its own convictions of its enormity and its mischievous tendency. The denomination applied to the offender is of no importance to the character of the act, though without designation otherwise, it may be as to the punishment of the offence. But there can be no difficulty in vindicating the classification of the offence described in the act as piracy. The acts of 1794, 1800, 1807, and 1818, abolished the slave trade, and prohibited the employment of American seamen and vessels, either in the foreign slave trade or in the importation of slaves to the United States. The American citizen was not allowed to acquire any title to the subject of such traffic, from any person concerned in it. The right of the inhabitants of Africa to their liberty to be inviolable by the inhabitants of the United States. To this limited extent they were placed upon the same conditions as the inhabitants of any other country. From a remote antiquity, the seizure and abduction of men and women, with the intent to dispose of them as slaves, by the crew or ship's company of vessels roaming at large for the purpose of plunder and traffic, have been deemed and always called acts of piracy. It was a capital offence by the Jewish law, and to steal a human being, man, woman or child, or to seize and forcibly carry away any person whatever from his own country into another, has always been considered to be piracy, and is now so considered by all nations enjoying Jewish and Christian instruction, punishable with death. The exclusion of the inhabitants of Africa from such protection, so far as the nations of Europe are concerned, commenced in the early part of the fourteenth century; the Portuguese having then begun the traffic in slaves from the western shores of that continent. But they placed their right to do so, and the exercise of it, upon the Roman law of "Jure gentium, servi nostri sunt qui ab hostibus capiuntur." Nor was it ever recognized in Europe to be allowable trade upon any other principle, until the emperor Charles V. authorized, in 1516, the introduction of Africans into the island of St. Domingo, from the establishments of the Portuguese on the coast of Guinea, to work the mines in that island. It was subsequently sanctioned by the nations of Europe for the same purpose and for agricultural labor, and for the last it was introduced by all of them into their respective colonial possessions in America. But now the sanction of all of them for such a trade having been withdrawn, and all of them having declared it to be piracy, the natural rights of the inhabitants of Africa are secured against the violation of them by their respective citizens and subjects, as to the transportation of them to any port of the world, with intent to make them slaves. A classical writer upon the manners of the ancient Greeks informs us: "The supply by war of slaves, there seldom equalled the demand; in consequence a race of kidnappers sprung up, partly merchants and partly pirates, who roamed about the shores of the Mediterranean, as such miscreants do now about the slave coasts, picking up solitary and unprotected individuals. Greek and Roman authorities tell us that when the Sclesian pirates had the possession of the Mediterranean, as many as ten thousand slaves were said to have been imported and sold in one day." Lord Stowell describes a pirate "as one who renounces every country, and ravages every country on its coasts, and vessels indiscriminately." And it is quite clear, politically and judicially, that a pirate is one who, without a commission from any public and recognized authority, shall ravage the coasts or vessels of any country indiscriminately. Mr. Jefferson, in his draft of the Declaration of Independence, denounces the African slave trade "as a piratical warfare, the opprobrium of infidel nations."

The motives and considerations which induced congress, with scarcely a division, to enact the law of May, 1820 [3 Stat. 600], are fully explained in the report of the committee of the house of representatives, which recommended the passage of the bill. "Congress," say the committee, "have heretofore marked with decided reprobation the authors and abettors of this iniquitous commerce in every form which it assumes, from the inception of its unrighteous purposes in America, through all the subsequent steps of its progress to its final consummation,—the outward voyage, the cruel seizure and forcible abduction of the unfortunate African from his native home, and the fraudulent transfer and sale of the person so acquired. It may, however, be questioned if a proper discrimination of their relative guilt has entered into the measure of punishment annexed to their criminal acts. Your committee cannot perceive wherein the offence of kidnapping an offending inhabitant of a foreign country, in chaining him down for a series of days, weeks, and months, amidst the dying and the dead, to the pestilential hold of a slave ship; of consigning him, if he chance to live out the voyage, to perpetual slavery in a remote and unknown land, differs in malignity from piracy, and why a milder punishment should follow the one than the other crime. Are there not united in this offence all that is most iniquitous in theft, most daring in robbery, and cruel in murder? If the internal wars of Africa and their desolating effects may be imputed to the slave trade,—and that the greater part of them must, cannot now be questioned,—his crime, considered in its remote as well as its proximate consequences, is the very darkest in the whole catalogue of human iniquities, and its authors should be regarded as hostes humani generis." In the year 1823, the house of representatives of congress adopted a resolution to request the president to prosecute, from time to time, negotiations with the several maritime powers of Europe and of America, for the effectual abolition of the African slave trade and its ultimate annunciation as piracy under the laws of nations by the consent of the civilized world. This resolution was adopted by a vote of 139 yeas to 9 nays, and among those who voted for it, were Mr. Buchanan, now our president; Mr. McLane, of Delaware; Mr. Poinsett, Mr. McDuffie, and General Hamilton, of South Carolina; Mr. Reid, of Georgia; Mr. Sergeant, of Pennsylvania; Stevenson, of Virginia, and Williams, of North Carolina. Charles Fenton Mercer, of Virginia, the mover of the resolution, said that technical objections have been urged and sneers have been indulged against the legal accuracy of the application of the term "piracy" to the offence. Such criticism has no sound reason to sustain it. The law of nations is in part natural, in part conventional. Its only sanction is to be found in the physical force; its authority in the express or local consent of nations. The consent of nations may make piracy of any offence on the seas. In seeking a denomination for a new crime, it is not necessary to invent a new term. The object of classing the prohibited act under an old title, is to provide for the former a definite and complete remedy. Piracy, under the law of nations, is alike understood and punished by all nations. And is there no analogy between the African slave trade and the offence of piracy, which would warrant the proposed classification of the former crime under the latter title? It may sometimes be difficult, amidst conflicting authorities, to say what is not piracy, but it cannot be so to determine what is. It is robbery on the high seas without a lawful commission from any recognized authority to take from a vessel, without color of law, a single package of goods. And is it not robbery to seize, not the property of the man, but the man himself; to chain him down, with hundreds of his fellows, in the pestilential hold of a slave ship, in order, if he chance to survive the voyage, to sell him to a foreign master? By a former law, almost coeval with our constitution, we made murder on the high seas piracy. The seizure of an African by the landing of the crew of a vessel with intent to make him a slave in a foreign land is kidnapping, and its consummation on the high seas is within the power of congress to "define and punish piracies." Search the etymology of the term of "piracy," and its applications to crimes, and nothing restricts it to the injuries to property, or to offences which have their inception and termination on the high seas. The act of violation may begin on the shore and be continued on the ocean for the consummation of its intentions elsewhere, and congress may define it to be either a piracy or a felony, according to its sense of the enormity of the purpose or intention of the persons concerned in it. Congress has defined it to be piracy, and has declared that it shall be punished with death.

The act of 15th May, 1820 [3 Stat. 600], on this subject, was a consummation of its legislation for the complete abolition of the slave trade. It was not passed under any momentary excitement or impulse, but it was the deliberate and considered act of the federal government to carry out a policy that had been disclosed in the first days of our existence as a free and independent people, and which in every stage of its history had been sanctioned by the moral sense of the people. Under the resolution before mentioned, which was so triumphantly passed in the house of representatives, the executive government entered upon negotiations with Great Britain, and in the year 1824 its parliament followed the lead of this country in designating the crime of abducting Africans from their shores to make them slaves as piracy. All the nations of Europe, as well as of America, have followed in the same legislation, and the object of the resolution of 1824 seems to be near its accomplishment.

Upon three occasions since 1824, the subject has been under the consideration of congress, and at each time has a determination been fully expressed to maintain the principles that had been incorporated into the legislation of the country. No part of it has been more explicit in that declaration than the states in my judicial circuit. Georgia declared in her constitution of 1798 that there should be no future importation of slaves into the state, from Africa, or any foreign place, after the first day of October ensuing. South Carolina prohibited negroes and slaves of any color from being brought into the state as early as the 4th November, 1788. That state's act of the 21st December, 1792, is to the same purpose, with this addition, that there should be no importation of slaves or negroes, mulattoes or Indians, Moors or mestizoes, bound to service for a term of years. And her repeated legislation from that time to the year 1803, extended and renewed the prohibition of the importation of slaves into that state. And it is a little amusing too, that the origin of the present African apprentice system was begun in attempts to violate her laws forbidding the importation of slaves or negroes under the pretence that they were only bound to service for a term of years. But the artifice was discovered, and the state has the credit of having accommodated her legislation to the fraud, so as to prevent and punish it. When the constitution was under discussion, the convention of North Carolina had no legislation directly to prohibit the importation of slaves. It only imposed duties upon the introduction of them into that state; but since the ratification of the constitution no state in the Union has more faithfully kept the act of congress prohibiting the importation of slaves, unless it be the state of South Carolina, for from what I have judicially witnessed in that state, I can say, notwithstanding there are a few there who are active advocates for the renewal of the slave trade, that the people of that state are not at all likely to recede from their long standing policy in that regard. In 1826, in the discussion of the Panama mission, Col. Hayne, a member of the senate from the state of South Carolina, said: "The United States were the first to set their faces against the slave trade, and the first to repress it among her citizens. We are entitled to the honor of having effectually accomplished this great object; not more by the force of our laws than by the omnipotent power of public opinion. In all measures of this character every portion of our fellow-citizens have cordially co-operated, and even in those states where slavery exists, the people have gone heart and hand with the government in every measure calculated to cut up this nefarious trade by the roots. In the state which I have the honor to represent, any man concerned directly or indirectly in this traffic would be indignantly driven out of society." Mr. Johnson, a member of the senate from Louisiana, said: "A general accordance in principle and sentiment prevails throughout the civilized world in regard to the duty and obligation of nations to exterminate the slave trade. It is the prevailing feeling of the age. This inhuman traffic, which fills the world with misery, ought to be effectually suppressed. It belongs to Christian nations to put an end to this infamous practice, with all the crimes and horrors that follow its commission." Judge Berrien, of Georgia, said: "For myself, I abhor the slave trade. It is abhorred by my constituents. Even at the time when it was tolerated by our laws, it was not in the Southern portion of this Union that its practical advocates were found." At a later period in the history of the country, 1853, the United States was called upon to consider the measures for the execution of the treaty of Ghent with Great Britain, relative to the suppression of the slave trade. These measures will be found in the treaty negotiated at Washington with that power, frequently called the "Webster-Ashburton Treaty." That treaty was ratified, and is now a part of the law of the land. The eighth article requires "both countries to prepare, equip, and maintain in service on the coast of Africa a sufficient and adequate squadron to enforce separately and respectively the laws, rights, and obligations of each of the two countries for the suppression of the slave trade." The ninth article recites that notwithstanding all efforts which may be made on the coast of Africa for suppressing the slave trade, the facilities for carrying on that trade and avoiding the vigilance of cruisers by the fraudulent use of flags and other means are so great, and the temptations so strong for pursuing it, while a market can be found for slaves, that the desired result may be long delayed unless all markets be shut against the purchase of African negroes. The parties to this treaty agree that they will unite in all becoming representations and remonstrances with any and all powers within whose dominions such markets are allowed to exist; and that they will urge upon all such powers the propriety of closing such markets at once and forever. This treaty was ratified by the senate by a vote of 39 ayes to 9 nays, three of those who voted in the negative representing slaveholding states. One of those was Col. Benton, and one of the grounds of his objection to the treaty was the clause just recited, but he declared the trade itself diabolical and infamous.

The constitution of the United States, mainly made by slaveholding states, authorized congress to put an end to the importation of slaves by a given day. Anticipating the limited day by legislation, congress had the law ready to take effect on the day permitted. On the 1st day of January, 1808, Mr. Jefferson being president, the importation of slaves became unlawful and criminal. A subsequent act following up the idea of Mr. Jefferson in the first draught of the Declaration of Independence, qualified the crime as piratical and delivered up its pursuers to the sword of justice, as the enemies of the human race. Vessels of war cruising on the coast of Africa under our act of 1819 [3 Stat. 532] have been directed to search our own vessels, to arrest the violators of the law, to bring in the ships for condemnation, and the men for punishment. At this time the government is not unmindful of this treaty obligation, for our next squadron for the coast of Africa will consist, I believe, of four steamers and as many sloops-of-war, and four steam ships will probably cruise off Cuba to intercept slaves that may escape the ships on the African coast. Mr. Calhoun voted for the ratification of the treaty, and expressed his clear convictions "that the policy of closing the markets of the world was both right and expedient in every point of view, that we were deeply committed against the traffic, both by legislation and treaty. The influence and the efforts of the civilized world were directed against it, and that too under our lead at the commencement." Still later, in 1855, the house of representatives, by a vote nearly unanimous, decided that it was not expedient to repeal the laws for the suppression of the slave trade.

The leading points in the legislative history of the laws under discussion have been referred to, to show upon what solid foundations of authority and consent on the part of the executive and legislative departments of the government, the laws for the suppression of the slave trade rest. No doubt has been entertained by the long succession of jurists and statesmen who have been concerned in their discussion and enactment of the constitutional power of congress to pass them. There is no question of public morality which has been more clearly and solemnly maintained than that on which this legislation reposes. It would be a retrograde movement of more than a century to consent to abate one line of the condemnation of this trade, or to relax any effort for its extirpation. Many of the clauses of these laws have come before the judiciary department of the United States for interpretation; property has been sentenced to confiscation, and men have been tried and some condemned, for the violation of them. Not a question has been decided in the circuit or in the supreme court which in any manner impugns their validity as constitutional enactments.

Having thus given you, gentlemen, the acts and their legislative history, all of which have hitherto had the support and concurrence of the people of the United States, and by no part of the people more so than by the people of the slave-holding states; should cases of the kind be submitted to you by the district attorney, you will no doubt show yourselves true and faithful to the constitution and laws of our country.

Case No. 18,270.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY—TREASON.

[4 Blatchf. 518; 1 23 Law Rep. 597.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Jan. 14, 1861.

THE LAW OF TREASON.

1. The provision of the constitution of the United States in regard to treason, explained.
2. What acts constitute treason and misprision of treason, under the act of April 30, 1790 (1 Stat. 112), defined.
3. A mere conspiracy to subvert by force the government, is not treason.

¹ [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

4. The combination of a body of men, with the design of seizing, and the actual seizing, of the forts and other public property of the United States, is a levying of war against the United States, and is treason.

5. All persons engaged therein are by the law regarded as levying war against the United States; and all who adhere to them are to be regarded as enemies; and all who give them, in any part of the United States, aid and comfort, come within the provisions of the act of April 30, 1790, and are guilty of treason.

6. What amounts to adhering to the enemies of the United States and giving them aid and comfort, explained.

7. The extent of the jurisdiction of this court in regard to the offences of treason and misprision of treason, defined.

SMALLEY, District Judge (charging grand jury). The court has requested your attendance this morning, in order to call your attention to, and give you some instructions in relation to, crimes which have long been unknown in our hitherto peaceful and happy country, which for more than fifty years the federal courts have not been called upon to investigate, and which are, therefore, very imperfectly understood in the community. Yet one of them is the highest crime known to the laws in any civilized country. It is that of high treason. Recent painful events make it the duty of the court to define to you what constitutes the offence, and also what constitutes the lesser crime of misprision of treason, that you may inquire whether either has been committed by any person or persons within the jurisdiction of this court, and, if you are satisfied that either has, that they may be presented to the court, to be dealt with according to law, and, also, that those who desire to be good and true citizens may be forewarned, and not ignorantly and unwittingly be led into the commission of any acts in violation of the laws of their country, and which would make them guilty of either of these offences. It is unnecessary at this time to enter into an elaborate disquisition on the law of treason. The constitution of the United States clearly defines in what it consists. The third section of the third article provides, that "treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." Again, the same section provides that "the congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason."

In pursuance of the power thus conferred, congress passed an act, which was approved April 30, 1790 (1 Stat. 112), which provides, in section one, "that if any person or persons, owing allegiance to the United States of America, shall levy war against them, or shall adhere to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort, within the United States or elsewhere, and shall be thereof convicted, on confession in open court, or on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act of the treason whereof he or they shall stand indicted, such person or persons shall be adjudged guilty of treason against the United States, and shall suffer death." Section two provides, "that if any person or persons, having knowledge of the commission of any of the treasons aforesaid, shall conceal, and not, as soon as may be, disclose and make known the same to the president of the United States, or some one of the judges thereof, or to the president or governor of a particular state, or some one of the judges or justices thereof, such person or persons, on conviction, shall be adjudged guilty of misprision of treason, and shall be imprisoned not exceeding seven years, and fined not exceeding one thousand dollars."

It is well known that war—civil war—exists in portions of the Union; and that persons owing allegiance to the United States have confederated together, and with arms, by force and intimidation, have prevented the execution of the constitutional acts of congress, have forcibly seized upon and hold a custom-house and post-office, forts, arsenals, vessels, and other property belonging to the United States, and have actually fired upon vessels bearing the United States flag and carrying United States troops. This is a usurpation of the authority of the federal government. It is high treason, by levying war. Either one of those acts will constitute high treason. There can be doubt of it. The fact that any or all engaged in the commission of these outrageous acts under the pretended authority of the legislature, or a convention of the people, of any state, or of the officers appointed thereby, or acting thereunder, does not change or affect the criminal character of the act. No man or body of men can throw off their allegiance to their government in that way. Nor can any state, or the people of any state, acting in any capacity whatever, absolve any person therefrom. Neither South Carolina nor any other state can authorize or legally protect citizens of the other states in waging war against their government, any more than can the queen of Great Britain or the emperor of France. If any such power is assumed it is without right, and the deluded individual who acts under it is none the less guilty of treason, and liable to be punished therefor.

That the slaveholding states have just cause of complaint against some of their sister states, is lamentably too true; and that the legislatures of several states have passed acts which are in direct conflict with one of the plainest provisions of the constitution of the United States, which acts were intended to deprive the slaveholding states of rights expressly guaranteed to, and important to them, is well known. This is deeply to be regretted; and it is hoped and believed that the sober second thought of the people of those states will induce them to do justice to themselves, as well as to their Southern brethren, and evince their loyalty to the constitution and the Union by speedily wiping all such acts from their statute books. But the fact that some of the states have passed unconstitutional acts, can afford no justification for rebellion and civil war, or a breaking up of the federal Union, which was formed by the patriotism and wisdom, conciliation and compromise of our fathers, and in which our prosperity as a people has been unparalleled in the history of nations. Such legislative acts, however, are not laws. Being in violation of the constitution of the United States, they are mere nullities, and all who attempt to enforce them are themselves violators of the laws, and can be, and in some instances have been, punished as such.

What overt acts, then, constitute treason? A mere conspiracy to subvert by force the government, however flagitious the crime may be, is not treason. To conspire to levy war, and actually to levy war, are distinct offences. If a body of people conspire and meditate an insurrection, to resist or oppose the laws of the United States by force, they are only guilty of a high misdemeanor; but, if they proceed to carry such intention into execution by force, they are guilty of treason by levying war. In the language of Chief Justice Marshall, in Ex parte Bollman, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 75, 126: "It is not the intention of the court to say that no individual can be guilty of this crime who has not appeared in arms against his country. On the contrary, if war be actually levied, that is, if a body of men be actually assembled for the purpose of effecting by force a treasonable purpose, all those who perform any part, however minute, or however remote from the scene of action, and who are actually leagued in the general conspiracy, are to be considered as traitors."

As the court has already said to you, the combination and assemblage of a body of men, with the design of seizing, and the actual seizing, of the forts and other public property in and near Charleston, South Carolina, and some other states, is a levying of war against the United States. Consequently, any and every person who engages therein is by the law regarded as levying war against the United States; and all who adhere to them are to be regarded as enemies; and all who give them aid and comfort, in South Carolina or New York, or in any other portion of the United States, or elsewhere, come within the express provisions of the first section of the act of April 30, 1790, and are guilty of treason.

What amounts to adhering to, and giving aid and comfort to our enemies, it is somewhat difficult in all cases to define; but certain it is, that furnishing them with arms or munitions of war, vessels or other means of transportation, or any materials which will aid the traitors in carrying out their traitorous purposes, with a knowledge that they are intended for such purposes, or inciting and encouraging others to engage in or aid the traitors in any way, does come within the provisions of the act. And it is immaterial whether such acts are induced by sympathy with the rebellion, hostility to the government, or a desire for gain.

Under the second section of the act of 1790, all who have any knowledge of any such acts of treason, and do not as soon as possible make it known, in the manner therein prescribed, are guilty of misprision of treason, and subject to the punishment therefor. Your inquiries must be confined to offences committed within the jurisdiction of this court, that is, within the Southern district of New York, and upon the high seas. Although there may be a question whether the jurisdiction of the court, in such cases, is not more extended, you will for the present confine your investigations to the limits prescribed. Within this limit it is your right and your duty to inquire whether any person or persons have been, according to the principles of law laid down by the court, guilty of treason or misprision of treason, and, if you are satisfied that either of these offences has been committed, to faithfully and fearlessly present the offenders, that they may be punished. It is the duty, and it will unquestionably be the desire, of all good and true citizens, to do, in their respective spheres, everything in their power to suppress rebellion, expose treason, and bring traitors to justice.

² [Inquiries having been made by the jury in reference to their duties, the court made the following observations: When the grand jury retired, the other day, one of the members of your body submitted on paper, certain questions to the court, which I shall now proceed to answer: "First. Whether it is the duty of the grand jury to inquire into violations of the law which may be incidentally brought to their knowledge, and which have not been presented by the district attorney, and which he had no knowledge of." In reply to that, the court would say, gentlemen, that you are not necessarily confined to offences to which your attention may be called by the prosecuting officer. If any one of you have reason to believe that any of the laws of the federal government have been violated, you are at liberty to inquire into the matter, whether or not your attention has been called to it by the district attorney. Unquestionably you have a right to make the investigation. The second inquiry is: "Whether it is expected of the jury to examine into the detention of felons and witnesses, as to their safety, treatment, and comfort, and as to whether any persons are kept an unwarrantable time before trial." The third inquiry is: "Whether it is expected that the grand jury would present such defects in the practice in the custom-house as render it easy for the clearance of vessels for the slave trade." With respect to that, gentlemen, it may be well to consider, for a moment, what is the jurisdiction of the federal courts. First, then, they can only inquire into violations of the federal laws. The federal courts have no common-law criminal jurisdiction, and they therefore have no jurisdiction over offences that are not created by the constitution, or some act of congress under the constitution. I understand that, in many of the states, it is by express statute made the duty of grand juries to inquire into matters referred to in the second and third interrogatories submitted to the court. English grand juries have also frequently inquired into such matters, and made presentment thereof to the court, and probably it is a part of the common law that they should do so; but the court is not aware of any act of congress, nor of any practice in the federal courts, which renders it your duty to make any of the investigations contemplated by either of these questions. The court does not intend to say that you may not make such examinations and inquiries, only that they are outside of your judicial duties, and, if you make report to the court, it has no power to act, and can do nothing more than to order it filed with its records. Such investigations, therefore, cannot be regarded as a part of the official duties of grand juries in the federal courts. You are at liberty now to retire, gentlemen, and proceed with the business before you.]²

² [From 23 Law Rep. 597.]

Case No. 18,271.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY—TREASON.

[5 Blatchf. 549.]¹

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 4, 1861.

THE LAW OF TREASON.

1. To constitute the crime of treason, in levying war against the United States, as defined in article 3, § 3, of the constitution, there must be an actual levying of war. A consultation or conspiracy to do so is not an overt act, within the constitutional definition.

2. What acts constitute adhering to the enemies of the United States, giving them aid and comfort, within article 3, § 3, of the constitution, considered.

3. Words, oral, written or printed, however treasonable, seditious or criminal of themselves, do not constitute an overt act of treason.

4. The extent to which the fact of the use of such words may be used, in finding an indictment, or on the trial of it, considered.

5. There is no law of the United States making the use of treasonable words an offence.

6. In a civil war, persons who adhere to their allegiance, are not, although they reside in an insurrectionary district, regarded as enemies; and trade with such persons in good faith and without collusion with the enemy, is lawful, unless interdicted by the government.

7. The provisions of the act of July 13, 1861 (12 Stat. 255), in regard to trade with territory in insurrection, explained, as bearing on the subject of treason.

NELSON, Circuit Justice, in charging the grand jury, after instructing them in regard to several cases to be brought before them, proceeded as follows:

The unhappy condition of our country, arising out of the unnatural struggle of the people of a portion of the Union to overthrow their government, has created new relations among, and imposed new duties upon, the citizens, which have brought into operation crimes and guilt that, to the great credit of the country, have heretofore been rare; indeed, I may say, almost unknown to her laws and judicial tribunals. I refer to the crime of treason against the United States. Although no case of this description has been presented by the district-attorney to be specially submitted to you, it may not be out of place to call your attention, in a general way, to the elements constituting this offence. It is the highest crime known to society, and was deemed by the founders of our government of such importance, both in respect to the government and the citizen, that they specially defined it in the constitution; thus, taking it out of the power of legislative regulation. The definition is found in the third section of the third article, as follows: "Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort. No person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court." The power to annex the punishment was left to congress, which annexed the penalty of death. This definition of the crime was taken from the statute of 25 Edw. III. of England, and which has been several times reaffirmed, for the purpose of correcting abuses that had grown up in that kingdom in respect to the law, both by acts of parliament and the decisions of courts, under the tyrannical reigns of the Tudors and the Stuarts. Those abuses were well known to the founders of our government, and doubtless led to the peculiar phraseology observable in the definition of the crime, namely, that it shall consist only in levying war against the United States, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort; and to the other equally stringent feature, that no person shall be convicted of the offence except on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act. The first prohibits congress from making any other act of the citizen than those specified, treason; and the second prevents the introduction of constructive treasons, which had been engrafted upon this statute of Edw. III. by judicial decisions.

² [From 23 Law Rep. 597.]

¹ [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Under the first clause of the provision—levying war against the United States—there can be no great difficulty in determining the facts and circumstances which establish the crime. There must be an actual levying of war. A consultation or conspiracy to do so, is not an overt act, within the constitutional definition.

There is more difficulty in determining what constitutes the overt act under the second clause—namely, adhering to the enemy, giving him aid and comfort. Questions arising under this clause must depend very much upon the facts and circumstances of each particular case. There are some acts of the citizen, in his relations with the enemy, which leave no room for doubt—such as, giving intelligence, with intent to aid him in his acts of hostility—sending him provisions or money—furnishing arms, or troops, or munitions of war—surrendering a military post, &c., all with a like intent. These and kindred acts are overt acts of treason, by adhering to the enemy.

Words oral, written or printed, however treasonable, seditious or criminal of themselves, do not constitute an overt act of treason, within the definition of the crime. When spoken, written or printed in relation to an act or acts which, if committed with a treasonable design, might constitute such overt act, they are admissible as evidence tending to characterize it, and to show the intent with which the act was committed. They may also furnish some evidence of the act itself, against the accused. This is the extent to which such publications may be used, either in finding a bill of indictment or on the trial of it. An attempt was made, in the parliament of England, during the reign of James II. to make treasonable words the subject of this crime; but it was resisted by the friends of constitutional liberty and defeated, and since that time it has not been renewed.

Such publications are misdemeanors at common law, indictable, and punishable by fine and imprisonment. But, as there are no common law offences cognizable in the federal courts, unless made so by act of congress, and as congress has passed no act on the subject, this court has no jurisdiction over them. The only act passed by congress on the subject was the act of July 14, 1798 (1 Stat. 596). The second section of that act provided, that if any person should write, print, utter, or publish any false, scandalous and malicious writing, or writings, against the government, or either house of congress, or the president, with intent to defame the government, or either house of congress, or the president, or to bring them or either of them into contempt or disrepute, or to excite against them or either of them the hatred of the people of the United States, or to stir up sedition within the same, or to excite unlawful combinations therein for opposing or resisting any law, or any act of the president done in pursuance thereof, &c., such person, on conviction, should be punished by a fine not exceeding $2,000, and by imprisonment not exceeding two years. The act was a temporary one, and expired on the 3d of March, 1801, by its own limitation, and no similar act has since been passed.

On the breaking out of a war between two nations, the citizens or subjects of the respective belligerents are deemed, by the law of nations, to be the enemies of each other. The same is true, in a qualified sense, in the case of a civil war arising out of an insurrection or rebellion against the mother government. In the latter case, the citizens or subjects residing within the insurrectionary district, not implicated in the rebellion, but adhering to their allegiance, are not enemies, nor to be regarded as such. This distinction was constantly observed by the English government in the disturbances in Scotland, under the Pretender and his son, in the years 1715 and 1745. It modifies the law, as it respects the condition of the citizens or subjects residing within the limits of the revolted district, who remain loyal to the government. As it respects those of two sovereign nations in a state of war, all commercial intercourse between them is forbidden by the law of nations, all contracts are unlawful, and any goods or property, the subjects of the illicit trade, are liable to seizure and confiscation. This is true, also, as it respects the citizens or subjects in revolt and making war upon the mother government. But trade with the loyal portion of the people in the disaffected district, in good faith and without collusion with the enemy, is lawful, unless interdicted by the government. The principle is recognized by the recent act of congress, passed July 13, 1861 (12 Stat. 255). The fifth section provides, that the president, by proclamation, may declare that the inhabitants of a state, or of any part of it, are in a state of insurrection, and, thereupon, all commercial intercourse shall cease between the citizens thereof and the citizens of the rest of the United States, and the goods and merchandise, &c., the subject of the illicit trade, shall be liable to seizure and confiscation. Here, the trade and intercourse are interdicted by the proper authority, and the interdiction applies to the loyal as well as the disloyal citizens or inhabitants. The sixth section goes further, and forfeits any ship or vessel belonging, in whole or in part, to a citizen or inhabitant of the interdicted state or district, found at sea or in any port of the rest of the United States. The forfeiture applies to the loyal as well as the disloyal citizens in the disaffected district, probably, from the difficulty of making the forfeiture practical and complete against the latter without making it general. The government, however, having a general control over the subject, can remedy any injustice as respects the loyal citizen, by releasing the forfeiture. This section, in terms, forfeits the whole of the vessel if part belongs to the citizens of the disaffected district, and would seem to carry with it any interest in the vessel belonging to citizens of the loyal states. This, however, can hardly have been the intention of congress. Trade with the enemy, as I have already said, according to the law of nations, is forbidden, and, the property engaged in it is liable to forfeiture, as is the trade in the particular cases specified in the act of congress referred to. But, this is all. The act is not made criminal; and, until it is made so by congress, no punishment is annexed to it, except the forfeiture of the goods. But, this interdicted trade may be carried on in such a way as to expose the parties concerned to the crime of treason. If carried on for the purpose and with the intent of giving aid and assistance to the enemy in their hostility against the government, the act would furnish an overt act of adhering to the enemy, giving him aid and comfort. Every citizen therefore, engaged in carrying on this illicit trade, will find a much greater peril accompanying the enterprise than the mere forfeiture of his goods.

Case No. 18,272.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY—TREASON.

[1 Bond, 609.]¹

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. Oct., 1861.

TREASON AGAINST UNITED STATES—CONSTITUTIONAL DEFINITION—ACTS COVERED THEREBY—CONSPIRACY TO OVERTHROW GOVERNMENT—RECRUITING INSURRECTIONARY FORCES.

[1. To be employed in actual service in an army raised to oppose the government in its action, or directly or indirectly to aid or assist in the levying or embodying of a military force for the subversion of the government, are plainly acts of "levying war," and involve the commission of the crime of treason. The constitutional definition of treason, however, is of broader signification, and includes all those who join a hostile army after war is begun.]

[2. Treason may be predicated of acts which are not a direct levying of war. The words "adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort," include, in general, any act committed after war actually exists which indicates a want of loyalty to the government and sympathy with its enemies, and which, by fair construction, is directly in furtherance of their hostile designs. If this be the natural effect of the act, though prompted solely by the expectation of pecuniary gain, it is treasonable in character.]

[3. Thus, after war actually exists, it is treasonable to sell to, or provide arms or munitions of war, or military stores and supplies, including food, clothing, etc., for the use of the enemy; to hire, sell, or furnish boats, railroad cars, or other means of transportation, or to advance money or obtain credits for the use and support of the hostile army; and to communicate intelligence to the enemy by letter, telegraph, or otherwise, relating to the strength, movements, or position of the army.]

[4. The meaning of the words "overt act" as used in the constitutional definition of treason and in the statute, is an act of a character susceptible of clear proof, and not resting in mere inference or conjecture. They were intended to exclude the possibility of a conviction upon proof of facts which were only treasonable by construction or inference, or which had no better foundation than mere suspicion.]

[5. Mere expressions of opinion indicative of sympathy with the public enemy, though sufficient to justify a strong feeling of indignation against the individual, and the suspicion that he is at heart a traitor, are not sufficient, under the constitution and laws, to warrant a conviction of treason.]

[6. The act of August 6, 1861 (12 Stat. 317), making it a high misdemeanor to recruit soldiers or sailors in any state or territory to engage in armed hostility against the United States, or to open a recruiting station for the enlistment of such persons, was intended to reach acts not deemed treasonable under the statute of 1790.]

[7. The act of July 31, 1861 (12 Stat. 284), making it a high crime to conspire to overthrow or destroy by force the government of the United States, or to levy war against the United States, or to force their authority, or to do certain other acts therein specified, was designed to punish the mere act of conspiring, which, under the constitutional definition and the act of 1790, do not involve the crime of treason, unless there is an attempt to consummate the treasonable act.]

LEAVITT, District Judge (charging grand jury). You have been summoned and sworn as a grand jury of the United States for the Southern district of Ohio; and, according to the tenor of the oath you have just taken, it will be your duty to inquire into all crimes against the laws of the United States committed within the district; and, upon sufficient evidence, to return bills of indictment against the persons accused. It is not necessary, on this occasion, that I should refer specially to all the crimes and offenses defined and punished by the various acts of congress, and which are properly within your cognizance as a grand jury. I shall therefore notice such only as you will in all probability be called upon to investigate in the proper discharge of your duties. Among these, I am informed, there will be some involving the charge of treason against the United States.

The constitution declares that "treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort," and that "no person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court." The act of congress of April 30, 1790 [1 Stat. 112], adopts the words of the constitution in defining the crime, and declares that on conviction in accordance therewith the punishment shall be death. Neither the constitution nor the act of congress specifies the precise acts which shall constitute the crime. As it would be impossible for any human intellect to foresee all the circumstances under which it might be committed, the framers of the constitution and of the statute wisely determined not to attempt such a specification. It was, therefore, a necessity that something should be left to the discretion of courts and judges, in determining what facts shall constitute treason. There is, however, a salutary limitation to the exercise of their discretion in the provision that there can be no conviction unless on the public confession of the accused party, made in court, or by the evidence of two witnesses to the same overt act of treason. The object of the provision is to prevent the probability of a conviction for a mere constructive treason. In the earlier periods of English history, the judges were often the pliant tools of the king, and exercised the power of punishing for constructive treasons, under circumstances the most revolting and greatly to the oppression of innocent persons. The wise and sagacious framers of our constitution have effectually guarded against such abuses of power, by declaring there shall be no conviction for this high crime on mere suspicion or on proof of any fact which is not an overt act of treason established by two witnesses. This provision applies as well to the legislative as to the judicial department of the government, and an act of congress, therefore, in conflict with it would be a nullity.

It would be a vain effort to attempt to designate every act, which, in its legal import, would be levying war against the government, or giving aid and comfort to the public enemy after a war is actually begun. Under the first division of the constitutional definition of treason, there are some acts, the treasonable character of which is apparent to the mental consciousness of every one. To be employed in actual service in an army raised to oppose the government in its action, or directly or indirectly to aid or assist in the levying or embodying a military force for the subversion of the government, are plainly acts of levying war, and involve the commission of the crime of treason in its most aggravated form. But the words referred to have a broader signification. As remarked by Chief Justice Marshall, in the trial of Burr, those who join the hostile army after the war is begun, are equally guilty of levying war within the meaning of the constitution and the act of congress. That learned judge states the law in these words: "If a body of men be actually assembled for the purpose of effecting by force a treasonable purpose, all those who perform any part, however minute, or however remote from the scene of action, and who are in the general conspiracy, are to be considered as traitors." [Case No. 14,693.]

¹ [Reprinted by permission.]

But without stopping to specify more fully what acts may be understood as a direct levying of war, I will notice briefly what are included in the words, "adhering to the enemies of the United States, giving them aid and comfort." This language leaves no room to doubt, that treason may be predicated of acts, which are not a direct levying of war according to the construction of that phrase, as just indicated. The words in the definition, "adhering to their enemies," seem to have no special significance, as the substance is found in the words which follow—"giving them aid and comfort." As before remarked, it is not an easy task to classify or specify the acts, which bring a party within the range of this branch of the definition. In general, when war exists, any act clearly indicating a want of loyalty to the government, and sympathy with its enemies, and which, by fair construction, is directly in furtherance of their hostile designs, gives them aid and comfort. Or, if this be the natural effect of the act, though prompted solely by the expectation of pecuniary gain, it is treasonable in its character. Without going into details on the subject, I will briefly notice some things clearly involving the guilt of treason. Thus, to sell to, or provide arms or munitions of war, or military stores, or supplies, including food, clothing, etc., for the use of the enemy, is within the penalty of the statute. And to hire, sell or furnish boats, railroad cars, or other means of transportation, or to advance money, or obtain credits, for the use and support of a hostile army, is treasonable. It is equally clear that the communication of intelligence to the enemy, by letter, telegraph, or otherwise, relating to the strength, movements, or position of the army, is an act of treason. These acts, thus briefly noted, show unequivocally an adherence to the enemy, and an unlawful purpose of giving him aid and comfort.

It has been already noticed, that to justify a conviction for treason, unless the crime is confessed in open court, there must be the evidence of two witnesses to an overt act. The plain meaning of the words "overt act," as used in the constitution and the statute, is an act of a character susceptible of clear proof, and not resting in mere inference or conjecture. They were intended to exclude the possibility of a conviction of the odious crime of treason, upon proof of facts which were only treasonable by construction or inference, or which have no better foundation than mere suspicion. In its benign caution on this subject, the law requires not only proof of a treasonable act, but that it should be established by the oaths of two witnesses. Hence, it will be obvious that however strong may be the grounds of suspicion or belief, that an individual is disloyal to his country or his government, until his disloyalty is developed by some open and provable act, he is not legally guilty of the crime of treason. And it follows, also, that mere expressions of opinion indicative of sympathy with the public enemy, will not ordinarily involve the legal guilt of that crime. They may well justify a strong feeling of indignation against the individual, and the suspicion that he is, at heart, a traitor, but will not be a sufficient basis for his conviction in a court of law. Whether, on the principle of self-preservation in times of great public danger, the summary arrest of such a person, under the military authority of the government, may not be both necessary and proper, is a different question, not in any way connected with the discharge of your duties as grand jurors. There may be circumstances justifying the exercise of such a power as a military necessity. But the constitution and laws of the United States are your guides in the performance of your duties. You, as a grand jury, and this court, as a court of the Union, derive all their powers from this source. Neither can willfully overleap the limits prescribed for its action without a sacrifice of integrity and of all claim to the respect and confidence of every right-minded American citizen.

Without detaining you by any further exposition of the law of treason, I will call your attention to the offense of misprision of treason, defined and punished by section 2 of the act of 1790. This section provides, in substance, that if any person having knowledge of the commission of an act of treason shall conceal it, or not make it promptly known to the proper authority, he shall be liable to punishment by fine and imprisonment. The section is so clear in its terms as to render any comment unnecessary. It will be obvious to you that the concealment of treason may involve the most serious consequences to the public, and, on sufficient proof, should be visited with the severest penalty of the law.

It is my duty also to call your attention to two other acts of congress, passed at the recent special session of that body, the provisions of which have some connection with the present state of our national affairs. The first to which I shall refer is the act approved August 6, 1861, which provides, "that if any person shall be guilty of the act of recruiting soldiers or sailors in any state or territory of the United States, to engage in armed hostility against the United States, or who shall open a recruiting station for the enlistment of such persons, either as regulars or volunteers as aforesaid, he shall be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and upon conviction in any court of record, having jurisdiction of the offense, shall be fined a sum not less than two hundred dollars, nor more than one thousand dollars, and confined and imprisoned for a period not less than one year nor more than five years." The second section subjects the person enlisted to a fine of one hundred dollars and to imprisonment, not less than one year nor more than three years. In reference to this statute, I may remark, it seems to have been the view of the congress by which it was enacted, that recruiting or enlisting soldiers or sailors for the service of the enemy, or opening a recruiting station for that purpose, or the act of being enlisted, were not treasonable within the law of 1790, and that further legislation was therefore needed to warrant their punishment.

It is also proper to call the attention of the grand jury to another statute, approved the 31st of July last, "to define and punish certain conspiracies." This statute has but one section, which provides, "that if two or more persons within any state or territory of the United States shall conspire together to overthrow or put down, or to destroy by force, the government of the United States, or to levy war against the United States, or to oppose by force the authority of the government of the United States; or by force to prevent, hinder, or delay the execution of any law of the United States; or by force to seize, take, or possess any property of the United States, against the will or contrary to the authority of the United States; or by force, or intimidation, or threat to prevent any person from accepting or holding any office of trust or place of confidence, under the United States; each and every person so offending shall be guilty of a high crime." The punishment is by fine not less than five hundred and not more than five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment not less than six months nor more than six years, or by both fine and imprisonment. The jury will notice that this statute punishes a conspiracy by two or more, to do any of the unlawful acts which it specifies. Under the act of 1790, defining and punishing treason, it has been held by the courts, that to conspire to overthrow the government, or to do any hostile act against it, did not invoke the crime of treason, unless there was an attempt to consummate the treasonable act. Hence the necessity of the late statute, to meet the case of a treasonable conspiracy. And it is perhaps to be regretted that this provision had not been a part of the act of 1790. With such a provision of law, properly enforced, there is reason to believe many persons who have been prominent in our national affairs, and once high in the confidence of the people, would have been the subjects of its penalties; and thus the great rebellion now in progress may have been prevented.

It may also be worthy of the notice of the grand jury, that by the act just referred to, it is declared to be a crime to conspire "by force to prevent, hinder, or delay the execution of any law of the United States." For many years a law has been in force, affixing punishment to any forcible opposition to the execution of an act of congress, but a mere conspiracy for that purpose was not criminal until the passage of the act of last July. There can be but little doubt, that if the provisions referred to had been earlier in force, it would have subjected to deserved punishment some individuals who were parties to unlawful conspiracies, but who directly avoided any active participation in executing their purposes, and who were not therefore within the reach of the law.

It does not occur to me that there are any other statutory provisions, having any direct bearing on the present state of our national affairs, or your duties in connection with the conflict now in progress, to which it is necessary to call your attention. It is a time when grand jurors should be vigilant and faithful in the discharge of their duties. Every loyal citizen, whatever may be his position or place in the community, is required to stand up fearlessly in defense of the government. It can not be disguised or concealed that our once happy and united country is encompassed by perils that must excite the deep solicitude of every patriotic heart. We are called upon to confront and put down a rebellion of formidable aspect and dimensions, and which for the unmitigated atrocity of its designs, and the madness and infatuation of those who began, and are now engaged in it, has no parallel in history. Its object is no less than the total subversion of a government devised and founded by the far-reaching wisdom of our fathers, in every part of the structure of which they have legibly inscribed their deep devotion to the great principles of constitutional liberty, and evinced a philanthropy co-extensive with the whole human race. And rightly administered, the constitution they have given us is suited to promote, beyond any ever devised by mere human intelligence, the happiness and prosperity of those who live under its benign sway. It is truly gratifying to know that among the citizens of the loyal states, as also in the minds of many of those now in rebellion, there is a prevalent conviction that the preservation of a government founded in such a spirit and for such exalted purposes is worth every conceivable sacrifice. And there is the most unmistakable indications of an unalterable determination to perpetuate it, in its integrity and purity, at every hazard. With this wide-spread and elevated patriotic feeling, and steadfast devotion to the Union, we are hopeful for the future of our country. We may meet with reverses, and be called upon to endure many fiery trials, but we can not doubt that these will be met with heroic firmness and a unity of purpose altogether invincible. There is nothing extravagant in the belief that, though dark clouds now hang upon our horizon, we may look forward to a time when the present rebellion shall be effectually suppressed, and the government ordained and established by our patriotic fathers shall come out of the conflict, not only uninjured, but strengthened and purified by the trial to which it has been subjected, and with an increased capacity for extending and multiplying the blessing it has already so largely conferred. But the occasion is not suitable for an extended discussion of our national affairs. I have adverted thus briefly to the subject for the sole purpose of reminding you of the solemn responsibility resting on you as grand jurors, in the present crisis of the country, and of exhorting you to a careful inquiry into any charges which may be brought to your notice, involving the crime of treason or any of the kindred offenses to which I have referred. I shall not detain you with a reference to the specific accusations which you may be required to investigate. While in the discharge of your duties you will be impressed with the necessity of due vigilance; it will be equally obvious to you that you should act with a proper measure of caution and deliberation. Treason is justly considered the highest crime against society. Having for its object an assault by violence on the government, and thus to effect its overthrow, it may imperil the happiness and lives of millions. The crime is, therefore, odious in the view of those who are thus liable to suffer as the result of its perpetration. The mere suspicion of guilt often brings down upon its object a strong feeling of public indignation, attended perhaps with the most serious consequences to the suspected person. Such results are not uncommon when there is a high state of excitement in a community. Facts may be misrepresented, or so distorted, as to induce this suspicion without any real cause; or a vindictive personal enemy may fabricate statements to the prejudice of another for the base purpose of bringing odium upon him. Thus, it may happen that a citizen of the purest character, and the most patriotic heart, may be a grievous sufferer. Let me, therefore, suggest to the grand jury, that in their investigation of charges involving the high crime of treason, they should carefully exclude from their minds all influences originating in mere popular excitement or which may be supposed to be the result of personal enmity. If, after a calm inquiry into the facts, the jury believe that the accused person is guilty of treason, they ought not to hesitate in returning a bill according to their convictions, whatever may be the result to the party implicated. But in regard to treason, and indeed all other crimes, the jury should reach a rational conclusion, from the law and the evidence, that the person accused is guilty, before returning a true bill against him.

A grand jury has only the evidence which the government can adduce, without reference to what the defendant may have in his power to bring forward, in proof of his innocence. They ought, therefore, to be able to say under the solemnity of their oaths, that there is reasonable ground for the inference of guilt. And, as before intimated as to all crimes, it must appear that the act charged was committed within the limits of the Southern district of Ohio. If treason is the crime charged, there must be a distinct allegation in the indictment of the overt act or acts; and although a grand jury return a true bill for this crime, there can be no conviction unless an overt act is proved by two witnesses. And it may well be doubted, whether it is expedient to indict for this crime in cases where it is certain the evidence required by law can not be produced before a traverse jury, and where consequently there can be no conviction.

Case No. 18,273.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY—TREASON.

[1 Spr. 602; 23 Law Rep. 705.]¹

District Court, D. Massachusetts. March, 1861.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — SUPREMACY OF NATIONAL GOVERNMENT — RESISTANCE BY STATES TO ENFORCEMENT OF LAWS—WHAT CONSTITUTES TREASON—JURISDICTION OF NATIONAL COURTS—MODES OF PROCEDURE—QUALIFICATIONS AND SELECTION OF JURORS.

[1. The government of the United States is not a mere confederacy. It is, on the contrary, a government possessing the highest attributes of sovereignty, embracing a legislature to enact laws, a judiciary to expound them, and an executive to enforce them. These laws, within the sphere of their operation, act directly upon individuals, and are of paramount authority over all the territory of every state. They cannot be annulled, nor the force of any of them be in any degree impaired, by any state law, constitution, ordinance, or resolve.]

[2. The Criminal Code of the United States is in full force over all persons and places within every state of the Union, notwithstanding any attempt to invalidate it by any organization, whether in the form of state legislatures, conventions, or other voluntary associations.]

[3. If a body of men be actually assembled for the purpose of effecting a treasonable purpose by force, that is levying war. But it must be an assemblage in force, a military assemblage in a condition to make war.]

SPRAGUE, District Judge (charging grand jury). It is the duty of the court to give you some instructions upon the criminal jurisprudence of the United States.

The times invite especial attention to that branch which relates to resistance to the laws, and endeavors to subvert the national authority.

The government of the United States is often spoken of as if it were a mere confederacy. This is a fundamental and dangerous error. We had a confederacy during the Revolution, but when the external pressure of a foreign war was removed, its inherent weakness was such as to render it indispensable that a government should be substituted in its stead. This was achieved by the constitution of the United States. It emphatically established a government with the highest attributes of sovereignty, embracing a legislature to enact laws, a judiciary to expound them, and an executive to enforce them. These laws operate directly upon individuals. The several states also have a power of legislation within their respective limits.

Thus, in our complex system, we have two governments, each with a power of legislation over the same territory, and acting upon the same persons. The danger of a conflict of laws from these two sources was palpable, and our fathers wisely and carefully provided against it. They marked out the sphere of the general government with all practicable clearness and precision, and within that sphere made its power supreme. This supremacy was not left to inference, but is provided for in the most explicit terms.

Article 6 says: "This constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges, in every state, shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding."

Thus the constitution and laws of the United States extend and are paramount over all the territory of every state, and cannot be annulled, nor the force of either of them be in any degree impaired by any law of a state, no matter in what form or with what solemnity, such law may have been enacted, or by what name it may be designated; whether it be a constitution, an ordinance, a statute, or a resolve. So far as it conflicts with the constitution, or with any valid law of the United States, it is utterly nugatory, and can afford no legal protection whatever to those who act under it. The Criminal Code of the United States is, therefore, in full force over all persons and places within the limits of the thirty-four states, notwithstanding any attempt to invalidate them by any organization, whether in the form of state legislatures, conventions, or other voluntary associations.

The highest crime known to our law is treason. This offence is defined by the constitution itself in the following words:

"Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." [Article 3, § 3.]

These terms, "levying war," "adhering to enemies," "giving them aid and comfort," were not new. They had been well known in English jurisprudence at least as far back as the reign of Edw. III. They had been frequently the subject of judicial exposition, and their meaning was to a great extent well settled.

The question what amounts to levying war, arose soon after the adoption of our constitution, in the several trials of Mitchell [Case No. 15,788], Vigol [Id. 16,621], and Fries [Id. 5-127], for being engaged in the Pennsylvania insurrection against the law imposing a duty upon distilled spirits, under the administration of Washington, and subsequently in the trial of Aaron Burr, in the year 1807 [Id. 14,693], and in the case of U. S. v. Hoxie [Id. 15,407], in the year 1808. These were trials in the circuit court.

The only case which has come before the supreme court, was that of Ex parte Bollman, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 125. It is settled that if a body of men be actually assembled for the purpose of effecting a treasonable purpose by force, that is levying war. But it must be an assemblage in force, a military assemblage in a condition to make war. U. S. v. Burr [Case No. 14,693]. A mere conspiracy to overthrow the government, however atrocious such conspiracy may be, does not of itself amount to the crime of treason. Thus, if a convention, legislature, junto, or other assemblage, entertain the purpose of subverting the government, and to that end pass acts, resolves, ordinances or decrees, even with the view of raising a military force to carry their purpose into effect, this alone does not constitute a levying of war.

What is a treasonable purpose? If the object be to prevent by force the execution of any public law of the United States, generally and in all cases, that is a treasonable purpose, for it is entirely to overthrow the government as to one of its laws. And if there be such an assemblage as I have already described, for the purpose of carrying such an intention into effect by force, it will constitute levying war.

But the sudden outbreak of a mob, or the assembling of men in order, by force, to defeat the execution of the law, in a particular instance, and then to disperse, without the intention to continue together, or to re-assemble for the purpose of defeating the law generally, in all cases, is not levying war.

If the purpose be entirely to overthrow the government at any one place, by force, that is a treasonable purpose.

This was the well known law before the adoption of our constitution, and has been affirmed by the supreme court of the United States in Ex parte Bollman [supra]. The place to which that case had reference was New Orleans.

¹ [Reprinted by permission.]

And if a body of men be actually assembled in force, in a condition to make war, in order to overturn the government at any one place by force, that is levying war. Nor is it necessary that the assemblage should be with military arms and array—numbers may supply the requisite force.

If any such assemblage for the purpose of subverting the government at any place, take forcible possession of any fort, arsenal, or other property of the United States, it is a still more flagrant act of levying war.

If such acts have been committed anywhere within the United States, it may become a material inquiry, how far persons, who are not present with the body of men so assembled, may, although distant, be involved in the guilt, and subject to the penalties, of treason. If war be actually levied, "All those who perform any part, however minute, or however remote from the scene of action, and who are actually leagued in the general conspiracy, are to be considered as traitors." Ex parte Bollman, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 126.

Thus far the law has been decided by the highest authority. I do not think it necessary, on this occasion, to go farther and inquire to what extent the English doctrines are to be followed under our definition of treason.

Thus if a person in league with those who are levying war send them arms, provisions, money or intelligence for the purpose of aiding them, he may be a traitor, however distant from the place of their assemblage.

Therefore, if the actual assemblage be at Charleston or at New Orleans, any person owing allegiance to the United States, however distant he may be, may become a traitor by being in conspiracy with them, and rendering them assistance. It is possible, therefore, that such acts may be within the jurisdiction of this court, so far as to be proper subjects for your investigation.

The constitution has not only defined the crime of treason, but prescribed a rule of evidence: "No person shall be convicted of treason, unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court."

The reason of these extraordinary safeguards is to be found in the nature of the offence, and in the pages of history. An attempt to overthrow the government excites the deepest indignation in great numbers, especially in those who are imbued with a warm and devoted patriotism, the cherished sentiment of a life-time, strengthened by a matured conviction of the vastness of the interests which are wrapped up in the inviolability of the sovereign power, that power which is the guardian of their safety, the daily dispenser of blessings, and the object of their prayers. A traitorous assault upon it arouses the strongest passions, and in the keenness of their resentment, and the eager pursuit of the guilty, they are apt to break down the barriers which are essential to the protection of innocence. Our fathers, therefore, endeavored to render some of these safeguards impregnable, by imbedding them in the fundamental law.

By the constitution, treason, or other crime committed within the limits of the United States, can be tried only within the state and judicial district within which it was committed; and the accused has the right to a trial by jury in such state and district.

If, therefore, treason has been committed at Charleston or at New Orleans, it can be tried only by a jury in South Carolina or Louisiana.

And if the condition of either of those states be such that the judicial tribunals of the United States cannot or will not perform their functions, crimes there committed, however atrocious, cannot be punished by the regular administration of justice.

The laws themselves are equally valid and equally paramount, notwithstanding the recency of the agents by whom they should be enforced.

Congress may provide a more efficient judicial system than that which now exists.

They have heretofore adopted some of the state laws and modes of procedure, and especially those which prescribe the qualifications of jurors, and the mode in which they shall be elected or summoned. This is wise, as conducive to harmony and convenience, so long as justice can thus be duly administered.

But the United States are under no necessity of conforming to state law, or of using any part of its machinery.

It is competent for the national legislature to prescribe the qualifications of jurors, and the manner in which they shall be selected and summoned. They may even authorize the marshal himself to select suitable persons. Indeed, congress may make their judicial system complete for the independent exercise of all its functions.

As we have seen, treason may be committed at places remote from the seat of the rebellion, by co-operating with the rebels and sending them arms, intelligence, or intentionally rendering other assistance, and the trial of such offence will be had in the state and district where committed.

As to offences committed without the limits of the United States, it is left to the national legislature to determine in what place they shall be tried, and this power they have exercised by St. 1790, c. 9, § 8 [1 Stat. 113], and St. 1825, c. 65, § 14 [4 Stat. 118], which provide that the trial of all offences which shall be committed upon the high seas, or elsewhere, out of the limits of any state or district, shall be in the district where the offender is apprehended, or into which he may be first brought.

Congress may alter these statutes, and provide other places for the trial of such offences, whenever the public safety or welfare may, in their judgment, render it proper; but as the law now stands, when a crime has been committed on the high seas, or in any place not within any state or district, if the offender has been legally arrested without the limits of the United States, and brought in custody into any judicial district, he is to be tried in such district.

But if he has not been so brought into the United States, he must be tried in the district in which he is apprehended.

Any person owing allegiance to the United States, may subject himself to the penalties of treason. St. 1790, c. 9, § 1.

Allegiance is of two kinds: that due from citizens, and that due from aliens resident within the United States. Every sojourner who enjoys our protection, is bound to good faith toward our government, and although an alien, he may be guilty of treason by co-operating either with rebels or foreign enemies.

The allegiance of aliens is local, and terminates when they leave our country. That of citizens is not so limited—although the European doctrine of indissoluble and perpetual allegiance has not been accepted in this country.

There are minor offences created by acts of congress.

Misprision of treason is defined by St. 1790, c. 9, § 2, which declares that if any person having knowledge of the commission of any treason, "shall conceal, and not, as soon as may be, disclose and make known the same to the president of the United States, or some one of the judges thereof, or to the president or governor of a particular state, or some one of the judges or justices thereof," such person, on conviction, shall be subject to fine and imprisonment.

By section 22, of the same statute, it is made a criminal offence knowingly and wilfully to obstruct, resist, or oppose any officer of the United States, in serving or attempting to serve or execute any order of any court of the United States, or any legal or judicial writ or process whatever, or to assault, beat, or wound any officer or other person duly authorized in serving or executing any such order or process.

By St. 1831, c. 99, § 2 [4 Stat. 488], it is enacted that, if any person shall corruptly, or by threats or force, endeavor to influence, intimidate, or impede any juror, witness, or officer, in any court of the United States, in the discharge of his duty, or shall corruptly, or by threats or force, obstruct or impede, the due administration of justice therein, every person so offending shall be liable to prosecution therefor by indictment.

Such are the criminal offences which have been created by the constitution and acts of congress, for the preservation of the government and the effectual execution of its laws.

It has been, at a former period, and is now a momentous question, whether, under our complex system, there is any power extrinsic to that of the national government by which its laws can be rightfully resisted, or their obligation impaired. There is no such power.

As I have already said to you, the authority of the United States, within their sphere, is supreme. This is a vital principle. It was so regarded by the framers of the constitution, and they have secured it in the most explicit and emphatic terms. This constitution, and the laws made pursuant thereto, shall be the supreme law of the land. And to render this effectual, they provided that the government which they created should be the final judge of the extent of its own powers and the meaning of its own laws. And to this end, they established a judicial department as a co-ordinate branch of the government, to expound and enforce the provisions of the constitution and the acts of congress. Nor is this all. In order that the laws of the United States should be practically as well as theoretically supreme, they created an executive department, clothed with full power to enforce the laws. And thus a government, paramount in all its departments, was established.

This supremacy has not always been acquiesced in. The legislation of a great country can never meet with universal approbation. And it has sometimes happened that acts of congress have been adverse to the opinions or supposed interests of many persons, sometimes constituting a majority in particular states.

And in such cases, unwilling to submit, they have eagerly sought for some mode of resistance which should wear the semblance of legality, and to this end have invoked state interposition, and the cover of state authority.

Such was nullification. That doctrine did not deny the paramount obligation of laws constitutionally enacted, but it arrogated for a state the right to determine, in the last resort, whether a law was constitutional or not. It sought to overthrow the judicial power by denying its supremacy, and claimed for every state the right to judge of the extent of the powers of the general government, and of the validity of its laws, and to limit, restrain, or annul them, according to the views of each state.

This doctrine, once formidable, has now few adherents.

Some of the adversaries of national legislation, while conceding the supremacy of the legislative and judicial departments, have sought to render their decrees nugatory by impairing the executive power, by which alone they can be carried into practical effect. And to this end also they have invoked state interference, or assumed the garb of state authority. Some believe that the attempt thus to impair the action of the executive officers of the United States has not been wholly without success.

It seems now to be admitted, that if an United States marshal hold a legal precept, commanding him to arrest a person, or take an article of property, if such person or property be in the custody of a sheriff under a state process to enforce even a subordinate right, the marshal cannot execute his precept, but that the person and the property, although within his district, are beyond his reach, so long as the custody of the sheriff shall continue. This I understand to be the decision of the supreme court of the United States, in the absence of any act of congress upon the subject. Taylor v. Carryl, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 583.

This conclusion has been reached by assuming that the governments or jurisdictions under which the marshal and sheriff respectively act, are not only distinct, but in this respect have equal and co-ordinate authority, and thence inferring that the one who first gets actual possession, under his precept, is to retain the custody against the other, without regard to the character of the laws under which they respectively act. And it has also been held, that if a writ of habeas corpus, from a state magistrate or tribunal, be directed to an United States marshal, he is to make return stating the authority by which he holds his prisoner. He is not to produce the body, but to state the reason why he declines to do so. Ableman v. Booth and U. S. v. Booth, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 506.

This conclusion has been adopted as a measure of peace, and as a plain and practical mode of preventing contest and violence between executive officers holding conflicting precepts from their respective superiors.

The adoption of such a rule manifests moderation and abstinence on the part of the national authorities. And yet there are those who think that this is not conceding enough, but that a prisoner held by a marshal, under a legal precept of the United States, may be taken from his custody by a sheriff holding a state process. Some have supposed that this could be accomplished by putting into the hands of the sheriff a capias writ, commanding him to take the prisoner therein described, and giving such writ the name of habeas corpus.

Again, it has been supposed that the custody of the marshal could be divested, and all his power ended, by handing to the sheriff a warrant to arrest the person upon some criminal charge. As if the name or nature of a state law could make it potent enough to defeat the execution of a valid law of the United States.

The constitution, in the positive language already quoted, makes such laws supreme, without limitation or exception. This of itself is sufficient.

But it does not stop even there, but in anticipation of attempts to set up adverse state authority, it adds these emphatic words, "anything in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." And thus every law of a state, civil or criminal, organic or ordinary, is rendered subordinate to the legitimate legislation of congress, and must recede before the action of the general government in its appropriate sphere.

The disaffected, at different times, and in various sections of the Union, have earnestly sought for some legal mode of resisting legitimate authority. But it has been in vain. There is no such anomalous middle ground between submission and rebellion; and this last extreme has at length been reached. Secession is but another name for revolution; for it is vain to contend for a constitutional right to overthrow the constitution, and a legal right to destroy all law.

It is often said, that the constitution does not contemplate making war upon a state. If by this is meant only that a state, as a political body, is not to be compelled to execute the laws of the United States, it is true, because those laws act directly upon individuals, and are not to be enforced by state authority, but by national instrumentalities.

In other words, we have a government, and not a mere confederacy.

But if, by the proposition that the constitution does not contemplate war upon a state, is meant that the authority of the United States cannot be maintained, or its laws enforced, if a state organization interpose to annul them, or protect its citizens in doing so, nothing can be more erroneous. The constitution unquestionably contemplates this very contingency of adverse state interposition or legislation, and provides against it, and for the national supremacy, in the clear and imperative language which has already been quoted. This supremacy may be maintained by the whole physical force of the nation, and whoever offends against the law, is subject to its penalties, in whatever official robes or insignia he may be clothed, or whatever state parchments he may hold in his hand.

Congress has the right to declare war. With this high prerogative they are invested in express terms, and without limitation or condition. Its exercise is left to their uncontrolled discretion.

The national legislature, therefore, may make war whenever that dread calamity is an appropriate means of sustaining the rights of the nation.

I have endeavored, gentlemen, to give you a judicial exposition of some laws to which the attention of a jury has rarely been called. In explaining their validity and extent, I have necessarily said something of the powers of the government for the maintenance of their own authority. I have confined myself to vindicating the existence of those powers, and your duty to inquire into and present offences under them. And I wish to say with emphasis, that I have not intended to indicate any opinion as to the time or manner in which they should be exercised by other departments, much less to stimulate any action. It is for them, in their wisdom, to decide when and how the high trust confided to them shall be executed. It is for the legislature and the executive, upon their grave responsibility, to determine when the great and permanent interests of the nation require them to put forth their strength, and when to exercise the more difficult virtue of a firm forbearance.

Case No. 18,274.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY—TREASON.

[2 Spr. 292.]¹

District Court, D. Massachusetts. March, 1863.

TREASON AND KINDRED CRIMES.

[1. Until the year 1861 there were no provisions in the criminal legislation of the United States to punish any measures that had not ripened into an overt act of levying war or actual interference with the administration of the law. All the incipient and preparatory measures, leading to the overthrow of the government, were left without punishment or reprehension.]

[2. After the commencement of the war of the Rebellion congress endeavored to secure the fidelity of officers and employes of the United States by various acts requiring an oath of allegiance from them.—Act Aug. 6, 1861 (12 Stat. 326); Act March 6, 1862 (12 Stat. 354); Act July 2, 1862 (12 Stat. 502); Act July 17, 1862 (12 Stat. 593); and to punish conspiracies to effect treasonable objects, and other acts of disloyalty, or of opposition or interference with the government, falling short of the crime of treason.—Act July 31, 1861 (12 Stat. 284); Act July 17, 1862 (12 Stat. 593); Act March 3, 1863, § 24 (12 Stat. 735).]

[3. A mere conspiracy to overthrow the government does not of itself amount to the crime of treason.

¹ [Reprinted by permission.]

Thus, if a convention, legislature, junta, or other assemblage entertain the purpose of subverting the government, and to that end pass acts, resolves, ordinances, or decrees, even with the view of raising a military force to carry their purpose into effect, this alone does not constitute a levying of war.]

[4. A purpose to prevent, by force, the execution of any public law of the United States, generally, and in all cases, is a treasonable purpose, for it is entirely to overthrow the government as to one of its laws; and, if there be an assemblage of men for the purpose of carrying this purpose into effect by force, this will constitute a levying of war.]

[5. The sudden outbreak of a mob, or the assembling of men in order, by force, to defeat the execution of a law in a particular instance, and then to disperse, without any intention of continuing together, or of reassembling for the purpose of defeating the law generally, and in all cases, is not levying war.]

[6. If a body of men be actually assembled in force, in a condition to make war, in order to overturn the government at any one place by force, this is levying war. It is not necessary that the assemblage should be with military arms and array; numbers alone may supply the requisite force.]

[7. If any such assemblage for the purpose of subverting the government at any place take forcible possession of any fort, arsenal, or other property of the United States, this is an act of levying war.]

[8. If war be actually levied at one place, and any person in league with those actually engaged therein send them arms, money, provisions, or intelligence for the purpose of aiding them, he is guilty of treason, however distant he may be from the place of their assemblage. Following Ex parte Bollman, 4 Cranch (8 U. S.) 126.]

[9. Under the constitution, treason or other crime committed within the limits of the United States can be tried only within the state and judicial district within which it is committed, and the accused has the right to a trial by jury in such state and district. If, therefore, the condition of such state or district be such that the federal courts there cannot or will not perform their functions, crimes committed there cannot be punished by the regular administration of justice.]

[10. Although congress has heretofore adopted some of the state laws and modes of procedure, especially those which prescribe the qualifications of jurors and the mode of summoning them, there is no necessity for so doing, or for using any part of the state machinery. The national legislature has constitutional power to prescribe the qualifications of jurors and the manner in which they shall be selected and summoned; it may make the judicial system of the United States complete for the independent exercise of all its functions.]

[11. If a crime has been committed on the high seas, or in any place not within any state or district, and the offender has been legally arrested without the limits of the United States, and brought into any judicial district, he must, under the existing statutes, be tried in that district. If he has been arrested within the United States, he must be tried in the district in which he was apprehended.]

[12. Every person owing allegiance to the United States may subject himself to the penalties of treason. Allegiance is of two kinds,—that due from citizens and that due from aliens resident within the United States. Every sojourner who enjoys our protection is bound to good faith towards our government, and, though an alien, he may be guilty of treason by cooperating either with rebels or foreign enemies.]

[13. Under our complex system of government there is no power extrinsic to that of the national government by which its laws can be rightfully resisted or their obligation impaired.]

[14. The theory, or opinion, that the constitution of the United States does not contemplate making war upon a state, is true only in the sense that a state, as a political body, is not to be compelled to execute the laws of the United States; for those laws act directly upon individuals and are to be enforced by national instrumentalities. But the constitution does contemplate and provide for the contingency of adverse state interposition or legislation to annul or defeat the execution of national laws; for it expressly declares that the national law shall be supreme, "anything in the constitution or the laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding."]

SPRAGUE, District Judge (charging grand jury). It is your duty to inquire into all offences against the United States within the jurisdiction of this court. The greatest crime known to the law is treason; self-preservation being the highest duty of government. Without it, there can be no administration of law, civil or criminal. This crime is defined by the constitution itself. It declares that treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort. A person may be guilty of treason without himself taking up arms, and even while at a distance from any military assembly. That crime may now be committed within this state, by co-operating with rebels who are in arms, in distant parts of the country; the rule being that "all those who perform any part, however minute or however remote from the scene of action, and who are actually leagued in the conspiracy, are to be considered as traitors." Any person who, knowing that treason has been committed, shall "conceal, and not, as soon as may be, disclose and make known the same" to certain high officers, is guilty of a criminal offence denominated misprision of treason.

Until the year 1861, these were the only provisions of the criminal law for the suppression of acts directly tending to the destruction of the government.

There were indeed statutes making it criminal to obstruct, resist, or impede the execution of legal process, or to assault, beat, or wound any officer or other person duly authorized, in serving such process, or to endeavor corruptly, or by threats or force, to influence any juror, witness, or officer in any court of the United States, or by threats or force to impede, or endeavor to impede, the due administration of justice therein. But these were regarded as minor offences, subjecting the offender only to moderate punishment, by fine and imprisonment.

Under these laws, a marshal of the United States might be forcibly resisted, and he and his aids actually murdered, while in the execution of lawful process within a state, and yet the courts of the United States could sentence the offenders to no higher punishment than imprisonment for one year, and a fine of three hundred dollars. The state law might or might not prohibit such acts, and affix an adequate penalty.

Such was the condition of our criminal jurisprudence for the protection of the life of the government, and to secure the enforcement of the laws, up to the time of the breaking out of this Rebellion. How far it fell short of the duty of congress, is now seen by the light of the conflagration which was permitted to be kindled.

The Criminal Code touched no measure that had not ripened into an overt act of levying war, or actual interference with the administration of the law. All the incipient and preparatory measures, leading to the overthrow of the government, were left without punishment or reprehension.

Since the commencement of this Rebellion, congress has, by penal enactments, endeavored to secure the fidelity of officers and employes of the United States.

There are several statutes prescribing new oaths of office, and affixing the penalties of perjury to their violation. The first was passed in August, 1861 (Acts 1861, c. 64; 12 Stat. 326), and requires, that every officer, clerk, or employe in the several departments of the government, or in any way connected therewith, shall take an oath to support and defend the constitution and government of the United States against all enemies, whether domestic or foreign, and to bear true faith, allegiance and loyalty to the same, any ordinance, resolution, or law of any state convention or legislature to the contrary notwithstanding. Here, you will observe, is a most important and striking provision, unknown to any previous official oath. It requires not only fidelity to the government, but the support and defence thereof against all enemies, domestic as well as foreign. Nor is this all; there is added this emphatic language: "Any ordinance, resolution, or law of any state convention or legislature to the contrary notwithstanding." This, gentlemen, is a most explicit renunciation and abjuration of the deadly heresy of a paramount state sovereignty,—that heresy which has been so persistently and successfully inculcated for many years past, especially in the Southern states, and has at length produced the bitter fruit of open rebellion. This doctrine of paramount state sovereignty, and of paramount state allegiance, has taken possession of the minds of tens of thousands; nay, has become public opinion in several states, and this not only against the whole spirit of the constitution, but in the face of its most express and emphatic language.

Our fathers foresaw this danger, and most carefully guarded against it. They meant to create a government with the highest attributes of sovereignty, and with the power of self-preservation. They marked out the sphere of that government with all practicable clearness and precision, and within that sphere made it supreme.

They took especial care that this supremacy should not be left to inference. The sixth article of the constitution declares, in express terms, that "this constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land."

This seems to be sufficiently positive and unequivocal. But the framers of the constitution did not stop even there, but added these words: "any thing in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding;" thus pointedly and laboriously, in words as apt and expressive as our language affords, guarding against and repelling the idea, that a state could by any act, however solemn, even by its organic or fundamental law, resist or interfere with the constitution and laws of the United States, in their operation over the whole country. And yet the doctrine that the laws of the United States, constitutionally enacted, are not supreme, but that the law of a state may override them, and even authorize its inhabitants to rise up in resistance and overthrow the government, has been not only theoretically maintained, but carried into actual and direful practice. The disastrous consequences of this heresy of paramount state allegiance cannot be measured. We have seen some of them, but the end is not yet. Under its influence, we have seen the government, in the incipient stages of a great rebellion, when its life was threatened and its very existence at stake, stand as inactive as if struck with paralysis. At such a time, we have seen the chief magistrate of this great country looking on as if in utter helplessness, taking no efficient measure, either of prevention or repression, but declaring, in a solemn message, that the constitution did not contemplate making war upon a state,—a declaration which, in its application to the then condition of the country, meant that if a state saw fit to make a law to overthrow the government of the United States, and resist the execution of its laws, the government has no right, in order to enforce the laws and maintain its authority, to put down such resistance by using the requisite force; that is, that the state law is to be supreme, and practically triumphant over the constitution and laws of the United States.

Under the influence or pretence of this doctrine, we have seen high functionaries and officials, of almost every grade, guilty of the most appalling perfidy. We have seen them plotting and taking actual measures for the destruction of the government, while trusted and paid to preserve and protect it. We have seen even officers of the army and navy, of almost every grade, who had been educated, supported, cherished, and honored by the United States, and with whom we had supposed that loyalty and devotion to their country and their flag was both a sentiment and a principle,—we have seen such men, not only deserting their country and their flag in the hour of approaching peril, but plunging into the crime of treason, and actually joining, and some of them leading, the forces of the rebel enemy. Surely it was time that congress should take more effectual measures for the suppression and prevention of such atrocious perfidy. This statute of August 6, 1861, so far as it went, was well adapted to that end. It is limited, as we have seen, to employés in the executive departments, or persons connected therewith. By statute of March 6, 1862, the same oath is required of ship-masters, on clearing for a foreign country, or for any port in the United States. Acts 1862, c. 38; 12 Stat. 354.

By the act of July 17, 1862, persons making claims against the United States are required to take the same oath. Acts 1862, c. 205; 12 Stat. 610.

By statute of July 2, 1862 (Acts 1862, c. 128; 12 Stat. 502), every officer, civil, military, and naval, is required to take an oath that he has not voluntarily borne arms against the United States, or voluntarily given aid, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto; that he has neither sought, accepted, nor exercised any office under an authority hostile to the United States, nor yielded a voluntary support to any such authority within the United States; and, further, to support and defend the constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic, and to bear true faith and allegiance to the same, and that this obligation is taken without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that he will well and truly discharge the duties of his office. This oath does not contain the special clause against state assumptions which is found in those I have before mentioned. It does not in terms name the ordinance or law of any state, but its comprehensive language clearly embraces them. The falsely taking this oath of office is made a criminal offence, which not only subjects the party to the penalties of perjury, but ever afterwards disqualifies him from holding any office under the United States.

I have called your special attention to these recent statutes, because they create new offences. There are two others of great importance.

By an act passed in July, 1861 (Acts 1861, c. 33; 12 Stat. 284), it is provided that if two or more persons within any state or territory of the United States shall conspire together to overthrow by force the government of the United States, or to levy war against it, or by force to oppose the government, or to prevent, hinder, or delay the execution of any law of the United States, or to seize any property of the United States, against its authority, every person so offending shall be guilty of a high crime.

The statute of July 17, 1862 (Acts 1862, c. 195, § 2; 12 Stat. 590), makes it a criminal offence to incite, set on foot, assist or engage in, any rebellion or insurrection, or to give aid and comfort thereto. These statutes reach the incipient steps which lead to resistance and rebellion.

Previous to their enactment, any person might, by words or acts, stir up and incite others to rebellion, or actually enter into conspiracies, and take preparatory measures for the destruction of the government, without being subject to any legal penalty. Those who were plotting and preparing treason were not compelled to secrecy or concealment. They were not driven to cellars or caverns, the approprate scenes for such dark and nefarious machinations. But they were carried on in open day, in public buildings and halls of legislation. We have seen incitements to rebellion by every art that could mislead the mind, or inflame the passions. We have seen conspiracies in almost every form. Even legislative bodies and public conventions have assembled for the purpose of devising plans and carrying out measures for the overthrow of the government, and they have prosecuted their work by public ordinances and declarations, and made preparations for actual hostilities; and all this with legal impunity, there being no statute of the United States by which any one of these conspirators could be arrested as a criminal. And yet congress has always had the power to pass statutes of prevention. It was given to them by the people for the preservation of the government. This power was vested in congress to be exercised; and it is not too much to say, that, if congress had performed that duty by passing these statutes thirty years ago, and they had been faithfully executed, the dire catastrophe in which our country is now involved would probably have been prevented. This forces upon us the pregnant inquiry, why was this duty so long neglected? Why, for more than seventy years, was the life of the government thus left exposed to the machinations of its enemies? The cause is to be found in excessive jealousy of the power of the federal government, and apprehension, real or pretended, of danger to the states. The fear that the states might be overwhelmed, or encroached upon by the national government, although sometimes feigned, has no doubt been actually felt by many persons. Although most prevalent in the Southern states, it has not been confined to them. This jealousy and apprehension have greatly affected the practical working of our political system from a very early period. They have persistently magnified the sovereignty of the states, and belittled that of the nation. They have been reluctant to admit that the constitution established a government, but have chosen rather to call its work a confederacy, a compact, or a league. They have not only sought after such construction of the constitution as would pare down the powers conferred by it, but have prevented the exercise by congress of many unquestionable powers which were vested in it for the public safety. The criminal legislation which I have referred to, is but one example of omission and neglect by the national legislature in executing the high trust which has been confided to it.

Upon a superficial view, there seems to be some reason for this apprehension of danger from the great powers vested in the national government. It may raise money to an unlimited amount by imposts and taxation, both direct and indirect. It may raise and support armies and navies without restriction. It creates offices at will, and determines the compensation of thousands of public officers and agents; and the chief executive power is vested in the hands of a single magistrate. Without further enumeration, this seems, at first view, to constitute a great and formidable central power, which may be antagonistic and dangerous to the several states.

But let us see how this Colossus is constituted and sustained. The house of representatives is the most important branch of congress in matters of legislation. There all bills for raising revenue must originate. Without its concurrence, no revenue can be provided or funds raised, no money can be appropriated, no armies or navies can be raised or maintained, no offices be created, or compensation provided for, and paid. In fine, without its assent, there can be no act of legislation.

The house of representatives is composed wholly of members from the several states. They have there had their birth and education.

There are their families, friends, associations, and homes. Nearly all of them have held state offices, or been members of the legislature, and become imbued with the predilection for state authority and devotion to state aggrandizement which such positions are likely to generate. At the expiration of the term for which they were elected, they must generally return to the mass of the people from which they were taken. But what is still more effective in controlling their action is the power which the people of the state hold over their future political existence. They are chosen for only two years, and they cannot be re-elected without the favor of the people. This power was deemed by the authors of our institutions a sufficient security against any encroachments upon the rights of the people of the several states.

It has been found even more potent in its practical operation than they had contemplated. They secured to members perfect freedom of debate, and certain means of information, that they might be able to form a correct judgment, and gave to them personal immunities and a certain tenure of office, that they might independently and conscientiously follow the dictates of their own informed understandings. But, in practice, almost every representative holds his own judgment in entire subjection to the will of his constituents. No matter how cogent the facts, or unanswerable the reasoning for or against any measure, he deems it a sufficient answer to say, "My constituents think otherwise." He takes an official oath, and those who have taken no such oath control his action. He hears the discussion, receives information and light from all parts of the country upon great measures affecting the whole nation; and others, at their distant homes, who have not heard the discussion, nor received that information, nor obtained that light, decide the question. Thus, instead of acting as a member of a deliberative assembly, he becomes in effect an ambassador, or diplomatic agent, with instructions in his pocket, and is constantly watching for indications of the will of a distant power, to which he yields implicit obedience.

The members of the senate have the same antecedents and predilections, and are equally devoted to state interests and submissive to state will. They are elected by the legislatures of the several states; and those bodies claim the right to give instructions to senators which shall be absolutely binding upon them. In nearly all the states, this asserted right has been freely exercised, and rarely indeed has a senator hesitated to render the most implicit obedience. Their term of office is six years; but the senate is divided into three classes, so that one-third may go out at the end of every two years, a number which may often be sufficient, in the division of parties, to change the political majority. In four years, two-thirds of the whole body may be changed by new elections.

The president and vice-president of the United States are taken from among the people, by popular vote in the several states, the interposition of electors being now merely a formal mode of declaring the popular will. No other officers, except the judges of the courts, have any constitutional tenure of office, and almost all are removable at the pleasure of the chief executive. Upon a change of president, the whole catalogue of these officers may be displaced. Thus the people of the states, by frequent elections, added to the moral influence of education, habit, and local ties and associations, hold the most effective control over public officers and the whole legislative and executive action of the government. Indeed, our whole system rests upon the states. Archimedes could not move the world because he had no fulcrum beyond its surface. And our great national government has no place beyond the limits of the states, upon which it can stand to wield its power to their injury. It may be formidable to foreign nations, because it has a position without and independent of them.

The "Federalist," a work written by three of the most eminent statesmen and jurists of their age, declares that "it will always be far more easy for the state governments to encroach upon the national authorities, than for the national government to encroach upon the state authorities." The Federalist, No. 17. This prediction has been verified by experience. Many portions of our history might be cited. Three events only can now be adverted to.

The first is the Virginia Resolutions of 1798. These celebrated resolutions assert that in case of the exercise by congress of a dangerous power, not granted to them, a state has a right to interfere, and arrest the progress of the evil. How it may interfere is not explained. Some have insisted that the resolutions intended to assert a right to interpose by forcible resistance. Others, and among them Mr. Madison, the most eminent constitutional lawyer who participated in those resolutions, always understood them to intend only peaceable interposition, as by remonstrance, argument, or solemn declarations of opinion. The language of the resolutions is vague and indefinite, and probably left so by design, to secure the assent of persons holding widely different opinions. There can be no doubt that these resolutions have generated opinions and measures adverse to the legitimate authority of the federal government.

The next event to be now noticed is nullification. This also professed to touch such acts only as are unconstitutional. The doctrine was, that, if a state deem any law of congress to be unconstitutional, it may nullify it by its own declaration, and then resist it by force. It did not deny that enactments made pursuant to the constitution were the supreme law of the land throughout its whole extent, and of universal obligation; but it arrogated for a state the right to decide, in the last resort, whether a law was constitutional or not; thus denying the supremacy of the judiciary of the United States, and overthrowing one of the great departments of the national government. More than thirty years ago, this heresy had obtained such prevalence as to be formidable. The intelligence and patriotism of the country were aroused, and it was examined, exposed, and exploded.

We next come to the secession of the present day. The advocates of this doctrine deny that the United States has any sovereignty, or can claim any allegiance; although the constitution confers the highest powers of sovereignty, and makes its authority supreme, and defines the crime of treason, which can be committed only by those who owe allegiance. In the face of the whole purpose of the constitution, and of its positive and express provisions, they deny that it created a government. They delight to call our political system a compact, and assume that, if it be so, they may, of course, destroy it at pleasure: as if to violate compacts was an inalienable right. They do not rest upon the ultimate right of revolution, to throw off intolerable oppression, but claim a legal right to resist all law, and overthrow the constitution itself. And the question now is, whether our government can withstand this last most desperate and atrocious assault, or whether it must fall, and bury us and the hopes of mankind in its ruins.

There are other recent enactments to which I would call your attention. The statute of July 16, 1862 (Acts 1862, c. 180; 12 Stat. 577), makes it a criminal offence if any member of congress, or any officer of the government of the United States shall receive, or agree to receive, any valuable consideration for procuring or aiding to procure any contract, office or place from the United States, or any department or officer thereof, or for giving such contract, office or place; also, if any person shall give, or offer, or agree to give, any valuable consideration for promising or aiding to procure any contract, office, or place as aforesaid. The same statute provides, that, if a member of congress shall receive, or agree to receive, any valuable consideration for his attention to, services, action or vote, on any question, matter, or proceeding which may be then pending, or may, by law, or under the constitution, be brought before him in his official capacity, he shall be liable to indictment, and to be punished by fine and imprisonment in the penitentiary. And any member of congress, or officer of the United States, who shall be convicted of any such offence, is moreover disqualified from holding any office under the United States.

The statute of August 6, 1861 (Acts 1861, c. 56; 12 Stat. 317), makes it a criminal offence to recruit soldiers or sailors to engage in armed hostilities against the United States, or to open a rendezvous for such enlistment. And every person who shall be so enlisted or engaged shall also be liable to fine and imprisonment.

By a statute passed on the third day of the present month (Acts 1863, c. 75, § 24; 12 Stat. 735) it is made a criminal offence to procure or entice, or attempt to procure and entice, a soldier in the service of the United States to desert; or to harbor, conceal, or give employment to a deserter; or to carry him away, or to aid in carrying him away, knowing him to be such; or to purchase from any soldier his equipments, or clothing, or any part thereof. And if any commanding officer of any ship or vessel, or any conductor of any railroad, or any other public conveyance, shall carry away any such soldier as one of his crew or otherwise, knowing him to have deserted, or shall refuse to deliver him up to the orders of his commanding officer, such person also is liable to be punished by fine and imprisonment.

The same statute provides, that if any person shall resist a legal draft of soldiers into the service of the United States, or shall counsel or aid resistance thereto, or shall assault or obstruct any officer in the performance of any service in relation to such draft, or shall counsel any person to assault or obstruct any such officer, or shall counsel any drafted men not to appear at the place of rendezvous, or wilfully dissuade drafted men from the performance of military duty as required by law, such person shall be liable to indictment.

We have seen it stated in such form as to arrest attention, that unauthorized individuals have entered into communication with members of parliament and foreign ministers and officers, in order to influence their conduct in controversies with the United States, or to defeat the measures of our government. It ought to be known that such acts have long been prohibited by law. By a statute passed in the year 1799, c. 1, it was enacted: "If any person, being a citizen of the United States, whether he be actually resident, or abiding within the United States, or in any foreign country, shall, without the permission or authority of the government of the United States, directly or indirectly, commence, or carry on, any verbal or written correspondence or intercourse with any foreign government, or any officer or agent thereof, with an intent to influence the measures or conduct of any foreign government, or of any officer or agent thereof, in relation to any disputes or controversies with the United States, or defeat the measures of the government of the United States; or if any person, being a citizen of, or resident within the United States, and not duly authorized, shall counsel, advise, aid or assist in any such correspondence, with intent, as aforesaid, he or they shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor," and punished by fine and imprisonment. 1 Stat. 613.

Case No. 18,275.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY—TREASON.

[1 Story, 614.]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. June 15, 1842.

TREASON AGAINST THE UNITED STATES AND AGAINST A STATE—CONSTITUTIONAL DEFINITION OF TREASON—OPPOSING EXECUTION OF LAWS.

[1. To constitute treason against the United States by levying war, there must be a levying of war against the United States in their sovereign character, and not merely a levying of war exclusively against the sovereignty of a particular state.]

[2. To constitute a levying of war, within the meaning of the constitutional definition, it is not sufficient that there should be an assembly of persons merely to meditate and consult about the means of levying war at some future time, or upon some future contingency, without any present force. This would be a mere conspiracy to levy war. To actually levy war, there must be an assembly of persons, met for a treasonable purpose, and some overt act done, or some attempt made by them, with force, to execute, or towards executing, that purpose. The assembly must be in a condition to use force, and must intend to use it, if necessary, to further, aid, or accomplish the treasonable design.]

[3. If the assembly is arrayed in a military manner, if they are armed and marched in military form, for the express purpose of overawing and intimidating the public, and thus attempt to carry into effect the treasonable design, this will, of itself, amount to a levy of war, although no actual blow be struck or engagement take place.]

[4. It is not necessary to a treasonable design that there should be a direct and positive intention entirely to subvert or overthrow the government. It is sufficient if there is an intention by force to prevent the execution of any one or more of the general and public laws of the government, or to resist the exercise of any legitimate authority of the government in its sovereign capacity.]

[5. If there be an assembly of persons, with force, with an intent to prevent the collection of lawful taxes or duties levied by the government, or to destroy all customhouses, or to resist the administration of justice in the courts of the United States, and the assemblage proceed to execute this purpose by force, this is treason against the United States.]

[6. There may be treason against a state by levying war which is aimed altogether against the sovereignty of the state, as would be the case if the object of an assembly of persons, met with force, were to overturn the government or constitution of the state, or to prevent the due exercise of its sovereign powers, or to resist the execution of any one or more of its general laws, without any intention to intermeddle with the relations of the state with the national government, or to displace the national laws or sovereignty therein.]

[7. Treason begun against a state may be mixed up or merged in treason against the United States. If the treasonable purpose be to overthrow the government of the state, and forcibly to withdraw it from the Union, and thereby to prevent the exercise of the national sovereignty within the limits of the state, this would be treason against the United States.]

[8. If the troops of the United States should be called out by the president, upon the application of a state legislature or executive, to protect the state against domestic violence, and there should be an assembly of persons with force to resist and oppose the United States troops, this would be treason against the United States, although the primary intention of the insurgents may have been only to overthrow the state government or the state laws.]

STORY, Circuit Justice, after some preliminary observations upon the late alarming crisis of the public affairs in Rhode Island, and paying a just tribute to the excellent institutions and past history of the state, proceeded to say to the grand jury: This is the first occasion, for many years, in which it has become necessary for me, in addressing the grand jury, to state the doctrines of law applicable to the crime of treason. Happily, there is at the present moment a pause in the public mind, which I trust may be the harbinger of a speedy return to a permanent course of peace, prosperity, and general confidence among the citizens of your state. It is impossible for me not to feel a deep sense of the dangers, through which you have so recently passed, and of the painful duties, which might have devolved upon this court in certain contingencies, which seemed at one moment about to be fearfully realized. It may not, therefore, be without some use, to call your attention to the law of treason, and to distinguish between the cases, where the crime is properly a crime against the United States, and the cases, where it properly constitutes a crime exclusively against the state. Both may be, indeed (as will be presently shown), mixed up in the same transaction; or rather, the treason against the state may, under certain circumstances, be merged in the treason against the United States. Still, there is a broad and clear line of distinction between them in many cases, which I will endeavour briefly to explain and illustrate.

The constitution of the United States has declared that "treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." [Article 3, § 3.] There must, then, to constitute the crime, be a levying of war against the United States in their sovereign character, and not merely a levying of war exclusively against the sovereignty of a particular state. What, in the sense of the constitution, is to be deemed a levying of war? I take it to be clear, that it is not sufficient, that there should be an assembly of persons, who are met merely to meditate and consult about the means of levying war at some future time, or upon some future contingencies, without any present force. That would amount to a conspiracy to levy war. But a conspiracy to levy war, and an actual levy of war are distinct offences. To constitute an actual levy of war, there must be an assembly of persons, met for the treasonable purpose, and some overt act done, or some attempt made by them with force to execute, or towards executing, that purpose. There must be a present intention to proceed in the execution of the treasonable purpose by force. The assembly must now be in a condition to use force, and must intend to use it, if necessary, to further, or to aid, or to accomplish the treasonable design. If the assembly is arrayed in a military manner,—if they are armed and march in a military form, for the express purpose of overawing or intimidating the public,—and thus they attempt to carry into effect the treasonable design,—that will, of itself, amount to a levy of war, although no actual blow has been struck, or engagement has taken place. This is a clear case; but it is by no means the only case (for many others might be stated), in which there may be an actual overt act of levying war. I wish to state this only as one case, upon which no doubt whatsoever can be entertained. In respect to the treasonable design, it is not necessary, that it should be a direct and positive intention entirely to subvert or overthrow the government. It will be equally treason, if the intention is by force to prevent the execution of any one or more general and public laws of the government, or to resist the exercise of any legitimate authority of the government in its sovereign capacity. Thus, if there is an assembly of persons with force, with an intent to prevent the collection of the lawful taxes or duties, levied by the government,—or to destroy all customhouses,—or to resist the administration of justice in the courts of the United States, and they proceed, to execute their purpose by force,—there can be no doubt, that it would be treason against the United States. But it is not every act of treason by levying war, that is treason against the United States. It may be, and often is, aimed altogether against the sovereignty of a particular state. Thus, for example, if the object of an assembly of persons, met with force, is to overturn the government or constitution of a state,—or to prevent the due exercise of its sovereign powers, or to resist the execution of any one or more of its general laws, but without any intention whatsoever to intermeddle with the relations of that state with the national government, or to displace the national laws or sovereignty therein, every overt act done with force towards the execution of such a treasonable purpose is treason against the state, and against the state only. It is in no just sense a levying of war against the United States. But treason may be begun against a state, and may be mixed up or merged in treason against the United States. Thus, if the treasonable purpose be to overthrow the government of the state, and forcibly to withdraw it from the Union, and thereby to prevent the exercise of the national sovereignty within the limits of the state, that would be treason against the United States. So, if the troops of the United States should be called out by the president, in pursuance of the duty enjoined by the constitution, upon the application of the state legislature, or the state executive, when the legislature cannot be convened, to protect the state against domestic violence, and there should be an assembly of persons with force to resist and oppose the troops so called out by the president, that would be a levy of war against the United States, although the primary intention of the insurgents may have been only the overthrow of the state government or the state laws. These cases sufficiently point out the distinction, to which I have alluded, and it is not necessary, upon the present occasion, to go into more minute details.

Case No. 18,276.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY—TREASON.

[2 Wall. Jr. 134; 4 Am. Law J. (N. S.) 83; 5 Pa. Law J. R. 55; 9 West. Law J. 163.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Sept. 29, 1851.

TREASON AGAINST THE UNITED STATES—WHAT CONSTITUTES—INDICTMENT—PROOFS BEFORE GRAND JURY.

[1. The expressions "levying war" and "adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort," in the constitutional definition of treason, were borrowed from the ancient law of England, and are to be understood in the sense which they bore in England when the constitution was adopted.]

[2. The expression "levying war" embraces not merely the act of formal or declared war, but any combination forcibly to prevent or oppose the execution or enforcement of a provision of the constitution or of a public statute, if accompanied or followed by an act of forcible opposition in pursuance of such combination.]

[3. Direct proof of the combining may be found in declared purposes of the individual party before the actual outbreak, or it may be derived from proceedings of meetings in which he took part openly, or which he either prompted or made effective by his countenance or sanction, commending, counseling, or instigating forcible resistance to the law.]

[4. Direct proof of the purpose, however, is not legally necessary; the concert of purpose may be deduced from the concerted action itself, or it may be inferred from facts occurring at the time, or before or afterwards.]

[5. To complete the crime of treason, there must be some act of violence as the result or consequence of the combining. But it is not necessary to prove that the person accused was a direct personal actor in the violence. If he was present, directing, aiding, abetting, counselling, or countenancing it, or if, though absent at the time of its actual perpetration, he yet directed the act, or devised or knowingly furnished the means for carrying it into effect, and instigated others thereto, he is guilty of the crime. Successfully to instigate treason is to commit it.]

[6. The constitutional provision that "no person shall be convicted of treason, unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court" (article 3, § 3), applies, it seems, only to the proofs on the trial, and not to a preliminary hearing before a committing magistrate, or the proceedings before a grand jury.]

[7. Treason against the United States may be committed by any one residing or sojourning within its territory and under the protection of its laws, whether he be a citizen or an alien.]

On the 18th of September, 1850 [9 Stat. 462], congress, in order to give effect to a provision of the constitution, passed a law to enable the owners of fugitive slaves to recover them when found in the states to which they had fled. Slavery, the abolition of slavery, this law, or any law for the recovery of slaves, had been for some time prior to the passage of the act, the themes of passionate and fanatical debate by extreme factions in the Northern and Southern states. The country was convulsed by party rage, and that "unity of government which constitutes us one people," had itself become endangered. Not content with resisting the passage of the act, the northern part of the faction, immediately after its passage, set themselves to work through the pulpits, the press, through public harangues and secret engines of every kind, to bring about resistance to the law, and to destroy the power of executing it through the force of public opposition. In this circuit, everywhere, owing to the energy of this court, and of the commissioners and officers appointed by it to execute the provisions of the act, the law was generally enforced with integrity. "As the Lord liveth, and as my soul liveth,"—declared Mr. Justice Grier, just after its passage, and in the midst of an assemblage whose murmurs of violence were disturbing his administration of justice,—“this court will administer this law in its full meaning and genuine spirit till the last hour that it remains on the statute book.” In one of the interior counties, however, it was successfully resisted. Mr. Edward Gorsuch, a citizen of Maryland, who had come to Christiana, in Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, to reclaim his slaves, was met by a body of armed men, assaulted, beaten and murdered. His son who was with him, was at the same time, beaten, robbed and stabbed, and his life endangered. An officer of the United States was driven back by menaces and violence while proclaiming his character and exhibiting his warrant. The time and the manner of these outrages, their asserted object, the denunciations by which they were preceded and the concerted action of the persons, evinced, it was thought, a combined purpose forcibly to resist the statute. And it was stated that for some time before this, gatherings of people had been held from time to time at West-Chester, a town near the place of the outbreak, at which denunciations of the law were made as unconstitutional and of no obligation against “the higher law of every man’s conscience:” the judges of the United States who would enforce it denounced as Scroggses and Jefferieses, and exhortations made and pledges given to defy its execution to the last. The murder of Mr. Gorsuch, under such circumstances, caused a deep feeling throughout the whole country; and it being stated to the court that several bills of indictment for treason against the United States would be laid before the grand jury, that body was thus charged on the law of treason, by

KANE, District Judge. Treason against the United States is defined by the constitution (article 3, § 3, cl. 1) to consist in “levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort.” This definition is borrowed from the ancient law of England (St. 25 Edw. III., St. 5, c. 2), and its terms must be understood of course in the sense which they bore in that law, and which obtained here when the constitution was adopted. The expression “levying war,” so regarded, embraces not merely that act of formal or declared war, but any combination forcibly to prevent or oppose the execution or enforcement of a provision of the constitution or of a public statute, if accompanied or followed by an act of forcible opposition in pursuance of such combination. This in substance has been the interpretation given to these words by the English judges, and it has been uniformly and fully recognised and adopted in the courts of the United States. See Foster, Hale, and Hawkins, and the opinions of Iredell, Paterson, Chase, Marshall, and Washington, J.J., in the supreme court, and of Paterson, C. J., in U. S. v. Mitchell [Case No. 15,788]; U. S. v. Fries [Id. 15,170]; U. S. v. Bollman [4 Cranch (8 U. S.) 75], and U. S. v. Burr [Id. 14,692a].

The definition, as you will observe, includes two particulars, both of them indispensable elements of the offence. There must have been a combination or conspiring together to oppose the law by force, and some actual force must have been exerted; or the crime of treason is not consummated. The highest, or at least the direct proof of the combining may be found in the declared purposes of the individual party before the actual outbreak; or it may be derived from the proceedings of meeting, in which he took part openly, or which he either prompted, or made effective by his countenance or sanction,—commending, counselling or instigating forcible resistance, to the law. I speak, of course, of a conspiring to resist a law, not the more limited purpose to violate it, or to prevent its application and enforcement in a particular case, or against a particular individual. The combination must be directed against the law itself. But such a direct proof of this element of the offence is not legally necessary to establish its existence. The concert of purpose may be deduced from the concerted action itself, or it may be inferred from facts concurring at the time, or afterwards, as well as before. Beside this, there must be some act of violence, as the result or consequence of the combining. But here again, it is not necessary to prove that the individual accused, was a direct, personal actor in the violence. If he was present, directing, aiding, abetting, counselling, or countenancing it, he is in law guilty of the forcible act. Nor is even his personal presence indispensable. Though he be absent at the time of its actual perpetration, yet if he directed the act, devised or knowingly furnished the means, for carrying it into effect, instigating others to perform it, he shares their guilt. In treason there are no accessories. There has been, I fear, an erroneous impression on this subject among a portion of our people. If it has been thought safe, to counsel and instigate others to acts of forcible opposition to the provisions of a statute,—to inflame the minds of the ignorant, by appeals to passion, and denunciations of the law as oppressive, unjust, revolting to the conscience, and not binding on the actions of men,—to represent the constitution of the land as a compact of iniquity, which it were meritorious to violate or subvert,—the mistake has been a grievous one; and they who have fallen into it may rejoice, if their appeals and their counsels have been hitherto without effect. The supremacy of the constitution, in all its provisions, is at the very basis of our existence as a nation. He, whose conscience, or whose theories of political or individual right forbid him to support and maintain it in its integrity, may relieve himself from the duties of citizenship, by divesting himself of its rights. But while he remains within our borders, he is to remember, that successfully to instigate treason, is to commit it.

It is declared in the article of the constitution which I have already cited, that “no person shall be convicted of treason, unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court." This and the corresponding language in the act of congress of April 30, 1790 [1 Stat. 112], seems to refer to the proofs on the trial, and not to the preliminary hearing before the committing magistrate, or the proceeding before the grand inquest. There can be no conviction until after arraignment on bill found. The previous action in the case is not a trial, and cannot convict, whatever be the evidence or the number of witnesses. I understand this to have been the opinion entertained by Chief Justice Marshall [Case No. 14,692a], and though it differs from that expressed by Judge Iredell, on the indictment of Fries [Id. 15,170], I feel authorized to recommend it to you, as within the terms of the constitution, and involving no injustice to the accused.

I have only to add, that treason against the United States may be committed by any one resident or sojourning within its territory and under the protection of its laws, whether he be a citizen or alien. 1 Hale, P. C. 59, 60, 62; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 2, § 5; W. Kel. 38.¹

Case No. 18,277.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY—TREASON AND PIRACY.

[2 Spr. 285.]²

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. 16, 1861.

TREASON AND TREASONABLE CONSPIRACIES—PIRACY—CONSTITUTIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL LAW—REGULATION OF COMMERCE.

[1. If war be actually levied, all those who perform any part, however minute, or however remote from the scene of action, and who are actually leagued in the general conspiracy, are to be regarded as traitors. Such part may be performed, not only by giving permission or other direct aid to the rebels, but also by acts which tend and are designed to defeat, obstruct, or weaken the arms of the United States.]

[2. Offences committed without the limits of the United States, upon the ocean, must be tried in the judicial district into which the offender is first brought, or into which he shall have been first apprehended.]

[3. Pirates are sea robbers or highwaymen of the sea, and all civilized nations have a common interest, and are under a moral obligation, to arrest and suppress them; and the constitution, in express terms, confers upon the United States the power to perform this duty, as one of the family of nations.]

[4. If a number of persons associate together, and undertake to establish a new government, and assume the character of a nation, and, as such, to issue military commissions, any other nation may, according to its own view of policy or duty, either utterly refuse to recognize the existence of such government, and treat all, who, acting under it, commit aggressions upon the ocean, as mere pirates, or it may fully recognize such new government, or may adopt the intermediate course between these two extremes, and, to some extent, and for some purposes, recognize the existence of a new government, while in other respects, and for other purposes, it rejects its pretensions to be deemed a nation.]

[5. The constitutional power to regulate commerce, and to pass all laws necessary to carry that power into effect, vests in congress the right, not merely to preserve and protect commerce, but to foster, strengthen, and extend it; and this authority is sufficient to sustain the validity of the legislation whereby congress has declared certain acts committed upon the high seas to be piracy, and punishable as such, even if those acts do not strictly constitute the crime of piracy as known to international law. Act 1790, c. 9, §§ 8, 9 (1 Stat. 113); Act 1820, c. 113, § 3 (3 Stat. 600); Act 1847, c. 51 (9 Stat. 175).]

¹This charge was delivered in the absence of GRIER, Circuit Justice. On a subsequent occasion, however, he referred to it as containing a correct statement of the decisions on the subject, and he expressed his full concurrence in the doctrines and sentiments which it expressed.

²[Reprinted by permission.]

[6. It is an offence punishable by fine and imprisonment, under the act of 1799 (1 Stat. 618, c. 1), for a citizen of the United States, at a time when a part of the inhabitants of the United States are in rebellion against the government, to write letters to a member of the British parliament, urging that body to acknowledge the independence of the insurgents.]

[7. Prior to the act of July 31, 1861 (12 Stat. 284), there was no law for punishing treasonable combinations or conspiracies which were not consummated by an overt act. The statute of that date, however, makes criminal not only combinations to overthrow the government, but conspiracies or mutual agreements, whether by few or many, whether public or private, forcibly to resist, or even to delay the execution of, any law.]

SPRAGUE, District Judge (charging jury). The two great offences which now force themselves upon the attention of courts and juries are treason and piracy. Upon both of these I have heretofore charged grand juries at some length. As those instructions can be laid before you, I do not think it necessary to repeat them at length, and I shall now make but few remarks upon these subjects.

The constitution declares that "treason against the United States, shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." [Article 3, § 3.] This crime, like other offences, when committed within the limits of the United States, can be tried only in the state and district within which it is committed. Flagrant war being now carried on in other parts of the country, it becomes an important inquiry how far persons here, within your jurisdiction, may incur the guilt, and be subject to the penalties, of treason by co-operating with distant rebels. The law in that respect is this: if war is actually levied, all those who perform any part, however minute, or however remote from the scene of action, and who are actually leagued in the general conspiracy are to be considered as traitors. Such part may be performed, not only by giving information or other direct aid to the rebels, but also by acts which tend and are designed to defeat, obstruct, or weaken our own arms.

If any such offence should be presented for your investigation, I doubt not that you will without hesitation enforce this law, as just and reasonable; for a seeming friend in New York or Massachusetts may, by various means, do more injury to our country, and more effectually aid its enemies, than he could by actually joining the rebel army; and while we are sending forth thousands of our friends and neighbors to the dangers of the field, to fight our battles and preserve our government, we cannot permit their dangers to be increased, and their lives to be sacrificed, by the practices of traitors at home, who are enjoying the protection of our laws. Offences committed without the limits of the United States upon the ocean must be tried in the judicial district into which the offender is first brought, or in which he shall be first apprehended.

There are two distinct provisions of the constitution, by which congress is empowered to punish certain kinds of piracy. By the first article of the constitution, congress is authorized "to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offences against the law of nations." Pirates are generally described as sea-robbers. They are deemed "hostes humani generis," enemies of mankind, warring against the human race. The ocean is the common highway of nations, over which every government has criminal jurisdiction. Pirates are highwaymen of the sea, and all civilized nations have a common interest, and are under a moral obligation, to arrest and suppress them; and the constitution, by the provision I have referred to, enables the United States to perform this duty, as one of the family of nations. Pirates are called and recognized as enemies. They carry on war, but it is not natural war; and they are not entitled to the benefit of the usages of modern civilized international war. There being no government with which a treaty can be made, or which can be recognized as responsible for the acts of individuals, the individuals themselves are held amenable to criminal justice, and liable to be put to death for the suppression of their hostilities. If a number of persons, large or small, associate together, and undertake to establish a new government, and assume the character of a nation, and as such to issue military commissions, any other nation may, according to its own view of policy or duty, either utterly refuse to recognize the existence of such assumed government, and treat all who, acting under it, commit aggressions upon the ocean, as mere pirates; or each nation may fully recognize such new government; or it may adopt any intermediate course between these two extremities,—to some extent, and for some purposes, recognize the existence of the new government, while in other respects, and for other purposes, it rejects its pretensions to be deemed a nation. Some of the nations of the earth, and particularly Great Britain, have taken this intermediate course in relation to the self-styled "Southern Confederacy." As there has been much sensibility manifested upon this subject, it is desirable that it should be well understood. Great Britain has merely declared that she will not ignore the existence of a Southern Confederacy, and treat those holding naval commissions under it as pirates; but that she recognizes the existence of civil war between the United States and the Southern Confederacy, and that she will take no part in such war. She in no degree interferes with the manner in which we shall treat either our own citizens or foreigners who may be engaged in this conflict, even although such foreigners be British subjects. She leaves us to deal with them as traitors or pirates, according to our own sense of justice and policy. Against this her position, we have nothing to urge under the law of nations or treaty stipulation.

Believing ourselves to be fighting the battle of human liberty and free institutions, and having heretofore cherished strong sympathy for others, the attitude assumed by Great Britain was not regarded as one merely of chilling indifference, but rather as an indication of unfriendly, if not hostile, feelings, exciting emotions of surprise and resentment. All, however, must admit that we cannot of right claim the assistance of any foreign government in the execution of our own laws or the suppression of rebellion. But we may justly claim that it shall not give aid to our enemies, or interfere with the manner in which we shall suppress a flagrant armed rebellion. It has been sometimes contended that some of the acts which are denominated piracy by congress are not such by the law of nations; and hence it has been inferred that such legislation is unauthorized. But it is to be observed that the constitution confers upon congress the power, not only to punish piracies under the law of nations, but also to define that offence. This approaches so near to a right to determine what shall constitute the offence, that it is not easy to subject it to precise limitations. But I do not dwell upon this source of authority, because our attention at the present time is called only to aggressions upon our own commerce; and that congress has ample power to repress these by penal legislation, there can be no doubt. The constitution, in express terms, gives authority to regulate commerce, and to pass all laws necessary to carry that power into effect; and this gives the right, not merely to preserve and protect commerce, but ever to foster, strengthen, and extend it. The criminal jurisprudence of the United States has extended to our commerce ever since the organization of our government, and this has been expressly sanctioned by the supreme court in U. S. v.

Coombs, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 72, and tacitly affirmed in a great number of criminal cases. The authority thus conferred upon congress has been exercised by a great variety of legislative enactments. By these acts, various offences are denominated and punished as piracy. By St. 1790, c. 9, § 8 (1. Stat. 113), "if any person or persons shall commit, upon the high seas, or in any river, haven, basin or bay, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, murder or robbery, or any other offence which, if committed within the body of a county, would by the laws of the United States be punishable with death; or if any captain or mariner of any ship or other vessel, shall * * * yield up such ship or vessel voluntarily to any pirate," he shall be deemed a pirate, and, on conviction, shall suffer death. By section 9: "If any citizen shall commit any piracy or robbery aforesaid, or any act of hostility against the United States, or any citizen thereof, upon the high sea, under color of any commission from any foreign prince, or state, or on pretence of authority from any person, such offender shall, notwithstanding the pretence of any such authority, be deemed, adjudged and taken to be a pirate, felon, and robber, and, on being thereof convicted, shall suffer death." Accessories before the fact are also punishable with death.

By St. 1820, c. 113, § 3 (3 Stat. 600), "If any person shall, upon the high seas, or in any open roadstead, or in any haven, basin, or bay, or in any river where the sea ebbs and flows, commit the crime of robbery, in or upon any ship or vessel, or upon any of the ship's company of any ship or vessel, or lading thereof; * * * and if any person engaged in any piratical cruise or enterprise, or being of the crew or ship's company of any piratical ship or vessel, shall land from such ship or vessel, and, on shore, shall commit robbery, such person shall be adjudged a pirate: and on conviction thereof * * * shall suffer death." By St. 1847, c. 51 (9 Stat. 175), "Any subject or citizen of any foreign state, who shall be found and taken on the sea, making war upon the United States, or cruising against the vessels and property thereof, or of the citizens of the same, contrary to the provisions of any treaty existing between the United States and the state of which such person is a citizen or subject, when by such treaty such acts of such persons are declared to be piracy, may be arraigned, tried, convicted, and punished * * * in the same manner as other persons charged with piracy." By St. 1846, c. 98, § 5 (9 Stat. 73), the punishment for piratically running away with any vessel, or delivering her to any pirate, is fine and imprisonment.

Whether any, or all, of the acts which by these statutes are denominated piracy, or piratical, be deemed such by the law of nations, is clearly immaterial, so far as the protection of our own commerce is concerned; and congress, having unquestionably the power to make such acts criminal when committed against our own commerce, and to punish them with any degree of severity, may adopt any nomenclature they see fit. The offence described is to be prosecuted, and punished in the manner directed, whatever name may be affixed to it, or if no name be given it. Thus in the statute of 1790, which declares that, if any person shall, upon the sea, commit murder or robbery, he shall be deemed a pirate or felon, and suffer death, an offence would have been completely described, and the punishment effectually denounced, if the words "shall be deemed a pirate and felon" had been wholly omitted. We have no occasion, therefore, to inquire, at least at the present time, whether the offences to which congress has seen fit to give the name of piracy or piratical, be deemed such by other nations or not.

There are other offences to which our attention is called by the present condition of our country. A few months since, a member of the British parliament declared, in the most public manner, that he had received many letters from the Northern states of America, urging parliament to acknowledge the independence of the Southern Confederacy. Such an announcement ought to arrest the attention of grand juries; for, if any such communication had been made by a citizen of the United States, it is a high misdemeanor. St. 1799, c. 1 (1 Stat. 613), was especially designed to prevent such unwarrantable interference with the diplomacy and purposes of our government. It declares: "That if any person, being a citizen of the United States, whether he be actually resident, or abiding within the United States, or in any foreign country, shall, without the permission or authority of the government of the United States, directly or indirectly, commence, or carry on, any verbal or written correspondence or intercourse with any foreign government, or any officer or agent thereof, with an intent to influence the measures or conduct of any foreign government, or of any officer or agent thereof, in relation to any disputes or controversies with the United States, or defeat the measures of the government of the United States," he shall be liable to punishment by fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, and imprisonment not less than six months nor exceeding three years. And the same penalties are incurred by any person who, being a "citizen of, or resident within the United States, and not duly authorized, shall counsel, advise, aid or assist in any such correspondence, with intent as aforesaid."

The last session of congress made two important additions to our Criminal Code. The statute of the 31st July last (Acts 1861, c. 33; 12 Stat. 284), declares: "That if two or more persons within any state or territory of the United States shall conspire together to overthrow, or to put down, or to destroy by force, the government of the United States, or to levy war against the United States, or to oppose by force the authority of the government of the United States; or by force to prevent, hinder, or delay the execution of any law of the United States; or by force, to seize, take, or possess any property of the United States against the will or contrary to the authority of the United States; or by force, or intimidation, or threat to prevent any person from accepting or holding any office, or trust, or place of confidence, under the United States; each and every person so offending shall be guilty of a high crime, and upon conviction thereof * * * shall be punished by a fine not less than five hundred dollars and not more than five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment, with, or without hard labor, as the court shall determine, for a period not less than six months nor greater than six years, or by both such fine and imprisonment." Levying war against the United States, and resisting or obstructing the execution of the laws of the United States, have, from the origin of the government, been criminal offences; but heretofore the criminal law has waited until treason or resistance has been consummated by an overt act. Conventions, associations, combinations, or conspiracies, however atrocious even for the purpose of levying war and subverting the government, were not subject to criminal prosecutions; but now we have a statute of prevention which reaches one of the initiatory steps. Not only combinations to overthrow the government, but conspiracies of mutual agreements, whether by few or many, public or private, forcibly to resist or even to delay the execution of any law, are high crimes, subject to severe punishment. The statute of the 6th August last (Acts 1861, c. 64; 12 Stat. 326) prescribes a new oath of allegiance, and fidelity to be taken by every officer, clerk, or employé in the several departments, or in any way connected therewith. It is in the following form: "I do solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that I will support, protect, and defend the constitution and government of the United States against all enemies, whether domestic or foreign, and that I will bear true faith, allegiance, and loyalty to the same, any ordinance, resolution, or law of any state convention or legislature to the contrary notwithstanding; and further, that I do this with a full determination, pledge, and purpose, without any mental reservation, or evasion whatsoever; and further, that I will well and faithfully perform all the duties which may be required of me by law. So help me God." The violation of this oath is denounced and punished as wilful and corrupt perjury. What shall be deemed a violation, is not defined, but the very general and comprehensive language is left to judicial interpretation. This oath is wisely framed for the purpose of upholding the paramount authority of the national government, and recognizes allegiance to the United States as the highest political duty. It emphatically repels the deadly heresy of a paramount state allegiance.

Official oaths have heretofore generally been left without penal sanctions, their observance being secured only by the conscience of the officer; but we are admonished by recent atrocious examples, that the moral sense is no adequate security against the most appalling perfidy in officers of every grade, and it is wise therefore to affix to such crimes the palpable temporal penalties of perjury.

These two acts passed by the national legislature, at their recent session, to uphold the constitution and the government, are highly important. Looking at the powers and duties of congress by the light of the conflagration which has threatened to desolate our country, we see that such enactments ought to have existed from the beginning. If they had, and had been faithfully executed for the last twenty years, the catastrophe in which we are now involved would probably have been prevented.

Case No. 18,278.

The CITY of WASHINGTON.

[Cited in Bartlett v. Spicer, 75 N. Y. 530. Nowhere reported. Opinion not now accessible.]

CIVIL CASES, FEES AND COSTS IN CIVIL CASES. See Case No. 18,284.

CIVIL RIGHTS ACT, Charge to Grand Jury in relation to the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT. See Cases Nos. 18,258, 18,259 and 18,260.

Case No. 18,279.

CLARKE et al. v. CLARKE et al.

[2 Hayw. & H. 114.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May 30, 1853.

ASSIGNMENT TO ATTORNEYS OF INTEREST IN CLAIM — LIEN OF.

1. Where a claim was presented and prosecuted by attorneys in the name of a bankrupt who had purchased it at a sale made by his assignee, in bankruptcy, but which sale was subsequently declared void. An assignment in a power of attorney of so much of the fund as the attorneys were to receive as compensation for their services will be carried out.

2. Such an assignment is a lien on the fund, and will be preferred to the judgment creditors of the bankrupt.

¹ [Reported by John A. Hayward, Esq., and Geo. C. Hazleton, Esq.]

In equity, for an injunction and distribution of funds in the treasury in the defendant's name. The bill in substance states: That the claimant [Benjamin C. Clarke] was a judgment creditor of the defendant [Ferdinand N. Clarke]; that the defendant at the time the judgment was entered against him was wholly insolvent. That on the 15th of April, 1851, an award was made by the board of commissioners on claims against Mexico, in favor of said Ferdinand N. Clarke for $86,786.24, and that it is the only assets of the said Ferdinand to which the creditors can have any recovery for the payment of their claims against him. That he left the city of New York and proceeded to New Hampshire, and filed his petition to be declared a bankrupt; he was duly declared a bankrupt. That an assignee was appointed to dispose of the effects. That pursuant to the schedule filed he sold all Clarke's interest in the property, and the rights of property, for the sum of two dollars; Clarke himself bidding at the sale, but ordered the title to be made by the assignee to his (Clarke's) sister, who relinquished to him by a formal deed on the next day. By virtue of this purchase, Clarke claims to be bona fide owner of all the property, and rights of property he had in or indicated in the schedule. That the assignee, John Palmer, is dead. That the complainant prays for a writ of injunction against the said Ferdinand not to receive the amount of the award, and that another assignee duly appointed may come in and make himself party complainant.

The defendant answered the bill, said notwithstanding the creditors had due notice of the proceedings in bankruptcy in this case, none of the creditors filed any proof of debt in the case of the defendant, or any objections to the proceedings, or to the doings of the said assignee until after the filing of this bill, insisting that if any loss has accrued to the complainant in consequence or on account of the management of his assets in bankruptcy by said assignee, it has been through the laches and negligence of said complainant, that he was the bona fide purchaser of said claim, and is entitled to the sole benefit of the award. That the complainant, if any claim existed at the time of the proceedings in bankruptcy had no claim upon the award, or any part thereof, as was intended to be protected and secured by the 8th section of the act entitled "An act to carry into effect certain stipulations of the treaty between the United States and the republic of Mexico, of February 2d, 1848" [9 Stat. 922]; and therefore is not entitled to relief, and that said complainant did not file the notice and bond required by said section within the time specified in said section.

The allegation of fraud in the bill was put in issue by the answer. William H. G. Hackett was appointed assignee of the estate of the defendant Clarke, in the place of John Palmer, deceased, and was made party complainant in this suit; and stated in his position that there was no evidence put into the possession of the original assignee to enable him to recover the claim, but that such information and evidences were fraudulently withheld by the said bankrupt; that because of the assignee's ignorance of its value it could not be sold; and that no title to the said Mexican claim passed out of said assignee to any person whatever, or in any manner averted to or became the property of the bankrupt.

The following auditor's report of the claim of F. T. Lally and James S. Thayer, with the accompanying decree, will explain the claim of said Lally and Thayer to a portion of the fund awarded.

By the reference in the above cases the auditor is directed to ascertain and report: (1) Whether the commissions claimed by Lally and Thayer are due to them under the agreement set up? (2) Whether the agreement was bona fide made by them at the time it bears date? (3) Whether the fund in controversy was recoverable by them under said agreement? and, (4) To state the account, &c.

The papers have been perused, and under the above reference the following report is respectfully submitted:

By W. RIDDEN, Auditor:

"The petition of F. T. Lally and James S. Thayer states that Ferdinand N. Clarke, being entitled to a claim against the Mexican government, executed on the 24th of Feb., 1851, a power of attorney, constituting said Lally his attorney, to present and prosecute said claim before the board of commissioners on claims against Mexico. That said power of attorney contained, in consideration of his professional services rendered, and to be rendered, an assignment and transfer to said Lally of 20 per centum of such amount as might be awarded to said Clarke, and a power to said Lally to draw the same from the treasury department; that said Lally engaged the services of said Thayer to aid him in the prosecution of said claim; that they prosecuted said claim, and obtained an award in favor of said Clarke for $86,786.24. The answer of the defendant, Clarke, to the petition, does not deny the allegations in the petition, but admits them.

"I find, therefore, that Lally was employed to prosecute the claim; that 20 per cent. of the amount was assigned to him for his services; that the agreement and assignment were bona fide made at the time they bear date; that $86,786.24 were recovered and awarded; and that the same were recovered by said Lally, and the agents employed by him, under the said agreement and assignment as averred in said petition, and admitted by the said answer of said F. N. Clarke. I find the amount due to said F. T. Lally, under said agreement and assignment, and which he is entitled to have paid out of said sum awarded, to be $17,357.20.

"Several bills and petitions have been filed claiming the fund. Wm. H. Y. Hackett claims it as assignee under F. N. Clarke's bankruptcy; Benjamin F. Clarke and W. C. Pickersgill as judgment creditors of said F. N. Clarke prior to his bankruptcy, and Stanton, Barclay and Boothe also as creditors of said F. N. Clarke prior to his bankruptcy. The claim was presented and prosecuted by said Lally and Thayer, in the name of said F. N. Clarke alone, and the award was made in his name. All the parties now claiming the fund claim under or through him, and ought, and it is supposed, must take, if they establish their claims, subject to the burthen created and imposed by Clarke, upon the fund in favor of his attorneys for their services in recovering it.

"The court has established and carried out these agreements, where the power of attorney has contained an assignment of so much of the fund as the agent was to receive as compensation for his services. As in Betsy McIntosh's Case (McElrath v. McIntosh [Case No. 8,781]), one-half, in Fuller v. Clarke's Adm'r (not reported) one-half, and in Baldwin v. Wylie [Id. 18,228], on an agreement to be paid five per cent. out of the fund. Twenty per cent. is not an unusual commission on claims of this kind. The agreement, however, of Mr. Clarke is specific, and binds, it is supposed, those who claim through him, in favor of the agents who obtained the claim. All the claimants and the defendant are represented in this agreement to refer, viz.: Benjamin F. Clarke, Barclay and Hackett by Mr. Carlisle; Stanton by Mr. Abert; Chester and Fleming, et al. by Mr. Hall; Boothe by Mr. Bradley. The defendant by Mr. Hays and Mr. Lawrence, and Pickersgill by Mr. Hall."

J. M. Carlisle, for complainants.
John L. Hayes, for defendants.

Before CRANCH, Chief Judge, and MORSELL and DUNLOP, Circuit Judges.

THE COURT decided that the commission of said Lally agreed to be paid by the said Clarke out of this fund, and assigned to said Lally by said Clarke, is a lien upon the said fund, ratifying and confirming the auditor's report; decreeing that the sum of $17,357.20, with interest thereon, from the 21st day of June, 1851, and that the injunctions granted in the causes be dissolved as to the said sum and interest.

The following is the decree of THE COURT in the cause under consideration:

This cause having been set for hearing by consent of parties and by order of the court, on bill, petitions and exhibits, and on answers and exhibits, and on general replications and testimony on both sides, and having been fully argued by counsel. It is now this 30th day of May, 1853, by the court ordered, adjudged and decreed that the fund in controversy in this cause, to wit: the sum of sixty-nine thousand four hundred and twenty-nine dollars and four cents, which is remaining in the treasury of the United States, of the amount of the award to Ferdinand N. Clarke, mentioned in the bill, petitions and answers, deducting therefrom the complainant's costs, here to be taxed by the clerk, be paid over to the complainant, William H. Y. Hackett, assignee in bankruptcy of said Ferdinand N. Clarke, for distribution in the bankrupt court, where the proceedings in bankruptcy are pending, to wit: the district court of the United States, for the district of New Hampshire, under the orders of the said court, according to the respective rights of the creditors of said bankrupt, to whom the said court may order the same to be distributed.

On appeal, the court was sustained. See 17 How. [58 U. S.] 315.

Case No. 18,280.

CLARKE v. OLARKE.

[Nowhere reported. Opinion not now accessible.]

CLARKE (JOHNSTON v.). See Case No. 18,303.

CLARKE v. SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY. See Case No. 18,279.

CORCORAN (JUDSON v.). See Case No. 18,304.

Case No. 18,281.

CORPORATION OF GEORGETOWN v. UNITED STATES.

[2 Hayw. & H. 302.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Aug. 25, 1858.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—REPAIRING ROADS OUTSIDE OF CORPORATE LIMITS—INDICTMENT FOR NEGLIGENCE.

1. A municipal corporation has no authority to take upon itself the burden of repairing a road or turnpike, in which the public as well as the corporation are interested, when the same is outside the limits of said corporation.

2. Where it is the duty of the levy court to keep in repair all the roads in the county, outside the corporate limits of Georgetown, an ordinance passed by the corporation, stipulating that the corporation should repair a certain road leading to said corporation, does not make the corporation liable on an indictment for not repairing said road, neither would it be the case where the act of congress of 1826 [4 Stat. 183] makes the corporation liable for one-half of the expense of keeping the county roads in repair. In other words the corporation has no authority for any purpose beyond its own limits.

At law. Writ of error from the criminal court. On an indictment for a nuisance in not repairing a highway, etc.

P. Barton Key, U. S. Atty. for the District of Columbia, for the United States.

J. M. Carlisle, special counsel with U. S. Dist. Atty.

Robert Ould, for the corporation.

¹ [Reported by John A. Hayward, Esq., and Geo. C. Hazleton, Esq.]

The object of this prosecution being to ascertain judicially whether the corporation of Georgetown is bound to keep in repair the road mentioned in the indictment, and there being no dispute about the matter of fact, but only in matter of law, touching the obligation to repair and liability to this indictment, the case is submitted to the court under the statute, subject to the opinion of the court as to the liability of the corporation, upon the following facts agreed:

On the 2nd of March, 1833, congress passed and approved an act to improve the navigation, &c. 4 Stat. 646. The corporation passed the following ordinances of March 11, 1833; of 19 and 20 March, 1833; of May 11, 1833; of 19 June, 1833, and of September 16, 1833. It is agreed that a majority of the voters of Georgetown did, at the election referred to in the ordinance of Sept. 16, 1833, duly declare their preference for making such "free turnpike road from some point of the upper part of the town," &c., but no application was made to congress in that behalf. And afterwards the said corporation passed the following ordinances, to wit: the ordinances approved March 15, 1834, June 7, 1834, October 21, 1834, February 21, 1835, April 16 and 18, 1835, May 16 and 23, 1835, and also the following ordinances, to wit: the ordinances approved November 9, 1835, December 22, 1835, April 23, 1836, June 15, 1836, and October 1, 1836, and afterwards passed the following ordinances, to wit: the ordinances approved December 4, 1838, November 22, 1839, February 12, 1840, and July 18, 1840. And it is agreed that the road mentioned in the indictment was contracted by the corporation under the contract approved by said ordinance of April 16, 1835; and that the said road is the same road which is referred to in the said ordinances as the "Upper Route" of the free turnpike road aforesaid, and which enters the said town at Seventh street.

It is agreed that the road mentioned in the indictment, and as aforesaid constructed by the corporation, has and is from the time of constructing the same, and hitherto a public highway, convenient for the interests of the upper or northern section of the town, and lies without the corporate limits of the said town, and wholly within the county of Washington, District of Columbia, extending from Seventh street in said town; and has been, from time to time, repaired and kept in repair by the corporation from the time the same was contracted until within two years last past, since when the corporation has not kept the same in repair or in a condition fit for a public highway; but the same has been and is wholly unfit for travel, and by reason of the decay and dilapidation of certain culverts, part thereof, and by reason of the condition of the roads generally, the same is a public nuisance, as being impassable as a public highway, and as causing damage by overflow, &c., to the private property bordering thereon. It is agreed that if upon the whole case the court shall be of opinion that the corporation is bound to keep the said road in repair, and is indictable for the nuisance created by the failure to do so, judgment shall be entered accordingly, or such form (either upon plea of guilty or otherwise) as may be deemed regular by the court; but if the court shall be of the contrary opinion a nolle prosequi shall be entered, the object of the prosecution being to determine judicially the right of the matter.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The present case grows out of an indictment in the criminal court against the corporation of Georgetown for not keeping in repair a road in the county of Washington, outside the limits of the corporation, which is described in the indictment as "a certain common public highway leading from Seventh street, in the town of Georgetown, at the county aforesaid, to the stone house situate on the common and public highway leading to the Little Falls bridge, and known and designated as the 'Upper Road to the Little Falls Bridge.'"

It is admitted on all hands that the duty of repairing a highway outside its territorial limits does not rest, at common law, upon any parish, corporation or county; and that to create a liability to repair an extraterritorial highway some special legal obligation must be shown. If, therefore, the corporation of Georgetown is liable under this indictment that liability must be sought in some legislation of congress or on some permanent obligation assumed by the corporation within the scope of the corporate powers which have been confirmed by law upon the authorities of the town. With the most limited powers, among the chief of which was the right of the commissioners to hold semi-annual fairs in April and October. Georgetown within what were then the limits of Frederick county, was erected into a town by the act of assembly of 1751, c. 25. Its streets, lanes and alleys were defined by the commissioners and by successive acts of assembly of 1783, c. 27, and 1784, c. 45, the boundaries of the town were extended. The town was first incorporated by Act 1789, c. 23, then being in Montgomery county, and certain additional powers were granted to it by Act 1797, c. 56, and 1799, c. 85. Congress extended the chartered powers by the act of 1805, c. 32 [2 Stat. 332], and by the 12th section conferred upon the corporation power to "open, extend and regulate streets within the limits of said town," and by further amendment of the charter, Act 1809, c. 30, § 4 [2 Stat. 537], that power is defined as follows: "The said corporation shall have power to lay out, open, extend and regulate streets, lanes and alleys within the limits of the town under the following regulations," &c., &c. And connected with these special powers our streets, &c., &c., within the limits of the town; congress conferred upon the levy court of Washington county, by the act of 1812, c. 117, § 2 [2 Stat. 771], "full powers to lay out, straighten and repair public roads within said county, except within the corporate limits of the cities of Washington and Georgetown." By the 8th section of this law the levy court was empowered to lay an annual tax upon all the real and personal property within said county, (except the city of Washington,) for the purpose of defraying the annual charges, (expenses of repairing roads included.) Afterwards by Act 1826, c. 111 [4 Stat. 183], the power of the levy court to assess and collect taxes within Georgetown was abolished, but with regard to county expenses the corporation was bound to contribute certain proportion amongst others, one-half the expense of opening and repairing roads in the county of Washington, west of Rock Creek and leading to Georgetown. From an inspection of these several statutes, it is manifest that the corporation of Georgetown has no general powers whatever on the subject of roads outside of the limits of the town to which all its functions and authority are by the statutes studiously limited, and that the whole power to open roads as well as the duty to repair is devolved by express terms upon the county, the corporation paying only to the treasury of the county, one-half the expenses incurred by the levy court for roads opened or repaired west of Rock creek.

This being the relation of the corporation to the county in regards to its road system, the special act of congress, of March 2, 1833, c. 66, and the several ordinances of the corporation mentioned in the agreed statement which taken together are supposed to create the liability to repair in the case were enacted. In order to understand their full bearing it is deemed necessary to refer to some other special legislation of Maryland, by Act 1791, c. 81, incorporated the Georgetown Bridge Company, for the purpose of erecting a toll bridge at the Little Falls of the Potomac and subsequently by Act 1795, c. 44, on petition of that company authorizing them to construct a road from the bridge to Georgetown, which said road was declared to be "a public highway forever, and kept in repair by said company." Afterwards upon the destruction of the bridge, Feb. 22nd, 1811, congress authorized the company to make a new assessment upon its stockholders to rebuild the bridge and to keep the same in repair together with the road leading thereto from Georgetown. The bridge and road then were constructed by the same company, owned by the same company, chargeable upon and to be kept in repair by the same company and made subservient to the uses of the public, to citizens of Georgetown and others going to and returning from that town. It was under this state of circumstances that congress, in pursuance of its general policy to make the roads and bridges leading to and through the District of Columbia, free to all, passed the act of 1833, c. 66, appropriating a sum of money to enable the corporation of Georgetown among other things "to make a free turnpike road to the District line on the Virginia side of the river, and to purchase of the present proprietors and make forever free the bridge over the Little Falls of the Potomac river," coupling with its bounty the condition "that before the said sum be paid over to said corporation it shall pass an ordinance to make said road and bridge free, and to be kept in repair by said corporation forever." In consequence of the act of congress, the corporation passed an ordinance on the 11th of March, 1833, accepting the condition imposed, and on the 20th of March, another ordinance in more explicit terms than the first, declaring "that the bridge across the Potomac river at the Little Falls and the road to the District line west of the river, be and the same are hereby declared to be free, and the corporation of Georgetown engages that the said bridge and road shall be kept in repair by the corporation forever."

Looking to the preceding legislation of Maryland and congress, it would seem that the ordinances fulfilled the meaning of the law, and determined upon the then existing road and bridge as the road they were to turnpike and make free as far as the Virginia line, and in connection with the bridge keep in perpetual repair; and that having accepted that particular road the power of the corporation conferred by the act of congress was to that extent satisfied and exhausted. It is true, indeed, that by an intermediate ordinance of the 19th of March, 1833, the corporation seemed to contemplate an unrestricted power in itself to select any route for a turnpike road without any reference to the site of the old road of the bridge company, and by other ordinances of May and June of that year they look to an alternative selection.

Afterwards, in September of the same year, 1833, they passed an ordinance, the title of which is: "An ordinance fixing and establishing the route of the free turnpike road from the town to the Chain bridge, and making provision for the construction thereof, and for other purposes," and by that ordinance they adopted substantially the same road mentioned in the ordinances of the 11th and 20th of March, to wit: the old road of the bridge company, with certain alterations which were particularly specified in the first section of the ordinance.

It is perhaps not necessary to examine over-critically, how far it was competent for them to modify the selection of a route previously designated and which in this ordinance is substantially re-announced, for if the corporation had no power whatever over the subject, so as to make needful, perhaps indispensable, variations in the course of the route so as to make it fit for turnpiking, there could be no shadow for the operation of the further power over the matter necessary to impose the obligation which must exist to sustain the present indictment.

Conceding then, for the purpose of this case, the power to vary the location of the line where the reasonable convenience or economy of constructing the turnpike required the modification, it remains that the ordinance of September the 16th, in connection with those of March 11th and 20th, amounted to a final adoption of a route for a turnpike, coupled with an obligation under the sanction of the act of congress for perpetual repair of the road designated in the ordinance as "the present road or canal route." It also made provision for constructing the road and appropriating a portion of the funds derived from congress to carry out that object.

Having done thus much the corporate authorities went further. In the same ordinance of the 16th September, 1833, by the 7th section, they proposed to apply to congress for authority to appropriate $35,000 of the monies derived under the act of March preceding, either to the purchase of the turnpike from Georgetown to Rockville or making a free turnpike road from some point of the upper part of the town to intersect the road designated in the ordinance, as a majority of the voters might prefer, their preference to be ascertained at the next March election. The voters did declare a preference for the road described in the indictment.

No act of congress was, however, passed, and the corporation in October, 1834, passed an ordinance entitled, "A supplement to the ordinance of September 16th," providing for an additional inlet into the town and for the construction thereof; in which they declared "that the upper section of the town are fairly entitled to an equal participation in the advantages resulting from the expenditure of funds for the benefit of all its citizens, which could only be extended to those sections by means of a part of said road leading into said sections, and as the public convenience required it," they therefore authorized certain commissioners to lay out and construct the same, and declared that when located it should be forever taken as part of the free turnpike road provided for in the act of 2nd of March, 1833. This road, being the same described in the indictment, was located and the contract for its construction ratified contemporaneously with the contract for the road provided in ordinance of 16th September, 1833, and by the ordinance of October certain portions of the funds derived from congress were appropriated to this upper route, and by an ordinance of April 23, 1836, a fund of $15,000 was set apart and pledged as a perpetual fund for the repair of both roads. The two roads have thenceforth continually been kept in repair by the corporation of Georgetown until some short period before the filing of this indictment.

In constructing this new road, nearly or quite one-half the length of the original road, did the authorities of Georgetown bring themselves within the powers conferred by the act of congress, by connecting it with the original road, and at the same time declaring it to be a part thereof? Could a form of words adopted in a corporation ordinance make that a part of a road, which was to all intents a separate road, connecting with it?

It was not essential to the other which was capable of use without it, and although doubtless of great value and utility to a portion of the citizens of the town it could not in legal comprehension be a part of that which was an entirety without its being constructed, and had substantial existence many years before it was located; neither could the appropriation to the purpose of a portion of the funds derived from the bounty of congress by the individuals who happened at the time to fill the corporate offices, raise a perpetual obligation upon the corporation to redeem a pledge with which its officers had accompanied an expenditure of those funds. For the protection of the rights and property of the inhabitants who constitute the citizens of any municipality the law has wisely provided that they shall be bound by no act of their agents which is not within the scope of the delegated powers of those agents, and however the pledge of public faith may be attempted, it will not avail unless warranted by a legal delegation of authority. The public convenience and manifest advantage to a portion of the citizens of Georgetown which the ordinances recite as these inducements are alike insufficient to support a legal obligation upon the corporation to repair this road.

In one of the cases referred to in the argument of this case: Rex v. Inhabitants of St. Giles, 5 Maule & S. 266, 267; Holroyd, Justice, gives the very reason which fits the present enquiry, "It has been said that it might have been for the convenience of the parish of St. Mary, that this land was dedicated to the public for the purpose of a highway, and that in consideration of this boon the parish might have taken on themselves the burden of its reparation, but I think upon reflection that this could not be a legal consideration binding on the successors, because a burden might thereby be imposed on them beyond the benefit which they were to receive, for they would have to repair the highway not only for their own use, but also for the public." And as in this case, although the convenience of the people of Georgetown may be promoted by the road in question; and in view of that and to equalize the advantages springing out of the liberality of congress, the then inducements of the corporate officers honestly stipulated that through all time the corporation should repair the road; in so doing they transcended their authority and attempted to impose a burden beyond the benefit which the law contemplated that the citizens received in stipulating for them to repair a highway in which the whole public as well as the citizens of Georgetown are interested. If the road in question be a public highway, as is assumed in the indictment and the agreed statement, then the corporation not being liable under the above mentioned ordinances, the burden of repair will fall upon the county. In that event Georgetown is not entirely exempted but according to the equitable apportionment determined by the act of 1826, one-half of the expense must be contributed by the corporation to the levy court, which body by the policy of the law is primarily charged with the duty of repairing public roads within the county of Washington.

If this view of law be correct, it is needless to inquire whether, as was strenuously denied by the counsel for the corporation, an obligation to repair a highway may be incurred by contract for a pecuniary consideration, which will render the party so contracting liable to indictment for not repairing. No such contract could be made by the corporation of Georgetown under the powers conferred by its present charter. Neither is it necessary to consider any question growing out of the form of the indictment. For the reason above given, it is the opinion of the court that the indictment cannot be sustained upon the case agreed, and the judgment of the criminal court must therefore be traversed and judgment of not guilty entered for the traverser.

COSTS.

See Case No. 18,282.

Case No. 18,282.

COSTS AND FEES.

[1 N. B. R. 24; 1 Bankr. Reg. Supp. 6; 6 Int. Rev. Rec. 53.]

District Court, D. Wisconsin.

BANKRUPTCY — COSTS, FEES, AND DISBURSEMENTS.

Semble, 1. That a regular taxation by the clerk should be made of all the fees and disbursements in each bankrupt case.

2. The sum of $50, deposited with the clerk, is not a fund in court for general distribution among creditors, but is to be disbursed under the supervision of the court.

3. The sum, or such portion of it as may be necessary, may be appropriated to the register in the first place.

4. Where a bankrupt is relieved by order of the court from further payment of fees, the $50 deposit will be distributed pro rata to the register, clerk, and marshal.

5. Printers' fees are chargeable according to the United States fee bill.

MILLER, District Judge. The subject of costs and fees for services, under the act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved March 2, 1867, being brought up almost daily, I have prepared the following for the consideration of persons interested: Section 47 of the act relates exclusively to the subject of costs and fees. The section is so unskillfully drawn as to cause uncertainty in its construction. In the first place it provides: "That in each case there shall be allowed and paid, in addition to the fees of the clerk of the court, as now established by law, or as may be established by general order, under the provisions of this act, the following fees, which shall be applied to the payment for the services of the registers." The fees of the clerk of the court are here allowed as now established by law,—that is, by the general fee bill for similar services, or as may be established by general order, under the provisions of this act. Then follows a specification of fees, "which shall be applied to the payment for the services of the registers." Following the specification of the register's fees is the provision, "Such fees (that is, the register's fees) shall have priority of payment over all other claims out of the estate, and before a warrant issues, the petitioner shall deposit with the senior register of the court, or with the clerk (by rule 36 of the General Orders in Bankruptcy, with the clerk), to be delivered to the register, $50 as security for the payment thereof. And if there are not sufficient assets for the payment of the fees, the person upon whose petition the warrant is issued shall pay the same, and the court may issue an execution against him to compel the payment to the register." It is here provided that the register's fees shall have priority of payment out of the estate. Then $50 shall be deposited with the clerk of the court, to be delivered to the register as security for the payment of his fees, and the petitioner is rendered liable to an execution on the part of the register in case of deficiency of assets for the payment of his fees. It is apparent that the compensation of the register is abundantly secured. The clerk and marshal do not appear to be so well provided for. The 47th section further provides that, "before any dividend is ordered, the assignee shall pay out of the estate to the messenger (that is, the marshal) the following fees, and no more," as there specified. And "for cause shown, and upon hearing thereon, such further allowance may be made as the court in its discretion may determine." I presume this is in reference to the marshal's fees alone. The section concludes with this provision: "The enumeration of the foregoing fees (that is, all the fees enumerated) shall not prevent the judges (of the supreme court), who shall frame general rules and orders in accordance with the provisions of section 10 from prescribing a tariff of fees for all other services of the officers of courts of bankruptcy, or from reducing the fees prescribed in this section in classes of cases to be named in the rules and orders." The act classes registers with clerks and marshals as officers of the courts. In pursuance of said last provision of the section, the judges ordered, by rule 30, that additional fees should be allowed clerks and registers for services not enumerated in the act. And by rule 29 it is ordered that "the fees of the register, marshal, and clerk shall be paid or secured in all cases before they shall be compelled to perform the duties required of them by the parties requiring such service." The fees of the register, as before seen, are to be secured by a deposit of $50 with the clerk; but there being no security provided for in the law for the payment of the fees of clerks and marshals, no doubt, induced the judges to adopt rule 29. It is claimed that registers are entitled to be paid in advance the $50 directed to be deposited with the clerk in each case. The act does not direct the manner or the time of disbursing the $50, but expressly directs the deposit to be made for the security of the register's compensation. In a great majority of cases register's fees cannot approximate the sum of $50. Where there is no estate for distribution, there will be but few, if any, debts proven, and no meeting of creditors to appoint assignees, and no examination of the bankrupt. The appointment of an assignee and subsequent proceedings will be mere matters of form. The legislature did not contemplate that registers should be paid in advance the whole amount of $50, in cases where, by the fee bill, not half, or, probably, not the quarter, of that sum could be earned. Rule 12 orders that "every register shall keep an accurate account of his traveling and incidental expenses, and those of any clerk or other officer attending him in the performance of his duties, in any case or number of cases which may be referred to him, and shall make return of the same under oath, with proper vouchers (where vouchers can be procured), on the first Tuesday in each month; and the marshal shall make his return under oath, of his actual and necessary expenses in the services of any warrants addressed to him, and for custody of property, publication of notices, and other services," &c. If the $50 were payable to the register, or any part of it, in advance of services performed, this rule would be unnecessary, unless to enable him to have execution or an order for payment out of the estate, for excess of fees over the $50.

¹ [Reprinted from 1 N. B. R. 24, by permission.]

In pursuance of the concluding sentence of section 47, that the enumeration of the foregoing fees shall not prevent the judges from reducing the fees prescribed in this section in classes of cases to be named in their rules and orders, by rule 30 the following order is made: "In cases where the debtor has no means, and makes proof to the satisfaction of the court that he is unable to pay the costs prescribed by the act and these orders, the judge, in his discretion, may direct that the fees and costs therein shall not exceed the sum of (fifty dollars) required by the act to be deposited with the clerk." This rule is a reduction of fees, and contemplates a distribution of the sum deposited with the clerk amongst the register, marshal, and clerk; otherwise, the marshal might be required to advance money to pay for advertisements, notices, and postage, and he and the clerk might be compelled to perform their official duties without compensation. I think the law and the orders contemplate a regular taxation of all the fees and disbursements in each case by the clerk, under the direction and control of the court or judge. The sum deposited with the clerk as security for register's fees, or such portion as may be necessary, will, in ordinary cases, be appropriated, upon such taxation, to the register, in the first place. In cases where a bankrupt is relieved by order of the court from making further payment of fees, the $50 will be distributed pro rata to the register, marshal, and clerk. In ordinary cases any surplus of the $50 will be ordered returned to the party, as applicable to any unpaid fees of marshal or clerk. The sum of $50 is not a sum in court, but is deposited with the clerk, an officer of the court, where it will remain until disbursed under the supervision of the court. This is not a fund in court for general distribution amongst creditors. By rule 29 "the court may order the whole or such portions of the fees and costs to be paid out of the fund in court in such cases as shall seem just. Upon a taxation of the costs and fees, after a final discharge or decree in any case, the court may order the whole or a portion thereof advanced by the party to be paid or refunded out of the fund made of the estate, which is required to be paid into court and deposited in a bank according to the rules." Printers' fees are chargeable according to the United States fee bill.

Case No. 18,283.

COSTS, FEES AND COMPENSATION IN PRIZE CASES.¹

[Blatchf. Pr. Cas. 206.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Aug., 1862.

BETTS, District Judge. Bills of costs are laid before me for taxation in behalf of the district attorney, the marshal, the prize commissioners, and the counsel for captors, made up in prize suits which have been adjudicated in the court.

The following principles of allowance will be applied in the taxation of costs in prize cases:

¹[Reported by Samuel Blatchford Esq.]

1. No specific tariff of fees having been appointed to the suits by statute, the costs fixed by the statute for similar services in admiralty will be allowed in this court, except as otherwise directed by acts posterior to the fee bill of February 26, 1833.

2. The compensation directed to be made by the act of March 25, 1862, to the officers therein named, will be computed and adjusted as nearly as may be conformably to allowances by the laws of the United States to employes for like services under the government, or in accordance with established rules and usages of the courts in regard to their officers rendering like services. In cases of doubt or difficulty, evidence may be taken on the question of quantum meruit.

3. The gross costs taxed to any of the officers of the court for services in prize suits will be, in collection or payment, subject to all limitations as to amounts or periods of payment, under the acts of congress in force at the time of such taxation.

4. The method of ascertaining the compensation of any of the officers of court for their services in prize suits, by a percentage on the value of the property coming officially into their possession or under their charge, will not be adopted by the court without express authority of law, or the assent thereto, in writing, by the parties whose interests are to be affected thereby.

Case No. 18,284.

COSTS IN CIVIL CASES.

[1 Blatchf. 652.]¹

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. May, 1852.

COSTS IN CIVIL CASES.

1. The right of the prevailing party to recover costs is recognized in the judiciary act of 1789, and in numerous acts of congress passed since down to the present day.

2. All of them assume that the costs which have been taxed and usually allowed by the practice of the courts are to be recovered.

3. The usage and practice of the circuit courts of the United States in taxing costs have uniformly been to apply the general rule prescribed in the act of September 23, 1789 (1 Stat. 49, § 2), which act is not now in force, namely, to fix the rate according to the fee bill of the state, altering the rate from time to time by rule of court, to correspond with it as altered by state legislation.

4. This has been the usage for fifty years in the circuit courts in the Second circuit.

5. Taxing officers in the circuit courts in New York must look to the fee bill of the state of New York, as found in chapter 386 of the Laws of 1840, as amended by chapter 273 of the Laws of 1844 (2 Rev. St. N. Y., 3d Ed., pp. 722-725), as the rule to guide them in the taxation of costs in the circuit court in cases at common law, and to the equity fee bill (2 Rev. St. N. Y. pp. 629, 630) in cases in chancery.

6. If there are any items of service not provided for in those bills, the practice is to refer to some previous fee bill, in which an allowance is found for a service corresponding with the one in this court.

[Cited in The Advance, 60 Fed. 423.]

7. The act of the legislature of New York, abolishing all costs and fees to attorneys and counsel (Laws N. Y. 1849, c. 433, § 303), does not affect the question of costs in the federal courts.

8. But the rate of those costs is limited to that prescribed by the fee bills of the state, as they existed at the time of such abolition.

9. The thirty-fourth section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 92) has no application to the proceedings or practice of the courts, but relates to the rules of decision as to the rights of persons and of property, in the trial of civil causes at common law.

10. Semble, that congress has no power to abrogate the distinction between actions at law and suits in equity, which is recognized by article 3, § 2, of the constitution.

¹[Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The question of the proper rate of costs to be allowed and taxed for the services of attorneys, solicitors, and counsel, in civil suits, at law or in equity, in the circuit courts of the United States, having been submitted to Mr. Justice NELSON, in May, 1852, he delivered the following opinion:

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The act of September 29, 1789 (1 Stat. 93, § 2), provided that the rates of fees in the circuit and district courts of the United States, in suits at common law, should be the same as were allowed in the supreme court of the state, and the rates of fees in equity cases should be according to those allowed in the chancery court of the state. This act was to continue only until the end of the next session of congress.

The act of May 26, 1790 (1 Stat. 123), continued the act of 1789 until the end of the succeeding session, and no longer. It was again continued by the act of February 18, 1791 (1 Stat. 191), until the end of the next session. This last act was repealed by the eighth section of the act of May 8, 1792 (1 Stat. 278).

The act of March 1, 1793 (1 Stat. 333, § 4), provided that there should be allowed and taxed in the circuit courts of the United States, in favor of the parties obtaining judgments therein, such compensation for their travel and attendance, and for attorneys' and counsellors' fees, "as are allowed in the supreme or superior courts of the respective states." The duration of this act also was limited to the end of the next session of congress. It was continued another year by the act of February 25, 1795 (1 Stat. 419), and was again continued by the act of March 31, 1796 (1 Stat. 451), for the term of two years, and from thence to the end of the next session of congress thereafter. It then expired.

Since this last act I have not been able to find any one prescribing the rate of fees to attorneys and counsel in the circuit courts of the United States. The right of the prevailing party to recover costs is, however, recognized and admitted in the judiciary act of 1789, and in numerous acts of congress that have been passed from time to time since that period down to the present day. All of them assume that the costs which have been taxed and usually allowed by the practice of the courts are to be recovered. A collection of these acts will be found in Mr. Law's recent work, which contains much useful information in a succinct form, entitled "The Jurisdiction and Powers of the United States Courts," etc., at page 255, and by Mr. Justice Woodbury, in Hathaway v. Roach [Case No. 6,213]; and the usage and practice of the circuit courts in taxing costs have uniformly been to apply the general rule prescribed in the act of September 29, 1789, namely, to fix the rate according to the fee bill of the state. This has also been done from time to time by the rules of the circuit courts, as the rates of fees were altered by state legislation so as to conform to the existing regulations. This usage has prevailed for the last fifty years in the circuit courts of the United States in the Second circuit, and, as I understand, in the other circuits also, where a fee bill exists in the state courts. See case above cited.

The last rule on the subject in the circuit court for the Southern district of New York was adopted June 28, 1845. That rule applies to cases at common law and in equity, between parties, the same principle as it respects the fees of attorneys, solicitors, and counsel, that had been applied to the attorney of the United States by the acts of 1841 and 1842—Act March 3, 1841 (5 Stat. 427); Act May 18, 1842 (5 Stat. 484)—in respect to the rate of fees allowed to him; and which is the same rate that is allowed to attorneys, solicitors, and counsel, in the highest courts of law or equity of original jurisdiction of the state, according to the nature of the proceedings for like services rendered therein. And where, according to the course of practice in the circuit court, a service is rendered for which no fees are appointed specifically by act of congress, or by the state law, the same rate of compensation is taxable as is allowed therefor by the usage or adjudication of the circuit court or of the supreme court of the United States. The above is the substance of the rate of fees as prescribed in the acts of congress of 1841 and 1842, before named. See, also, District Attorneys' Fees [Case No. 18,290].

The taxing officers, therefore, must look to the fee bill of the state of New York, as found in chapter 386 of the Laws of 1840, as amended by chapter 273 of the Laws of 1844 (see this fee bill in 2 Rev. St. N. Y., 3d Ed., pp. 722-725), as the rule to guide them in the taxation of costs in the circuit in cases at common law, and to the equity fee bill (2 Rev. St. N. Y. pp. 629, 630) in cases in chancery.

As the pleadings and practice in the circuit court of the United States conform substantially to the pleadings and practice in the supreme court of the state, as they existed at the time those state fee bills were established, there can be but few items of service that are not provided for in those bills. If there happen to be any, the practice has been to refer to some previous fee bill, in which an allowance is found for a service corresponding with the one in this court. But such instances are comparatively few, and the state fee bills which have been referred to will, therefore, furnish, in most cases, a fixed guide for the taxing officer.

Since the fee bills, as found in the third edition of the Revised Statutes, were enacted, the legislature of the state have abolished all costs and fees to attorneys and counsel, leaving the measure of compensation to an agreement between them and their client. Laws N. Y. 1849, c. 438, § 303; Blatchford's Ed. St. N. Y. 265. This, however, does not affect the question of costs in the federal courts. The right to costs, as recognized and admitted by the several acts of congress to which I have referred, still remains, but the rate of the fees is necessarily limited to that prescribed by the fee bills of the state, as they existed at the time of the abolition of all costs to attorneys and counsel.

The right of the prevailing party to recover costs generally in all cases, at law and in equity, is given by acts of congress, either expressly or by necessary implication; and, for some ten years, the rates of fees were prescribed by a statute adopting the state fee bill. But, by some oversight, this act was allowed to expire: since which time the principle of the statute has been recognized and applied by the usage and practice of the courts, by allowing the rates of fees for like services in the supreme courts and courts of equity of the states, as the case may be. This seems to have been necessary, in order to carry out practically the right given to the prevailing party to recover costs. The rate of fees allowed to attorneys, solicitors, and counsel, in cases at law and in equity in the courts of the United States, has stood on this footing for more than fifty years. I take the rule, therefore, as to their compensation, as I found it on coming into this court, and shall administer it accordingly. I do not think the thirty-fourth section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 92) can be invoked in aid of the view that the question of costs in the federal courts is affected by the statute of New York abolishing all costs, as that section has no application to the proceedings or practice of the courts, but relates to the rules of decision as to the rights of persons and of property in the trial of civil causes at common law.

The legislature of New York have also abolished the distinction between actions at law and suits in equity, as well as the forms of all such actions and suits, and blended them into one. Laws N. Y. 1849, c. 438, § 69; Blatchford's Ed. St. N. Y. 222. This distinction is recognized in the constitution of the United States (article 3, § 2), and I suppose, therefore, that congress possesses no power to abrogate it. And, from the lights of experience thus far under the new system, so far as I am advised, the policy of any such change would be even more than doubtful. The pleadings are more voluminous, the issues of fact more complicated and confused, and the adjudications rest more upon the arbitrary discretion of the courts, than in proceedings according to the course of the common law.

Even if costs, therefore, had been given under the new system of the administration of justice in the state of New York, of which I have been speaking, there would be great difficulty in the application of the rates of compensation to the proceedings in the federal courts. The pleadings and practice, and indeed the whole course of proceeding, in these courts, are so diverse and variant from those in the state courts that the services rendered in a cause by the attorneys and solicitors would possess very little in common with those rendered by the same officers in the state courts.

=====

COUNTERFEITING—CHARGE TO GRAND JURY IN RELATION TO COUNTERFEITING. See Cases Nos.
18,248 and 18,251.

CRAWFORD (FIELDS v.). See Case No. 18,296.

CRAWFORD (LATTON v.). See Case No. 18,296.

=====

Case No. 18,285.

CROMPTON v. BELKNAP MILLS et al.
[3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 536.]²

Circuit Court, D. New Hampshire. May, 1869.

PATENTS—"LOOMS"—OATH—PRESUMPTION—SURRENDER—REISSUE—CONSTRUCTION OF CLAIM—ASSIGNMENT—COMMISSIONER'S DECISION—CONCLUSIVENESS—FRAUD—INFRINGEMENT—COMBINATION—EQUIVALENTS.

1. To warrant a patent, the invention must be useful; that is, capable of some beneficial use, in contradistinction to what is pernicious, or frivolous, or worthless.

2. The fact that a blank form of oath not executed is found among the papers cannot overcome the direct recital of the letters patent that the oath was taken, or the presumption that the requirements of the law were complied with in issuing the patent. The taking of the oath is not a condition precedent, failing which the patent must fail. Whether the oath be taken or not, or the fee paid, the omission would not render the patent void when granted.

[Cited in Hartshorn v. Eagle Shade-Roller Co., 18 Fed. 91; Hancock Inspirator Co. v. Jenks, 21 Fed. 914; Tonduer v. Chambers, 37 Fed. 338. Quoted in Holmes Burglar Alarm Tel. Co. v. Domestic Telegraph & Telephone Co., 42 Fed. 222.]

3. Differences of description or specification between the original and reissue are consistent with the identity of the thing patented. To correct a description or claim, or both, is one object of allowing a surrender.

4. In the reissued patent the patentee need not claim all that was claimed in the original patent. He may retain whatever he deems proper. A claim in a reissue for the use of a pattern chain, or any other device for determining the design to be woven, is not a claim for all subsequent improvements, nor does it enlarge the patent. It is limited to the pattern chain described, or one substantially the same, or some well known substitute.

[Cited in Chicago Fruit-House Co. v. Busch, Case No. 2,669.]

5. A reissue granted to an assignee may be extended to the patentee. In judgment of law, a reissue is only a continuation of the original patent.

[Cited in Washburn & Moen Manuf'g Co. v. Griésche, 16 Fed. 671.]

6. A notice of an application to extend the original patent is a sufficient notice of an application for the extension of a reissue.

7. The functions of the commissioner in extension cases are judicial, and his judgment settles conclusively all questions of notice.

[Cited in Railway Register Manuf'g Co. v. North Hudson C. R. Co., 23 Fed. 595.]

8. If there was fraud practiced in obtaining the patent, that is a matter between the patent office and the patentee. The patent, although obtained by fraud, must be respected and enforced until reversed or annulled by some proceedings directly for that purpose. It is not exposed to the attacks of strangers or third persons for such reason.

9. The claim of Crompton is for a combination of five elements, to wit, the jacks, the lifter, the depresser, the pattern chain and the holding mechanism; and any machine combining substantially the same elements, or well-known substitutes for the same, must be regarded as an infringement. Such a claim would not be infringed by a combination which dispensed with one of the elements, and substituted therefor another element substantially different in construction and operation, but serving the same purpose. Nor by any and every combination of the same elements which may produce the same result, but only by the peculiar combination of the elements described, or one substantially the same.

10. The elements combined being old and the patent being for the peculiar combination, the doctrine of mechanical equivalents does not apply.

[Cited in Yuengling v. Johnson, Case No. 18,195.]

11. The identity or diversity of two machines depends, not on the employment of the same elements or powers of mechanics, but upon producing the given effect by substantially the same mode of operation, or substantially the same combination of powers.

12. One device can not be said to be a well-known substitute for another which can not be used for it.

13. A patent for a combination of three distinct things is not infringed by combining two of them with a third, which is substantially different from the third element described in the specification.

14. The loom manufactured under letters patent granted to S. T. Thomas, July 3, 1855, and February 11, 1862, and to Thomas and Everett, July 25, 1866, does not infringe the patent granted to Moses Marshall, December 11, 1849, as reissued and extended.

This was a bill in equity [by George Crompton against the Belknap Mills and others] filed to restrain the defendants from infringing letters patent [No. 6,939] for "an improvement in looms for weaving figured fabrics," granted to Moses Marshall, December 11, 1849, assigned to complainant May 5, 1859, reissued to complainant April 24, 1860 [No. 974], and extended to the inventor for seven years from December 11, 1863, and assigned to complainant for the extended term, December 19, 1863. The claim of the original patent was as follows: "What I claim as my invention, and desire to have secured to me by letters patent, is the improvement herein above described in the machinery for operating the harness, so that any proper number of heddles may be used or changed as desired without taking the loom to pieces; said improvement consisting, first, in providing the movable spring rests for supporting the jacks of the harness when they are not in use, and which are sprung back by the bevel face on the shoulders of the jacks when they are kept in play by the cams on the pattern chain, the whole arrangement being substantially as herein above set forth; and second, in the 'eveners,' constructed and operating as herein described, for assisting in moving the upper heddle levers and keeping them even, so that the cams or rollers on the pattern chain will operate accurately on the jacks as specified; meaning to claim the exclusive use of said spring rests and 'eveners,' in a loom, the invention of which is entirely original with me. I also claim the combination of rotating, lifting, and depressing bars, arranged in endless chains, so as to revolve, as described, with the forked jacks, having internal shoulders, as specified." The claim of the reissue was as follows: "I claim combining with the jacks that operate the series of leaves of heddles, and with the lifter and depresser, and pattern chain, or any equivalent apparatus for determining the pattern, a mechanism for holding the jacks either in their elevated or depressed position, when not required to be operated, substantially as and for the purpose specified. I also claim imparting an irregular motion, substantially such as herein described, to the jacks, by means of eccentric cog wheels, substantially as and for the purpose specified." The defendants claimed to manufacture looms under letters patent granted to Samuel T. Thomas, July 3, 1855, and February 11, 1862, and to Samuel T. Thomas and Edward Everett, July 25, 1866.

¹ [Corrected report of Case No. 3,406.]

² [Reported by Samuel S. Fisher, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Causten Browne and B. R. Curtis, for complainant.

Joshua D. Ball and T. A. Jenckes, for defendants.

Before CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice, and OLARK, District Judge.

OLARK, District Judge. December 11, 1849, a patent was granted to Moses Marshall for "an improvement in looms for weaving figured fabrics." He described his improvement to consist in this, to wit: "Providing the movable spring rests for supporting the jacks of the harness when they are not in use, and which are sprung back by the bevel face on the shoulders of the jacks when they are kept in play by the cams on the pattern chain," "substantially as set forth;" and, second, "the eveners," as described. "Meaning to claim the exclusive use of the rests and eveners in a loom, the invention of which is entirely original with me." He also claimed a combination of rotating, lifting, and depressing bars, which are not material in this case. The complainant alleges: That before May 5, 1859, the patentee, Marshall, assigned to him, the complainant, all right, title, and interest in, to, and under said letters patent; and that, on said 5th day of May, 1859, he covenanted and agreed with the complainant to convey to him all right, title, and interest whatever in, to, and under any extension of said patent which might be obtained. That afterward, and before the 24th day of April, 1860, said letters patent were surrendered for a defect in the specification, and new letters were issued on said 24th day of April, 1860, to the complainant for the remainder of the term of fourteen years, from the date of the original patent, to wit, the 11th day of December, 1849. On the 8th day of December, 1863, this reissued patent was extended for the further term of seven years from the 11th day of December, 1863, and on the 19th day of December, 1863, said Marshall sold and assigned all his right and interest under said extension to the complainant. Under the reissued patent, the patentee, or assignee, stated his claim as follows: "What I claim as my invention, and desire to secure by letters patent is, combining with the jacks that operate the series of leaves of heddles, and with the lifter and depressor, and pattern chain, or any equivalent apparatus for determining the pattern, a mechanism for holding the jacks either in their elevated or depressed position, when not required to be operated, substantially as and for the purpose specified." He also claims imparting an irregular motion to the jacks, which is not here material. This reissued patent the complainant alleges the respondents have infringed. His bill of complaint is dated the 1st day of October, 1864, and prays that the Belknap Mills may be decreed to account for and pay over to the complainant all such gains and profits as have accrued to them in that behalf, and may be restrained from making, using, or vending any looms embracing in their construction the invention of said Marshall, and for general relief.

The respondents in their answer deny the validity of the original patent to Moses Marshall, December 11, 1849. They also deny the validity of the reissue, April 24, 1860, and of the extension, December 8, 1863. And they also deny any infringement of the complainant's patent, if he has any, and say that they have never manufactured or used any looms involving the invention of Marshall, but that their looms have been manufactured under letters patent issued, two of them to Samuel T. Thomas, and one of them to Samuel T. Thomas and Edward Everett, and that they were essentially different in principle, construction, and mode of operation. These letters patent they produce in evidence. The first are dated July 3, 1855, and are for an "improvement in looms." Among other things, the patentee claimed the combining with each rocker, lever, and lifter, an arm, cam, and sector, or equivalents, the whole being applied together, and made to operate substantially as described. Also the combining with the series of lifters and pattern prism, a series of bent levers, or their equivalents, and imparting to the pattern prism vertical, or up and down, movements as described. This patent, and that to Moses Marshall and the reissue, had in view the accomplishment of the same object, to wit, the production of an "open-shed loom." And the question of infringement arises between this patent mainly, and the Moses Marshall patent, as reissued and extended. The next patent to Thomas is dated February 11, 1862, and that to Thomas and Everett, July 25, 1866. The respondent objects to the Marshall patent of December 11, 1849. That the invention was neither new nor useful, and that the patentee did not, before the granting and issuing of the letters to him, take the oath prescribed by section 6, of the act of July 4, 1836, that he verily believed he was the original inventor or discoverer of the art, machine, etc., for which he solicited a patent. 5 Stat. 119.

A patent is deemed prima facie evidence that the patentee has made the invention. Philadelphia R. Co. v. Stimpson, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 448. There is, in this case, no sufficient evidence to overcome that presumption, or prima facie case. There is evidence that "open-shed" fancy looms were used prior to Marshall's invention, but not involving the combination of Marshall. His invention must, therefore, be taken to be new. Precisely how useful it may be, the court have not undertaken to decide; but that it is sufficiently so to support a patent, we have no doubt. Other looms may have been preferred by different persons, or may have found a readier sale; but that good cloth can be woven by Marshall's loom and invention there is sufficient evidence. To warrant a patent, the invention must be useful, that is, capable of some beneficial use, in contradistinction to what is pernicious, or frivolous, or worthless. Dickinson v. Hall, 14 Pick. 217; Whitney v. Emmett [Case No. 17,535]; Many v. Jagger [Id. 9,055].

These objections to the patent can not, therefore, avail. Nor can the other, that the oath required by section 6 of the act of 1836 was not taken, for two reasons: First. We are not satisfied the oath was not taken. The letters patent recite that it was. The respondent finds among the papers on file in the case in the patent office a blank form of the oath, with the jurat not signed by any magistrate, and hence he argues the oath was not taken. But the oath may have been taken for all that; and this negative testimony can not overcome the direct recital of the letters patent that the oath was taken; or the presumption that the requirements of the law were complied with in issuing the patent. But suppose it were so. Suppose the oath was not taken; would the patent be void on that account? It was held otherwise by Justice Story, in the case of Whittmore v. Cutter [Case No. 17,600]. The taking of the oath, though to be done prior to the granting of the patent, is not a condition precedent, failing which, the patent must fail. It is the evidence required to be furnished to the patent office, that the applicant verily believes he is the original and first inventor of the art, etc. If he takes this oath, and it turns out that he was not the first inventor or discoverer, his patent must fail and is void. So, if he do not take it, and still he is the first inventor or discoverer, the patent will be supported. It is prima facie evidence of the novelty and originality of the invention until the contrary appear. Parker v. Stiles [Case No. 10,749]. So the act says, on payment of the duty, that is, fees, the commissioner shall make an examination, and, if the invention shall be found useful and important, shall issue a patent. Suppose the fees should not be required or paid, would the patent therefore be void? Yet the one requirement appears to be as much a condition precedent as the other. Both directory, not to be dispensed with; but neither involving the validity of the patent when granted.

The next objections are to the reissued patent, and they are two: First, that the original patent was void, and the reissue was therefore so; and, second, that the reissue was not for the same invention as the original. The first of these objections has already been disposed of. It was maintained in the argument, that the original patent was void for want of the proper oath, and that the defect could not be cured by the reissue. But, whether the oath were taken or not, we are of opinion as already expressed, that such an omission would not invalidate the patent, nor would it affect the reissue. The second objection to the reissue is a more serious one, and for its proper determination requires a careful examination and comparison of the original patent to Marshall, and the reissue to Crompton. The presumption of law is, that the reissued patent is for the same invention as the original. O'Reilly v. Morse, 15 How. [56 U. S.] 62; French v. Rogers [Case No. 5,103]; Hussey v. McCormick [Id. 6,948]; Hussey v. Bradley [Id. 6,946]. Differences of description or specification are consistent with the identity of the thing patented. To correct a description, or claim, or both, is one object of allowing a surrender. Id.

The original patent to Marshall claimed the improvement therein described, consisting, first, "in providing the movable spring rests for supporting the jacks of the harness, when they are not in use, and which are sprung back by the bevel face on the shoulders of the jacks when they are kept in play by the cams on the pattern chain, the whole arrangement being substantially as herein above set forth;" and, second, "the evener constructed and operating as herein described, for assisting in moving the upper heddle levers, and keeping them even, so that the cams or rollers on the pattern chain will operate accurately on the jacks as specified, meaning to claim the exclusive use of said spring rests and evener in a loom, the invention of which is entirely original with me." "I also claim the combination of rotating, lifting, and depressing bars, arranged in endless chains, so as to revolve as described, with the forked jacks, having internal shoulders as specified." In the specification the elementary features of the improvement are said to consist in a series of stationary rests, which support the jacks of the harness, when the sheds operated by them are not in use; the chain shafts, and lifting and depressing bars for operating the jacks and harness; and the evener, which is composed of two rollers, set in a frame having a reciprocating rectilinear motion, which rollers press against the beveled ends of the harness levers, and assist in shifting the sheds of yarn, and, what is more essential, operate always to keep the levers even, for the proper operation of the cams on the pattern chain. The specification then describes the parts referred to, among others the jacks, the rests, the elevator and depressor arranged upon two endless chains, the method of connecting the jacks and heddle levers, the operation of the cams, the shafts, which carry the elevating and depressing bars, eccentric gear, the pattern chain, and the evener. In the reissued patent the claim is stated to be, the "combining with the jacks that operate the series of leaves of heddles and with the lifter and depressor and pattern chain, or any equivalent apparatus for determining the pattern, a mechanism for holding the jacks, either in their elevated or depressed position, when not required to be operated, substantially as and for the purpose specified." "Also imparting an irregular motion, substantially such as herein described, to the jacks, by means of eccentric cog wheels, substantially and for the purpose specified." The specifications described the object of the first part of the invention to be, to avoid moving any of the leaves of the heddles, which are not required to be moved for the production of the design, during any part of the operation, that is, to produce an open-shed loom, and of the second part of the invention, to consist in imparting an irregular motion to the lifters and depressors by means of eccentric cog gearing, etc. They then go on to describe the levers, jacks, the elevators and depressors, the cams and motions and forms of the jacks, the spring latches or catches, the pattern chain, and the evener, sometimes in the same words, sometimes more minutely, but always substantially, as in the original Marshall patent.

The most important difference, so far, is in the statement of the claims. In the original patent the claim is, first, for the movable spring rests; second, for the evener; and, third, for the combination of rotating, lifting and depressing bars, arranged in endless chains, so as to revolve, as described, with the forked jacks having internal shoulders. In the reissued patent the claim is, combining with the jacks that operate the series of leaves of heddles, and with the lifter and depressor, and pattern chain, or any equivalent apparatus for determining the pattern, a mechanism for holding the jacks either in their elevated or depressed position, when not required to be operated, substantially as and for the purpose specified. It Battin v. Taggart, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 74, it was held, that whether the defect be in the specification, or the claim, of a patent, the patentee may surrender it, and by an amended specification, or claim, cure the defect. In that case, which was for an improvement for breaking and screening coal, the claim was for the manner, in which the party had arranged and combined the breaking rollers with each other and the screen; and the amended specification described, in the reissued patent, substantially the same machine, but claimed the breaking apparatus only; it was held a dedication to the public did not accrue in the interval between one patent and the other. It has been repeatedly decided that the reissued patent must be substantially for the same invention as the original patent. Under such circumstances a new and different invention can not be claimed. Battin v. Taggart, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 74; French v. Rogers [supra]. In the reissued patent the patentee need not claim all that was claimed in the original patent. He may retain whatever he deems proper. Carver v. Braintree Manuf'g Co. [Case No. 2,485].

We think that substantially the same invention is described in the two patents. It was urged in the argument that the reissued patent was not for the same but for a greater invention, because the patentee had inserted in the specification these words: "It will be obvious that this part of my invention is not dependent upon the use of the pattern chain, as it can be used in connection with any other device for determining the design to be woven, by shifting the jacks or their equivalent into position to be elevated or depressed." This is said to be done for the purpose of making it embrace all improvements afterward invented. But it certainly can not have that effect, nor can it enlarge the patent. If it could do any such thing it would render the patent void for uncertainty. But in the specification the patentee has described a pattern chain; in his claim he has claimed a pattern chain, or any equivalent apparatus for determining the pattern, in combination with other things, and to that pattern chain, or one substantially the same, or some well-known substitute, the patent must be limited. The same remarks will also apply to another interpolation, to wit: "Nor is it dependent upon the use of chains for carrying the lifting or depressing bars in a continuous circuit; as it is equally applicable to looms in which jacks are elevated or depressed by the well-known reciprocating lifters and depressors, as in the well-known Crompton loom," and to others of like character. They do not enlarge the invention or the patent. We think, therefore, that the invention described and patented in the reissued patent is substantially the same invention described in the Marshall patent of December 11, 1849. The claim is in a different form, but for substantially the same invention. It may be open to the objection, so pointedly stated in the cases of Burr v. Duryee, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 535, and Case v. Brown, 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 320, that there is an attempt to make the new specification more elastic, and to cover more than the old, but it does not enlarge the invention.

But if it should be held that the original patent to Marshall, and the reissue to Crompton, assignee, were valid, it is contended that the extension to Marshall was not, for three reasons, to wit: (1) That as Marshall never had any interest in the reissued patent, it could not be extended to him; (2) that no sufficient notice was given to the public of the application for the extension of the patent; and (3) that the extension was obtained by fraud.

To the first objection, to wit, "that as Marshall never had any interest in the reissued patent, it could not be extended to him," it is a full answer, that, in judgment of law, the reissue is only a continuation of the original patent. So held in Read v. Bowman, 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 604. And as Marshall was the original patentee, the extension was legally and properly to him. Wilson v. Rosseau, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 646. The extension enuring, under the statute, to the assignees and grantees to the extent of their respective interests. 5 Stat. 125 [Act 1836] § 18.

The second objection is that there was no notice ever ordered, or given, of any application to extend the reissued patent. There was of the application to extend the original patent, and the objection stands upon the supposition, or idea, that they are two distinct patents while in judgment of law they are one. If the reissue was only a continuation of the original patent, then a notice to extend the original would seem to have been sufficient. Again, under the act of 1836, the secretary of state, the commissioner of patents, and the solicitor of the treasury were a board of commissioners to "hear and decide upon the evidence produced before them, both for and against the extension." It has been held that the functions of this board were judicial, and that their judgment settled conclusively all questions of notice. Brooks v. Jenkins [Case No. 1,953]. The statute of May 27, 1848 (9 Stat. 231, § 1), provided that the power to extend patents then vested in the board of commissioners should be vested solely in the commissioner of patents; and in Clum v. Brewer [Case No. 2,909], it was held that the act of the commissioner in extending a patent was conclusive of the facts, which he is required to find, in order to grant such extension, in the absence of fraud or excess of jurisdiction.

But here, third, it is said that the extension was procured by fraud. We do not, however, think this objection is open to this respondent. He stands before the court accused of infringing the complainant's patent. He may, undoubtedly, show that the invention claimed by the complainant was not new or useful, or that it had been dedicated to the public, or that there was no sufficient specification or description, and so that there was in fact no infringement for which he should answer, but we think he cannot attack the granting and validity of the patent in this collateral manner. If there was fraud practiced in obtaining the patent, that is a matter between the patent office and the patentee; and can, perhaps, be inquired into by some proper proceeding of the officers of the government to vacate the patent. But, in this particular, like a judgment, it must be respected and enforced, until reversed or annulled by some proceedings directly for that purpose. It is not exposed to the attacks of strangers or third persons for such reason.

The next, and only question remaining, is that of infringement. The respondents admit they have on hand, with intent to sell, the Thomas loom, manufactured under the patents to Thomas and to Thomas and Everett. But they deny that either of the respondents ever at any time, before or since the date of said alleged reissued letters patent, or before or after the alleged extension of the said alleged patent, have manufactured, used, sold, or continued to manufacture, use, or sell any loom or looms embracing the said alleged improvement, or any mechanism substantially the same.

The question then is, whether the Thomas loom, as it is called, infringes the Marshall patent as reissued and extended? The original patent to Marshall, December 11, 1849, claimed the movable spring rests to hold the jacks of the harness, and the "evener," and the combination of the rotating, lifting and depressing bars, so as to revolve, etc. As reissued to Crompton, the claim was for combining with the jacks and with the lifter and depresser and pattern chain, or any equivalent mechanism for determining the pattern, a mechanism for holding the jacks either in their elevated or depressed position when not required to be operated, substantially and for the purpose specified. The language is "a mechanism for holding the jacks." This is broad enough, upon its face, to cover any mechanism, and if it stood alone and unaided it would be so general and uncertain as to be entirely void, but in the specification the holding mechanism is described particularly and precisely, and the claim is limited by such specification. Here, then, are combined five elements, to wit, the jacks, the lifter and depresser, the pattern chain, and the holding mechanism; and any machine combining, substantially in the same manner, substantially the same elements, or well-known substitutes for the same, must be regarded as an infringement of this reissued patent. Gorham v. Mixter [Case No. 5,626]. But it would not be infringed by a combination which dispensed with one of the elements and substituted therefor another element, substantially different in construction and operation, but serving the same purpose. Eames v. Godfrey, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 79; Vance v. Campbell, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 427. Nor by any and every combination of the same elements, which may produce the same result, but only by the peculiar combination of the elements described, or one substantially the same. Case v. Brown, 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 320. The elements here combined are old, the patent is for the peculiar combination, and the doctrine of mechanical equivalents does not apply. McCormick v. Talcott, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 405. The identity or diversity of two machines depends not on the employment of the same elements or powers of mechanics, but upon producing the given effect by substantially the same mode of operation, or substantially the same combination of powers. Odiorne v. Winkley [Case No. 10,432]; Evans v. Eaton [Id. 4,560].

Following these principles and adjudications, we proceed to the examination and comparison of the Marshall and the Thomas looms. In both we find, substantially, the same jacks, differing in form, but performing, substantially, the same office. In both we find, substantially, the same elevator and depresser. Arranged in the Marshall loom is a rotating, endless chain, so that the same bar in going up is an elevator, but in rotation or revolution going down, becomes a depresser. These three elements are substantially the same, but when we come to the holding mechanism, we find a marked and substantial difference in the two machines.

In the argument of the respondents' counsel, it was contended that the holding mechanism of the Marshall loom was not only the "series of horizontal spring latches or catches," and the shoulders on the two prongs of the jacks, but that it included the connecting mechanism of the jacks with the heddle lever, the pattern mechanism, and the "evener." Now, although it be true that the connecting mechanism and pattern mechanism of the jacks hold the jack securely upon the spring latches as upon a seat, until they be forced or allowed to come off by the pattern mechanism, and although in the operation of the machine there is a point of time after the jacks are forced off the springs, when the heddle levers are firmly held by the evener, so that the jacks can not move nor the sheds close until allowed to do so by the removal of the evener, yet we have considered the holding mechanism to be as decided in the patent, to wit, the series of horizontal spring latches, or catches, and the notches on the prongs of the jacks, and still we find the holding mechanism of the two machines to be substantially different. In the Marshall machine the elevator carries upward a particular jack, the beveled face on the projecting notch on the prong of the jack meets the beveled face of the spring, presses it back and passes it. Then the spring flies out under the shoulder of the jack and the jack rests upon it in a manner similar to a window-sash raised and resting on the old and familiar window-spring. Here it sits or is held until the pattern mechanism forces it off the spring and allows it to descend. When a jack is carried down by the depresser, it is held by a similar spring; being kept on its seat by the pattern mechanism, until allowed to be drawn off by the oblique connecting mechanism.

Now, in the Thomas loom there is a very different mechanism or device. There is a jack which is carried up and down by an elevator and depresser. On one side of this jack there is a gearing connecting it with and operating a sector. As the jack goes up and down, it rolls or rocks this sector forward and backward, as if you should turn a wheel part of the way round, say one-fourth, and then bring it back again, and so continue. In or near the circumference of this sector, there is a cam groove, and playing in this cam groove, forward and backward, as the sector moves, a projecting stud or friction roller connected with an arm of the heddle lever. This heddle lever rocks upon its fulcrum, and as the arm, guided and controlled by the projecting stud in the cam groove, is carried upward or downward by the cam groove, the ends of the rocking heddle lever are carried backward and forward, elevating or depressing, or holding stationary the harnesses. In the one end of the cam groove is a concentric into which the projecting stud or roller falls, which it is contended by the complainant's counsel is a substitute for the spring latch or catch of the Marshall loom; but we are of the opinion it is not so; but that the whole cam groove, of which the concentric makes a part, is more correctly a substitute for the cam; and that this device of the Thomas loom much more resembles in principle and operation the old Middlesex cam loom than it does the Marshall loom. It can not be conceded that the Marshall and the Thomas holding devices are the same, because the operation in both cases is performed by a surface of metal passing under or over another surface, and that, therefore, one infringes the other. In the old Middlesex cam loom one surface passed over another, to wit, over the cam, and was elevated, depressed, or held stationary by it; yet it was very different from the Marshall device. We can not give the Marshall holding device any such latitude of construction. There is also in the Thomas loom a brake connected with and operating upon the periphery of the sector, retarding, regulating, and governing its motion. And whether we regard this brake as a part of the holding mechanism or not, we think and conclude that these two elements are substantially different, and that one is not a well-known substitute for the other.

We come now to the last element or device, to wit, the pattern mechanism. Had the patent to Marshall not been surrendered, and a new one issued, the question of infringement, if it arose at all, must have arisen between the holding mechanism of the two looms; but that patent having been surrendered, and a new one issued, claiming a combination of elements, that new one is liable to be avoided by showing that the Thomas loom uses a substantially different element from any one of those combined.

To return to the pattern devices. These two mechanisms or devices are very different in their construction and in their operation. H. B. Renwick, one of the complainant's experts, says: "I think the pattern chain in model B (the Thomas loom) is, considered by itself, a substantially different species of pattern chain from that specially described and represented in the drawing of the Marshall reissue, and differing from it in the fact that it requires motion in two directions in order to cause it to operate upon the jacks, while the chain represented in the drawings of Marshall requires motion only in one direction." Precisely in the sense mentioned by this expert we are now considering these two devices or mechanisms,—that is, by themselves; and in that view they are substantially different in principle, construction and operation. But if we consider them in regard to the functions they perform, we shall find as great and substantial difference. Both select the jacks to be operated; but the pattern chain, in addition to this, in the Marshall loom, forces the jacks off the upper series of spring catches, and holds them on to the lower series, in both instances in opposition to the force supplied by the oblique connection of the jacks with the heddle levers. Both these devices are said to be old. That is true in a limited sense. The Marshall chain is old. The Thomas mechanism is old in the fundamental principle. It is that of the Jacquard pattern; but Thomas has made two improvements upon it, which are not old. They are also said to be well known substitutes for one another; but it is very evident, both from the testimony of the experts and an examination of the machines, that, though the Marshall pattern mechanism might be applied to the Thomas loom, there is no apparent practical mode of applying the Thomas pattern mechanism to the Marshall loom, with its present method of holding the jacks. Can one device be said to be a well-known substitute for another which can not be used for it? Thus much for the elements of the Marshall combination. We now pass to the combination itself. Is the combination in the two machines substantially the same? It may be said they can not be, if the elements are not the same, as gold and copper is not the same combination as silver and copper. But the inquiry is to another point. Is the method or manner of the combination the same? We think not. Indeed, there seems to be as wide and substantial a difference in the mode of combination as in the things combined. Take, for instance, the combination of the jacks with the holding mechanism in the Marshall loom. By the lengthening of the lower heddle lever, giving an oblique direction to the connection of the jacks with the upper lever and lower, the protuberances upon the prongs of the jacks are held upon the upper series of spring catches. There is no such connection, device, office performed, or combination, that we can discover, in the Thomas loom.

Again, take the combination of the pattern mechanism in the Marshall loom with the jacks. It is so arranged as to hold the protuberances of the jack upon the lower series of spring catches, there performing substantially the same office that the oblique connection of the jacks with the heddle levers does in regard to the upper catches. There is nothing like this in the Thomas loom. Again: take the combination of the holding mechanism with the pattern mechanism and jacks, and there we find a substantially different combination, or mode of combination, in the two looms. In the Marshall loom the jacks are combined with the holding catches by their oblique connection with the heddle levers, keeping the jacks seated upon the upper catches until forced off by the pattern cams, and pulling the jacks off the lower catches when not held on by the cams. Is there any such arrangement in the Thomas loom? We do not find it, nor anything nearly approaching it. In the Thomas loom the jack is connected with the rocking sector by a gearing, rocking the sector backward and forward as the jack goes up and down. In the circumference of this sector is a cam groove or slot; in this groove plays a stud or friction wheel attached to an arm of the heddle lever. This stud is guided and held by the cam slot, thus elevating, depressing, or holding the heddle lever as it comes into one or the other part of the slot. The pattern mechanism has nothing whatever to do with this holding, elevating, or depressing, farther than to select the particular jack. We leave out of this combination the brake, purposely, though that device in the Thomas looms, and the "evener" in the Marshall, plays very important parts, both in holding the shed open and in preventing its closing too quickly.

We might pursue this examination and comparison further, but we have gone far enough to warrant the conclusion to which we have come, that the respondents have not infringed the complainant's reissued patent. See Brightly's Dig. p. 612, §§ 84, 96, 89. To constitute an infringement of a patent for a combination, the defendant must have used the same combination, constructed and operated substantially in the same way. Gorham v. Mixer [Case No. 5,626]. A patent for a combination is not infringed unless all the essential parts of it are substantially imitated. Bell v. Daniels [Case No. 1,247]. The patentee of a combination can not treat another as infringer who has improved the original machine by the use of a substantially different combination, though it produce the same result. Union Sugar Refinery v. Matthiessen [Id. 14,399]. A patent for a combination of three distinct things is not infringed by combining two of them with a third, which is substantially different from the third element described in the specification. Prouty v. Ruggles, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 336; Silsby v. Foote, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 219; McCormick v. Talcott, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 402; Vance v. Campbell, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 427; Eames v. Godfrey, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 78; Brooks v. Jenkins [Case No. 1,953]; Brooks v. Bicknell [Id. 1,945]; Parker v. Hayworth [Id. 10,738]; Latta v. Shawk [Id. 8,116]; Lee v. Blandy [Id. 8,132]; and other cases. In Morris v. Barrett [Id. 9,827] it was held that in an action for an infringement the machines themselves, as shown by the models, were evidence entitled to the highest credit.

We have examined the models in this case very carefully and repeatedly, and they have very materially aided us in coming to a satisfactory conclusion, particularly in determining how much weight was to be given to the opinions and explanations of the experts, two of which appeared on each side swearing with equal confidence and apparent intelligence in opposite directions. The complainant's bill must be dismissed, with costs.

Case No. 18,286.

CROSS v. UNITED STATES.

[2 Hayw. & H. 290.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. 12, 1857.

RESISTING ARREST—WARRANT NOT EXHIBITED.

Where a defendant has knowledge that the officers of justice are in pursuit of him for an offence committed by him against the law, he will not be justified in resisting such officers, even though such officers do not exhibit to him the warrant or inform him of the particular cause of his arrest.

[Writ of error to the criminal court.]

At law. Indictment [of Robert Cross] for assault with intent to kill. The case being closed for the defence, the counsel for the prisoner prayed the court to give the following instructions to the jury:

If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant Cross called upon the officers, who were seeking to arrest him to show to him, or to inform him for what cause he was to be arrested, and said officers, including Robinson, refused to show or inform him of the cause of his arrest, that the defendant had a right to resist said officers, including Robinson, with the force that he did employ. That if the jury should find from the evidence that the officers, including Robinson, who arrested Cross had refused to show their authority at the request of Cross, &c., then the prisoner was illegally arrested and not culpable; to which Mr. Key objected, saying that it was a hypothesis based upon supposed facts, of which there was not a particle of evidence, and referred to the testimony which had been adduced to show that a direct opposite state of facts was shown, and contended that the instruction was inapplicable to the case and should not be given. The court refused the prayer of the defence, after which Mr. Key offered the following for the adoption of the court, as instructions to the jury: If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant on 7th street asked certain officers if they had a warrant, &c., or to be informed of the cause of his arrest, which inquiry they refused to answer, it does not in any way justify the violence used by the defendant at another place, to wit: two squares off; if the jury believe from the evidence that none of the persons on 7th street were present, and the violence used was on different persons.

After occupying a short time in preparing the instructions, the court delivered the following to the jury: First. Was there a bench warrant? if there was (and you may collect this fact from the evidence,) in the hands of Deputy Marshal Philips—if you believe that, having such warrant, he called upon the bailiffs in court to aid him in arresting the defendant, against whom the bench warrant was issued on an indictment found, it is not necessary that the officer holding the warrant should be in the sight of the others called on by him as aforesaid whilst making the arrest, provided they were all out at the time in pursuit of the defendant. Com. v. Field, 13 Mass. 321; 1 Chit. Cr. Law, c. 49, § 6. If you believe that these officers were known to the defendant, (which you may infer if you think proper from the circumstances in evidence) the drawing of the pistol with which he inflicted the wound, carrying it openly exposed and threatening to shoot any of the persons in pursuit that came within ten feet of him; his flying and finally using the weapon; if you believe these circumstances show that defendant knew that the officers of justice were in pursuit of him for an offence against the laws of the country, and that the men then before him were such officers. It was unnecessary to show the warrant or inform him of the particular cause of his arrest before he was arrested, it follows as a necessary consequence that the defendant had no right "to resist said officers, including said Robinson, with the force he did employ." Second. The instruction on behalf of the United States it is perhaps unnecessary to answer, the above answer to the defendant's prayer includes a reply to it, but as it is before the court it is granted.

The instructions allowed by the court were in substance such as had been asked by the district attorney. The jury brought in a verdict of guilty. The sentence of the court was that the prisoner suffer imprisonment at labor in the penitentiary for the term of eight years. The counsel for the prisoner excepted to the instructions given by the court.

¹ [Reported by John A. Hayward, Esq., and Geo. C. Hazleton, Esq.]

Mr. Chilton, for the prisoner.
Mr. Key, for the United States.

THE CIRCUIT COURT affirmed the instructions as given.

D.

Case No. 18,287.

DARRELL v. BROOKE.

[2 Hayw. & H. 329.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May 31, 1859.

WILLS OF PERSONAL PROPERTY — EXECUTION — QUESTION FOR JURY.

It is not necessary to the validity of a will of personal property that it should have a date, or that it should be in the handwriting of the testator, or signed by him, or have any subscribing witness, provided it was drawn at his request, and according to his dictation; he being then of sound and disposing mind, and capable of executing a valid deed or contract, which the court held was a question for the jury to decide.

At law. Issue from the orphans' court as to the validity of a paper purporting to be the last will and testament of the late Benjamin E. Brooke, of the marine corps.

Petition of Lucy M. Darrell: That whereas her uncle, the late Captain Benjamin E. Brooke, United States marine corps, recently deceased, leaving an instrument in the nature of a last will and testament, which testamentary paper is here shown to the court, and by which she, the said Lucy M. Darrell, is made the legatee of her said uncle, she therefore prays this honorable court to place the said testamentary paper upon file, and to afford her further time to procure the attendance of her witnesses for the purpose of fully establishing the validity of said testamentary paper. Also that Walter T. Brooke, as next of kin, be summoned to show cause, if any he has, why this petition should not be granted, &c.

Answer of Walter T. Brooke: That the paper referred to in the petition (of Lucy M. Darrell) is not the last will and testament of the late Benjamin E. Brooke, and is not an instrument in the nature of a last will and testament of the said Benjamin E. Brooke, and is not a testamentary paper, or any paper whatever of the said Benjamin E. Brooke. That he objects. That the said paper ought not to be admitted to probate, and he prays that an issue or issues in the premises may be framed and sent to the circuit court to be tried, &c.

Issue: "Whether the paper writing propounded by the said Lucy M. Darrell be the last will and testament of the said Benjamin E. Brooke, deceased."

The words of the will are as follows: "To Wm. S. Darrell, clerk in the general post office, Washington, D. C., for Lucy Martha Darrell, his daughter, to whom I wish all my effects to be given, except my gold watch, which is to go to my brother Walter T. Brooke, clerk in the general land office, Washington, D. C." It was not written by the testator, nor signed or sealed by him, nor was it witnessed.

Fendall, Davidge & Booker, for propounder.
Bradley, Carlisle & Maury, for caveator.

THE COURT decided: 1. That it is not necessary to the validity of a will of personal property that it should have any date; that it should be in the handwriting of the testator, or signed by him, or have any subscribing witnesses, provided it was drawn at his request, and according to his dictation, he being then of sound and disposing mind, and capable of executing a valid deed or contract, and that it had not been revoked.

2. That if the decedent was a lunatic, having lucid intervals, and the will was made during a lucid interval, it was valid.

3. That if, at a time subsequent to the making of such will, the testator, being then of sound and disposing mind, &c., referred to and described it as his last will and testament, and it had not been revoked, he thereby adopted it as his last will and testament, and this adoption made it his last will and testament; provided, that at the time of the adoption he was of such sound and disposing mind, &c., whether or not he was of sound and disposing mind, &c., when the paper purporting to be a will was originally made.

4. That if the will is consonant to the testator's declarations, conduct and feelings towards the person in whose favor it was made (his niece) and towards the objector (his brother) such consonance is entitled to weight with the jury in determining whether it was made in a lucid interval, &c.

5. That if the testator, for some time before the making of the will, had been subject to a bodily disease, attended by great depression of spirits, causing particular hallucinations of mind amounting to morbid delusion on those subjects, but that on all other subjects the testator was entirely sane, and that the will-had no connection with such morbid delusion, then it is a question for the jury, whether or not, under all the facts and circumstances in evidence in the cause the testator was of sound and disposing mind and capable of executing a valid deed or contract.

¹ [Reported by John A. Hayward, Esq., and Geo. C. Hazleton, Esq.]

The verdict of the jury was that the paper was the last will and testament of the testator.

DAVIS (BIBBS v.). See Case No. 18,235.

Case No. 18,288.

DE KRAFT v. BARNEY.

[2 Hayw. & H. 405.]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Jan. 25, 1862.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—EFFECT OF JUDGMENTS OF OTHER STATES — GUARDIAN AND WARD — JURISDICTION OF ORPHANS' COURT.

[1. A personal judgment or decree obtained in one state against a nonresident, who has not been served with process in the state, or who has not voluntarily appeared and subjected himself to the jurisdiction, has no extraterritorial validity, and does not come within the operations of the fourth article of the constitution declaring the effect which the judicial proceedings of one state shall have in other states. Therefore a decree of divorce awarding the custody of children to the wife, and declaring the husband and father an unfit person to have them in charge, obtained by default against a nonresident served by publication only, is not conclusive, or even admissible, in a proceeding in another state or in the District against the father to have him declared an unfit custodian for his children and to procure the appointment of another guardian.]

[2. A direction by a testator that his estate shall be held in trust for his daughter and her heirs, free from the control or disposal of any husband she might have, and exempt from his debts, contracts, or engagements, are directed solely to the exclusion of the husband from the absolute right of property which the marriage confers over all personal property of the wife, and from the usufruct for life of the real estate with its rents and profits, and does not refer to the right of guardianship of the husband over the children after the death of the wife.]

[3. The orphans' court of the District of Columbia has no jurisdiction, by virtue of the act of Maryland of 1789 (subchapter 12, § 3, and subchapter 15, § 12) or otherwise, to inquire whether a father be a fit person to be intrusted with the personal custody and education of his children. Its jurisdiction, as to him, extends only to the due care and management of the infant's estate.]

Appeal from orphans' court.

Petition [by John W. De Kraft] for the appointment of a guardian to the minor children of Samuel Chase Barney and Mary E. De Kraft (formerly Barney) deceased.

The following is the opinion of the orphans' court (PURCELL, Judge):

"The above named, John W. De Kraft, filed his petition some months since in this court, praying that some competent person should be appointed guardian to such children. That their father, the said Samuel Chase Barney, was disqualified and unfit to act as such, and offered in evidence in support of the charges, amongst other facts, a record duly certified, purporting to be a divorce granted by the district court of Jasper county and state of Iowa, on the 18th day of Sept., 1860, in favor of the said Mary E. De Kraft Barney, against the said Samuel Chase Barney, her husband. The said Samuel Chase Barney, in his answer to the above petition, denies the allegations in said petition, and insists that he is not disqualified from acting as guardian to said children, and has offered the evidence of several witnesses in his favor, stating that he was not in their opinion addicted to intemperance. Without special reference to all the facts in the above cause, there is enough in the said decree of divorce of the district court of Jasper county, Iowa, so far as this court has jurisdiction to determine this cause.

"The sentence pronounced by the court granting the said decree was clear and emphatic. It stated that it was a court of competent jurisdiction; that it had jurisdiction of the parties; and of the subject matter, the law having been fully complied with by publication, and that notice had also, with a copy of the petition, been sent to the said Samuel Chase Barney's residence, and that he had been duly and timely served with notice as required by law; that the charges in her petition, which was proved, were others than adultery, and that the said defendant, Samuel Chase Barney was in default; that the said Mary E. De Kraft Barney, born Mary E. De Kraft, was entitled to a divorce from the bonds of matrimony from Samuel Chase Barney, her husband, to whom she was married in the year 1847. The said sentence further stated that the acts, conduct and character of the said defendant, Samuel Chase Barney, had been of such a character as to render him unfit to have the custody of the minor children of the said marriage, and that they be placed under the control of their said mother during their minority.

"If the said court of Iowa had erred, this court has no power to give him, the said Samuel Chase Barney, redress; that his remedy is before another tribunal, the regular appellate court. The above decree cannot be impeached or inquired into collaterally by this court, according to the authorities which are binding upon it. And it is binding also on the said Samuel Chase Barney until reversed. Raborg's Adm'r v. Hammond's Adm'r, 2 Har. & G. 42; Fishwick's Adm'r v. Sewell, 4 Har. & J. 393; Dimond's Adm'r v. Billingslea, 2 Har. & G. 264; Hammond v. Ridgely's Lessee, 5 Har. & J. 245; Comegys v. State of Maryland, 10 Gill & J. 175; House v. Wiles, 12 Gill & J. 338; U. S. v. Bender [Case No. 14,567].

"The fourth article of the constitution of the United States (section 1), and the acts of congress of the 26th of May, 1790 [1 Stat. 122], and March, 1804 [2 Stat. 298], passed in pursuance thereof, expressly declares that full faith and credit shall be given to all the judicial acts rendered in the different states. Chief Justice Marshall held in the case of Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 629, that the legislatures of the different states had the right to legislate on the subject of divorce. That the constitution of the United States, which prohibits the states from passing laws impairing the obligations of contracts, was never understood to restrict the general right of the legislature to legislate on the subject of divorce. Those acts enable some tribunals not to impair marriage contracts, but to liberate the parties, because it had been broken by the other. There is another fact in the case, which is entitled to much consideration: Edward De Kraft, the father of said Mary E. De Kraft Barney, deceased, the mother of the above children, by whom the entire estate, belonging now to the said minor children, came, expressly declared in his will that no husband of his daughter should ever control any part of the estate so devised. It appears from satisfactory evidence in this case that Doctor Harvey Lindsley is a gentleman of high integrity in the community, and the court in the exercise of its discretion, believes him under all circumstances, a proper person to be the guardian of the said minor children."

From which decision the respondent, Samuel Chase Barney, appeals.

Walter S. Davidge, for appellant.
Richard S. Coxe, for appellee.

MERRICK, Circuit Judge. The present appeal has its origin in one of those conditions of family embroilment always painful and distressing, which rarely come to the notice of courts of justice, and which still more rarely are investigated by courts with either moral or material advantage to the parties involved. The legal aspect which the present controversy assumes will relieve this tribunal from a critical balance of the criminations and re-criminations with which the record abounds. Simple justice requires us, however, to observe that the most flagrant charge against the appellant is utterly unsupported and unwarranted by the evidence which has been adduced in that behalf. The appellee, as prochein ami and near relative, filed his petition against the appellant in the orphans' court, praying that court to refuse to the appellant the guardianship of the persons and estates of the appellant's four children, alleging that he was an unfit and improper person for the office, and charging that he had been divorced from his wife, Mary De Kraft Barney, now deceased, by a decree of the district court of Jasper county, in the state of Iowa, and by that decree the appellant had been deprived of the custody of his children, and that his moral obliquity also was there fully adjudged. The appellee made sundry specific charges in addition, and offered to sustain them by proof. The cause was heard and proofs taken at great length before the orphans' court. That court finally adjudged that inasmuch as the court in Iowa had divorced the wife from the appellant, and had decreed his acts, conduct and character to have been such as to render him unfit to have the custody of the minor children of the marriage, and had committed the custody to the mother, the appellant was conclusively bound by that decree, and while unreversed it furnished an answer to his claim for the custody of the persons and estate of his children. The court also determined that the claim of guardianship of the father ought to be controlled by the fact that the estate of the children was derived under the will of the late Edward De Kraft, the maternal grandfather of the children, and he had by his will declared that his estate should be held by trustees in trust for his daughter and her heirs, free from the control or disposal of any husband she might have, and exempt from his debts, contracts or engagements. In both of these conclusions we think there was error in the decision of the orphans' court.

It appears from the record that the appellant was married to his late wife in the District of Columbia in 1847, and continued to reside here for many years; that some years prior to her decease they went to Paris, in France, and there sojourned, he being all the while a lieutenant in the navy of the United States; and that private difficulties having arisen between them, proceedings were instituted in a French tribunal, which decreed temporary custody of the children and a temporary separation of the parties, with leave to the wife to come to America to prosecute a petition for divorce. In the spring of 1860 Mrs. Barney came to the United States, unattended by her husband, and proceeding to the state of Iowa, where neither she nor husband had ever resided, she then filed in the district court of Jasper county her petition for divorce, causing publication to be made against her husband as an absent defendant, and procured a decree of divorce against him by default in September following, containing the allegations and determinations above referred to, and which are now relied upon as irrefragably conclusive against the appellant, not only as touching the marital relation, but also of the facts and charges recited as the basis of the decree, and of the paternal rights of the father over his children.

What might or might not be the effect within the state of Iowa of an ex parte decree of divorce obtained as was the present, and whether all the statutory requirements of the law of Iowa were complied with, so as to vest the district court of Jasper county with a jurisdiction entitled to consideration within the territorial limits of that state, we need not here inquire, it being conclusively settled by the supreme court of the United States in repeated adjudications that a personal judgment or decree obtained in any state of the Union over a non-resident, who has not been served with process within the state, or who has not voluntarily appeared and subjected himself to the jurisdiction of the court, has no extra-territorial validity and does not come within the operation of the fourth article of the constitution, declaring the effect within one state of judicial proceedings had in another state. Among other authorities, see Shelton v. Tiffin, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 143; Boswell's Lessee v. Otis, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 336; Landes v. Brandt, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 348; D'Arcy v. Kitchen, 11 How. [52 U. S.] 165; and Webster v. Reid, Id. 437; and that a case of divorce is embraced within the principle. See Vischer v. Vischer, 12 Barb. 640; Hill v. Hill, 28 Barb. 23.

Controlled by these authorities, as well as by the dictates of manifest justice, we are of opinion that the record of the court of Iowa was not admissible evidence for any purpose against the appellant in the present controversy.

The provisions of the will of Edward De Kraft, which were relied upon as the second ground of exclusion, when examined, have no relation to guardianship; indeed it cannot be deduced from the terms of the instrument that the matter of guardianship was at all in the mind of the testator. The provisions of the will are directed solely to the exclusion of any husband from that absolute right of property which the marriage confers over all the personal property of the wife, and from the usufruct for life of the real estate, with all its rents and profits. The terms of the will debar him from these, during the marriage, and also from his right of survivorship and curtesy: according to the doctrine of the cases of Marshall v. Beall, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 70, and Ward v. Thompson, 6 Gill & J. 349; but the strict terms of this settlement no more militate against the right of guardianship of the surviving husband than would the terms of a deed in fee simple from a total stranger to the children for a house and lot in this city.

The foregoing considerations dispose of the grounds of judgment relied upon by the court below, but as the act of assembly requires this court, on appeal, to go further (see section 18, subc. 15, Act Md. 1798), the question remains whether upon the testimony of the living witnesses produced by the petitioner, the court below was authorized to refuse to accept from the appellant a sufficient bond if tendered under the statute as natural guardian to his infant children? In other words, has the orphans' court jurisdiction to inquire into the character and conduct of a father, to exclude him from the care and custody of his infant children, and to commit their persons as well as their estates to a stranger?

The power is an inquisitorial power of a most delicate and difficult sort which must inevitably in its exercise bring to light numerous family differences, family difficulties and family misfortunes which it were better for the honor of humanity to cover with the thickest veil of charitable silence. For such investigations the machinery of courts of justice is ill adapted, especially the orphans' courts, whose interference with parental discipline could rarely be exerted usefully. The Vice-Chancellor in 2 De Gex & S. 474, says: "The acknowledged rights of a father with respect to the custody and guardianship of his infant children are conferred by the law, it may be with a view to the performance by him of duties towards the children, and in a sense on condition of performing those duties, but there is great difficulty in closely defining them. It is substantially impossible to ascertain or watch over their full performance, nor could a court of justice usefully attempt it. A man may be in narrow circumstances; he may be negligent, injudicious and faulty as the father of minors; he may be a person from whom the discreet, the intelligent, and the well disposed, exercising a private judgment would wish his children to be for their sakes and his own removed; he may be all this without rendering himself liable to judicial interference, and in the main for obvious reasons it is well that it should be so."

Such being the nature of the power claimed, and such being some of their objections to its exercise, it must be apparent to every one (independently of the injunctions of the act of 1798, "that the orphans' court shall not under pretext of incidental powers or constructive authority exercise any jurisdiction whatever not expressly given,") that its possession by that tribunal should be denied unless beyond all reasonable doubt the terms of the law vest it or the spirit of the law requires it to be comprehended in certain language which seems broad enough to include it.

Prior to the act of 1777 (chapter 8), the courts of the commissary-general and his deputies had jurisdiction only in testamentary affairs, the exclusive cognizance of matters of guardianship being confided to the county courts who were authorized only to appoint guardians to infant orphans who had no natural guardian. The county courts supervised the management of their estates and had it in charge by the act of 1715 (chapter 39, §§ 21, 22), annually to inquire by a jury "whether the orphans be kept, maintained and educated according to their estates," and to remove their guardians upon default found by the jury. This jurisdiction was for the first time transferred to the orphans' court by the act of 1777 (chapter 8). Before that statute the ordinary never exercised, either under the laws of England or the laws of Maryland, any jurisdiction in the matter of the appointment or removal of guardians. See Macph. Inf. 74; Rex v. Delaval, 3 Burrows, 1436; Mouro v. Ritchie [Case No. 9,312]. Upon the revision of our testamentary system by the act of 1789 the orphans' jury was abolished, and in lieu of its functions the orphans' court was authorized by the twelfth section of subchapter 15, upon application suggesting improper conduct in any guardian.

whatever, either in relation to the care and management of the property or person of any infant, to inquire into the same, and at their discretion remove such guardian and make choice of another who shall receive the property and custody of the said ward.

It will scarcely occur to any one who will advert to the history of the orphans' jury, and there read the language I have quoted, that the legislature had in contemplation when using the words "any guardian whatever" to confer upon the orphans' court the jurisdiction to enter every family in the land, upon suggestion from a child or some person on his behalf, investigate its private history and discipline, drag all its painful memories before the public attention, and record private shames and private griefs, to the scandal of future as well as the present generation, and yet such is the result of the argument in this case, for it is said that the father is the natural guardian of his children, and as the statute says "any guardian whatever," a natural guardian is included in the expression. This argument has its vice in an inversion of the force of language. The aspect in which the father is viewed by the law is that of parent, and not of guardian; the latter is the subordinate, the former the paramount relation; the less to be controlled by the greater, and not the greater curtailed by the less.

In the language of Blackstone, the relation of guardian is derived out of that of the parent, the guardian being only a temporary parent. Indeed, the loose manner in which the term natural guardian is used has given rise to much perplexity in the law books, and confusion in drafting and interpreting statutes. Its original and proper significance and energy arose out of the conflict between the claims of tenure and of parental right in the matter of lands held under the feudal tenure or knight's service or in chivalry. In that case the right to the custody of the person of the infant heir belonged to the father in exclusion of the lord in chivalry, who nevertheless retained the wardship of the lands, and was entitled also to the custody of the person as against mother, grandfather, and every other relative except the father, whose paramount parental right was acknowledged by the feudal lawyers under the scholastic designation of guardian by nature. It is the character of parent which the law has in view, and its sacredness at common law is admirably illustrated in this, its triumph over the iron exigency of military tenure. Whenever, therefore, our statutes use the term guardian, the father, although in one sense the natural guardian is never to be included, unless there be something more which imperatively demands that he should be embraced by the expression. But it is said that the father is to be embraced by the language of the section, because by the third section of subchapter 12, in case an infant becomes entitled by descent or devise to land or to legacy or distributive share, his natural guardian may be called upon to give bond for the performance of his trust, and upon his neglect or refusal the court may appoint another guardian. Does it follow from this section that if a father be poor, and by any of the contingencies enumerated his child should receive a large portion, for which he could find no one willing to go his surety, that therefore the court shall deprive him of the care and custody, the training, education and social consolation of his child, and confide not only the estate but the person of his child to some wealthier or better known stranger; and yet this conclusion must be reached before the interpretation claimed can be given to the twelfth section of subchapter 15.

It is obvious that the other guardian, contemplated by the third section, is a guardian of the estate only and not of the person. Repeated adjudication in England has established that a father cannot be deprived of the custody of his child, by a devise or legacy accompanied by the designation of guardian, and what is there held to be repugnant to natural right, we must not impute to the legislation in the construction of a statute, admitting a different meaning.

Chancellor Kent says (2 Comm. 221, note c): "Attempts have been made to control the father's right to the custody of his infant children by a legacy given by a stranger to an infant, and the appointment by him of a guardian in consequence thereof. But it is well settled that a legacy or gift to a child confers no right to control the father's care of the child, and no person can defeat the father's right of guardianship by such means."

In the case of Vanartsdalen v. Boyer, 14 Pa. St. 384, the court on appeal from the orphans' court, held that a devise by a grandfather of lands, &c., to grandchildren, containing a clause, "my executors hereinafter named to be guardians for the children of my said daughter, during their minority, and I do hereby nominate and appoint them for that purpose," meant merely a devise of the guardianship of the property, but was not intended to interfere with the natural right of the father to the custody and care of the children.

Upon these considerations the sound rule of construction would seem to limit the power of substitution to the trust, which the legislature for the first time subjected to the jurisdiction of the orphans' court, by the third section of subchapter 12, to wit: the security and control of the infant's estate, and that being the case, when we apply the provisions of section 12, subc. 15, we should in like manner limit the terms to the subject matter, to wit: the conduct of the father to the management of the property of his child. The case of Fridge v. State, 3 Gill & J. 113, is relied upon as adjudicating this question. Upon looking at the case it will be found that the present inquiry was not by the remotest hint brought to the minds of the court. The point before the court there was whether, it being shown in a suit upon a guardian's bond, collaterally that the mother as natural guardian was living at the time of appointment, that fact did not of itself show that the orphans' court transcended its jurisdiction in appointing a third person guardian. And in meeting that objection, the court of appeals said: "Unless the natural guardian had failed or neglected to give bond for the performance of her trust on being called upon to do so, in pursuance of the third section of the twelfth subchapter of the act of 1798, c. 101, or had been removed for cause under the provisions of the twelfth section of subchapter 15, it would not have been the case of an erroneous judgment," &c.

This chance expression in the course of a judicial opinion is relied upon as settling the claim of jurisdiction to the extent insisted on by the appellee. The case before the court was a case purely involving the estate of the infant and not relating to its custody; and the court, in speaking of "the removal for cause," does not say for what cause, nor what shall be the extent of the removal, and the language is perfectly consistent with the idea that the cause for which the natural guardian shall be removed must be some misconduct or dereliction touching the estate; and that the removal so to be made is a removal from the control of the estate. Nor do I think the concluding words of the section given any additional force to the claim, for as I have endeavored to show, that from the third section the statute contemplates a separation of the custody of the person and the estate in certain contingencies, and when we come to construe the twelfth section we must adopt the plain rule of rendering consequents according to their antecedents, giving to those cases where the property and persons have both come under the control of the court the right to transfer both; and where the property alone has come under its dominion, the right to transfer the property only. The foregoing limitation of the power of the orphans' court is necessary to harmonize the act of 1798 with the act of congress of February 20, 1846 (9 Stat. 4, c. 8, § 1). By its provisions, when an infant whose father is living shall, by gift or otherwise, become entitled to property separate from the father, the court may compel him to give bond to account for it, as other guardian, and if he fail or refuse, the court "shall have power to appoint a special guardian to take charge of said property, who shall give bond and security as in other cases, but with conditions to suit the case." Here we have a legislative declaration that the separate property of the infant shall, upon the father's default, be given in charge to a special guardian.

Now what reason can be shown why an infant having property by gift should be left to the personal control of his father, while he who has a legacy or distributive share, in the discretion of the orphans' court be committed to the charge of another. For the foregoing reasons we think the orphans' court precluded from inquiring whether a father be a fit person to be entrusted with the personal custody and education of his children, and that its jurisdiction as to him extends only to the due care and management of the infant's estate. It does not appear in this case that the father was permitted to tender a good and sufficient bond for the management of his children's property, nor is there anything in the testimony to show him to be incompetent for that task. We think him entitled to that privilege for aught disclosed upon the record. Should it appear that it is in some very material and important respects essential to the well being and welfare of children, either physically, intellectually or morally that the rights of a father "should be suspended or interfered with, the chancery jurisdiction is ample to afford remedy." Curtis v. Curtis, 5 Jur. (N. S.) 1147. In a proper case that tribunal may be invoked, and the interests of society protected without resorting to dangerous rules of construing statutory grants. It is therefore ordered that the decree of the orphans' court rejecting the application of the appellant to be permitted to give bond for the performance of his trust as natural guardian of the estate of his infant children, and that appointing Dr. Harvey Lindsley guardian of the said infants, be reversed, and said letters of guardianship issued to said Lindsley are hereby annulled, and the cause is remanded to the orphans' court with directions to cite the said Samuel Chase Barney for the purpose of entering into bond with good and sufficient security, to be determined by said court, for the execution of his trust as aforesaid, &c.

DE KRAFT (BARNEY v.). See Cases Nos. 18,230 and 18,308.

DE KRAFT (LINDSLEY v.). See Case No. 18,308.

DELAWARE, The (BOUKER v.). See Case No. 18,243.

Case No. 18,289.

DERMOTT v. FOWLER.

[2 Hayw. & H. 124.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Sept. 27, 1853.

PARTY-WALLS—COST OF REPAIRS.

Where the defendant uses a party-wall in the erection of his adjoining store, and is put to necessary expense in making the party-wall fit for his use, the jury, in assessing the damages, may take in consideration such extra expense, unless the party, or those under whom he claims, waived the defects.

At law. Action of debt. The declaration states that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $449.92, for material furnished and work and labor performed and bestowed on the party-wall, being the north wall of the warehouse owned by the plaintiff, and being between the plaintiff and defendant, agreeable to the 4th section of Regulation No. 1, entitled "Terms and conditions declared by president of the United States, the 17th October, 1791, for regulating the material and manner of the building, and improvements on the lots in the city of Washington." The following, after giving in detail the contents of the wall between the parties, is the certificate of the measurer: "According to the building regulations Mr. Fowler is required to reimburse one-half the value of said wall to Miss Dermott. Samuel Fowler to Miss Anne R. Dermott, Dr. To one-half value of so much of the party-wall as is designed to be used by him in the erection of his adjoining store, as per above measurement and valuation, $449.92. John C. Harkness, measurer."

¹ [Reported by John A. Hayward, Esq., and Geo. C. Hazleton, Esq.]

John Carrol Brent, for plaintiff.

Joseph H. Bradley, for defendant.

On the trial of the case the following remarks were made by THE COURT: We think the jury, in estimating the cost of the wall to be paid for by the defendant, may take into consideration such expense as the defendant was necessarily put to to make the part of the wall so used by him fit for that purpose, unless the jury shall find from the evidence that the defendant waived such defects, or those under whom he claims waived them. It must be considered that the defendant, when he purchased, did so with a view to the condition in which it was at that time, and whatever damage was done by it placing the wall there, claimed for in this case, might have risen in relation to the freehold. This defendant cannot have a right to recover therefor. There seemed to be a claim for set-off against the plaintiff's account for ground used by the plaintiff, although she denied the claim.

The jury brought in a verdict of damages $365, with interest from November 10, 1851, the time when the defendant commenced to use the wall.

DILWORTH (BLOOMER v.). See Case No. 18,242.

Case No. 18,290.

DISTRICT ATTORNEYS' FEES.

[1. Blatchf. 647.]¹

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. 1852.

DISTRICT ATTORNEYS' FEES.

1. Under the provisions of the act of May 18, 1842 (5 Stat. 434), which are made permanent by the act of March 3, 1845 (5 Stat. 764), the district attorneys for the Northern and Southern districts of New York are entitled to the same fees that are allowed to attorneys, solicitors, and counsel in the supreme court and court of chancery of New York, according to the nature of the proceedings, for like services rendered therein.

¹ [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

2. For services rendered to the United States by those officers in civil and criminal cases, their fees must be taxed according to the latest fee bill in the supreme court of New York, in which the rate of fees is prescribed for attorneys and counsel in that court, and which will be found in chapter 386 of the Laws of 1840, as amended by chapter 273 of the Laws of 1844. 2 Rev. St. N. Y. (3d Ed.) pp. 722-725.

3. The act of the legislature of New York abolishing all attorney and counsel fees (Laws N. Y. 1849, c. 438, § 303) does not affect the right of those district attorneys to the rate of compensation allowed to attorneys and counsel in the supreme court of New York, as it stood at the time of the passage of that act.

4. Where there is an allowance in the supreme court or court of chancery of New York, according to the nature of the proceedings, for a corresponding service, the district attorney can have no other or greater fee.

5. But it is not necessary, in order to entitle the district attorney to fees for a given service, that a corresponding fee for a like service should be given to attorneys, solicitors, and counsel, by an existing law of the state.

6. Where no such corresponding fee is given by any existing law of the state, the usage and practice is to refer back to some previous law of the state regulating the fees of attorneys and counsel, wherein may be found an allowance for a corresponding service.

7. The proper fees for subpoena tickets and for drawing indictments.

8. The practice prescribed for the commitment of prisoners by the marshal to the custody of the jails of the state, and for bringing them up for trial or other cause after such commitment.

9. The mittimus and the habeas corpus, in such cases, discussed.

The bills of James R. Lawrence, Esq., district attorney for the Northern district of New York, for services rendered to the United States in civil and criminal cases, at the October term, 1851, of the circuit court for that district, at Albany, having been submitted to Mr. Justice NELSON, he delivered the following opinion:

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The act of congress of March 3, 1841 (5 Stat. 427), provided, among other things, that, in lieu of all fees, emoluments, etc., it should and might be lawful for the district attorney to demand and receive "the same fees that now are, or hereafter may be, allowed," by the laws of the state where the courts are held, to the attorneys and counsel in the highest courts of the state in which the service was rendered, and no other fees or emoluments; and that he should receive for every day's actual attendance at any court, five dollars per day; and for any services, including the compensation for mileage, performed by him in the discharge of his official duty, for which no compensation was provided by the laws of the state, he "may receive such fees as are now allowed by law according to the existing usage and practice" of the courts of the United States. Then followed the limitation of the amount to be retained, which was not to exceed the sum of six thousand dollars per annum, over and above allowances to deputies and for office expenses. The above is the substance of the act, as it respects compensation to this officer. It was a proviso to the appropriation act of that year, and, therefore, would seem to have been of a temporary character.

The act of congress of May 18, 1842 (5 Stat. 434), forbids any per diem allowance to the district attorney, for attendance when the district or circuit court is sitting in bankrupt cases, unless his attendance is required by the court or the solicitor of the treasury, and also, in the Southern and Northern districts of New York, restricts the fees and emoluments of this officer to such as "now are or hereafter may be allowed by the laws of the state of New York" to attorneys, solicitors and counsel "in the highest courts of law or equity, of original jurisdiction," of the state, "according to the nature of the proceedings, for like services rendered therein."

The act of 1841 adopted the fees and emoluments allowed to attorneys and counsel by the state laws, in the highest courts of the state, as the rate of compensation for like services of the district attorney in the district and circuit courts of the United States. The act of 1842 modifies the clause, as it respects the Northern and Southern districts of New York, by restricting the allowance to the rate in the highest courts of original jurisdiction. Under the act of 1841, the rate of fees to which the district attorney was entitled in New York was the fees allowed to attorneys and counsel in the late court for the correction of errors, that being the highest court of the state. Under the act of 1842, he is entitled to the rate allowed in the supreme court and court of chancery, according to the nature of the proceedings, these being the highest courts of law and equity in the state, of original jurisdiction.

The act of May 8, 1792 (1 Stat. 277, § 3), had adopted the same rule of compensation, namely, "such fees in each state respectively as are allowed in the supreme courts of the same." The same rule was given in the act of February 28, 1799 (1 Stat. 625, § 4), and which, as far as I have been able to find from an examination of the acts of congress, continued down to the passage of the provision of 1841.

The bills before me must, therefore, be taxed according to the latest fee bill in the supreme court of New York in which the rate of fees is prescribed for attorneys and counsel in that court, and which will be found in chapter 386 of the Laws of 1840, as amended by chapter 273 of the Laws of 1844. See this fee bill in 2 Rev. St. N. Y. (3d Ed.) pp. 722-725. Since the third edition of the Revised Statutes was published, all attorney and counsel fees in the supreme court of New York have been abolished by an act of the legislature, and the measure of compensation has been left to an agreement between them and their client. Laws N. Y. 1849, c. 438, § 303; St. N. Y. (Blatchf. Ed.) 265. I am of opinion, however, that this act does not affect the question of taxation, or the right of the district attorney to the rate of compensation allowed to attorneys and counsel, as it stood at the time of its passage.

The act of 1842 provides, that he shall not receive any greater or other fees, etc., for services rendered, than "now are or hereafter may be allowed by the laws of the state of New York" to attorneys, solicitors, and counsel "in the highest courts of law or equity," etc., "for like services rendered therein." This act virtually adopts the laws existing in the state at the time, prescribing fees to attorneys and counsel in the supreme court, and also any subsequent law modifying them, either by increasing or diminishing the rate. The rate of fees allowed by the laws of the state, when adopted, became a part of the act of congress; and so, in respect to any modification. The modification, however, must be a modification of the rate of the allowance, not an abrogation of all allowance of fees and compensation, in order to bring it within the fair meaning of the act of 1842. It was the fees that were then allowed to attorneys and counsel in the state, or that might thereafter be allowed, that was referred to as constituting the general rate of allowance to the district attorney. If no alteration took place, the rate continued as it stood in 1842. If the allowance was subsequently varied by the state law, that would govern. But there must be, in the subsequent change, an allowance for the corresponding services, before it can be made applicable. Any other interpretation of the act of congress would not only be unreasonable, but uncalled for by the terms of the provision. The law of the state, therefore, abolishing all fees and compensation to attorneys and counsel, left the rate as adopted by force of the act of 1842 untouched. This provision of the act of 1842 seems to have been virtually re-enacted by the act of March 3, 1843 (5 Stat. 639, 640), by the act of June 17, 1844 (5 Stat. 690), and to have been made permanent by the third section of the act of March 3, 1845 (5 Stat. 764).

A criticism may be made upon the language of the act of 1842, the effect of which, it might be claimed, would lead to the conclusion that the district attorney is entitled to no fees since the passage of the law of the state abolishing them. I refer to the clause, "Any greater or other fees and emoluments, * * * for services rendered," etc., "than now are or hereafter may be allowed by the laws of the state of New York to attorneys, solicitors, counsel," etc., "for like services," etc. It may be said that this excludes all compensation for services, whatever they may be, by the district attorney, unless a corresponding fee for a like service can be found in an existing law of the state. But this is obviously not the meaning of the clause. The term "greater or other fees," in the connection in which it is found, means no greater or other fees shall be allowed this officer for a service rendered than are allowed to attorneys or counsel by the state law for a like service rendered by them. In other words, where there is an allowance in the supreme court or court of chancery of the state, according to the nature of the proceedings, for a corresponding service, the district attorney shall have no other or greater fee. This is all that the clause means, and not that, if no allowance can be found for the service in the state law, nothing shall be allowed this officer for the service.

The usage and practice in such cases (and which was recognized in the act of congress of 1841) is to refer back to some previous law of the state regulating the fees of attorneys and counsel in which may be found an allowance for a corresponding service. The object of this part of the provision of the act of 1842 was to change the rate of the fees from that of the highest court of the state, to that of the highest court of original jurisdiction, as has already been explained.

There are few items in the bills which have been erroneously charged:

1. Dr. subp. ticket is charged by the folio. The allowance for these tickets is twenty cents each, and this whether drafts or copies.

2. The indictment is charged by the folio. The rates of fees for a declaration in the supreme court should, I think, govern. This charge is $2.50 for the draft, and $1.25 for each copy. It is an inadequate compensation; but it seems to be a corresponding service in the supreme court, or so nearly such, that it must be held to apply, and it is the only one in any fee bill in that court which is analogous.

The practice in respect to the commitment of prisoners by the marshal to the custody of the jails of the states seems unsettled, and not uniform in the different states. The resolution of congress of September 23, 1789 (1 Stat. 96), recommended to the several states to pass laws making it the duty of the keepers of their jails "to receive and safe keep therein all prisoners committed under the authority of the United States, until they shall be discharged by due course of the laws thereof, under the like penalties as in case of prisoners committed under the authority of such states respectively." The state of New York passed a law in pursuance of this recommendation. Act Jan. 28, 1790; 2 Greenl. Comp. p. 292.²

The mittimus must, of course, be directed to the marshal, commanding him, in the name of the president of the United States, to convey and deliver the prisoner to the keeper of the jail, and it should, I think, also contain a command to the keeper to receive him. The original mittimus, or a copy of it duly certified by the marshal or his deputy, should be left with the keeper of the jail, as his authority for the detention. And, when it is necessary to bring the prisoner up for trial, or other cause, a writ of habeas corpus, directed to the marshal, and containing a clause directing the keeper to deliver him, would seem to be necessary, the marshal leaving, at the same time, a copy, certified by him, with the keeper, for his security. The writ in this form would afford a justification to both officers. This writ, or some equivalent authority, seems essential for the protection of the keeper in delivering the prisoner to the marshal, as he is responsible for him after the commitment, until discharged by due course of law; and the writ is also authority to the marshal to receive and bring up the prisoner. Whether some simpler mode might not be devised for bringing up the prisoner and committing him de die in diem, pending the trial, I cannot at present say. It is clear that the officers must be clothed with proper authority at all times to justify the custody of the prisoner, and to resist any attempt at escape or rescue.

² [See note at end of case.]

The practice in the First circuit, as I am advised, is to commit by a regular mittimus, and to bring the prisoner up by a writ of habeas corpus, thereby furnishing the keeper of the jail and the marshal with the proper authority at all times to justify the execution of their duty.

NOTE. This act was as follows: "Be it enacted, etc., that it shall and is hereby declared to be the duty of the sheriffs of the several counties within this state, to receive him into the several gaols within their respective bailiwicks, and safely keep, all prisoners who shall be committed to the said gaols, by virtue of any process to be issued under the authority of the United States, until they shall be discharged by the due course of the laws thereof; the United States supporting such of the said prisoners as shall be committed for offences against the said United States. And in case any prisoner or prisoners shall escape out of the custody of any sheriff to whom he or they shall or may be committed as aforesaid, such sheriff shall be liable to the like actions and penalties as he would have been, had such prisoner or prisoners been committed or charged in custody, by virtue of any process issuing under the authority of this state; and such sheriff or sheriffs respectively, into whose custody any such prisoner or prisoners shall be as aforesaid committed, is hereby authorized to take and receive to his own use such sum or sums of money as shall be payable by the United States, for the use of the said gaols."

The following are the provisions of the Revised Statutes of New York upon the same subject:

"Section 1. It shall be the duty of the keepers of the respective county prisons, to receive into their prisons any person duly committed thereto for any offence against the United States, by any court or officer of the United States, and to confine such person in their prisons, until he shall be duly discharged; the United States supporting such person during his confinement.

"Sec. 2. It shall be the duty of the respective keepers of each of the county and state prisons, to receive into the said prisons and safely to keep therein, subject to the discipline of such prison, any criminal convicted of any offence against the United States, sentenced to imprisonment therein, by any court of the United States, sitting within this state, until such sentence be executed, or until such convict shall be discharged by due course of law; the United States supporting such convict, and paying the expenses attendant upon the execution of such sentence.

"Sec. 3. In case any such prisoner shall escape, or attempt to escape out of the custody of any keeper to whom such prisoner may have been so committed, he shall be liable to the like punishment as if he had been committed by virtue of a commitment or conviction under the authority of this state.

"Sec. 4. The keeper of any prison to whom any such prisoner may have been committed, shall be liable to the like penalties and punishment, for any neglect or violation of duty in respect to the custody of such prisoner, as if such prisoner had been committed by virtue of a commitment or conviction under the authority of this state."

2 Rev. St. pp. 773, 774.

Case No. 18,291.

DIXON et al. v. WALKER.

[2 Hayw. & H. 316.]¹

Orphans' Court, District of Columbia. March, 1859.

ALIENS—DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION.

1. Under the Maryland act of December, 1791 (section 6), no alien can take by descent the real estate of an alien or naturalized citizen, but they can take real estate by deed or will.
2. The personal property of an alien or naturalized citizen dying intestate will be distributed according to the law of the domicile of the deceased.

For the distribution of the estate of a naturalized citizen, who died intestate. Proceeding by James Dixon and others, heirs of James Dixon, deceased, against James Walker, administrator of the estate of James Dixon, deceased, to recover the estate of decedent.

J. M. Carlisle, for the heirs.

PURCELL, J. James Dixon, a native of Scotland, emigrated to the United States and located in Washington City about 30 years ago, and became a citizen by naturalization, after which he acquired property, both real and personal, in the District of Columbia. He has recently departed this life intestate, and the administration of his estate has been committed by this court to James Walker.

It appears, as stated by the administrator, that deceased left no issue, but as next of kin he left three sisters, viz. Jennette, Elizabeth and Margaret, and the children of a deceased brother William, all being aliens. The sister Margaret has two sons in this District who have been naturalized.

The question before this court is, who are the parties entitled to the estate in controversy? An act was passed by the legislature of Maryland, in December, 1891, which had reference to this District, and is now in force here, in section 6 of which it was provided: "That any foreigner may, by deed or will, to be hereafter made, take and hold lands within that part of said territory (of the District of Columbia) which lies within this state, in the same manner as if he was a citizen of this state; and the same lands may be conveyed by him and transmitted to and be inherited by his heirs or relatives as if he and they were citizens of this state." The above section enables a foreigner to take and hold lands in this District and to convey and transmit them to his foreign relatives, but it only extends to such lands as may be acquired before naturalization. As soon as the foreigner becomes a citizen of the United States by naturalization he relinquishes all allegiance to a foreign power, and landed property acquired in this District subsequent to such naturalization, cannot be transmitted to foreign heirs or relatives. See the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall in

¹ [Reported by John A. Hayward, Esq., and Geo. C. Hazleton, Esq.]

Spratt v. Spratt, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 343. But can the two nephews of the deceased, who have been naturalized, inherit? They must claim through their mother, who is a foreigner, and it is well settled that at common law no person can claim lands by descent through an alien, since he has no inheritable blood. In the case of McCrery's Lessee v. Somerville, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 350, Justice Story held that the statute of 11 & 12 Wm. III. c. 6,¹ which is in force in this District, removes the common-law disability of claiming title through an alien ancestor, but does not apply to a living alien ancestor; consequently the claim of the two naturalized sons of the sister of the deceased is invalid. The personal estate, however, over which this court has exclusive jurisdiction, rests upon different principles. This will be distributed according to the law of the last domicile of the deceased, that being in this case the District of Columbia.

The principles which govern the court will be found well established in the case of Ennis v. Smith, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 400. This estate will be decreed to the nearest of kin, no matter in what country they may reside. When the heirship in the case shall be legally established, the orphans' court will pronounce a decree of distribution of the said personal estate in accordance with the foregoing opinion.

¹ Whereas, &c., that all and every person or persons, being the king's natural-born subject or subjects, within any of the king's realms or dominions, shall and may hereafter lawfully inherit, and be inheritable, as heir or heirs, to any honours, manors, lands, tenements or hereditaments, and make their pedigrees and titles by descent from any of their ancestors, lineal or collateral, although the father and mother, or fathers or mothers, or other ancestor of such person or persons, by, from, through or under whom he, she or they shall or may make or derive their title or pedigree, were or was, or is or are, or shall be born out of the king's allegiance, and out of his majesty's realms or dominions, as freely, fully and effectually, to all intents and purposes, as if such father or mother, or fathers or mothers, or other ancestor or ancestors, by, from, through or under whom he, she or they shall or may make or derive their title or pedigree, had been naturalized or natural-born subject, or subjects, within the king's dominions; any law or custom to the contrary notwithstanding.

DOBSON (GOODRICH v.). See Case No. 18,297.

DOUGLAS (BLOOMER v.). See Case No. 18,242.

Case No. 18,292.

DOVE v. BLAIR.

[2 Hayw. & H. 200.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Jan. 25, 1856.

JUDGMENT—MOTION IN ARREST—TIME FOR.

A motion in arrest of judgment will be dismissed if made after judgment is rendered and execution issued thereon.

At law. Motion in arrest of judgment [in an action by William T. Dove, to the use of Richard Halleck, trustee, etc., against J. H. Blair].

The clerk will please enter a motion in arrest of judgment in this case, on the ground that there are errors appearing on the face of the record.

Carlisle & Shehan, for plaintiff.

Bradley & Shelton, for defendant.

And thereupon the said motion in arrest of judgment coming on regularly to be heard, the plaintiff, by his counsel, objected to the same being heard by this court, on the ground that the said motion was not filed in time, according to the usage and practice of this court, and on the further ground that said motion was filed after judgment was rendered, and a fieri facias issued thereon, said judgment having been rendered on the 23d of April, 1855, and said fieri facias having been issued on the 8th of May following, and THE COURT, having heard and considered the said objection, refused to consider the said motion in arrest of judgment, and order and direct the same to be dismissed. Motion dismissed.

DRAHER (BLOOMER v.). See Case No. 18,242.

¹ [Reported by John A. Hayward, Esq., and Geo. C. Hazleton, Esq.]

E.

Case No. 18,293.

EASBY et al. v. EASBY.

[2 Hayw. & H. 207.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June 13, 1856.

EXECUTORS—RENOUNCING.

An executor could renounce his right as executor after acting as such, and be relieved from his responsibility.

At law. This was an appeal from the orphans' court, growing out of the will of William Easby. Among the questions decided by Judge Purcell was that the widow of William Easby and executrix, associated with others as executors of her husband's will, could join in letters testamentary with the executors, and after acting with them for several months renounce her right as executrix and be released from her responsibility as such.

Webb & Carlisle, for appellant.
J. H. Bradley, for appellee.

THE CIRCUIT COURT affirmed above decision.

ELECTION LAWS—CHARGE TO GRAND JURY IN RELATION TO ILLEGAL VOTING. See Case No. 18,254.

ELLSWORTH v. BANK OF WASHINGTON. See Case No. 18,294.

Case No. 18,294.

ELLSWORTH v. GUNTON et al.

[2 Hayw. & H. 21.]²

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. 11, 1850.

BANKS—DEMANDING PAYMENT OF NOTES—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action against a bank on a promissory note taken for collection, the burden of proof rests with the bank to show that the notary made the proper demand on the maker of the note, either at his place of business or at his residence.

At law. Suit on a promissory note [by Erastus L. Ellsworth against William Gunton and others, under the name of the Bank of Washington].

The following is the note on which action was brought: "Washington, January 15th, 1845. Sixty days after date I promise to pay M. N. Falls, or order, two hundred and fifty dollars for value received, with interest from date. Thomas B. Addison." Endorsed by M. N. Falls and Erastus L. Ellsworth.

Declaration: "Whereupon the plaintiff, by Joseph H. Bradley, his attorney, complains that whereas, heretofore, to wit: on or about the first day of March, in the year 1845, at the county aforesaid, he being the true owner and holder of a certain promissory note, bearing date at Washington, to wit, at the county aforesaid, the 15th day of January, 1845, made by a certain Thomas B. Addison, whereby sixty days after the date thereof the said Thomas B. Addison promised to pay Moore N. Falls, by the name of M. N. Falls, or order, two hundred and fifty dollars for value received, with interest from date, and delivered the same to said Moore N. Falls, and the said Falls endorsed and delivered the same to the plaintiff before it became due and payable; and the said plaintiff being the owner and holder as aforesaid of the said note, and wishing to collect the same, and being desirous to have the payment of the said note duly and lawfully demanded of said Addison, according to the law and the usage and custom of merchants, and in event of the failure of said Addison to pay the same on such demand being made, to have due notice of the non-payment thereof given to the said Moore N. Falls, according to law and the usage and custom aforesaid; and the said defendants being then and there engaged in the business of banking in the said city, the said plaintiff requested said defendants, in the due and ordinary course of their business, to receive the said note from said plaintiff and collect the same for the use and benefit of said plaintiff, and to demand the payment thereof from the said Addison as aforesaid, and to give notice as aforesaid to said Falls, in the event of said Addison failing to pay the same; and the said defendants in consideration thereof, and in the usual course of their said trade and business, did agree with said plaintiff to receive and collect the said note, and duly and lawfully to demand the payment thereof from said Thomas B. Addison, and on his failure to pay the same on such demand to give due notice thereof to said Moore N. Falls; and the plaintiff in fact saith that relying on the said promise and undertaking of said defendants, he did then and there to wit, on the first day of March, 1845, deliver the said note to the said defendants, and the said note was not paid at the maturity thereof. Yet the said defendants, not regarding their said promise and undertaking, did not, nor would when the said note was and became due and payable, to wit: on the 19th day of March, 1845, at the county aforesaid, lawfully and duly demanded payment of the same of the said Thomas B. Addison, but utterly failed and neglected so to do, and did not give due notice of the non-payment thereof to the said Moore N. Falls, whereby the said plaintiff utterly lost all remedy against and demand upon the said Moore N. Falls as endorser on said note, and the said sum of money hath not been paid to the said plaintiff to this day; to the damage of the plaintiff $500, and therefore he sued. Joseph H. Bradley, Plaintiff's Attorney."

¹ [Reported by John A. Hayward, Esq., and Geo. C. Hazleton, Esq.]

² [Reported by John A. Hayward, Esq., and Geo. C. Hazleton, Esq.]

On the 19th day of March, 1845, the note was presented at the maker's last place of business in Washington, and demand was made there for payment, and the notary was answered, "Mr. Addison has left this office and it cannot be paid here." The usual plea was made by the counsel for the defendant.

The following instructions appear to have been given to the jury in the case: "If from the whole evidence aforesaid the jury shall find that the note in the said declaration mentioned was made upon a full consideration by said Thomas B. Addison and delivered to M. N. Falls, and was endorsed by said M. N. Falls, and was the property of the plaintiff at the time it fell due, and was deposited by him with the defendants, through their agent, William Fuller, for collection, that the maker of said note resided in Georgetown, that when the same became and fell due the defendants did not present the same, neither at the place of business or abode of the maker of said note, and made no enquiry as to his place of business or abode the plaintiff is entitled to recover, and the burden of proof to show that the notary did make such enquiry is on the defendants, and there is no evidence in this cause that he did make such enquiry."

Verdict for the plaintiff. The following motion was made to set aside the verdict: "Because the jury have rendered a verdict for damages, with interest thereon, which defendants, by their attorney, objected to as illegal."

Joseph H. Bradley, for plaintiff.
I. Hellen, for defendants.

Motion overruled, and judgment rendered on the verdict for the amount of the note, with interest, from January 15, 1845, and costs.

ENFORCEMENT ACT, CHARGE TO GRAND JURY IN RELATION TO EN-FORCEMENT ACT OF MARCH 31, 1870.
See Case No. 18,252.

F.

FEES. See Cases Nos. 18,282-18,284, 18,290, 18,295.

Case No. 18,295.

FEES FOR REGISTERING.

[10 N. B. R. 141.]¹

District Court, E. D. Michigan. June 27, 1874.

FEES OF REGISTER IN BANKRUPTCY.

1. The fee of the register for taking an ordinary proof of debt, since the recent amendment went into operation, is one dollar and eighty-seven and a-half cents.

2. For examining and filing a proof of debt taken before any other officer, fifty cents is the proper fee to be charged.

When the bankrupt act first went into operation, the tariff of fees for proving debts was construed to authorize the charge of about one dollar to the officer who took the proof, and twenty-five cents in addition to the register by whom it was received and filed, making the usual charge, for proofs of the usual length, one dollar and twenty-five cents, or thereabouts. This tariff was changed by the supreme court about two years ago, so as to authorize a charge for the same service of at least double that existing before. The change was so great that very few, if any, registers in bankruptcy charged the whole amount allowed by the law. Some made no change at all in their charges; others advanced at varying rates, with so little uniformity, that, in some places, more than twice as much was charged as in others. The recent amendment of the bankrupt act, by which certain fees are to be reduced to one-half, has made it necessary to ascertain what fees are now allowable for taking and filing proofs of debt in bankruptcy. The register of bankruptcy in Detroit submitted to Judge Longyear, for his consideration and determination, the following question and opinion thereon: "What fees are taxable for taking proofs of debt in bankruptcy, assuming that the deposition which presents the proof contains more than five hundred and fifty words, and that not to exceed one hour was consumed in taking the proof?"

Opinion by HOVEY K. CLARKE, Register in Bankruptcy:

Proofs of debt in bankruptcy must be "verified by a deposition in writing." Section 22 of the act as originally enacted. Section 47 provides "for taking depositions the fees now allowed by law." The fees "allowed by law," were fixed by the act of 1853, under the head of "Commissioner's Fees." "For administering an oath, ten cents," and "for taking and certifying depositions to file, twenty cents for each folio of one hundred words;" and the same act provides that an excess of fifty words shall be counted as one folio. The fees, then, for taking a proof of debts, as fixed by the act, for a deposition containing more than five hundred and fifty words, would be one dollar and twenty cents, and for administering the oath, ten cents,—one dollar and thirty cents. By general order 30, as promulgated by the supreme court at the December term, 1871, it is provided that, "in addition to the fees expressly allowed by the bankrupt act, there shall be allowed the following: * * * To registers * * * for each examination in proof of debt, under section 22, twenty cents for each folio, and one dollar for each hour actually engaged, and for certifying each affidavit or deposition in proof of debt as satisfactory, twenty-five cents." These fees are expressly declared to be cumulative to those allowed by the act, and for the assumed six folios of the deposition, amount to one dollar and twenty cents, for the time consumed in taking, one dollar, and for the certificate, twenty-five cents, making the fees allowed "in addition," by general order 30, two dollars and forty-five cents, which, added to the fees allowed by the act, one dollar and thirty cents, make the whole sum, before the passage of the recent amendatory act, for taking a proof of debt of over five hundred and fifty words, and not consuming over an hour in taking and approving it as satisfactory, three dollars and seventy-five cents; which sum, by section 18 of the amendatory act, which requires certain fees to be "reduced to one-half," must be divided, making one dollar and eighty-seven and a-half cents as the sum now taxable for taking a proof of debt in bankruptcy, when taken before the register to whom the cause is referred and by whom it is filed.

¹ [Reprinted from 10 N. B. R. 141, by permission.]

In the case of a deposition sworn to before some other officer than the register to whom the cause is referred, the proof of debt is not complete until the deposition has been presented to such register and accepted as satisfactory, and filed by him. This supervisory power is plainly implied in the form of the notice to creditors to prove their debts in a court of bankruptcy (section 11), at which a designated register must preside (section 13); but it is expressly conferred by the amendatory act of July 27, 1868, which subjects all proofs taken by commissioners, etc., to the revision of the register. General order 34 prescribes certain duties to the register on the presentation of such proofs to him, and, moreover, expressly authorizes him to decline to file any deposition until the fee for filing the same is paid. What is this fee? This must be answered by reference to the duty involved in the filing of a proof of debt, and the inquiry whether that duty is fairly within any descriptive terms for which a fee is provided. For, of course, no such thing as a quantum meruit allowance can be made, unless the service is within the terms which allow fees. The service must be rendered without compensation. The register is allowed "for each examination in proof of debt * * * $1 for each hour actually engaged." Such an examination the register must bestow upon any proof of debt offered to him to file, whether sworn to before him or not. This duty is not only an obvious one, but the supervision expressly contemplated by general order 34 shows that it was this service which is complete on the filing of the proof, the payment for which was contemplated by the supreme court when it was provided that, until this fee was paid, the register might decline to file the proof. The fee, therefore, for this examination, when the proof is not taken before the register in charge of the case, before the recent amendatory act, was one dollar, and now, by the reduction provided for by that act, fifty cents.

It is proper to bear in mind that, although this fee is nominally for the service rendered in filing the proof of debt, it is really the only provision made for all other services which are involved in the filing of such proof: such as entering the proof on the register's docket, computing the amount due upon it, certifying it to the assignee in the list of creditors, etc., besides the clerical care of all proofs of debt, for convenient reference by assignee or creditors, as occasion from time to time demands. These latter services are in exact proportion in each case to the number of proofs of debt filed, and for which no other compensation is provided.

Detroit, June 27, 1874.

Approved: JNO. W. LONGYEAR, District Judge.

Ordinary proofs of debt contain usually six folios. For such proofs it is therefore established in this district one dollar and eighty-seven and a-half cents may be charged by a register in bankruptcy for taking a proof of debt, and for examining and filing a proof taken before any other officer, fifty cents.

Case No. 18,296.

FIELDS et al. v. CRAWFORD et al.

[2 Hayw. & H. 256.] 1

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April 4, 1857.

EXECUTION—LIEN—WHEN FORFEITED—REPLEVIN.

1. An officer leaving property levied on in the hands of the defendant, subjects it to be seized upon by subsequent creditors of the defendant.

2. An officer of another state forfeits any lien he may have on property levied on, by allowing it to be taken out of the jurisdiction of the state.

3. The only judgment that can be issued in favor of the defendant in replevin is one cent damages and a retorno habendo; he must rely upon a suit on the replevin bond for his damages.

At law. Action of replevin. The following rules were adopted March 25, 1857, by the court, in compliance with the provisions of an act of congress on the subject passed at the last session: "Three terms of this court shall be held in every year, commencing on the respective days following, viz.: On the third Monday of October, on the third Monday of January and on the first Monday of May. The first term under this rule shall be held on the third day of October next." The sheriff had levied an execution in his county on a horse and buggy, the property of one Johnson, to satisfy certain judgments recovered in that county; but he allowed the property, after being thus levied upon, to remain in the possession of Johnson, and while in such possession was brought by him (Johnson) to the city of Washington. While here the same property was levied upon, by virtue of an execution from a justice of the peace, to satisfy a debt due Willard Brothers, hotel keepers, and at the sale under said execution was purchased at public auction by the defendant Crawford. Some days after the sale and purchase the sheriff of Montgomery county replevied the property from Crawford.

Kennedy & Swann, for sheriff.

Chas. Lee Jones, for defendant.

These facts being submitted to the court, and being argued by counsel, the court decided that the sheriff, in leaving the property in Johnson's possession, subjected it, even in the state of Maryland, to be seized upon by any subsequent creditors of Johnson in that state; but even if the levy and execution created a valid lien on the property in that state, yet the bringing of the property out of the jurisdiction of the state forfeited any lien the sheriff might have upon it. The court instructed the jury to find for the defendant.

¹ [Reported by John A. Hayward, Esq., and Geo. C. Hazleton, Esq.]

A question then rose as to the form of the judgment to be rendered. Mr. Jones contended that the jury were not to assess the damages for the unlawful taking and retention of the property by the plaintiff, and a returno habendo awarded. The court decided that the only judgment the defendant in replevin could receive was one cent nominal damages, and a returno habendo, and the defendant must rely upon a suit on the replevin bond for his damages. Mr. Jones, in reply, did not see why, if one cent damages could be given, more could not, and took exception. The counsel for the plaintiff, however, agreed that the case might at once be submitted to the jury to assess both the value of the property and damages. The jury gave a verdict for the defendant to the amount claimed, viz., $125, with interest from the date of the replevin.

FIELDS v. RAINBY. See Case No. 18,296.

FISH (BLAKELY v.). See Case No. 18,240.

FITZHUGH (HINES v.). See Case No. 18,302.

FOWLER (DERMOTT v.). See Case No. 18,289.

FRAUDS—CHARGE TO GRAND JURY IN RELATION TO FRAUDS OF OFFICERS OF NATIONAL BANKS. See Case No. 18,246.

FRAUDS—CHARGE TO GRAND JURY IN RELATION TO FRAUDS ON THE REV-ENUE. See Cases Nos. 18,247 and 18,251.

FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW—CHARGE TO GRAND JURY IN RELATION TO FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW. See Cases Nos. 18,261, 18,262, and 18,263.

G.

GANSEVOORT (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 18,313.

GEORGETOWN, CORPORATION OF, v. UNITED STATES. See Case No. 18,281.

Case No. 18,297.

GOODRICH et al. v. DOBSON.

[43 Conn. 576.]

(District Court, D. Connecticut. April 22, 1876.)

BANKRUPTCY—MUTUAL CREDITS—SET-OFF.

[One to whom a bankrupt is indebted for money advanced, and who, before the bankruptcy, has purchased a note of the bankrupt, having in his possession at the time of the bankruptcy goods of the bankrupt, consigned to him for sale, may sell the goods, and, as against a claim for the proceeds, set off his claims against the bankrupt, under Rev. St. § 5073, providing "that in all cases of mutual debts or mutual credits between the parties, the accounts between them shall be stated and one debt set off against the other, and the balance only shall be allowed or paid; but no set-off shall be allowed of a claim in its nature not provable against the estate" of the bankrupt.]

Submission to arbitration of controversy between Goodrich & Lockwood and John S. Dobson, assignee in bankruptcy.]

H. C. Robinson, for plaintiffs.

A. P. Hyde, for defendant.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. E. Crosby & Sons were manufacturers in Connecticut, who were in the habit of consigning their goods to Goodrich & Lockwood, merchants in New York, for sale. The manufacturers were adjudicated bankrupts upon their own petition, and John S. Dobson was appointed assignee upon their estate. Goodrich & Lockwood proved a debt against the bankrupts which amounted to $16,595, the same being for cash advances by the consignees to the bankrupts on merchandise consigned for sale, and $3,935 for notes of E. Crosby & Sons, purchased by Goodrich & Lockwood for value, before any act of bankruptcy by said bankrupts, and without collusion, and without suspicion of insolvency of the makers, and at a rate fairly predicated upon their solvency, and without the knowledge of the makers. Goodrich & Lockwood held at the time of the bankruptcy, and at the time of making said proof, merchandise on hand then estimated as of about the value of $15,750, which has since been sold by them for a sum sufficient to pay both said advances and said notes. They now retain the amount of the advances and of said notes, claiming a right so to do, in payment therefor, and by way of set-off and mutual credit. The assignee denies their right to retain the proceeds of said sales beyond the amount of said advances, and the parties have submitted the question of such right to my arbitrament.

The question which is at issue between the parties depends upon the meaning of the term "mutual credits," contained in section 5073 of the Revised Statutes, formerly known as the twentieth section of the bankrupt act, which section is as follows: "That in all cases of mutual debts or mutual credits between the parties, the account between them shall be stated, and one debt set off against the other, and the balance only shall be allowed or paid."

but no set-off shall be allowed of a claim in its nature not provable against the estate: provided that no set-off shall be allowed in favor of any debtor to the bankrupt of a claim purchased by or transferred to him after the filing of the petition, or, in cases of compulsory bankruptcy, after the act of bankruptcy, or in respect of which the adjudication shall be made, and with a view of making such set-off." No question is made that the notes are not provable against the estate of the bankrupt, and it is also admitted that if, prior to the bankruptcy, the goods had been converted into money, the assignee could not properly claim any sum beyond the balance due from Goodrich & Lockwood upon their entire account. But it is claimed, inasmuch as the goods were in specie at the time of the bankruptcy, and as no lien existed thereon except for the advances, and as no contract had been made by which they were to be sold to pay any and all indebtedness, that these goods did not constitute a "mutual credit," within the meaning of the section which has been quoted. The sole question is whether, under the circumstances which have been stated, the goods were a "credit," so that their avails can be applied in payment of the notes of the bankrupt.

The term "mutual credits" is one which is not generally used in the statutes of the different states relating to set-off, and is peculiar to the bankrupt laws of England and of the United States. It has a more extensive meaning than the term "mutual debts," and has received a liberal construction in England for the benefit of trade and commerce. The twenty-eighth section of 5 Geo. II. c. 30, provided: "That where it shall appear to the commissioners, or the major part of them, that there hath been mutual credit given by the bankrupt and any other person, at any time before such person became bankrupt, the commissioners, or the major part of them, or the assignees of such bankrupt's estate, shall state the account between them, and one debt may be set against another; and what shall appear to be due on either side, on the balance of such account, or the setting such debts against one another, and no more, shall be claimed on either side respectively." In Rose v. Hart, 8 Taunt. 499, Gibbs, C. J., defines "mutual credits" as follows: "Something more is certainly meant here by 'mutual credits' than the words 'mutual debts' import; and yet, upon the final settlement, it is enacted merely that one debt shall be set against another. We think this shows that the legislature meant such credits only as must in their nature terminate in debts; as where a debt is due from one party, and credit given by him on the other for a sum of money payable at a future day, and which will then become a debt, or where there is a debt, on one side, and a delivery of property with directions to turn it into money, on the other, in which case the credit given by the delivery of the property must in its nature terminate in a debt, the balance will be taken on the two debts, and the words of the statute will in all respects be complied with; but, where there is a mere deposit of property without any authority to turn it into money, no debt can ever arise out of it, and therefore it is not a credit within the meaning of the statute."

As thus expounded, the familiar doctrine of the right to set off mutual debts is enlarged by the addition of the term "mutual credits"; so that, if one party owes a debt which is due at the time of the bankruptcy to a person who is indebted to the other in a sum payable in futuro, the one debt may be set off in bankruptcy against the other; and if, at the time of the bankruptcy, A., a bankrupt, owes B. a debt, and has also placed goods in his hands with directions generally to turn into money, though not on account of or in payment of that particular debt, the goods are a mutual credit, and their avails, when sold, which avails have then become a debt due to A.'s assignee, may be set off against the debt which is due from the bankrupt. It will be observed that this principle has no reference to any legal or equitable lien which has been created by contract or custom between the parties, but rests entirely upon the statute. It is also to be remembered that it was never supposed that goods or choses in action which had been deposited by the bankrupt with a person for a particular purpose, as a collateral security for a specific debt, or upon pledge, or upon trust, were a mutual credit; nor that the avails of such property, if it was sold after the filing of the petition, could be used as a set-off against any other debt or general balance due to such person from the bankrupt. The decision in Rose v. Hart, which was carefully considered, and which was a modification of previous decisions, has ever since been regarded of paramount authority by the English courts. Subsequent decisions have somewhat varied from each other as to the exact meaning of that part of the opinion which states that "the credits must in their nature terminate in debts"; and it has been insisted by eminent judges that those goods only could be considered a mutual credit "when, from the nature of the transaction, and according to the terms of the contract or contracts between the parties, the demands arising on the one side and on the other must necessarily result in mutual pecuniary debts." Dissenting opinion of Kelly, C. B., in Astley v. Gurney, L. R. 4 C. P. 724. As this distinction is one of great importance in this case, and, if it is supported by the weight of authority, is decisive against the claim of the consignees, an examination of the later English decisions becomes necessary.

The three important decisions upon this subject are Young v. Bank, 1 Deac. 622, Naoroji v. Bank of India, L. R. 3 C. P. 444, and Astley v. Gurney, L. R. 4 C. P. 714.

The facts in Young v. Bank, which are substantially taken from the syllabus of the case, are as follows: Palmer & Co., having borrowed a large sum of the Bank of Bengal, deposited the promissory notes of the government of Bengal (commonly called the "company's paper") as a collateral security, accompanied with an agreement, in writing, authorizing the bank, in default of repayment of the loan by a given day, to sell the company's paper for the reimbursement of the bank, rendering to Palmer & Co. any surplus. Before default was made, Palmer & Co. were declared insolvent, under the India insolvent act, which contains a provision in regard to set-off similar to the section of the act of Geo. II. which has been cited. At the time of the adjudication in insolvency, the bank were also holders of two notes of Palmer & Co., which they had discounted for them before the transaction of the loan and the agreement as to the deposit of the company's paper. The time for repayment of the loan having expired, the bank sold the company's paper, the proceeds of which, after satisfying the principal and interest due on the loan, produced a surplus. "In an action by the assignee of Palmer & Co. against the bank to recover the amount of this surplus, held, that the bank could not set off the amount of the two promissory notes, and that the case did not come within the clause of mutual credit in the bankrupt act." It will be perceived that the paper which was deposited by the bankrupt with the bank was as collateral security for the repayment of a particular loan. Lord Brougham, who gave an elaborate opinion in the case, does not rest his decision entirely upon that ground, however, but substantially holds that the doctrine of mutual credit only applies where the person who had given the credit "had placed the other party in a situation which he himself could not alter, had given him funds of which he could not dispossess him, or, which is the same thing, a power over funds which he could not revoke"; and that Palmer & Co. had not placed themselves in this position, because they could at any time, by repaying the moneys advanced, have regained possession of the deposit, and determined the power of sale, and thus have prevented the bank from ever receiving the surplus. The court considered the decision in Rose v. Hart to be "that such a set-off is only competent to the pawnee where the thing alleged to be a giving of credit either constitutes a present cross debt or must end in one." If the opinion of Lord Brougham, though not necessary to the decision of that case, was now the law of England, it would follow that in the case now under consideration no mutual credit existed, for the assignee could probably have compelled the consignees to deliver up the goods at the time of his appointment, by the repayment of their cash advances, and have determined their power of sale.

In Alsager v. Currie, 12 Mees. & W. 751, the court of exchequer pointed out the facts upon which Young v. Bank really turned; and in Naoroji v. Bank of India, L. R. 3 C. P. 444, Byles, J., bluntly declares that "the case is a very doubtful authority." In the Bank of India Case "the plaintiffs were in the habit of drawing bills upon merchants in Bombay, and handing them to the defendants, bankers in London, for collection by the defendants' Bombay branch; the proceeds, when received, being remitted by the Bombay branch to the plaintiffs through the defendants' house in London. The plaintiffs executed a deed of inspectorship under the bankrupt act." The defendants had then in their hands bills of the plaintiffs to the amount of £3,248, which were subsequently collected. "At the same date the plaintiffs were indebted to the defendants on certain bills of exchange in the sum of £3,335." The plaintiffs insisted, upon the authority of Young v. Bank, that the deposit of the bills for collection was not a mutual credit, because, at the time of the bankruptcy, the assignee could have revoked that authority, and recalled the bills. The court held the case one of mutual credit. The importance of the decision to the present discussion consists in the definitions which the judges give to the expression "mutual credit," and in their disregard of the rigid construction which Lord Brougham had placed upon the language of Chief Justice Gibbs. Byles, J., says: "'Mutual credits' I conceive to mean simply reciprocal demands, which must naturally terminate in a debt. It seems to me that the transaction described in this case would naturally terminate in a debt." Montague Smith, J., says: "To bring a case within the act, it is not necessary that the credits should be dependent the one upon the other, nor that there should have been any agreement beforehand. The object of the enactment seems to me to have been that where merchants have had mutual dealings, each giving credit to the other, relying upon each other's solvency, in the event of the bankruptcy of one of them the account shall be taken between them of all such credits and dealings as in the natural course of business would end in debts, and the balance shall be the debt due from the one to the other."

Astley v. Gurney, L. R. 4 C. P. 714, next came before the court of common pleas. The facts as stated in the syllabus were that on March 30, 1865, Joyce & Co. indorsed and deposited with the defendants bills of lading for cotton and coffee valued at £7,048, as collateral security for the defendants' acceptance for £5,000. On April 5th, Joyce & Co. indorsed and deposited with the defendants bills of lading for other cotton, valued at £4,280, and four bills of exchange, amounting to £2,400, as collateral security for a further acceptance of the defendants for £5,000. Joyce & Co. were at this time already largely indebted to the defendants upon bills which the defendants had discounted for them, and which were subsequently dishonored; and, on May 19th Joyce & Co. became bankrupt. Before their bankruptcy, Joyce & Co. gave their assent that the defendants should sell the cotton and coffee, and receive the proceeds. The cotton was sold, and the proceeds received by the defendants, before the bankruptcy of Joyce & Co. The coffee did not arrive until after the bankruptcy. It was then sold by the defendants. The four bills deposited with the defendants were duly paid. The securities deposited on March 30th and April 5th realized £11,816. 12s. 3d., thus leaving, after payment by the defendants of two acceptances of £5,000 each, a balance of £1,816. 12s. 3d., which the defendants claimed to set off against the debt due to them from Joyce & Co. Held by the court of common pleas, upon the authority of Naoroji v. Bank of India, a case of mutual credit as to the cotton and coffee; aliter as to the bills, upon the authority of Young v. Bank; and judgment was given for the plaintiffs for £1,816. 12s. 3d. The exchequer chamber (Kelly, C. B., dissenting) reversed the judgment. The court of exchequer seem to have supposed that the common pleas held that the coffee was not a mutual credit, and base their decision upon the fact that Joyce & Co., before their bankruptcy, gave their assent to the sale by the defendants of the cotton and coffee, and to their receiving the proceeds. Cleasby, B., giving the opinion of the court, says: "It appears to us that this authority altered the relation of the parties, and that, so soon as it was given, credit was given to Overend, Gurney & Co. for the proceeds of the sale, and the case is brought within the authority of the case in the common pleas of Naoroji v. Bank of India."

The facts of that case and of the present bring them within the second rule laid down by Gibbs, C. J., in Rose v. Hart. Kelly, C. B., in his dissenting opinion, did not fail to point out that the authority to sell did not take away from Joyce & Co. the power to provide themselves for the acceptances, and to take back the bills of lading, and thus that the coffee was not necessarily to be converted into money, and ought not to have been treated as money. The majority of the court, however, clearly held with the court in the Bank of India Case, that, where the natural result of the arrangement between the parties in the ordinary course of business would be the conversion of the property into money, such a delivery constituted a mutual credit. It can therefore now be considered that so far as Young v. Bank is an authority for holding that, to constitute a mutual credit, the authority to sell must be irrevocable, the authority is overruled in England. It may be added that the dicta in Murray v. Riggs, 15 Johns. 571, and Ex parte Caylus, Low. 550, Fed. Cas. No. 2,534,—the American cases which are directly upon this point,—are in conformity with Rose v. Hart. The remark of Judge Woodruff in Clark v. Iselin, 10 Blatchf. 211, Fed. Cas. No. 2,825, that "any collections in excess of the advances for which they [the assets of the bankrupt] were specifically pledged, made after the filing of the petition, were collections for the account of the consignees, and as to them no such right of set-off exists," refers to collections of assets which were pledged as collateral security for a specific debt, which assets, while they existed in specie, did not constitute a mutual credit, and the avails of which, unless collected before the filing of the petition, could not therefore be used as a set-off. It is true that Lord Brougham's rule is one which relieves assignees from responsibility, and does not cast upon them the burden of deciding whether they will or will not raise the money to pay the consignees cash advances, and take possession of the goods; but upon principle, if a consignee who has at the time of the bankruptcy in his possession goods of the bankrupt, which must necessarily be sold by the terms of the contract, can retain the avails as a set-off against any debt of the bankrupt, it would seem that he could also, with as much propriety, retain the avails of goods which he was directed to sell, and which at the time of the contract of the unsecured debts must be sold in the ordinary course of business, and which, therefore, naturally constituted the basis of the credit given to the bankrupt, and which goods had been sold without objection. The factor has no higher equitable title to the money in the one case than in the other. In each case the effect of the sale is to give him an advantage over the other creditors, and an advantage to which he has no more superior equity in a case where the property must necessarily be converted by him into money, than where it must be sold unless the assignee prevents the sale by paying the liens upon the property.

If the notes of E. Crosby & Sons had been directly given to Goodrich & Lockwood for moneys loaned to the former, though without reference to the goods, or for property purchased by the bankrupts from Goodrich & Lockwood, the merchandise would clearly have been a mutual credit, under all the decisions except Young v. Bank. It is, then, to be considered whether the fact that the notes were purchased of these persons without the knowledge of E. Crosby & Sons, though with no suspicion of their insolvency, varies the rights of the parties. The notes are a debt provable against the bankrupt estate, and, if the goods constitute a credit given by the bankrupts to the consignees, the avails of the goods may be set off against any provable demand which Goodrich & Lockwood have against the bankrupts; and it is not material whether that claim consists of purchased notes of the bankrupts or of money directly loaned to them. Alsager v. Currie, 12 Mees. & W.

757. The important question to be determined is, were the goods deposited under such circumstances that they constitute a credit? And, if they were a credit, the only remaining question to be decided by the assignee and the creditor, under the twentieth section, is, what is the balance of money due to or from the consignee upon the final statement of his account with the bankrupt estate? In cases of involuntary bankruptcy, it would not seem, under the amendment of June 22, 1874, to be important where or for what purpose the claims against the bankrupt were purchased, provided they were not purchased after the filing of the petition. As has been suggested, the material question in cases of this class is, were the goods delivered under such circumstances as to constitute a mutual credit? The conclusions which are sanctioned by the authorities are that where a known debt is due from the bankrupt, and goods have been deposited with the creditor, not as a pledge, for sale under such circumstances of dealing between the parties that a conversion into money is, in the ordinary course of business, the natural result of the transaction, such goods constitute a mutual credit given by the bankrupt to the other; and when they are sold, either before or after the filing of the petition, the avails may be set off against any unsecured claims due from the bankrupt, under the restrictions provided in section 5073 of the Revised Statutes. Goods deposited as a pledge or as collateral security are not a mutual credit; but if sold before the filing of the petition, in good faith, the excess above the debt for which they are security becomes a debt of the consignee to the bankrupt, capable of being set off like any other mutual debt. If such goods are sold after the filing of the petition, the excess belongs to the assignee.

Upon the foregoing principles, it follows that nothing is due from Goodrich & Lockwood to the estate of E. Crosby & Sons.

GORDON (HINES v.). See Case No. 13,302.

Case No. 18,298.

GORMLEY v. SMITH.

[2 Hayw. & H. 202.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April 17, 1856.

CONTRACTS—DAMAGES FOR BREACH—PROSPECTIVE PROFITS.

1. On a contract with the defendant to haul all the stone which the defendant had contracted to supply for the capitol extension, the plaintiff hauled about one-half, and was forbidden by the defendant to proceed further.

¹ [Reported by John A. Hayward, Esq., and Geo. C. Hazleton, Esq.]

2. In an action on the contract it was held: That the plaintiff is entitled to the contract price for the stone he had hauled, and the gain or profit he would have made if he had been allowed to complete the contract.

At law. Action for work and labor. This action of trespass on the case was brought on the following bill of particulars:

Bartlett Smith, to Philip Gormley, Dr.
Aug., 1851,	To hauling 15,664 perches of gneiss rock for the extension of the U. S. Capitol, at 40 cents per perch. . . . $6,265 60
May, 1852.	To profit on hauling 17,976 perches of gneiss rock for same, said profit being 18 cents per perch. 3,495 37
Dec., 1852.	By cash to this date. $9,760 97
Dec., 1852.	By cash to this date. 3,370 00
	Balance due $6,390 97

On the trial of the case the following instructions were prayed for by the respective counsel. On the trial of this cause, the plaintiff, to maintain the issue on his part, gave in evidence the proposition in writing from the plaintiff to the defendant, and proved by Samuel Strong, a witness on his part, produced by him, that the witness was the superintendent of the work of the extension of the capitol; and that he received from the defendant the said paper, and that the defendant in his presence accepted the said proposition, and the witness then and there noted the said acceptance at the bottom of the said paper. That the plaintiff thereafter promptly proceeded to perform the said contract on his part till he was forbidden from proceeding further by the defendant, who rescinded the contract, without expressing any reason for so doing. That the plaintiff had in part discharged his duty under said contract faithfully till then, and was prepared and able, and offered to complete it. And that the fair gain which he would have made thereon was 18 cents per perch, and that the whole amount of the stone hauled for the said work, from the said canal, was 33,640 perches, of which the said plaintiff hauled 15,664. That while the said work was progressing, the said Smith assigned his contract for the north wing to one O'Neal. That the plaintiff offered and was ready to proceed, notwithstanding said assignment, but that the defendant, aforesaid, assigned the same so as to cut off the plaintiff's right, and that he was notified by the plaintiff that he should claim the hauling of the whole and hold him responsible; but the defendant nevertheless forbade the plaintiff from further proceeding.

The witness further proved that the contract between the plaintiff and the defendant was for the hauling of all the stone which should be required for the capitol extension both wings, for the supply of all of the stone the defendant held a contract with the government. And thereupon the defendant prayed the court to instruct the jury that the plaintiff is only entitled to recover in this action the balance of the account for stone actually hauled at the rate proven, and not for any gain or profit which he would have made if he had hauled all the stone required for the said work. Which instruction the court (DUNLOP, MORSELL and MERRICK), refused to give, to which refusal the defendant, through his attorney, excepted.

Verdict for the plaintiff. Damages $6,399.97, with interest, from Dec. 1, 1852. Motion for new trial.

W. D. Davidge and Mr. Ennis, for plaintiff.
J. M. Carlisle, for defendant.

Motion overruled and judgment on the verdict.

Case No. 18,299.

GREENHOUGH v. KEYWORTH.

[2 Hayw. & H. 9.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June 11, 1850.

BILLS AND NOTES—ENDORSEMENT FOR COLLECTION —SUIT BY ENDORSER.

Where a note payable to the plaintiff or order was endorsed over to a bank for collection, and the bank was unable to collect it, the endorser may bring his action against the maker without regard to the endorsee for collection, and may erase the cashier's or endorser's name from the note without affecting his right to recover as against the maker.

At law. Suit on two promissory notes.

The following are the notes on which the action was based: "Washington, June 4, 1841. Sixty days after date I promise to pay to the order of B. F. Greenhough two hundred and thirty-five $\frac{81}{100}$ dollars, value received, payable at the Bank of the Metropolis, Washington, D. C. \$235 $\frac{81}{100}$. Robert Keyworth. August 3 to 6." Endorsed by B. F. Greenhough: "Stanley Reed & Co. Pay J. M. Houston, cash or order. T. Duron, Cashier. Credit ac. I. Solono. J. M. Houston, Cashier." The other note was for ninety days, drawn by the same party to the plaintiff's order, for the same amount, with the same endorsers, due September 2d to 5th. The former was presented at the Metropolis Bank August 6th, and the latter September 4th. Notices of protest to each endorser were deposited in the post office, enclosed to J. M. Houston, Esq., Cashier, Philadelphia, Pa. The names of "T. Duron, Cashier," and "J. M. Houston, Cashier," were erased.

The declaration is as follows: "District of Columbia, Washington County—To Wit: Robert Keyworth, late of the county aforesaid, was attached to answer Benjamin F. Greenhough, in a plea of trespass on the case, and so forth. And whereupon the said plaintiff, by Jos. H. Bradley, his attorney, complains that whereas, heretofore, to wit, on the 4th day of June, A. D. 1841, the said defendant made his certain note in writing, commonly called a promissory note, his own proper handwriting being thereunto subscribed, bearing date the day and year aforesaid, and thereby sixty days after the date thereof promised to pay to the plaintiff, by the name of B. F. Greenhough or order, the full and just sum of two hundred and thirty-five dollars and eighty-one cents, current money of the United States, for value received at the Bank of the Metropolis, Washington, D. C., and then and there delivered the said note to the plaintiff. And whereas, afterwards, to wit, on the 4th day of June, A. D. 1841, at the county aforesaid, the said defendant made his other promissory note, &c., ninety days after date, &c. By reason thereof, and by force of the statute in such case made and provided, the defendant became liable to, by the said sums of money, in the said notes mentioned, to the plaintiff (according to the tenor and effect of the same), and being so liable, in consideration thereof, then and there undertook and promised to pay the same to the plaintiff, according to the tenor and effect thereof, whenever afterwards he should be thereto requested. And whereas, the defendant afterwards, to wit, on the 5th day of September, 1841, at the county aforesaid, was indebted unto the plaintiff in another sum of six hundred and fifty dollars, like money, for the like sum, by the plaintiff to and for the use of the defendant before that time paid, laid out and expended, at the special instance and request of the defendant; and for other money by the plaintiff before that time lent and advanced to the defendant at his special instance and request; and for other money by the defendant before that time had and received to the use of the plaintiff, and being so indebted the defendant in consideration thereof afterwards, to wit, on the same day and year last aforesaid, at the county aforesaid, undertook and promised the plaintiff to pay him the last mentioned sum of money when afterwards he should thereunto be required. And whereas, the defendant afterwards, that is to say on the 5th day of September in the year aforesaid, at the county aforesaid, accounted with the plaintiff of and concerning divers sums of money from the said defendant to the said plaintiff before the time due owing then in arrear and unpaid, and upon such accounting the said defendant was then and there found in arrear and indebted to the said plaintiff in the further sum of six hundred dollars; and being so found in arrear and indebted, the said defendant afterwards, that is to say, on the day and year last mentioned, at the county aforesaid, in consideration thereof, undertook and then and there faithfully promised to pay to the plaintiff, when thereto afterwards required, the said last mentioned sum of money. Yet the defendant, the said several sums of money herein mentioned, or any part thereof, (although often thereto requested, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, at the county aforesaid, and often afterwards) hath not paid, but the same or any part thereof, to pay hath hitherto wholly refused, and still doth refuse to the damage of the plaintiff in the sum of one thousand dollars, current money, and therefore he brings suit, and so forth."

¹ [Reported by John A. Hayward, Esq., and Geo. C. Hazleton, Esq.]

Verdict for the plaintiff for the amount of the notes and interest until paid.

Motion in arrest of judgment: (1) Because the second count upon one of the notes set forth a day of indebtedness different from the day when it became due, to wit, it sets forth the 5th day of September, 1841, whereas the note to which it refers did not become due until the 7th day of September, 1841, and therefore the obligation is premature,—citing Sheehy v. Mandeville, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 208. (2) That the declaration does not aver any non-payment of either of the notes, but relies upon the insimul computassent on the 5th September, 1841, which was before the second note was due. (3) That the action is upon neither entirely as notes; and when the declaration does not set out the written contract correctly, the plaintiff cannot recover upon the count erroneously framed on the contract, and he cannot recover upon the money counts, because there is a written contract,—citing Page's Adm'rs v. Bank of Alexandria, 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 35.

Motion for a new trial, because, that the verdict was against the evidence. Action on two promissory notes, specially endorsed and stricken out.

Points reserved by the counsel for the defendant for the opinion of the court: That a special endorsement, or endorsement in full, cannot be stricken out, so as to give the endorser a right of action, unless he shows how he reacquired the note. Craig v. Brown [Case No. 3,327]; Burdick v. Green, 15 Johns. 247. A payee of a note, who has specially endorsed it, cannot recover in his own name without proof of payment to the endorser. Georgerat v. McCarty, 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 145. Possession of a note is not evidence of ownership without a reassignment. Welch v. Lindo, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 159.

Jos. H. Bradley, for plaintiff.

Henry M. Morfit, for defendant.

Motion in arrest of judgment, and new trial overruled, and judgment rendered on the verdict.

GUNTON (BELLSWORTH v.). See Case No. 18,294.

H.

HALLACK v. BLAIR. See Case No. 18,292.

Case No. 18,300.

HANCOCK v. WILMINGTON & R. R. CO.

[Cited in Case No. 11,563. Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

Case No. 18,301.

HICKERSON v. UNITED STATES.

[2 Hayw. & H. 228.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. 18, 1856.

NUISANCE—PUNISHING SLAVE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

1. It is an indictable offence to inflict punishment on a servant or slave, to the annoyance or nuisance of citizens, whose pleasure or business carry them near the scene of infiction.

2. The question of nuisance or no nuisance is one of fact exclusively for the jury to decide.

At law. Writ of error to the criminal court. Indictment for an assault on a slave. The following is the indictment: That William Hickerson, late of the county aforesaid, laborer, on the 2nd day of June, 1856, with force and arms, at the county aforesaid, in and upon one negro, James, the said James being then and there a slave, the property of one Mary A. Dodson, in the peace of God and the said United States, then and there being near a public street and highway in the county aforesaid, did make an assault and battery; and him, the said James, did then and there beat and ill treat, and other wrongs and injuries to the said James then and there did, to the great damage of the said James, to the terror and disturbance and annoyance and common nuisance of the good citizens of the United States, then and there passing and repassing on and near the said public street and highway, and there and thereabouts being and abiding and against the peace and government of the United States.

The defendant, by his counsel, moved the court to quash the indictment, because the offence charged is not an indictable offence.

THE COURT overruled the motion.

The defendant's counsel prayed the court to instruct the jury as follows: If the jury believe that the negro James, mentioned in the indictment, was a slave of Mary

¹ [Reported by John A. Hayward, Esq., and Geo. C. Hazleton, Esq.]

A. Dodson, and was hired to Mr. Burch, the keeper of a livery stable, and that the defendant was the manager for said Burch, with authority from him to correct and manage his servants; and that the assault and battery charged was a mere whipping inflicted by said defendant in the said stable, then the jury must acquit the defendant of the offence charged.

THE COURT refused to give the instructions, but gave the following: "The court cannot say to the jury that the fact of the defendant having inflicted the whipping in a stable entitled him to acquittal. If they believe it to have been so from the evidence in the case, it is necessary that they should believe from the evidence that the whipping took place near a public street or highway, and that it was to the terror, disturbance, annoyance and common nuisance of the good citizens of the United States, for it is so charged in the indictment. It must amount, and you must believe that it was a nuisance, for a technical assault and battery on a slave is not indictable. A master or hirer of a slave, or his manager, has a right to correct a slave that belongs to him, or to whose services he is entitled by hiring, but if he does so in a cruel or inhuman manner in such a place, whether it be in a street, a house or stable, as to be an annoyance or nuisance to the citizens, whose pleasure or business carry them near the scene of the infliction, he is indictable. The question of nuisance, or no nuisance, is one of fact exclusively for the jury to decide." To which ruling and instructions of the court, the defendant, by his counsel, excepts, and prays that this bill of exception may be signed, sealed and enrolled, which is done accordingly.

Charles L. Jones, for petitioner.
P. B. Key, for the United States.

Judgment of criminal court affirmed.

HILL (BLOOMER v.). See Case No. 18,242.
HINES v. FITZHUGH. See Case No. 18,302.

Case No. 18,302.

HINES v. GORDON et al.

[2 Hayw. & H. 222.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June 20, 1856.

HUSBAND AND WIFE — DISPOSAL OF PROPERTY BY WILL — ABANDONMENT.

1. In the absence of consent on the part of her husband, a wife cannot dispose of her personal property by will during his lifetime.

2. Judge Morsell held, that where a husband voluntarily abandoned his wife and neglected to provide for her, she may dispose of any property she may have subsequently acquired in such manner as she may please.

At law. This is an issue from the orphans' court between Jacob Hines and John Gordon and John Fitzhugh to try the validity of a will executed by Mrs. Rachel Hines, the mother by a former husband of the defendants' wives. The following is the caveat of Jacob Hines in the matter of the will of Rachel Hines, deceased: "(1) Your caveator respectfully represents that the paper propounded as the last will and testament of Rachel Hines, deceased, is not the last will and testament of said Rachel. (2) That at the time prior to the making of the alleged will, said caveator intermarried with said Rachel, which said marriage was never annulled or vacated till the death of said Rachel; and that no consent was given by said caveator to the making of said alleged will, or any will or testament or disposition by the said Rachel. Wherefore the said caveator respectfully prays that the said will may not be admitted to probate, and that the court may direct an issue to be made up and sent to the circuit court, to try whether the said alleged will is the last will and testament of said Rachel Hines." The issue as prayed was sent up to the circuit court.

Bradley & Bradley, for the will.
Carlisle & Maury, for the caveator.

The defendants, through their counsel, asked the court to give to the jury the following instructions: "If from the whole evidence aforesaid the jury shall find that the said Rachel Hines was, in the year 1837, the widow of Thomas Taylor, then late of the city of Washington, the administratrix of the personal estate of said Thomas, and guardian of her three children by said Thomas: to wit, (one name not given) since deceased, unmarried and intestate; Martha Ann, the wife of the defendant Fitzhugh, and Rachel, the wife of the defendant Gordon. That as administratrix and guardian as aforesaid, she had possession and control of the real estate and personal estate of said Thomas, and kept the same undistributed, and undivided, and so managed the same for the common benefit of herself and her said children until the year 1850. That in the year 1850 the personal estate of said Thomas, and the accounts of said guardian were settled, and by the said settlement the negro woman and her children in said will named were passed to the testatrix as part of her share in said estate, and in settlement of her account as guardian for the maintenance and education of her said children, then in the year 1850, and not before, in law, she became the purchaser of said negro woman and children, and until then she had no separate estate in them which would have enabled her to dispose of them in her own right. And if they shall further find that in the year 1837 the said Rachel intermarried with the said Jacob Hines, she still retaining the said control, possession and management of the estate of said Thomas; and that in the month of December, 1841, he deserted and abandoned her, refused to provide for her support, and told her in effect to provide for herself, went to the state of Ohio, and ever after to the day of her death remained and continued to live separate and apart from her, and afforded her no aid, protection or support; that to support herself and her said children, she was obliged to open and keep, and did in fact open and keep, and provide for, and furnish a boarding house, and entertain boarders therein in the city of Washington, from the year 1842 to the year 1847, when the said Fitzhugh was married, and for that purpose did from time to time rent divers houses in said city, and did thenceforth, to wit, from December, 1841, to her death in 1852, deal, trade and carry on business in the said city in her own name, on her sole credit and responsibility, assisted by the means so as aforesaid derived from the estate of said Thomas Taylor, and was enabled thereby to maintain herself and said children, and to purchase the said negroes as aforesaid in the year 1850, then she had a right in law to dispose of the same as her separate property, either in her life-time, or by her last will." The court refused to give the above instructions.

¹ [Reported by John A. Hayward, Esq., and Geo. C. Hazleton, Esq.]

The caveator, through his counsel, asked the court to give to the jury the following instructions: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the slave Henny, mentioned in the alleged will, is the same slave mentioned in the inventory of the estate of said Thomas Taylor, and that the other slaves in said will mentioned are the issue of the said Henny, born while she was held by the said Rachel Hines, after the death of said Taylor, and before her marriage with said Hines, or after said marriage, then the alleged will being made only as to the said property, is null and void." Which said instruction the court gave as prayed.

To the granting of said instructions, as prayed for by the caveator, as also to the refusal of the instructions prayed for by the defendants, the defendants excepted.

The following prayers were offered by the counsel for the caveator, and, the court being divided in opinion, were refused: "If the jury believe from the evidence aforesaid that the separation between the caveator, Jacob Hines, and his wife Rachel, in the year 1841, was not intended by the said Jacob to be a final abandonment of his said wife, but was with the intention of returning to live with his said wife; or if the jury shall find from said evidence that the said separation was continued only in consequence of the said Rachel's determination and declaration, that she would never live with her said husband again; in either case they must find for the caveator, Jacob Hines, on this issue. If the jury believe from the evidence aforesaid that the deceased, Rachel Hines, at the time of executing the paper writing so as aforesaid propounded as a will, and at the time of her death was the lawful wife of the caveator, Jacob Hines, and that the said Jacob Hines did not assent to the making of the said paper writing, then the said paper writing is not the will of the said Rachel Hines, but is utterly null and void, and they must render their verdict for the caveator on this issue."

MORSELL, Circuit Judge, agreeing with his colleague, DUNLOP, Chief Judge, on general principles, but making an exception in this case, expressing himself to the effect that where a husband voluntarily abandons his wife, and neglects to provide for her, the wife may dispose of any property she may have subsequently acquired in such manner as she may please.

At the March term, 1855, the verdict of the jury was for the caveator.

Motion was thereupon made for a new trial by the defendants. At this, the March term, 1856, the court dismissed the motion for a new trial, and certified the verdict to the orphans' court.

I.

ILLEGAL VOTING—CHARGE TO GRAND JURY IN RELATION TO ILLEGAL VOTING. See Case No. 18,254.

INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS—CHARGE TO GRAND JURY IN RELATION TO FRAUDS UPON THE REVENUE. See Case No. 18,251.

30 Fed. Cas.—69

INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS—CHARGE TO GRAND JURY IN RELATION TO INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS. See Case No. 18,248.

J.

JOHNSON (ARMSTRONG v.). See Case No. 18,226.

Case No. 18,303.

JOHNSTON v. CLARKE et al.

[2 Hayw. & H. 258.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April 6, 1857.

BUILDING ASSOCIATIONS—USURY—DEALING WITH PARTNERSHIP FUNDS—INJUNCTION.

A number of persons enter into mutual agreement to subscribe and pay into a common fund by regular instalments, say $1 per month for each share a member may take, until the fund has accumulated so as to divide $200, or any given amount, to a share; at which period the partnership is to cease; and to secure punctuality, each member neglecting his monthly payments is subjected to a fine, say of 10 cents upon every dollar he fails to pay at the regular monthly meetings. The period of distribution is hastened, and the common fund made productive by authorizing any member to make a composition sale of his interest in the ultimate distribution, to the other members of the association. Thus, whenever there are funds enough in the treasury for the purchase of one or more shares at any regular meeting of the association, the member who bids the highest premium, or in other words, agrees to take the lowest price, is paid the price so bid by him for his ultimate share. He remains, however, a member of the society until the close, paying thenceforth a double instalment on his shares, $2 per month on each, instead of $1, and subject to all the regulations of the society, liable to attend its meetings and to do any duties which might be devolved upon any other member, and liable to the regulated fines, in default of punctual payment of monthly contributions or any other default under the rules. To secure a compliance with his contract to the company, the member making such composition of sale executes his bond in the penalty of the ultimate value of the share sold, conditioned for the faithful payment of the monthly dues thereafter to accrue, and all fines and forfeitures which may under the rules be imposed on him for any defaults. He also executes a deed of trust, conveying real estate, to secure a compliance with the condition of the bond. There is in the bond and deed no stipulation for the return of the principal sum advanced to the member, nor is it at all in the power of the society to compel its return if he fulfill the conditions of the bond and deed of trust.

Held: 1. Such stipulations entered into are not, on their face, a device to cover a usurious loan; and such a transaction is not usurious upon its face.

2. This was a dealing with the partnership funds, in which the complainant had an interest in common with the members of the society, and was not a loan; the complainant was interested in the money when it was advanced and when it was repaid.

3. An injunction to restrain a sale under the deed of trust ought to be refused.

¹ [Reported by John A. Hayward, Esq., and Geo. C. Hazleton, Esq.]

[Bill] in equity for an injunction [by John Johnston against Richard H. Clarke and Daniel Ratcliffe, trustees of the Potomac Building Association].

Johnston filed a bill praying for a special injunction of the court to release him from the payment of certain bonds and forfeitures due the Potomac Building Association, for money advanced by the society on certain shares of stock held by Johnston in the society, on the ground that the contract between the association and the applicant was illegal, and the action of the association usurious. The complainant gave a deed of trust to secure a loan of $260. That since making the loan he had paid $239. That the association claims there is due $203.50, and on default of the payment are about to make a sale of the premises, north half of lot 24, in square 732. That the contract and transactions between the complainant and the association are usurious. That he may be credited with the sum paid, and that the interest may be adjudged according to equity, and that the trustees be enjoined from selling the property. Advance was purchased by the complainant on his two shares of stock at a premium of 35 per cent. May 3d, 1851.

Carlisle & Maury, for complainant.

Bradley & Bradley and others, for defendant.

MERRICK, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The complainant is a member of one of those voluntary associations, with the principles and modes of operation of which the public has long been familiar, under the denomination of building associations, and brings his bill into this court against the trustees of the association, to restrain the enforcement of the stipulations he has entered into with them in the usual conduct of the business of the association, and in furtherance of the objects for which he, and all its other members enter into the co-partnership, upon the ground that those stipulations are usurious, unconscionable and oppressive. This case is understood to raise the question, presented by several of like character on the docket, of the lawfulness of the operations of this class of associations, and of a large number of kindred societies which are known as benefit societies, and have as their ostensible object the accumulation of a fund for each of their members by the periodical contribution of small savings, which are made productive by being advanced in certain amounts to individual members in the form of composition sales of their interests. All these societies combine two leading features, viz: hoarding savings, and making profits by compounding interest on the savings, on substantially the same principles as savings banks and mutual insurance companies, by the following simple process: A number of persons enter into a mutual agreement to subscribe and pay into a common fund, by regular instalments, say one dollar per month, for each share the member may take, until the fund shall have accumulated so as to divide $200, or any other given amount to each share, at which period the partnership is to cease, and the share of each member thus accumulated will be a fund for him to purchase a small freehold tenement, or to be applied to any other prudential use he may determine; and to secure punctuality each member neglecting his monthly payments is subjected to a fine, say of ten cents upon every dollar he fails to pay at the regular monthly meetings. The period of distribution is hastened and the common fund made productive by authorizing any member to make a composition sale of his interest in the ultimate distribution to the other members of the association. Thus, whenever there are funds enough in the treasury for the purchase of one or more shares at any regular meeting of the association, the member who bids the highest premium, or in other words agrees to take the lowest price, is paid the price so bid by him for his ultimate share. He remains, however, a member of the society until the close, paying thenceforth a double monthly instalment on his shares, $2 per month on each instead of $1, and subject to all the regulations of the society, liable to attend its meetings and to do any duties which might be devolved upon any other member, and liable to the regulated fines in default of punctual payment of monthly contributions, or any other default under the rules. Whenever a sale of this kind is effected, it is manifest that unless some arrangement is made the society has no security that the member who has been advanced by his sale his ultimate share of profits will continue to bear his proportion of the burden of mutual contribution; therefore a bond in the penalty of the ultimate value of the shares sold and a deed of trust upon real estate is executed to the society, conditioned for his faithful payment of the monthly dues thereafter to accrue, and all fines and forfeitures which may, under the rule, be imposed on him for any defaults. There is in the bond and deed no stipulation for the return of the principal sum advanced to the member, nor is it at all in the power of the society to compel its return if he fulfill the conditions of the bond and deed of trust. Should the member fail to comply, the bond and deed of trust become forfeit, and the society may direct a sale of the property conveyed by the deed to raise the amount of damages which are ascertained and liquidated by the deed of trust, and which are usually the return to the society of the advance paid upon the bid of the member, with interest thereon, all the monthly dues and fines which may be in arrear; and the member is then and thereby reinstated in the condition of a member who has had no advance, and has paid his dues and fines, &c.

The facts in the present case conform to the general scheme I have mentioned. John Johnston is a member of the Potomac Building Association, consisting of 176 members. On the 5th of May, 1851, he received from the society $260, bid on 2 shares of the ultimate value of $400. In other words, he sold to the members at 35 per cent. discount, and gave bond and deed of trust for the payment of double monthly dues thenceforth, or $4 per month, and for such fines and forfeitures as he might incur; and falling in arrear for dues and fines in December, 1856, the trustees under the deed of trust advertised the property for sale, and he has filed his bill charging that the stipulations he entered into were only a device to cover an usurious loan, and praying to be discharged from his contract on payment of the principal sum of $260, with interest from May 5th, 1851, and to be released from the fines incurred by him as a member of the society, and to enjoin a sale of the property by the trustees. The trustees in their answer deny that there was any corrupt intent or secret agreement to effect an usurious loan under the forms of stipulations entered into by parties, and sets out the bond, deed of trust, articles of association, &c., and aver that the contract was bona fide entered into and made and intended to be what it appears on the face of the papers, and none other. In the present stage of the cause the answer must be taken as true, that the contract between the parties was whatever it appears to be, and there was no other and different agreement behind the ostensible arrangement. Were there another secret agreement to make an usurious loan, to which the stipulations here shown were but an outward covering, and it were so charged in the bill by proper averments, it would become necessary, before a final hearing, to send down a case to a jury to ascertain whether there be in fact a secret, corrupt, usurious agreement for a loan; for whatever form parties adopt to hide usury, if they have secretly made a corrupt loan, the law will drag away the veil and penetrate the motive. But I do not understand the bill to charge any different agreement from that disclosed by the answer, and the question before us is therefore not one of intention, but one of construction upon the face of the articles of association, bond and deed of trust exhibited with the answer. As a question of construction it seems to me, both upon principle and authority, that stipulations like those we are considering are not usurious. To constitute usury, there must be a loan of money in which the principal sum is not hazarded, and is to be repaid at all events with more than legal interest. There was a time in the history of the law when the taking of any interest for the use of money was an heinous offense; but "usury has long since lost that deep moral stain which was formerly attached to it, and is now generally considered only as an illegal or immoral act, because it is prohibited by law." Lloyd v. Scott, 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 224. With this high warrant for a lenient construction of a penal law, no court should pronounce a contract usurious in which any of the elements of the definition are wanting, or which is within the exemption of adjudicated cases; but, on the contrary, should seek to enforce the principle that every man has a right to make what contracts he pleases, if not restrained by some law, and that justice and equity require that such contracts should be executed if fairly made. The very point involved in the present case was decided in Silver v. Barnes, 6 Bing. N. C. 180 (decided in 1839, after the act of Geo. IV.) Tindall, Chief Justice says, "The question was whether the transaction was a loan of money or a dealing with the partnership funds. If it was a loan, it was usurious. We think it was a dealing with the partnership funds, in which the defendant had an interest in common with the other members of the society, and that it was not a loan; the defendant was interested in the money when it was advanced and when it was repaid. The rules of the society are in effect a mere agreement by the partners that their joint contributions shall be advanced for the use of one or other, as occasion requires, and the transaction was not a borrowing by the maker of the note from the payees."

In a later case (Burbidge v. Cotton, 8 Eng. Law & Eq. 62) Sir J. Parker says, "The case of Silver v. Barnes was a direct authority, that an advance out of the funds of an association of this kind, made pursuant to its rules, to one of its members, having in common with other members an interest in the fund out of which the advances were made and in the money to be repaid to him, was not a loan of money, but a dealing with the partnership funds, and was not usurious. He was not aware that the authority of that case had ever been doubted. It had been approved by Parker, Baron, in Cutbill v. Kingdom [1 Exch. 494], and he considered that a decision of a court of law on such a subject was binding in this court." To the same effect are the cases of Seagrave v. Pope, 15 Eng. Law & Eq. 480; Mosley v. Baker, 6 Hare, 87, and other cases. It has been supposed that the cases of Silver v. Barnes, Burbidge v. Cotton, and all the others rest the principles of their decision upon the late English statutes of 7 Wm. IV., and 7 & 8 Vict., and also a previous statute of Geo. IV., for the regulation of certain joint-stock associations. But this is a total mistake, as may be found by consulting Wadsworth on Joint Stock Companies, as well as the cases themselves. They do not profess to rest upon a statutory privilege, but upon common law principles. These statutes had their origin with the statute of 6 Geo. I., c. 18, passed in 1719, which was made to restrain the creation of associations with shares transferable at pleasure, which after the introduction of the South Sea bubble were used as means for the wildest forms of stock-gambling, and indulged to such a mad and ruinous extent as to require the check of legislative prohibition. When mutual benefit and aid societies having funds accumulated from small monthly subscription, were adopted about the beginning of the present century, it was much doubted whether they did not fall within the prohibitions of the stock-gambling statutes, the provisions of which are numerous and very complicated. To remove these doubts, and to reduce into a system the manner of conducting these and other joint-stock associations having legitimate and beneficial objects, and to give greater facilities for the management and enforcement of the rights of these companies, the statutes of Geo. IV., superseded by 7 Wm. IV., and 7 & 8 Vict., were passed. These statutes are in no sense enabling statutes, but are in the nature of restraining enactments, requiring certain formalities, not at common law necessary, to give vitality to the association coming within their purview, and subjecting them to a certain inquisitorial control by boards of justices, &c. But these statutes, although none of them in force in this district, may be invoked for one purpose, viz.: to show the sense of the people and parliament of Great Britain that associations of this sort are of most beneficial tendency; and, pruned of abuses to which some of them are liable, are of great utility to the public, especially to the poorer classes, by encouraging thrift and supplying them with advantageous agencies for the accumulation and management of the savings of their daily labor.

But, altogether outside of any decisions, touching joint-stock associations, it is well settled that if profit be derived through a bona fide partnership, the dealing with money is not usurious. Gilpin v. Enderbey, 5 Barn. & Ald. 954; Fereday v. Hordern, Jac. 144. The reason running through all these cases is, that the principal sum is in hazard by the liability of the partners for the debts of the concern to third persons; and the principle is not varied by the fact, that under the particular arrangements of the business any loss is highly improbable. An inspection of the scheme in this case will make apparent to any one, without pausing to illustrate it, that each member is interested in every dollar belonging to the concern; the greater the profits the less will be the amount of his weekly contribution to raise the common fund to the distributive amount; and if no profit be made, he will contribute all that he ultimately withdraws, and will only derive the benefit, a substantial one indeed, of the saving process. On the other hand, in payment of officers' salaries, rent, and all other expenses, he is liable individually for all the debts of the concern; and therefore, to all legal intents and purposes, is a partner.

Independent of the partnership view of the case, as was argued at the bar, the contract may be likened to the purchase by the society from its member of an annuity. For the amount advanced or paid to him he agrees to pay double the monthly instalment on the shares represented during the life of the association. The duration of the society is altogether uncertain; it may, and probably will, expire before the monthly payments amount in the aggregate to the price he receives with simple interest, or it may continue until these exceed that amount. The purchase and sale of annuities and rent charges differ from a loan at interest in this: that in case of a loan the principal sum, as such, is to be repaid at all events. In the case of annuities and rent charges, redeemable, it may be repaid at the will of the purchaser, nor does it make any difference that the annuity is dependent upon a contingency other than the duration of a human life. Both in annuities and rent charges purchased the stated payments may amount to much more than the interest upon the price paid, and be so great as in all human probability before the termination of an annuity largely to exceed both principal and interest; yet the validity of the purchase is not thereby affected. The case of Lloyd v. Scott, decided in 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 224, and afterwards tried in this court upon procedendo [Case No. 8,434], on an issue of usury before the jury, was the purchase of an annuity or rent charge, very like in its practical results to the present case; and in that case the court held that the covenant that a party might re-purchase within a given period at the same price, and upon the repayment of that price, with all arrears of instalments of the annuity which was equivalent to 10 per cent. per annum, to be entitled to re-conveyance of the premises charged, did not give the transaction in law the character of a loan so as to taint it with usury, provided the original purchase was in good faith. But it is further said, that although the sale of the shares upon a discount, coupled with an agreement to pay the double monthly instalment, may not be usurious, considered in the light of a partnership dealing, or an annuity sale, or a contract in which the principal sum is not, at all events, returnable, together with more than legal interest, yet the imposition of fines of ten cents for each dollar of monthly dues not punctually paid is usurious interest upon the monthly dues. This does not appear to me to be either a just construction of that part of the regulations of the society; nor if it were meant to be a reservation of interest, as interest would it be usurious. The cases of Roberts v. Trenayne, Cro. Jac. 509; Floyer v. Edwards, Cowp. 113; and Wells v. Girling, 4 Moore, 78; same case, 1 Brod. & B. 447; all deciding that, where the party may relieve himself from any interest at all by payment at a day certain, the reservation of more than legal interest in case of default is not usurious within the statute. But the fair construction of this part of the regulations of these societies seems to be that, in as much as punctuality and exactitude are essential to the just and profitable conduct of the business of the concern, the reservation of legal interest on non-payment of monthly dues being so inconceivable, hard to compute and next to impossible to collect and account for, it would be no compensation to the society for these defaults, nor any security against their frequent recurrence. Hence their rules fix as a measure of liquidated damage for each default, under the name of a fine, a certain small sum, in this and most other societies 10 cents on every dollar. The 16th rule of the articles in the case of Silver v. Barnes, already cited, calls these fines by the name of "liquidated damages."

Now, if the contract in this case was not usurious, was it an unconscionable and oppressive bargain, which a court of equity ought to relieve against? By reference to the tables of calculation which are published in the explanatory treatise on these subjects, or which, with a little trouble, may be calculated by any person for himself, it will appear that the average duration of these societies is from eight to nine years, dependent upon the range of premium which their advances command. A society with an average premium of 35 per cent., which the complainant in this case paid, will wind up in eight years and a fraction. What does an advance at thirty-five per cent. discount cost the member during eight years, as compared with the admitted standard of moderation, a loan at six per cent.

$400 at thirty-five per cent. discount is..	$260 00
Interest at six per cent. for eight years	is 124 80
	$384 80
Double monthly dues for eight years at
$2.00 per share.....	384 00
Balance in favor of an advance over an ordinary loan at six per cent. is	$ 80

Thus it appears in point of fact, that if the complainant were faithfully to comply with the terms of his contract, and be in no default for monthly dues, instead of paying more than legal interest he would get the advance and use of $260 for eighty cents less than simple interest, while the profit to the co-partnership would be the active employment of his and other weekly dues in the interval. Suppose the contract be terminated, and the complainant released from his connection with the society, and he claims in his bill:

By payment of the advance.....	$260 00
Legal interest thereon for five years and seven months.....	87 10
	$347 10
Crediting the account with dues paid as per answer.....	209 00
	Balance due to the society.....$138 10

Suppose, on the other hand, the complainant be released upon the terms offered by the respondents in their answer, the account will stand:

Debtor to amount advanced..	$260 00
To amount of fines, as per detail statement	14 00
Whole amount of dues prior to and after advance.....	282 00
	$556 00
Crediting him by estimated value of his shares.....	$200 00
And by monthly dues already paid	209 00
	409 00

The balance claimed by them is... $147 00
—Or $8.90 more than by calculation of simple interest.

Suppose, on the other hand, that the advance be restored to the society, and the complainant restored to the condition of a member having received no advance, which, under the terms of the articles of association, is all that the society can insist upon without his consent to a dissolution of their relations, the account would be stated thus:

Debtor to advance.....	$260 00
To amount of fines incurred.....	14 00
Total dues prior to and since his ad- vance	282 00
	$556 00
And crediting the dues already paid in..	209 00
	Leaving an apparent balance of...$347 00

But to show the true attitude of the parties it will be remembered that this balance of $347 represents within itself his remaining interest in the association and the value of his ultimate distributive share. This share he may sell to any third person or to the society, as they offer by their answer, at its market value of $200, and the balance against him will be exactly as before, $147, or less than $9 above legal interest for the use of the advance for five years and upwards. Suppose the member resorts to the other alternative of voluntarily quitting the society after having enjoyed the benefit of his advance for five years and seven months. He has a right to do it without the assent of the association, as provided in their constitution, by returning the money advanced, with interest thereon, paying all fines incurred, and being credited with the dues already paid in. The account would then be:

Advance	$260 00
Interest for five years and seven months	87 10
Fines incurred	14 00
	$361 10
Amount of dues paid in.....	209 00

Balance due the association.....$152 00

—Or $14 more than simple interest for the use of the advance during five years and seven months.

No man who will give a thought to the subject can call a contract voluntarily entered into, which presents these results, unconscionable or oppressive.

But suppose that the forfeitures and fines imposed upon a defaulting member were much larger than those claimed in the present case, would it be the province of this court, upon the bill of the defaulter, to relieve him from the consequences of his own contract and his voluntary acts? The distinction must always be remembered between calling upon a court of equity to relieve against a forfeiture or to enforce a forfeiture. In the latter case they may refuse to interfere. But the doctrine of relief has been restored from confusion of the oldest decisions and narrowed to this, that unless the court can clearly see that full compensation can be made, and the forfeiture was not voluntarily and persistently incurred, it will not relieve, but let the party abide by the contract he has formed. In 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1323, it is thus summed up: "The doctrine seems now to be asserted in England, that in all cases of forfeiture for breach of any covenant, other than a covenant to pay rent, no relief ought to be granted in equity, unless upon the ground of accident, mistake, fraud or surprise, although the breach is capable of a just compensation." And in section 1325 he gives the special phase of reasoning, which fits the present and like cases, viz.: "It is upon grounds somewhat similar, aided by considerations of public policy, and the necessity of a prompt performance in order to accomplish public or corporate objects, that courts of equity, in cases of non-compliance by stockholders with the terms of payment of their instalments of stock at the time prescribed by which a forfeiture of their share is incurred under the by-laws of the institution, have refused to interfere by granting relief against such forfeiture."

In the case of Sparks v. Liverpool Water Works, 13 Ves. 433, which was a case of purely accidental forfeiture of stock in a corporation, under one of its by-laws requiring instalments to be paid at a certain time, the master of the rolls uses language precisely adapted to the business and objects of societies organized upon the principles we are considering. He says: "It is essential that the money should be paid, and that they should know their situation. Interest is not an adequate compensation even among individuals, much less in these undertakings. In particular cases interest might be a compensation, but in a majority of cases it is no compensation from the uncertainty in which they may be left. The effect is the same whether the money has been paid or not. They know the consequence." I agree with those enlightened judges and chancellors of England, Lord Eldon, and a host of others, who have always regretted that courts of equity had ever undertaken to relieve against forfeitures and breaches of private contract. They have all admitted it to be "delicate and dangerous," and some have denounced it as "mischievous and arbitrary." See Eaton v. Lyon, 3 Ves. 693; Sanders v. Pope, 12 Ves. 291; cases of Hill v. Barclay, 16 Ves. 403, and 18 Ves. 58; Bracebridge v. Buckley, 2 Price; 206; Rolfe v. Harris, Id. 210, note; and other cases cited in 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1320, 1325. For myself, I adopt the maxim laid down by Cranch, C. J., in Lloyd v. Scott [supra], on motion for a new trial: "Every man has a right to make what contracts he pleases, if not restrained by some law; and justice and equity require that such contracts should be executed, if fairly made." I am of the opinion that upon the case made by the answer the special injunction should be refused.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge, concurred in the foregoing opinion.

DUNLOP, Chief Judge, dissented, and delivered a separate opinion as follows:

A voluntary, unincorporated association, called the Potomac Building Association, was formed in Washington in the year 1850, by the complainant and others. The constitution of the society provided that a monthly subscription of $1 should be paid by the members in respect of each share held by them until the joint contributions were of an amount to enable each member to receive $200 in respect of each share. Power was given to the society to advance to any member his share at a discount, such member paying an additional $1 monthly on each share, as aforesaid, and executing a bond and deed of trust to defendants to secure the due payment of his future subscriptions. The complainant took an advance upon his two shares at a discount of 35 per cent. per share; that is to say, on his two shares, estimated as worth $400, $140 was deducted for discount, and he received in cash from the company $260, and executed to the defendants, the trustees of the building association, the bond and deed of trust set out in the proceedings in this cause for securing the payment of the future subscriptions. The deed of trust contained no covenant for the payment of the advance. The complainant having failed to pay his dues, &c., for more than 60 days, the defendants, as trustees, advertised to sell for the amount claimed by the building association in their account filed, which is in the following terms:

Jno. Johnston, to Potomac Building Association.

Dr.

1851. May 5. To cash advanced on two shares of stock.....	$260 00
Monthly dues for two shares of stock for seven months, prior to taking advances, at $1 per share	$ 14 00
Dues from May, 1851, to Dec., 1856, five years and seven months, at $2 per month each	268 00
	<hr/>
	282 00
Fines to Dec., 1856, as per statement in detail	14 00
	<hr/>
	$556 00

Cr.

By amount of dues paid in, as per statement in detail here-with	$209 00
By estimated value of his two shares of stock, by actual sales made Dec. 1, 1856.....	200 00
	<hr/>
	409 00
Balance due by Johnston.....	$147 00

Johnston, the complainant, filed his bill in this case, charging usury in the contract, and claiming to set it aside and to avoid the deed of trust on payment of principal and interest on the advance, and for an injunction to stay the sale by the trustees. The defendants, in their answer deny usury, and assert their right to sell for the balance claimed by them in the foregoing account. The complainant was a stockholder in the company to the amount of two shares, and had signed the constitution. The shares at the winding up were to be made worth $200 each. Johnston's two shares, $400 less $140, the premium bid by him for the advance, would be worth $260 at the winding up of the association, and to be accounted for to him in his settlement with the company at that value.

The articles of the constitution of the building company, which bear on this case, are as follows: Article 2, § 3: "Each and every stockholder, for each and every share of stock that they hold in this association, shall pay the sum of $1 in bankable funds, on the first Monday of each and every month, to the treasurer, or such other person or persons as shall from time to time, by the laws or regulations of the association, be authorized to receive the same, until the value of the whole stock shall be sufficient to divide to each share of stock the sum of $200, at which time the association shall determine and close." Article 8 ("Advances") §§ 1, 2, 3, and 7: Section 1: "Every stockholder, for each share, entitled to purchase an advance of stock of $200, to be paid from the funds of the association," &c. Section 2: "When the funds of the association warrant it, one or more advances shall be disposed of by the secretary to the highest bidder, at regular meetings of stockholders, not under par," &c. Section 3: "Whenever a stockholder shall purchase an advance, he shall pay, or cause to be deducted, the premium offered by him or them for the same, and shall secure the association by bond, deed of trust, and policy of insurance, the policy to be assigned to the trustees upon the trust for such amount as the board of directors may deem sufficient to cover the amount advanced, with all fines, costs, and charges which may accrue thereon." Section 7: "Stockholders taking an advance from the funds of the association shall, from the time of purchasing such advance, pay to the treasurer $2 per month for every share of stock on which such advance may have been made, (instead of $1, as hereinbefore provided, for those who have received no advance) and if the same shall be suffered to remain unpaid more than two months, the board of directors may compel payment by ordering proceedings on the bond and deed of trust according to law."

This additional $1 per month on each share to a stockholder buying an advance is $12 per year, or 6 per cent., the legal rate of interest, valuing the share at $200, which is its computed value on the close of the concern. Johnston bought an advance on his two shares at 35 per cent. premium, received $260 in money, paid or had deducted $140 premium, gave his bond to the treasurer for $400, conditioned to pay monthly dues of $2 per share on each share, and all fines, until the value of the whole stock shall be sufficient to divide to each share of stock $200, and also a deed of trust to Messrs. Ratcliff and Clark to secure these dues and fines, &c.

The condition of the bond is worthy of special notice, and shows plainly the nature of the contract, and together with the deed of trust, makes apparent the rights of the association and the duties and obligations of the borrower, and, as I construe them, are designed to carry into effect the true meaning of the constitution of the building company. The bond of date 15th May, 1851, is in the sum of $400. The condition of the bond is in these words: "Whereas the said John Johnston, a stockholder to the extent of two shares in said association, has, by virtue of and in accordance with the provisions of the constitution and obligation attached thereto of the said association or joint-stock company, received advances from the funds of the said association, advances on said stock; now if the said John Johnston, or his heirs, executors and administrators, shall well and truly pay, or cause to be paid unto the said Ephraim Wheeler, treasurer as aforesaid, or to his successor in office, the sum of $2 on each of the shares of stock on which he has received advances as aforesaid, monthly, and every month, commencing with the first Monday in June, 1851, and continues to pay the same on the first Monday of each and every month thereafter, together with any fines and forfeitures for the non-payment of said monthly dues, as is provided in said constitution and obligation as aforesaid, until the funds of the said association shall divide to each share of stock the sum of $200, then this obligation to be void, or else to remain in full force and virtue in law." And the deed of trust to Messrs. Ratcliff and Clarke, of the date the 2nd of June, 1851, under which they now claim to sell complainant's house and lot, after reciting said bond and its condition, in substance as above set forth, and that said deed was to secure the said monthly dues, fines, and forfeitures, conveyed to them the property described in said deed upon the following trusts, that is to say: "If the said Johnston, his heirs, executors and administrators shall fail to pay the said monthly payments and the fines and forfeitures aforesaid, so that any one or more of the same shall be due and unpaid for the space of sixty days, then the said writing obligatory shall be deemed and taken as forfeited, and upon request in writing, &c., the trustees shall sell, &c., and convey to the purchaser, &c., and out of the proceeds of the sale pay first the costs and charges attending said sale; secondly, pay to the treasurer whatever sum or sums of money shall then be found due by the said John Johnston to the said association, on an account to be stated by the treasurer, in which the said Johnston shall be charged with the sum of money received by him from the said association, and the monthly payments, fines and forfeitures intended to be secured by these presents, and the said writing obligatory, and credited with the amount of dues paid by him, and the residue, if any, pay over to the said Johnston, his heirs and assigns," &c. It is evident that the account herein to be stated, and the whole terms of the bond and deed of trust contemplate Johnston, to whom the advance has been made on the two shares, as still a partner, and to continue to be so till the final close of the association, when the two shares will be of the value of $200 each, and so to be estimated in the final settlement between him and his co-partners, less the premium bid by him at the time of the advance, and it is on the assumption only that he is so to continue a partner that he can be made to pay dues up to the close of the concern, when each share is to be made of the value of $200. As such partner and contributor he is to share in the profits, present and to come, of the partnership.

The English cases referred to in the argument, clearly the transaction of usury are based upon the assumption that the party to whom the advance is made is a partner at the time of the advance and when the advance is repaid, and so a sharer in the profits then and to the close of the concern. It can in no other sense be said to be a dealing in partnership effects by the partners inter se. In the case of Silver v. Barnes, 6 Bing. N. C. 180, Tindal, C. J., says: "A motion has been made for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection, but we think the case was properly left to the jury. The question was whether the transaction was a loan of money or a dealing with the partnership. If it was a loan it was usurious. We think it was a dealing with the partnership fund, in which the defendant had an interest in common with the other members of the society, and that it was not a loan. The defendant was interested in the fund when the money was advanced and when it was repaid. The rules of the society are, in effect, a mere agreement by partners that their joint contributions shall be advanced for the use of the one or the other, as occasion requires, and the transaction in question was not a borrowing by the maker of the note from the payees. In a case before Alexander, chief baron, in the year 1828, he held an advance, from a similar society to one of its members, to be a partnership transaction and not a loan." If the partner receiving the advance is turned out of the concern and dispossessed of his profits by an arbitrary valuation of the two shares, as is claimed in the account presented with the defendants' answer, who value and take the shares to the use of the association at $100 each, when they are to be made worth $200 each, less the premium bid on them in part by the complainant's monthly contributions to the end and winding up of the association, then he is no longer a dealer in partnership effects, having a common interest with his co-partners in all profits to the close, but an outsider and a borrower of funds owned by strangers, and in that light the contract is clearly usurious. I refer to the case of Bechtold v. Brehm, 26 Pa. St. 269, decided by the supreme court of Pennsylvania in 1856.

The additional monthly payments of $12 a year on a computed $200 share, greatly exceeds the legal rate of interest on the advance of $130 on that share, deducting 35 per cent. premium bid by the complainant and retained by the association when the advance was made. If the complainant is not a partner, and is subject to be ousted before the concern closes, he is not receiving his share by anticipation; he is not a sharer of profits present and to come. In that sense, by whatever name the transaction is called, it is a mere loan of money. It is a loan at a higher rate of interest than the law allows for the forbearance or giving day of payment, and the bond and deed, to secure the repayment of the principal, in which aspect the defendants treat said bond and deed in their account rendered (as I think, wrongfully), being securities tainted with usury, are both void by the statute. I entertain some doubt whether the contracts of this building association, as to advances, even when executed in good faith, according to the terms of their written constitution, are free from usury. Some of the English cases certainly go to that extent. The doubts there have been removed by statutory provisions, which legalize these advances and provide for the imposition of fines on members for failure to pay monthly dues within prescribed limits; the legislature of that country thinking such societies of beneficial tendency, and calculated to elevate the social condition of men, having no other means than the fruits of their daily labor. Their expediency and utility is not so certain here, where any laboring man, with the high rate of wages prevailing in this country, can, with the exercise of ordinary prudence and carefulness, soon secure a homestead without involving himself in the expensive machinery of a building association, the articles of which are not easily understood by unlearned people, and very liable to be perverted to their oppression. These considerations, however, belong to the legislature, and not to the courts of justice, and if such associations are deemed beneficial, they ought to be regulated and protected by statute, as has been done, it is believed, in some of our states.

The fines which, by their constitution, the members agree to pay in default of punctuality in the monthly dues, are in the nature of forfeitures, and are, in fact, sometimes so called by the society itself. If they were called liquidated damages their nature would not be changed. All the courts in this country, as I understand Kent, Story and Marshall, both at law and in equity, are unwilling to enforce forfeitures and lean against them. In England they have been sanctioned by the statutes to which I have referred. In the absence of any statutes here, I think we ought only to enforce payment of the dues by directing our auditor to allow interest on them from the periods when they accrue and fall due. As the trustees in this case claim to sell the complainant's property upon an account stated, and for a sum not warranted by law, nor even by the constitution of the building society itself, I think the injunction ought to be granted, and to have effect till the cause is fully heard. Notes to the case.

As to fines, penalties and forfeitures, the following cases are to the point: Skinner v. Dayton, 2 Johns. Ch. 535; Livingston v. Tompkins, 4 Johns. Ch. 431; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1313-1316; Hill v. Barclay, 16 Ves. 403, 405, and 18 Ves. 58; Sparks v. Liverpool Water Works, 13 Ves. 428; Taylor v. Sandiford, 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 13; Reynolds v. Pitts, 19 Ves. 140.

JOHNSTON v. POTOMAC BLDG. ASS'N.
See Case No. 18,303.

JOHNSTON v. RATCLIFF. See Case No. 18,303.

JOSLIN (BENTLEY v.). See Case No. 18,232.

Case No. 18,304.

JUDSON v. CORCORAN et al.

[2 Hayw. & H. 146.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. 17, 1853.

ASSIGNMENT—LOSS OF CLAIM BY LACHES.

A previous assignment will not be allowed where the assignee has through laches allowed his claim to go by default, especially where he has given no notice, as required by law, to establish his claim, thereby allowing his assignor to perpetuate a fraud by reassigning the same to another.

[Bill] in equity for an injunction [by William Judson against William W. Corcoran and others and the secretary of the treasury].

The bill of complainant states that on the 1st of January, 1845, Bradford B. Williams assigned to him an interest of $6,000, of the amount of a claim pronounced valid by the American members of a mixed commission, under a convention between the United States and Mexico, of April, 1839 (8 Stat. 527), with interest from the date of the assignment, amounting in all to $7,887.50. That an award was made upon said claim by the board of commissioners under the act of March 3, 1849 (9 Stat. 393), to carry into effect certain stipulations of the treaty between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico, in favor of Wm. W. Corcoran, as assignee of Bradford B. Williams and Joseph H. Lord, for the amount of $15,051, in which amount is included the sum due to said Williams, and previously assigned to the complainant. That such assignment is null and void as against his claim, praying that defendant Corcoran be restrained from collecting, &c., the money due the complainant, and that the secretary of the treasury be enjoined from paying said reward, or so much thereof belonging to the complainant, out of the treasury of the United States.

The defendant in his answer says: That it is true that he claims to be legally and equitably entitled to receive the whole of the amount of the said award as his own. That he has no knowledge or belief that the said claimant has any right or interest therein whatsoever. That if any assignment, as charged, have been executed at any time prior to the execution of the instruments under which the respondent claims that it was without any valuable consideration, or that it was of any force, validity or effect in law or equity, to vest any right or title in the said complainant in the premises, or in any manner to affect the right and title of the respondent. That for the purpose of ascertaining whether any other person besides the assignor (Hart) of the defendant, had any interest or claim, or pretence of title in the premises, an investigation of the files and records of the department of state was had, and nothing was discovered in any degree inconsistent with the title of Hart, nor any thing which could give him any notice, knowledge or suspicion that the said complainant, or any other person or persons had or claimed any right or title or interest adverse to or in any manner affecting the title claimed by the said Hart. That he purchased from said Hart all his rights and interest therein, without any knowledge or suspicion, and without any reason to know or suspect that the said complainant, or any person other than said Hart had any right, title or interest to the said claim; that said complainant never set up or pretended any interest therein, nor gave any notice or intimation to your respondent that he claimed any such interest until after the promulgation of the judgment of the board of commissions, under the act of 30th March, 1849; that said claim was valid and allowed, thereby fraudulently withholding and concealing all knowledge or notice thereof from the respondent, and suffered the respondent to devote and expend a large amount of money, time and labor to and in the prosecution of the said claim; that he is a bona fide purchaser of the said claim, for a full and valuable consideration, without notice, knowledge or suspicion of any pretence or right or title of the complainant in the premises, and do hereby insist that even if the said complainant had any such right or title or interest therein as now pretended, in and by his said bill of complaint, he has by his laches and culpable neglect and misconduct in the premises wholly lost the right to assert and give effect to the same, as against your respondent. The respondent states in substance as follows the chain of title on which he founds his claim: On the 11th of June, 1845, Bradford B. Williams assigned one-half of his interest in the claim to E. H. Warner; August 15th, 1845, Warner assigned the same interest to Wm. B. Hart; October 15th, 1846, Williams assigned to Hart the residue of his interest; October 3d, 1846, Joseph H. Lord assigned to Hart all his interest in the claim; June 18th, 1847, Hart assigned the whole of the claim to William B. Corcoran. In conclusion the defendant prays that the said injunction be dissolved, and that he be dismissed with his reasonable costs, &c.

A. H. Lawrence and R. H. Coxe, for petitioner.

J. M. Carlisle and P. R. Fendall, for defendants.

THE COURT, on the cause being duly argued, and the various exhibits and deposition being read, dismissed the bill with costs.

On appeal to the supreme court the decree dismissing the bill was affirmed. See 17 How. [58 U. S.] 612.

JUDSON v. SECRETARY OF TREASURY.
See Case No. 18,304.

JURORS—CHARGE TO GRAND JURY IN RELATION TO THE DUTY OF JURORS. See Case No. 18,257.

¹ [Reported by John A. Hayward, Esq., and Geo. C. Hazleton, Esq.]

K.

Case No. 18,305.

KEENAN v. UNITED STATES.

[2 Hayw. & H. 341.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May 19, 1860.

RAPE—AIDING AND ABETTING.

The aiding, abetting, and assisting others to commit rape is punishable under the penitentiary act of March 2, 1831 [4 Stat. 448].

Writ of error to the criminal court.

At law. Indictment for rape, and aiding and abetting, and assisting to commit rape. The indictment consisted of two counts. The first, that Patrick Keenan, &c., did make an assault, and her, the said Laura Swingman, then and there forcibly and against her will feloniously did ravish and carnally know against, &c. The second, that the said Patrick Keenan, &c., was present aiding, abetting and assisting (certain persons mentioned) the felony and rape aforesaid to do and commit against, &c. The jury brought in a verdict of guilty on the second count.

The United States, by their attorney, prayed judgment upon the verdict. And the prisoner, by his attorneys, saith that the court ought not to proceed to render judgment because: First. It does not appear from any law in force in this District that the prisoner is punishable under the second count of the indictment, and upon which alone he was found guilty by the jury. Second. The penitentiary act of March 2, 1831 [4 Stat. 448], and under which the indictment seems to have been formed, punishes parties who commit rape and such as are accessories before the fact but is silent as to abettors of a rape. Third. There is nothing in such act, or any other act in force in this District which embraces the charge upon which the prisoner was convicted.

Daniel Ratcliff and Thomas W. Berry, for prisoner.

Robert Ould, for the United States.

On appeal to the circuit court, THE CIRCUIT COURT affirmed the judgment of the criminal court, that Patrick Keenan suffer imprisonment in the penitentiary of the District of Columbia for the period of ten years.

Case No. 18,306.

In re KELBY'S WILL.

[2 Hayw. & H. 149.]¹

Orphans' Court, District of Columbia. April 15, 1854.

NUNCUPATIVE WILL—CANNOT PASS REAL ESTATE—WITNESSES.

1. From 1676, when the act of 29 Car. II. was enacted, no nuncupative will can, under any circumstances, pass real estate.

¹ [Reported by John A. Hayward, Esq., and Geo. C. Hazleton, Esq.]

2. That by 29 Car. II. c. 3, §§ 19, 20, 22,² and the act of Maryland of 1798, c. 101, subc. 2, § 13,³ in force in this district, there must be not less than three witnesses to a nuncupative will, where the amount of personal property exceeds thirty pounds.

PURCELL, J. From the 29th of Charles II. in force in this District and the statute of Maryland of 1798, a nuncupative will, under no circumstances, can pass real estate; there must be not less than three witnesses where the amount of personal property exceeds $300. Nuncupative wills are viewed with distrust in the ecclesiastical court, and the making of one requires to be proved by evidence more strict and stringent than that of a written one, in every particular. That is requisite in consideration of the facilities with which frauds, in setting up nuncupative wills, are obviously attended; facilities

² Sec. 19. (1) And for prevention of fraudulent practices in setting up nuncupative wills, which have been the occasion of much perjury. (2) Be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, that from and after the aforesaid 24th day of June, no nuncupative will shall be good where the estate thereby bequeathed shall exceed the value of thirty pounds, that is not proved by the oaths of three witnesses* (at the least) that were present at the making thereof; (3) nor unless it be proved that the testator, at the time of pronouncing the same, did bid the persons present, or some of them, bear witness that such was his will, or to that effect; (4) nor unless such nuncupative will were made in the time of the last sickness of the deceased, and in the house of his or her habitation or dwelling, or where he or she hath been resident for the space of ten days or more next before the making of such will, except where such person was surprised or taken sick, being from his own home and died before he returned to the place of his or her dwelling.

Sec. 20. And be it further enacted that after six months passed, after the speaking of the pretended testamentary words, no testimony shall be received to prove any will nuncupative, except the said testimony, or the substance thereof, were committed to writing within six days after making of the said will.

Sec. 22. And be it further enacted, that no will in writing concerning any goods or chattels, or personal estate, shall be repealed, nor shall any clause, devise or bequest therein, be altered or changed by any words, or will by word of mouth only, except the same be in the life of the testator committed to writing, and after the writing thereof read unto the testator, and allowed by him, and proved to be so done by three witnesses at the least. 29 Car. II.; British St. at Large, 387 (A. D. 1676).

³ And no nuncupative will shall be proved within fourteen days after the death of the testator, unless his widow (if any) and some one of the next of kin have been summoned to contest the same, if they please. Section 13, subc. 2, c. 101, Act Md. 1798.

* Explained by 4 Anne, c. 16, § 14. It is here declared that all such witnesses as are and ought to be allowed to be good witnesses upon trials at law, by the laws and customs of this realm, shall be deemed good witnesses to prove any nuncupative will, or anything relating thereto (A. D. 1705).

which essentially require for their suppression the utmost vigilance on the part of the court. The testamentary capacity of the deceased, and the animus testandi at the time of the alleged nuncupation, must appear by the clearest and most indisputable testimony.

KELLY (BLOOMER v.). See Case No. 18,242.

KEYWORTH (GREENHOUGH v.). See Case No. 18,299.

KOSCIUSKO (ARMSTRONG v.). See Case No. 18,226.

L.

Case No. 18,307.

Case of LANGE.

[13 Blatchf. (1877) 546.]¹

Supreme Court of New York, General Term.

FALSE IMPRISONMENT—ILLEGAL SENTENCE—PERSONAL LIABILITY OF JUDGE.

[1. Where a sentence imposed by a district court is held illegal by the supreme court of the United States on a writ of habeas corpus, but by a divided court, and only after a most thorough investigation into the state of the law upon the subject, it cannot be said that the act of imposing the sentence did not require the exercise of judicial functions, or that the propriety of the sentence was not, at least, doubtful. Under such circumstances, therefore, the judge cannot be held civilly liable for inflicting an unlawful imprisonment.]

[2. When a party has been brought before a court of justice in a legal manner, and circumstances are presented requiring a decision to be made, the tribunal making it cannot be deprived of protection from personal liability therefor because it may afterwards, upon fuller investigation, turn out to have been erroneous. This is especially true where the action of the judge is in accordance with a previous decision of an appellate tribunal from which he is bound to receive the law, and his actions were subsequently held illegal only by a decision of that tribunal which modifies or limits such previous decision.]

Action by Edward Lange against ———
Benedict for false imprisonment.

Edward Lange was indicted in the circuit court of the United States for the Southern district of New York, for stealing mail bags belonging to the post office department of the United States, under section 290 of the act of June 8, 1872 (17 Stat. 320), which provided as follows: "Any person who shall steal, purloin, or embezzle, any mail bag, or other property in use by, or belonging to, the post office department, or who shall, for any lucre, gain or convenience, appropriate any such property to his own or any other than its proper use, or who shall, for any lucre or gain, convey away any such property, to the hindrance or detriment of the public service, every such person, his aiders, abettors and counsellors, shall, if the value of the property be twenty-five dollars, or more, be deemed guilty of felony, and, on conviction thereof, for every such offence, shall be imprisoned not exceeding three years; and, if the value of the property be less than twenty-five dollars, the party offending shall be imprisoned not more than one year, or be fined not less than ten nor more than two hundred dollars." The indictment contained twelve counts, and charged three different offences. Upon a trial, at the October term, 1873, before the honorable Charles L. Benedict and a jury, he was convicted. The verdict rendered was a general verdict of guilty. Thereupon, on November 3d, 1873, he was sentenced to be imprisoned for the term of one year, and to pay a fine of $200. Thereafter, and at the same term, he procured a writ of habeas corpus, and, upon the return thereof to the circuit court, held by Benedict, District Judge, showed to the court that $200 had been deposited with the assistant treasurer of the United States, at the city of New York, to the credit of the treasurer of the United States, as the fine imposed by such sentence, and claimed to be discharged from imprisonment upon the ground that the fine had been paid, and that he was, therefore, not liable to be imprisoned, inasmuch as the statute aforesaid, creating the offence, did not warrant a sentence of both fine and imprisonment. The court held that the facts shown did not entitle the defendant to be released, and the writ was dismissed. After that, and on the 8th of November, 1873, at the same term, the court, still held by Benedict, District Judge, directed that the sentence pronounced on the 3d day of November be vacated and set aside, and thereupon proceeded to pass judgment anew, and sentenced the defendant to be imprisoned for the term of one year. A second writ of habeas corpus was then applied for, and, a hearing being had before Woodruff, Circuit Judge, and Benedict and Blatchford, District Judges, holding the circuit court, under section 2 of the act of February 7, 1873 (17 Stat. 422), the application for the writ was refused. Subsequently, a third writ of habeas corpus was issued by the supreme court of the United States, and the prisoner was released by that court. The opinion of the court, delivered by Mr. Justice Miller, is reported in 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 163. Mr. Justice Clifford and Mr. Justice Strong dissented, and the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Clifford is reported at page 173. After the release of the defendant he brought a suit against Judge Benedict, in the supreme court of the state of New York, to recover damages for false imprisonment. The imprisonment set forth as the cause of action was that resulting from the sentence pronounced November 8th, 1873. In that suit, upon a demurrer to the complaint, the special term, (Van Brunt, J.,) overruled the demurrer. The general term, in October, 1876, (Davis, Brady and Daniels, JJ.,) upon appeal, reversed the order of the special term, and dismissed the complaint. An appeal to the court of appeals was taken by the plaintiff.

The case was argued before the general term by Benjamin F. Tracy, Esq., on behalf of Judge Benedict, and the points taken by him were as follows:

I. The complaint shows the plaintiff charged with several offences against the United States, and his conviction of all the offences charged. The conviction is conceded to have been lawful. Upon such conviction the plaintiff became liable to the punishment imposed upon him by either or by both the sentences set forth in the complaint. There was, therefore, no false imprisonment.

¹ [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

(1) The indictment set forth in the complaint, on its face, shows to this court that the plaintiff was not put on trial for a single transaction. The indictment necessarily covers three separate and distinct offences, committed on different days and in respect to different lots of mail bags. These charges against the plaintiff were required by statute to be joined in one indictment. Section 1024 of the United States Revised Statutes, provides as follows: "When there are several charges against any person for the same act or transaction, or for two or more acts or transactions connected together, or for two or more acts or transactions of the same class of crimes or offences, which may be properly joined, instead of having several indictments, the whole may be joined in one indictment, in separate counts; and, if two or more indictments are found in such cases, the court may order them to be consolidated." So far as is known, under this statute, it has been the constant practice, in courts of the United States, to include several offences in a single indictment, and, upon a conviction, to inflict punishment for each offence.² There can be no doubt that this statute is applicable to the plaintiff's case, and it was, therefore, charged in the indictment, that the defendant, at the various times stated in the several counts, stole and appropriated to his own use the mail bags described. Conceding that the same transaction is charged in different forms in the 1st, 3d, 5th, 8th, 10th and 12th counts, and conceding, also, that but one other offence or transaction is charged in the 2d, 4th, 6th and 11th counts, there can be no doubt that the 7th count charges an offence separate and distinct from that charged in any other count of the indictment. The 9th count was quashed. There were, then, three separate and distinct offences charged. The plaintiff was, therefore, convicted of at least three distinct and separate offences, and could be lawfully sentenced for them all. Otherwise, his conviction upon different offences required by statute to be joined, would work an acquittal of all but one.

(2) No objection arises from the form of the verdict. The verdict was a general verdict of guilty. Such a verdict is a conviction upon every count in the indictment. It is not necessary to designate the counts in a verdict. A general verdict may always be rendered, which in law attaches to each count in the indictment. Such is the established effect of a general verdict of guilty; and this effect is the foundation of the rule, that, when some counts are bad, a general verdict of guilty is supported by one good count. In the indictment against the plaintiff all the counts, except the 9th, are good. If the verdict rendered against the plaintiff does not in law attach to each count in the indictment, to which of the counts is it to be attached, and by whom? Certainly this court cannot attach the verdict to any particular count, or to any set of counts; nor can it say, as matter of law, that the plaintiff was not found guilty of every offence set forth in the indictment. It is settled law, in this state, that a general verdict of guilty, rendered upon an indictment containing several counts, convicts the accused upon every count in the indictment (People v. Davis, 56 N. Y. 100), and the defendant may be sentenced on all counts that are valid (Com. v. Birdsall, 69 Pa. St. 482).

(3) The sentence may be general and need not specify any particular count. It is for the court that tried the cause to say, upon such a conviction, on how many counts of the indictment sentence shall be passed. When the sentence imposes a greater punishment than is prescribed by law for a single offence, it is presumed that the judge who tried the cause intended to sentence him on more than one count of the indictment. This precise question came before the supreme court of Massachusetts, in two different cases, at the same term. In Carlton v. Com., 5 Mete. (Mass.) 532, there were two counts in the indictment, charging separate offences. The judgment sentenced the prisoner to one day's solitary imprisonment, and confinement afterwards at hard labor, for the term of five years, in the state prison. The offence charged in the first count was punishable "by imprisonment in the state prison not more than five years." It was assigned for error that "said judgment is excessive and illegal, in the matter of the one day's solitary imprisonment;" and it was contended that the judgment was erroneous because distinct offences ought not to be included in the same indictment, and because, if they could be so included, there should have been separate sentences. The court held that two distinct offences could be included in the indictment, and affirmed the judgment, saying, (Shaw, C. J.): "We are of opinion that it is not necessary, in such cases, to award separate sentences, when they are so far alike that the whole of the judgment is but the sum of the several sentences to which the convict is liable." See, also, Booth v. Com., Id. 535; U. S. v. Boverman [supra]. "Judgment is continually passed upon a record containing many counts, without adverting to any count in particular." O'Connell's Case, Parke, Baron, 11 Clark & F. 301. "In criminal cases, where each count is, as it were, a separate indictment, one count not having been disposed of no more affects the proceedings with an error than if it were two indictments." Latham v. Reg., 5 Best & S. 641.

(4) There is nothing in the language of the statute creating the offences in question, to prevent a conviction and sentence for separate and distinct offences committed on different days and with respect to different articles. If it be suggested that the statement added to the verdict, "and the value of the bags to be less than twenty-five dollars," confines the verdict to a single count, the question again arises—to which count is it confined? This statement, if it be considered a portion of the verdict, must, like the rest of the verdict, be presumed to refer to each charge, and attaches to each count. If it be considered as giving the aggregate value of all the mail bags taken, the result is the same for some parts, and it is wholly immaterial what part is to be deemed applicable to each count. But, the statement in respect to value forms no part of the verdict. The statute under which the plaintiff was indicted does not make the nature of the offence depend upon the value of the property taken. In a prosecution under this statute, value becomes important only when necessary to justify an imprisonment exceeding one year. Imprisonment for one year may be imposed without regard to the value of the property. In criminal cases, as distinguished from civil cases, the court, and not the jury, determines the kind and the amount of the judgment; and the statement of value, in question, should be considered as a statement made simply for the information of the court in passing sentence. It is analogous to the statement that the accused is under 18 years of age, a fact which, in some cases, changes entirely the character of the punishment to be imposed.

² U. S. v. Mills [Case No. 15,777], Massachusetts district. The case was tried before Shepley, Circuit Judge. The indictment contained sixty-nine counts. The defendant was convicted on seven counts, for seven different transactions. Sentence was passed imposing a fine of $3,000 for each offence, in all, $21,000. U. S. v. Crane [Id. 14,886]. Vermont district, March, 1875, before Shipman, District Judge. Two separate indictments were found by the grand jury, one for embezzlement, the other for making a false entry. The court ordered the indictments to be consolidated. The defendant thereafter pleaded guilty, and was sentenced to pay $1,000 and be imprisoned one year for one offence, and, for the other offence, to pay $1,000 and be imprisoned one year after the expiration of the imprisonment first imposed. U. S. v. Eckel [Id. 15,022], Southern district of New York, before Blatchford, District Judge, January 25th, 1869. Indictment contained eight counts. Conviction on six counts. Sentence as follows: "Alyah Blaisdell, upon the first count of the indictment, to be imprisoned in the state prison at Sing Sing for the period of three years, and judgment and sentence suspended upon the 2d, 4th, 5th, 6th, and 8th counts of the indictment, until after the full execution of this judgment." In De Puy [Id. 3,814], Southern district of New York, before Blatchford, District Judge. The prisoner, in this case, being convicted of two offences on one indictment, was sentenced, for one offence, to be imprisoned one year and pay a fine, and, for another offence, to pay a fine and be imprisoned for six months, this imprisonment to commence on the termination of the imprisonment first imposed. Great efforts were made to secure from Judge Blatchford a release of the prisoner by habeas corpus, but the legality of the sentence was not questioned and the discharge was refused. U. S. v. Boverman [Id. 14,630], Maryland district, before Giles, District Judge. An indictment against a deputy collector for embezzlement. There were five counts. The court directed the jury to acquit on the 5th count. The verdict was guilty on the first count as to $1,120; on the second count as to $996.72; on the third count as to $50; on the fourth count as to $180; on the fifth count, not guilty. Sentence as follows: "Sentenced by the court to pay a fine of $2,346.72 and costs, and to be imprisoned in the jail of Baltimore city for the term of four years."

(5) The circumstance that the first sentence, which inflicted punishment for two offences, was vacated, and thereafter a sentence pronounced which inflicted the punishment prescribed for a single offence, does not tend to show that the plaintiff was not liable to the punishment imposed by the first sentence; while the fact that, upon the return of the first habeas corpus, the court dismissed the writ before vacating the judgment, shows that the court adjudged the first sentence to be lawful. Reasons for vacating the first sentence, in no way connected with the idea of illegality, can easily be suggested. Such action is not infrequent in inflicting punishments for crime.

(6) There being three distinct offences charged in the indictment, and the punishment imposed by the sentences pronounced being lawful punishment for these offences, the presumption must be that these punishments were imposed for three offences proved; in which case, there was no false imprisonment.

(7) The sentences pronounced upon the plaintiff are in no way affected by the time of rendition. Being pronounced at the same term, they were in law pronounced upon the same day. No statute of the United States fixes the time within which sentence is to be pronounced. Unquestionably, it would have been lawful to have detained the plaintiff in prison, after conviction, until the last day of term, and then to have sentenced him to one year's imprisonment for every offence for which he stood convicted.

The reasons above stated are sufficient to show that this case, as it stands before this court, affords no room to assert the proposition that the second sentence of the prisoner was unlawful because "it was an attempt to enforce a judgment which the judge knew to have been satisfied." Van Brunt, J. None of the foregoing points were considered or passed on at the special term, Judge Van Brunt being of the opinion that it would not be decorous in him to declare an imprisonment lawful, from which the supreme court of the United States had released the prisoner upon habeas corpus. But good law is always decorous. This defendant is not bound by a judgment to which he was no party, nor can he be adjudged liable in this action upon ideas of decorum. Respectful consideration will, of course, be given to the opinion delivered by the supreme court upon discharging the plaintiff from imprisonment, but it does not conclude this court, nor prevent due effect being given here to the point now made. Certainly, no breach of decorum can be charged upon this court if it adopts, from the opinion of the supreme court in Ex parte Lange, the language used by that court in regard to a decision of its own (see point VII., below), found standing in the way of what the dissenting opinion designates as "a pre-determined unsound judicial conclusion." Opinion of Clifford, Circuit Justice, Ex parte Lange, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 201. This court, therefore, may well say, in respect to the discharge of the plaintiff upon habeas corpus, that, "in general terms, without much consideration," the supreme court declared the plaintiff not liable to the punishment inflicted upon him. If it was intended to raise the question whether the plaintiff was not under conviction for several offences and liable to be punished for each offence, "that point was not presented so as to receive the attention of the court, and certainly was not considered or decided." Opinion of the Court, Ex parte Lange, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 167.

II. If the record can be held to show a conviction of only one offence, then the first sentence was a nullity; in which case, the second sentence was, of course, lawful.

(1) It does not follow, says the supreme court of the United States (opinion, Ex parte Lange, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 176), because the court had jurisdiction of the person of the prisoner and of the offence, that these two facts make valid, however erroneous it may be, any judgment the court may render in such case. On an indictment for libel, a judgment of death or confiscation of property would be void.

(2) If the first sentence be deemed a sentence for a single offence, then it inflicts a punishment not authorized by law; and, whether void or voidable, the error affects equally each part of the sentence. How can it here be said, that that portion of the sentence which imposes the fine is valid, while that which inflicts the imprisonment is invalid? And how can it be left to the prisoner to determine for himself which part shall become valid and which remain invalid? The sentence is an entirety, and must stand or fall as a whole, unaffected by the subsequent action of the prisoner. It cannot be avoided in part and affirmed in part, and that by the prisoner instead of the court.

III. This is an action for false imprisonment. The imprisonment complained of is from the 8th of November, 1873, to the 29th of January, 1874. This period is embraced within the term of imprisonment as fixed by both sentences. The first sentence, therefore, if not vacated, renders the imprisonment lawful. The first sentence was vacated, or it was not. If, as the plaintiff contends, the first sentence was valid and beyond the power of the court to vacate it, then that sentence stands as the sentence of the circuit court; and, whether justified by the conviction or not, it subjected the plaintiff to imprisonment for one year. Consequently, there could be no false imprisonment by reason of the second sentence, inasmuch as, during the period of his imprisonment, the plaintiff was within the scope of the first sentence as well, and subject thereto. In order to maintain this action, therefore, it must be conceded by the plaintiff that the first sentence was lawfully vacated.

IV. The first sentence was vacated. That sentence having been expunged from the record, the second sentence, when pronounced, was the only sentence. The record, therefore, shows to this court a lawful conviction, and a sentence pronounced at the same term, imposing a punishment lawful for a single offence. It is by this record that the plaintiff's case must stand or fall, and the record shows the imprisonment complained of to have been lawful.

(1) The first sentence, whether incomplete, or irregular, or void, was within the control of the court during the entire term, and might be vacated or modified for any error or irregularity therein, and a new sentence be pronounced in conformity with the law. Writs of error, in criminal cases, are not allowed in the courts of the United States, but such courts are authorized, by statute, to grant new trials for reasons for which new trials have usually been granted in the courts of law. The power to vacate a sentence is implied in the power to grant a new trial, and is necessary to the proper administration of justice. Suppose gross misconduct on the part of the jury should be discovered the day after sentence—does the fact that sentence has been pronounced deprive the court of the power to set aside or vacate the judgment, that it may grant a new trial? "It is, also, equally well settled, that the power of a court over its judgments, to set aside, modify or annul, is unlimited during the entire term at which such judgments are rendered." Union Trust Co. v. Rockford R. R. Co. [Case No. 14,401], Blodgett and Drummond, District Judges. "The court certainly had full power to amend their records, and are the sole judges of the correctness of the entries made therein." Sheppard v. Wilson, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 277. See, also, Doss v. Tyack, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 312. As no writ of error is allowed in the courts of the United States, in criminal cases, to hold that such courts have not the power to vacate a sentence would often deprive the accused of all power to vindicate his innocence.

(2) The first sentence was imperfect and incomplete. It was necessary that it be perfected or vacated, and it was, therefore, not only competent for the court, but incumbent upon it, to perfect or to vacate the sentence, as advised. It contained no directions to docket judgment for the fine, nor any order for execution, and there was no order to stand committed until the fine be paid. So far as the fine was concerned, the sentence was wholly ineffective, as it stood, for want of an "award of the proper process to carry into effect the sentence of the court." Kane v. People, 8 Wend. 215. Fines imposed by the courts of the United States are to be docketed as judgments and collected by execution, as in civil cases. Payments may also be enforced by imprisonment, when so ordered by the court.³ Here, no commitment was ever directed or issued.

V. The exercise of the power to vacate a sentence, in cases where the sentence is in part executed, does not violate the constitutional provision which forbids that one shall be twice punished for the same offence.

(1) The application of the constitutional principle relied upon by the plaintiff was rejected by the supreme court in the plaintiff's case, where the court declares, that it is not necessary to say, that, "when a party has had a fair trial before a competent court and jury, and has been convicted, any excess of punishment deprives him of liberty or property without due course of law." 13 Wall. [35 U. S.] 170. It was also considered and rejected by the court of appeals of New York, in Ratzky v. People, 29 N. Y. 124. There, a sentence, passed upon a good conviction, and when in part executed, was set aside as unlawful, whereupon the power to pass a new sentence was questioned, and the constitutional protection was invoked. The power to sentence anew was upheld. Denio, C.

³ "In all criminal or penal causes in which judgment or sentence has been or shall be rendered, imposing the payment of a fine or penalty, whether alone or with any other kind of punishment, the said judgment, so far as the fine or penalty is concerned, may be enforced by execution against the property of the defendant, in like manner as judgments in civil cases are enforced: Provided, that, where the judgment directs that the defendant shall be imprisoned until the fine or penalty imposed is paid, the issue of execution on the judgment shall not operate to discharge the defendant from imprisonment until the amount of the judgment is collected or otherwise paid." Act June 1, 1872 (17 Stat. 193, § 12); Rev. St. U. S. § 1041.

J., says (page 135): "The case is not within the constitutional provision which forbids a person being twice put in jeopardy for the same offence. A person is said to be put in jeopardy only when he is a second time tried upon a criminal accusation; but, the term has no relation to the reversal of an erroneous judgment and pronouncing a legal one, pursuant to one legal conviction." So, in the case of Foote v. People, 56 N. Y. 321, where the court below pronounced a sentence for a fine and ninety days' imprisonment, which, on appeal, was declared illegal, the court of appeals directed a new punishment to be imposed. In Harris v. People, 59 N. Y. 599, the defendant was convicted upon an indictment supposed to charge burglary in the second degree, and was sentenced to be imprisoned in the state prison, at hard labor, for the term of seven years and six months. It was held by the court of appeals, that the charge in the indictment was burglary in the third degree, and, consequently, that the punishment imposed was greater than that fixed by law for the offence charged. The court thereupon affirmed the conviction and remanded the case to the court below, with directions that the proper sentence be imposed.

(2) No sound distinction can be made between the plaintiff's case and other cases of sentences partly executed, by declaring that the payment of the fine expiated his crime, because it was a suffering of "one of the alternative punishments to which alone the law subjected him." There is no such thing as an "alternative punishment." The statute makes none, and this sentence made none. The conviction of the plaintiff rendered him subject to such punishment as should be fixed by the court. The statute creating the offence does not fix the punishment, much less an "alternative punishment;" nor does it declare that suffering a fine shall expiate this crime. The statute simply limits the power of the court to certain kinds of punishments and within certain bounds as to extent. What would expiate the crime, in this case, rested in the conscience of the court, and is only shown by the sentence of the court in the case. The only punishment to which the plaintiff ever became subject, must, therefore, be found in the sentences pronounced upon him; and the punishments there imposed he has never suffered.

(3) A sentence is a judgment of the court, but the judgment in a criminal case differs from the judgment in a civil case, in that it must contain a determination in respect to the kind as well as the amount of punishment, made not by the jury, nor by the convict, but by the court. It sounds strange to say that, when a court, in pronouncing sentence, leaves unperformed the duty imposed upon it by the statute, of selecting between two kinds of punishments, then the convict may determine that question himself, and, by electing to be punished by fine, deprive the court of all power to proceed further in the premises. The picture of a person whipped in pursuance of an erroneous sentence, has been alluded to with feeling, to show the necessity for a restriction of the power of courts. But there must be power somewhere. The court of appeals has power, by statute, in case of reversal, to direct as to the sentence to be imposed, and whipping might appear in a sentence so directed. Prisoners convicted of crime may escape just punishment, by means of the writ of habeas corpus. But such suggestions afford slim reason for an abrogation of the statute, in the one case, or the denial of the power to discharge upon habeas corpus, in the other.

VI. The proposition that the second sentence imposed upon the plaintiff was void, is made to depend upon the fact that the fine which formed a part of the first sentence had been paid. Payment of the fine has, it is said, expiated the crime. But, the fine was never paid. This appears by the complaint; and it was also apparent at the passing of the second sentence. The facts relied on to show payment of the fine are set forth in the complaint. They show, on the contrary, that no legal payment of the fine was ever made. The facts stated are as follows: The first sentence was on November 3d. On November 4th, two hundred dollars was handed to the clerk, and retained by him until November 7th, when it was deposited with the assistant treasurer, "to the credit of the treasurer of the United States;" and, on the same day, the plaintiff obtained the first writ of habeas corpus, returnable November 8th, upon the return of which writ, the deposit made the day previous with the assistant treasurer was proved on the part of the petitioner, as ground for his discharge.

(1) The defendant was in the custody of the marshal. In order to pay the fine he must either pay the money to the marshal, directly, or obtain leave to pay the money into court, and, upon such payment, obtain an order of the court directed to the marshal, authorizing his release. The plaintiff pursued neither of these courses, but caused $200 to be deposited with the assistant treasurer, to the credit of the treasurer of the United States. It is true, that the clerk gave a receipt stating that the money was in the registry of the court on November 4th, but the receipt of November 7th shows that the money remained on that day undeposited in the registry. It was never deposited to the credit of the court, as required by law,⁴ but, on November 7th, was still subject to the control of the plaintiff who, on that day, caused it to be deposited with the assistant treasurer. The clerk had no authority so to deposit it in behalf of the court. Such a deposit was, indeed, contrary to law; and the clerk, in making it, must be deemed to have acted as the agent of the plaintiff. The plaintiff, in his application for discharge on the first habeas corpus, made such deposit to appear, and thus shows that he relied on that deposit as his payment of the fine. The records of the circuit court, in the case of the plaintiff⁵ show, also, to this court that no money was ever paid into court by the plaintiff.

(2) The $200 was never intended to be paid into court. On the contrary, it was deposited in Wall street, without the knowledge of the court, in order to place it beyond the reach of the court. If this money had been paid into court, by the rules and by statute it would have been deposited in the Central National Bank, in the name and to the credit of the court, to be drawn therefrom only upon a check showing upon its face the order of the court so to draw it, and bearing the signature of the judge.⁶ If so paid, it would have been within the power of the court to direct its return, by the clerk, to the person from whom he received it. It was not so paid, but was deposited to the credit of the treasurer of the United States, in order to prevent the possibility of a direction to return it.

(3) Money cannot be paid into court without leave of the court. No permission or direction to pay this money into court was ever given, and none is averred. The clerk is but the amanuensis of the court. He acts only by rule or direction of the court, and he cannot bind the court except as directed. A court is not, at the option of any one, to be made responsible for the custody and disposition of money, simply by the fact that a clerk may be willing to receive it. "The clerk had no right to receive the money without a rule of the court." Baker v. Hunt, 1 Wend. 103. The case is not that of an ordinary judgment regularly entered and an execution issued directing money to be made and returned to the court.

(4) The deposit of the money with the assistant treasurer cannot be relied upon as showing a payment of the fine to the United States. A payment of money, to be effective as a payment to the United States, must be made in the mode required by law. The delivery of money to the president, the secretary of the treasury, or the treasurer of the United States, amounts to nothing, unless authorized by some statute. The fine in question was imposed for the violation of a postal law. By statute, the money belonged to the post office department, as part of the postal revenue, and was to be deposited "for the use of the post office department." Rev. St. U. S. § 4059. "Unclaimed money in dead letters for which no owner can be found; all money taken from the mail by robbery, theft, or otherwise, which may come into the hands of any agent or employee of the United States, or any person whatever; all fines and penalties imposed for any violation of the postal laws, except such part as may by law belong to the informer or party prosecuting for the same; and all money derived from the sale of waste paper or other public property of the post office department, shall be deposited in the treasury, under the direction of the postmaster general, as part of the postal revenue." Act June 8, 1872 (17 Stat. 290, § 42); Rev. St. U. S. § 4050. In order to effect a payment to the United States of the fine in question, the money must go to the postmaster general to be deposited, under the direction of the postmaster general, in the treasury of the United States "to the use of the post office department." When so deposit-

⁴ "Section 1. That all moneys in the registry of any court of the United States, or in the hands or under the control of any officer of such court, which were received in any cause pending or adjudicated in such court, shall within thirty days after the passage of this act, be deposited with the treasurer, an assistant treasurer, or a designated depository, of the United States, in the name and to the credit of such court. And all such moneys which are hereafter paid into such courts, or received by the officers thereof, shall be forthwith deposited in like manner: Provided, that nothing herein shall be construed to prevent the delivery of any such money upon security according to agreement of parties, under the direction of the court. Section 2. That no money deposited as aforesaid shall be withdrawn except by order of the judge or judges of said courts, respectively, in term or in vacation, to be signed by such judge or judges and to be entered and certified of record by the clerk; and every such order shall state the cause in or on account of which it is drawn." Act of March 24, 1871 (17 Stat. 1, §§ 1, 2); Rev. St. U. S. §§ 995, 996.

⁵ "The United States vs. Edward Lange. For stealing and embezzling mail bags. 1873. Oct. 7. Filed bill of indictment. Oct. 8. Arraigned. Plea—not guilty. Oct. 15. Motion to quash eighth, ninth, and eleventh counts of indictment. Ninth count quashed. Other counts stand. Trial commenced. Oct. 23. Trial concluded. Verdict—guilty; and the value of the property to be less than $25. Nov. 3. The prisoner, Edward Lange, is sentenced to one year's imprisonment, and to pay a fine of $200. Nov. 7. Filed petition for habeas corpus. Nov. 7. Issued writ of habeas corpus. Nov. 8. Writ discharged. Nov. 8. Sentence pronounced Nov. 3d, 1873, vacated and set aside, and the prisoner sentenced to one year's imprisonment."

⁶ "At a stated term of the circuit court of the United States of America, for the Southern district of New York, in the Second circuit, held at the United States court rooms in the city of New York, on Monday, the fifth day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-one: Present—The Hon. Lewis B. Woodruff, Circuit Judge. In the matter of the deposit of moneys in the registry of the court. In obedience to an act of congress entitled 'An act relating to moneys paid into the courts of the United States, approved March 24th, 1871,' it is ordered, that all moneys in the registry of this court, or in the hands or under the control of any officer of this court, which were received in any cause pending or adjudicated in this court, be forthwith deposited in the Central National Bank of the city of New York, a designated depository of the United States, in the name and to the credit of this court; and that all such moneys, which shall hereafter be paid into this court, or received by the officers thereof, shall be forthwith deposited in like manner: Provided, that nothing herein shall be construed to prevent the delivery of any such money upon security, according to agreement of parties, under the direction of this court."

ed it would form part of account No. 7, "Fines and Penalties" (Rev. St. U. S. § 4049), and be available to the post office department as a part of the postal revenue; otherwise, not. Had it been paid into court, it would have been accounted for to the post office department. It would have been deposited in the Central National Bank, in the name and to the credit of the court, whence it would have been drawn under the order of the court for payment to the postmaster general, or, under his direction, into the treasury, to the credit of the post office department. What the plaintiff did was, to deposit two hundred dollars with the assistant treasurer, to the credit of the treasurer of the United States. So deposited, the money can never reach the post office department. Like "conscience money," it passed to the credit of the treasurer of the United States, but it balanced no account and discharged no debt.

(5) A sentence of the character of the first sentence passed upon the plaintiff, when made perfect, would assume the form of a judgment against the plaintiff for two hundred dollars, to be collected by the marshal upon execution; and the money, when received by the marshal, would be returned with the execution to the court, to be disposed of by the court in the manner before stated. The payment made by the plaintiff must, therefore, be deemed a voluntary payment. It was not made in pursuance of the sentence, and had no effect. The case, therefore, in every aspect, shows that the plaintiff has never expiated the crimes of which he stands convicted.

VII. So far as the liability of the defendant is concerned, the legality of his acts must be determined by the law as it then stood declared. According to that law, as declared by the supreme court of the United States, the legality of the second sentence would not be affected by the fact that a previous valid sentence, under which the accused had suffered punishment, had been made and set aside.

In Basset v. U. S., 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 38, it was decided, that it is competent for a court, for good cause, to set aside, at the same term at which it was rendered, a judgment of conviction, though the defendant had entered upon the imprisonment ordered by the sentence. The same court that discharged Lange on habeas corpus, in 1874, declared, in Basset's Case, in 1869, that "this control of the court over its own judgment, during the term, is of every day practice." This language was used by the supreme court, in a case where, in execution of the sentence, the defendant was taken to prison and imprisoned several days, and then, on habeas corpus, issued on motion of the district attorney, brought from the prison into court, and then, likewise on motion of the district attorney, the judgment was vacated and set aside. The defendant then withdrew his plea of guilty and gave a recognizance for his appearance for trial at a future term of the court. Failing to appear for trial in pursuance of his recognizance, an action was brought against the sureties upon the bond. To this action the sureties answered, in substance, that, Basset having been once tried, convicted, and sentenced to imprisonment on the indictment, and having been taken in execution of such sentence and imprisoned, such imprisonment was an expiation of the offence, and that the action of the court in holding him to bail to again answer upon the same indictment was in excess of the power of the court, and was illegal and void. This case is directly in point, and is so conceded to be by the supreme court in Ex parte Lange. It furnished, then, the law binding upon the circuit court of the United States at the time Lange was sentenced. It is, indeed, now said by the supreme court, that the decision in Basset's Case was made "in general terms, without much consideration, for no counsel appeared for the sureties," and that, for that reason, it is now to be disregarded. But, how could the defendant know that a case which the supreme court of the United States had decided and caused to be reported as an authority, had not received the attention of the court, and that the court had not considered what it had decided? He was bound to take the law as he found it declared; and, in sentencing Lange, the circuit court exercised precisely the same power exercised in Basset's Case, and approved by the supreme court. What was lawful for the court to do in Basset's Case, was lawful for the court to do in the plaintiff's case. It is, indeed, true, that what in Basset's Case was declared to be lawful, has since, in Lange's Case, been declared unlawful. But, the defendant is to be judged by the law in force at the time he acted. For the future, the later decision may furnish the rule in courts of the United States, unless, on some other day, the supreme court should say that, having been decided without much consideration, for no counsel appeared for the judge, it is to be disregarded.

It has now been shown that neither the first sentence, nor the second sentence, nor both together, imposed upon the plaintiff a greater punishment than the law allowed. It has also been shown, that the first sentence was lawfully vacated, and that the record shows but a single sentence, imposing lawful punishment for a single offence. It has also been shown, that, by the law as it was at the time, and as it now is, except as modified by the decision in Ex parte Lange, the first sentence having been set aside on objection taken by the accused, no previous payment of the fine, if made, would deprive the court of power to proceed in the cause, and to sentence anew. It has also been shown, that the fine was never paid. It is submitted, that, under the circumstances, the defendant is entitled to a determination of these questions at the hands of this court, notwithstanding it be plain that, for other reasons, the action cannot be maintained.

VIII. The act of the defendant, in pronouncing the judgment of the circuit court of the United States, upon the conviction of the plaintiff then standing on the records of the court, was a judicial act, and affords no right of action against the judge who happened to be holding the court. Neither malice nor corruption is here charged or suggested.

(1) Suits have frequently been brought against judges, and, whether maintainable or not, will continue to be brought from motives more or less creditable to the promoters thereof. They do not call for any stretching of the law in order to uphold them. Says Hale, C. J.: "I speak my mind plainly. Habeas corpus, although it doth make void the judgment, it doth not make the awarding of the process void to that purpose; and the matter was done in a course of justice. They will have but a cold business of it." Bushell's Case, 1 Mod. 119.

(2) As early as in the reign of Charles II. it was held by the court of king's bench, that an action will not lie against a magistrate for false imprisonment in consequence of acts done by him in the character of a judge. That rule has never been departed from by the English courts. Hawkins says (book 1, c. 72, § 6): "The law has freed the judges of all courts of record from all prosecutions whatsoever, except in the parliament, for anything done by them openly in such courts, as judges. For, the authority of a government cannot be maintained unless the greatest credit be given to those who are so highly intrusted with the administration of public justice; and it would be impossible for them to keep up in the people that veneration of their persons and submission to their judgments, without which it is impossible to execute the laws with vigor and success, if they should be continually exposed to the prosecutions of those whose partiality to their own causes would induce them to think themselves injured." This principle was asserted as early as the Book of Assize (27 Edw. III. pl. 18), where A. was indicted, for that, being a judge of oyer and terminer certain persons were indicted before him of trespass, and he had entered upon the record that they were indicted of felony, and judgment was demanded if he should answer for falsifying the record, since he was a judge by commission; and all the judges were of opinion that the presentment was void. The same protection was, at this early period, extended equally to grand jurors. In 21 Edw. III. Hil. pl. 16, a writ of conspiracy was sued in king's bench, and the question was, whether it would be a good plea to the action, that the defendants were indictors in the case complained of; and it was held to be a good plea. Staunford, in his Pleas of the Crown, first published in 1567, says (page 173) that no prosecution for conspiracy lies against grand jurors, for it shall not be intended that what they did by virtue of their office was false and malicious; and that the same law applied to a justice of the peace, for he shall not be punished as a conspirator for what he does in open session, as a justice. In Floyd v. Barker, 12 Coke, 23, the subject was considered by Lord Coke and all the judges, and they resolved, that no grand juror was responsible for finding an indictment, and that no judge, who tries and gives judgment in a criminal case, or does any act in court, shall be questioned for it at the suit of the party against whom judgment was given. And it was observed, that, if the judges of the realm, who have the administration of justice, were to be drawn into question, except it be before the king himself, it would tend to the slander of justice, and those who are the most sincere would not be free from continual calumniation. In Aire v. Sedgwick, 2 Rolle, 199, Noy, Judge, said that "no action lay against a judge for anything which he did as judge." But, the case of Hamond v. Howell, 1 Mod. 184, 2 Mod. 218, is directly in point. The defendant was a recorder of London, and, as one of the judges of oyer and terminer, had fined and imprisoned the plaintiff because he brought in a verdict, as petit juror, contrary to the direction of the court and the evidence. This case was brought after the Case of Bushell, who was another juror fined with the plaintiff for the same cause, and who had been discharged on habeas corpus, upon the ground that his imprisonment was illegal and a usurpation. The act of the judge was admitted to be illegal and void, and the effort was made to except the case from the general principle, by arguing that what the defendant did was not warranted by his commission, and that, therefore, he did not act as judge. But, the court held the action to be without authority or the semblance of authority, and they declared that the bringing of the action was a greater offence than the imprisonment of the plaintiff, for it was a bold attempt both against the government and justice in general. A warrant granted by the chief justice of the queen's bench, in chambers, returnable into that court, to arrest a party for breach of the peace, is such a judicial act as will protect him against an action for false imprisonment, although, from the want of proof before the chief justice, of the facts recited in the warrant, his act of issuing the warrant was declared to be without authority and illegal. Taaffe v. Downes, 3 Moore, P. C. 41, note. In Sutton v. Johnstone, 1 Term R. 493, it was held, that no action lies against a judge for acts done in that capacity; that the law raises a presumption in favor of a judge, and will not (as in ordinary cases) suffer that presumption to be rebutted; and that, if otherwise, it would deter them from doing their duty. Many other English cases could be cited.

(3) The rule, so early established and so uniformly adhered to in England, has, without an exception, been followed in this country. The case of Yates v. Lansing, 5 Johns, 282, is among the earliest cases, and is the leading case upon this subject. Chancellor Lansing committed Yates for contempt of court. He was discharged, on habeas corpus, by Chief Justice Spencer, of the supreme court. After his discharge he was rearrested and imprisoned, by order of the chancellor. This imprisonment was declared to be illegal by the court of errors, and the plaintiff was discharged. He then brought his action against the chancellor, to recover the penalty given by statute. The defence rested, mainly, on the ground that the act complained of was done by the defendant in his judicial capacity, while sitting in the court of chancery, and that, for such an act, no action would lie. In the opinion delivered by Chief Justice Kent, the English authorities were all reviewed, and the ruling there established was affirmed in its broadest terms, as the law of this state; and it was asserted that judges of all courts of record, from the highest to the lowest, are exempt from prosecution, by action or indictment, for what they did in their judicial character. The supreme court of the United States, in Bradley v. Fisher, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 335, affirmed the doctrines of Yates v. Lansing, in the following language: "In this country, the judges of the superior courts of record are only responsible to the people or the authorities constituted by the people, from whom they receive their commissions, for the manner in which they discharge the great trusts of their office." "Judges of courts of superior or general jurisdiction are not liable to civil actions for their judicial acts, even when such acts are in excess of their jurisdiction, and are alleged to have been done maliciously or corruptly." The circuit courts of the United States are courts of record, and have general jurisdiction of all offences committed against the United States.

(4) The act here complained of was a judicial act. The circuit court of the United States for the Southern district of New York had jurisdiction of the offences charged against the plaintiff. It also had jurisdiction of his person, acquired by due process of law, and not terminated by any discharge. The sentence complained of formed a part, and appears in the record as a part, of a lawful criminal prosecution then pending before that court. The defendant was before the court, in custody, upon a good conviction theretofore had, and upon that conviction he was sentenced by the court. How, then, can it be said that the pronouncing the sentence of the court was not a judicial act? Certain inferior officers sometimes act ministerially and sometimes judicially. For errors or mistakes committed when they act ministerially, such officers are liable to the party injured, but they are never liable for errors of judgment when they have jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and the acts complained of were in their nature judicial. Barhyte v. Shepherd, 35 N. Y. 251. Acts done by judges of courts of record are classified as judicial and extra-judicial. Their acts pertaining to the causes pending in their courts are always judicial. Vin. Abr. tit. "Judges"; Floyd v. Barker, 12 Coke, 23. A judicial act, when performed by a judge of a court of record, may be defined to be whatever he does in his judicial capacity, and which he cannot do in any other. To this rule there are a few exceptions, such as refusing writs of habeas corpus, and settling and signing bills of exceptions. These are exceptions to the general rule, made such by statute. As to all other acts of a judge, whether in court or out of court, if they cannot be done in any other than the judicial capacity, they are judicial acts. An extra-judicial act is one done by a judge in his private capacity, and which any citizen may do. If the act is one which none but a judge can do, then it is judicial and not extra-judicial. All acts done by a judge in furtherance of a case depending in court, the issuing of writs, making orders, and passing sentence, &c. are acts which can only be done by a judge and no other person, and must be done in a judicial capacity. The act here complained of was an act of judgment, where the defendant, being judge, at the end of an important criminal prosecution, where the plaintiff had been legally indicted, tried and convicted, exercised the proper functions of a judge, and, from the bench, in open court, at a regular term thereof, assisted by the clerk and marshal, in the presence of the party, upon discussion, in view, subject to public observation, in presence of the bar, and when the party had been heard by counsel, pronounced the solemn judgment of the circuit court of the United States, which judgment was then and there entered upon the record, and was executed by the marshal as a judgment. For, mark, no execution or commitment was issued by the defendant to the marshal. The plaintiff was imprisoned by no personal direction of the defendant, but by virtue of the sentence, as a judgment of the court, executed as such by the marshal. That record still stands, and must ever stand, as the judgment of the circuit court of the United States, for there is no tribunal empowered to reverse it. It may be called irregular—it may be called illegal; but the judgment still remains the judgment of a court having general jurisdiction over all offences committed against the United States, and which, beyond all question, had acquired jurisdiction of the person of the plaintiff. It is said that the court had lost jurisdiction of the person of the plaintiff by reason of the payment of the $200, and that, therefore, the sentence of the court was simply the act of a private person in regard to a bystander. But, the court having once acquired jurisdiction of the person, whether such jurisdiction had been lost, must, in its very nature, be a judicial question. It was one which a judge, as judge, was not competent to decide. It was a question to be decided by the court, in court. The plaintiff was before the court, in the custody of the marshal. That he had been legally committed to the custody of that officer, upon conviction, was not disputed; but, it was insisted that something had occurred, since he was thus legally committed, which entitled him to be discharged. This question the court was called on to adjudicate. Whether he should be discharged or be sentenced was then to be decided. The court decided that he was not entitled to be discharged and passed sentence; and that decision was final, from which no writ of error lay. The determination thus made involved the questions—whether the first sentence was valid or void; whether, valid or void, it could be vacated at the same term; whether, if the first sentence were vacated, the court had power to pronounce a second sentence; whether the power of the court to pronounce the second sentence was affected by the alleged payment of the fine; and whether the plaintiff had, in fact, paid the fine. All these questions the circuit court was forced to consider and determine. The defendant presiding, as judge, pronounced the judgment of the court thereon; and now it is sought to hold him liable upon the ground that, in so doing, he did not perform a judicial act.

IX. The judgment should be reversed, and judgment be given for the defendant.

DANIELS, J. This action has been brought to recover for the unlawful imprisonment of the plaintiff by the defendant, who is the United States district judge for the Eastern district of New York. It appears by the complaint and the copies of the papers annexed to it, showing the proceedings had, that the plaintiff was indicted, tried, and convicted at a term of the circuit court of the United States for the Southern district of New York, held by the defendant, of the crime of larceny committed by stealing mail bags of the value of less than twenty-five dollars. By the act of congress defining the offence and its punishment, that rendered the plaintiff liable to be sentenced to pay a fine not exceeding two hundred dollars, or to be imprisoned not exceeding one year. In finally disposing of the case, the defendant imposed both these punishments upon him. The plaintiff paid the fine and applied to be released from custody by means of the writ of habeas corpus, because he had suffered one of the alternative punishments provided for the offence. That was denied, and the court, by order entered, directed the sentence which had been pronounced to be vacated, and then sentenced the plaintiff to one year's imprisonment upon his conviction. He had then been in custody five days, and afterwards applied to the circuit court of the United States, where the circuit judge, Lewis B. Woodruff, the district judge of the Southern district, Samuel Blatchford, and the defendant, were upon the bench, presiding, for a writ of habeas corpus to discharge him from further imprisonment, because of its illegality. The application was heard, and, after being considered, was denied. He then applied for another writ of habeas corpus, which, together with a writ of certiorari, was issued by the supreme court of the United States, and, upon the hearing had on the return made to both writs, the plaintiff was discharged from custody, the court holding that he could not lawfully be sentenced to imprisonment after what had transpired in the case. Ex parte Lange, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 163. After that this action was brought against the defendant, for false imprisonment; and a very able argument has been made by the learned counsel for the plaintiff in favor of maintaining it. But the report of the case itself, as it was considered and decided by the supreme court of the United States, would seem to be sufficient to negative the assertion that such an action can be maintained, upon the facts in the case. The sentence was changed by the same court, at the same term during which the first sentence was pronounced; and a learned and extended examination by the court of last resort was found necessary for the purpose of maintaining the position that the change was improperly and unlawfully made. The opinion in which that view was sustained—and it was done by one of the ablest judges of the present time—proved unsatisfactory and unconvincing to two members of that learned court; and its conclusions were controverted by one of those two, in an opinion rarely if ever excelled in the thoroughness of its investigations and researches, or the vigorous logic tracing and exhibiting their results. Under these circumstances, it cannot with the least propriety be held that the point presented to the defendant was not a doubtful one, or that its decision and determination did not require the exercise of judicial functions. The examination and discussion which it received when it was finally decided, most conclusively establish the contrary; and that of itself should be deemed to be sufficient to shield the defendant from personal liability. The law was, to say the least, in such a condition as to afford ostensible support to each side of the proposition presented, and to render the development of a satisfactory and consistent conclusion intricate and difficult. Different minds could very well, and would very naturally, be led to different results concerning the propriety of the course pursued in the disposition of the case by the circuit court. Two other judges of great learning and experience in that court held with the defendant, that the proceedings were not invalid; and the plausibility of their decision was finally corroborated by the opinion of Mr. Justice Clifford. If, with that weight of authority in support of the action that was taken, a judge could be held personally liable for its consequences, judicial protection would be at once wholly destroyed, and the utility of the courts practically subverted. For, the result would finally be, that all unauthorized determinations arising out of misapprehensions of the law, or of miscalculations of the true weight of authority, affecting the person or property of the defeated party, would furnish a cause of action for trespass or false imprisonment. And no court could possibly be protected against such liability; for, even those of last resort not unfrequently find it necessary to re-examine, distinguish, and finally overrule their own decisions. And it certainly is no discredit to the learned tribunal by whose mandate the plaintiff was set at liberty, to say that it has not always found itself at liberty to disregard that alternative. The law is the most complicated of all practical sciences; and it cannot fail to become more so as the intricacies of business and enterprise increase and advance. Differences of opinion upon legal subjects cannot be avoided, even by the most patient attention and laborious investigation; and, when they do arise, erroneous conclusions are required to be excused, as the natural consequences of human fallibility. When a party has been brought before a court of justice in a legal manner, and circumstances are presented requiring a decision to be made, the tribunal making it cannot be deprived of protection because it may afterwards, upon further and fuller investigation, turn out to have been erroneous. That was the case of the plaintiff. He had been convicted of a crime punishable by fine or imprisonment. The court inadvertently imposed both. When its consideration was directed to the misapprehension under which the sentence had been pronounced, an effort was made to correct it in such a manner as to comport with what was considered to be just in the case; and that correction it was held could be and was designed to be made. The emergency which had arisen required a decision to be made. The judge could neither avoid it nor escape from it. His duty required him to act, and he had the power to decide, and he did so, according to the best of his judgment; and for that he cannot, upon any sound principle of accountability, be held to be personally liable. He had, for that purpose, jurisdiction of the person and the subject-matter. Both were before him, and his decision was necessary. He could not avoid making it if he would, and, as it turned out, he decided erroneously.

The rule by which judicial officers have been exonerated from liability for the consequences of their decisions has gone much further than is required for the protection of the defendant. In Yates v. Lansing, 5 Johns. 282, the assertion was approvingly mentioned, "that no authority or semblance of an authority" had been urged for an action against a judge of record, for doing anything as judge; that this was never before imagined, and no action would lie against a judge for a wrongful commitment any more than for an erroneous judgment. Id. 294. That principle was affirmed afterwards, in the same case, by the court of errors (9 Johns. 395), and to the same effect are Jenkins v. Waldron, 11 Johns. 114; Vanderheyden v. Young, Id. 150; Wilson v. Mayor of New York, 1 Denio, 595; Weaver v. Devendorf, 3 Denio, 117; Bradley v. Fisher, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 335. In the case of Rochester White Lead Co. v. City of Rochester, 3 Comst. [3 N. Y.] 463, it was said that, "whenever duties of a judicial nature are imposed upon a public officer, the due execution of which depends upon his own judgment, he is exempt from all responsibility by action, for the motives which influence him and the manner in which such duties are performed." Id. 466. To secure this immunity, it is sufficient that a case requiring judicial action is presented to the judge. Harman v. Brotherson, 1 Denio, 537; Landt v. Hilts, 19 Barb. 233.

The defendant's right to exemption from personal liability in this case rests upon still more cogent circumstances than those already relied upon. For, the decision of the United States supreme court, to which he was bound to subordinate his action, had previously affirmed the existence of the authority which he exercised in changing the punishment. Cheangkee v. U. S., 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 320; Basset v. U. S., 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 38. In the last case, the person proceeded against had pleaded guilty to an indictment, and had been sentenced to imprisonment, and was actually sent to prison, in pursuance of the sentence. A few days after that he was brought again into court by means of a writ of habeas corpus, and, on the district attorney's motion, the judgment was set aside and the prisoner had leave to withdraw his former plea of guilty. This was all done during the same term, as it was in the case of the plaintiff, and the court unanimously held it to be proper. That was not done because the proceeding was favorable to the defendant, but for the sole reason that, during the same term, the court had full power to control and change its judgments. That subject was very fully discussed and the authorities cited upon which the principle rested, by Mr. Justice Clifford, in his opinion in Ex parte Lange, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 191-195. A decision of the same nature was made after the execution of the sentence had commenced, by reducing the term for which transportation had been provided, in the case of Rex v. Price, 6 East, 323, 327. The circuit court had no power, even if it had the disposition, to gainsay or deny the accuracy of the legal principle sanctioned by the case of Basset v. U. S., supra. It not only had the power, but it was bound to conform its action to the principle maintained by that authority. That was as obligatory upon the defendant at the time as positive legislation would have been; and he appears to have acted under its sanction. At that time his action was strictly lawful, and it cannot be denied that the authority of that case then afforded him complete protection for the change made in the sentence, and it would probably be conceded to continue to do so, had it not been since impaired as authority by the final decision made in the plaintiff's favor. Under the doctrine of that case, he was vested with clear jurisdiction over the subject-matter brought before him, and it at the same time indicated the manner in which it should be exercised by him. That it was, as the learned justice stated in his opinion in the plaintiff's favor, decided "in general terms, without much consideration" (Ex parte Lange) 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 167), could not change its effect as authority, where it was followed by the circuit court. The defendant presiding there could not then, with the least propriety, have assigned that as a reason for disregarding it as authority. The decision was then in full force, as it had been made. It was promulgated by the court, in its published reports, as a proper exposition of the law; and it would be exceedingly unjust, under such circumstances, to render the defendant's protection dependent upon the views afterwards taken to correct it, by the court that had pronounced it. That tribunal could correct it, as it has, when it was discovered to be wrong, but he had no such power over it. It was his duty to conform his official action to it, and for that it cannot be that he can be held personally liable because the authority of the decision has since been superseded by another. His conduct, on the other hand, should be so far sustained as to secure him immunity, the same as it would have been if a statute had existed in favor of it, which the legislature afterwards repealed. For future purposes the repeal obliterates the law, the same as though it had never been enacted. But acts previously performed are still maintained by force of the law which sanctioned them at the time of their occurrence. This principle is too familiar to require the citation of authorities for its support, and all its reasons are applicable to the case now before this court.

The principle invoked for the support of this action would sanction suits against judges for their official acts, in a large class of cases, if it should receive the approval of the courts. It would be difficult to exclude from its comprehension any cases where imprisonment should be pronounced or continued which might afterwards be declared to be not warranted by the final view taken of the law. No authority has gone so far as that, and it is not probable that any will be hereafter so widely extended. The settled principle, on the contrary, is, that a judicial officer, in exercising the authority vested in him, shall be free to act upon his own convictions, without apprehension of personal consequences to himself. Liability to answer to every one who might feel himself aggrieved by the action of the judge would be inconsistent with the possession of this freedom, and would destroy that independence without which no judiciary can be either respectable or useful. Bradley v. Fisher, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 347.

The defendant cannot be held liable for the consequences of the imprisonment following the change made in the sentence. He acted judicially in making it. The exigency required him to decide, and that included the power to decide wrongly, without liability to himself, particularly as it practically required the abrogation of an existing and, for the time, controlling authority, to render the error apparent. It is entirely evident that he was actuated solely by the motive of performing his duties, for the best interests of the public, by subjecting the plaintiff to what was believed to be no more than a proper measure of punishment for the offence of which he had been convicted. That he considered his acts to be fully warranted by the decision of the tribunal from which he was bound to receive the law, is clearly shown by what the case shows to have transpired; and in that view he was supported by other eminent judges. To hold him liable for a change afterwards made in it, would seem to be hardly less than a positive perversion of justice. That he cannot be held liable for the five days' imprisonment under the sentence as it was at first pronounced, follows from the view which was adopted in the decision of the habeas corpus. For, it was there distinctly held, that "the judgment first rendered, though erroneous, was not absolutely void. It was rendered by a court which had jurisdiction of the party and of the offence, on a valid verdict. The error of the court in imposing the two punishments mentioned in the statute, when it had only the alternative of one of them, did not make the judgment wholly void." Ex parte Lange, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 174. And, as the defendant had the same jurisdiction over the subject when the plaintiff's first sentence was vacated and the last one was pronounced, he is equally entitled to the same protection as to this portion of the case. The sentence, under the circumstances, was not void. It was simply voidable, by the operation of the restriction subsequently imposed upon the principle established by the case of Basset v. U. S., supra, and that effect was first given to it long after the power of the defendant's court had been exhausted.

The order should be reversed, and an order entered sustaining the demurrer, with the usual leave to the plaintiff to amend, on payment of costs.

LATTON v. CRAWFORD. See Case No. 18,296.

LATTON v. RAINEY. See Case No. 18,296.

LEGAL PROCESS—CHARGE TO GRAND JURY IN RELATION TO THE OBSTRUCTION OF LEGAL PROCESS. See Case No. 18,250.

LEWIS (BELL v.). See Case No. 18,231.

Case No. 18,308.

In re LINDSLEY.

BARNEY v. DE KRAFT.

[2 Hayw. & H. 430.]¹

Orphans' Court, District of Columbia, March 21, 1863.

INFANTS—WARD OF CHANCERY—EXCLUSIVE JURISDICTION OF COURT.

In all cases where an infant is a ward of chancery, no act can be done affecting the person, property or estate of the minor, unless under the direction expressed or implied of the chancery court itself.

Overruling a mandate of the circuit court.

[Proceeding for the appointment of a guardian for Samuel C. Barney, Jr., and others, minor children of Samuel Chase Barney.]

PURCELL, J. In the above cause this court, on the 25th day of January, 1863, pronounced a final decree appointing Dr. Harvey Lindsley, (at discretion,) guardian to the above minor children, the court being of the opinion that Samuel Chase Barney had lost his marital rights as husband and natural guardian by the decree of divorce of Jasper county, in the state of Iowa, in equity in the district court. By that decree he was forever separated from his wife, and the custody of the said minor children was taken from him and given to the mother. It appears on the face of the decree that the court was a tribunal of competent jurisdiction both over the parties and the subject matter, and that said decree was duly and properly authenticated according to the act of congress in such cases made and provided, and this court held that the divorce was sufficient to exclude Samuel Chase Barney from the guardianship of the property of the said children, without reference to the other facts against him in the case. Also that inasmuch as the said decree of divorce declared that Samuel Chase Barney had received timely notice of the pending of the suit, by the proper publication required by law, and notice sent to his residence; it could not be inquired into collaterally by this court, and authorities were cited to that effect, and that such a decree was not ex-parte. This court at the same time stated another fact, which was entitled to much consideration, to wit, that the will of Edward De Kraft, by whom the whole estate in question was devised, the father of Mary E. De Kraft, who intermarried with the said Samuel Chase Barney, and who was the mother of said minor children, expressly declared that "no husband of his daughter should ever at any time control the estate so devised." From this decision the said Samuel Chase Barney appealed to the circuit court of this district, and by that court the decision of this court was reversed. [Case No. 18,230.] An appeal was then taken by J. W. De Kraft, next friend of the children, to the supreme court of the United States, and was dismissed by that tribunal for the want of jurisdiction. [2 Black, 704.]

¹ [Reported by John A. Hayward, Esq., and Geo. C. Hazleton, Esq.]

The circuit court (the opinion delivered by Judge Merrick) in reversing the decision of this court, made and elaborately discussed three points: 1st. That the decree of divorce rendered in Iowa could not be received in evidence for any purpose in the present controversy. 2nd. That the will of Edward De Kraft did not apply to the personal custody of the minor children, but only to the property, and that although the language of said will was clear and explicit that "no husband" of the daughter should at any time control the estate, yet as natural guardian, Samuel Chase Barney, the father, was entitled to preference in the control of said property, provided he gave sufficient bond and securities as natural guardian. 3rd. That the statute of Maryland, of 1798, in reference to the removal of guardians by the orphans' court, did not apply to Samuel Chase Barney as natural guardian.

In reference to the points thus considered by the circuit court, and upon the soundness of their decision, it would perhaps be unbecoming for this court to comment, although it may not be amiss to quote the express language of the sections of the statute of Maryland of 1798, which was held by the circuit court (in their 3rd and last point) not to apply to the present case. In subchapter 12, c. 101, of that statute, different classes of guardians are mentioned: "natural guardians" and "testamentary guardians." Then subchapter 15 provides that "the court (orphans) may upon application of an infant, or any person in his behalf, suggesting improper conduct in any guardian whatever, either in relation to the care and management of the property and person of the infant, inquire into the same, and at their discretion remove such guardian and make choice of another, who shall give security and conduct himself in the manner herein before prescribed, and shall receive the property and the custody of the ward." Could language be more comprehensive or explicit? This statute is in force in this district, and it expressly provides that the orphans' court may remove "any guardian whatever" for improper conduct, either in regard to the person or property of the ward, clearly embracing all guardians; and this has been the opinion of one of the ablest jurists, both of this District and the state of Maryland. On the 2d of March, 1863, the circuit court issued their mandate from their clerk's office, directing this court to cite Samuel Chase Barney, to give bond with sufficient securities to be approved by this court, &c., &c. Said mandate was delivered to the clerk of this court on the 4th of March, 1863, the day after the circuit court was abolished by congress.

The circuit court was the proper appellate tribunal, and this court would feel bound to respect its mandate, but it appears from this certificate, under seal of the clerk of that court, who was also clerk of the court of chancery, that on the 24th of February, 1863, a bill in equity had been filed in behalf of said minor children, who were then in the custody of Dr. Harvey Lindsley, their duly appointed guardian by this court, the property being also in his possession. Said bill alleging unfitness of said Barney, because gross immorality and incompetency rendered him unfit to have the custody of the said minor children, or to have the management of their property, consequently the said minor children became "wards in chancery" from the filing the said bill, and the issuing the process thereon and service on said Samuel Chase Barney, on the 26th of February, which proceedings operated as a supersedeas to the action of all other courts and persons. (It was stated to this court and not denied by the opposite counsel, that the circuit court had agreed to hear an argument, and examine authorities as to the propriety of having ordered the mandate, but did not, owing to some misunderstanding between the court and counsel, R. S. Coxe, Esq.) The above doctrine is very clearly stated by Judge Story in his very able work upon Equity Jurisprudence. Volume 2, §§ 1352, 1353. He says: "Wherever a suit is instituted in the court of chancery relating to the person or property of an infant, although he is not under any general guardian appointed by the court, he is treated as a ward of the court, and as being under its special cognizance and protection."

In all cases where an infant is ward of chancery, no act can be done affecting the person or property, or state of the minor, unless under the express or implied direction of the court itself. Every act done without such direction is treated as a violation of the authority of the court, and the offending party will be arrested upon proper process for the contempt, and compelled to submit to such orders and such punishment by imprisonment as are applied to other cases of contempt. See, also, Wellesley v. Duke of Beaufort, 2 Russ. 20, 21. In this case the rights of the father as natural guardian were involved, and he was by the court adjudged unfit to have the custody of his children. Goodall v. Harris, 2 P. Wms. 561; Butler v. Freeman, Amb. 302; 2 Bligh (N. S.) 137.

Thus it will be seen that by the foregoing high authorities should this court regard the mandate issued by the late circuit court, or "do any other act affecting the person, property or state of the minor" from the time they became "wards of chancery," it would be guilty of contempt of the court of chancery, and may not the late circuit court have rendered themselves liable, the mandate having been issued subsequent to the filing of the said bill in behalf of the minor children? "Filing a bill in chancery on behalf of infants makes them wards of court." says Maddox in his Chancery Practice. Volume 1, p. 432. See, also, the many authorities referred to in the margin by the learned author. Indeed, the circuit court, in their opinion already referred to, say that the court of chancery affords ample relief in the case of minors, when properly invoked. But if any doubts existed as to the principle in chancery, as above stated from the foregoing authorities and facts, they were removed on the awarding of the injunction on yesterday, the 20th of March, by the Hon. D.

K. Carter,¹ chief justice of the supreme court of the District, which was filed by John W. De Kraft, as next friend of said minor children, which arrested the said mandate ordered by the late circuit court, and which was brought officially to the view of this court. It is therefore ordered and decreed from the foregoing authorities and facts, that the direction contained in the mandate above referred to of the late circuit court, to cite Samuel Chase Barney to give bond and security as natural guardian to said minor children, within a reasonable time, is overruled.

¹ This appears to have been the first adjudication in which Chief Justice Carter took part upon entering upon his term of office.

M.

MACKENZIE (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 18,313.

McQUEWAN (BLOOMER v.). See Case No. 18,242.

MADDOX (ASHLEY v.). See Case No. 18,227.

Case No. 18,309.

MANIER v. TRUMBO.

[Monroe, C. C. (Ky. Dist.) 67.]

Circuit Court, D. Kentucky. Sept., 1855.

JURISDICTION OF COURTS—COLLATERAL ATTACK—ATTACHMENT FROM STATE COURT—WRONGFUL SEIZURE BY SHERIFF—REPLEVIN IN FEDERAL COURT.

[1. The question of jurisdiction over any particular case must be decided, in the first instance, by the court whose judicial action is first invoked. The question arises immediately upon the application for the original or first process in the action, and is necessarily decided in favor of the jurisdiction at the time when the process is issued, whether issued by the judge or the clerk. And it is thereafter also necessarily decided, by implication, preliminary to every order, sentence, or mandate of the writ; and every order and process exhibits on its face a decision of the court that it is made and awarded by competent authority.]

[2. When it is within the general jurisdiction of a court in a proper case to issue a writ, or make an order, which it has issued or made, but, in the particular case, the facts were not such as confer jurisdiction, such writ or order must be taken as valid and effectual, until quashed, reversed, or otherwise superseded by a tribunal competent to review and correct the error.]

[3. An order for the attachment of the property of the defendant in a personal action, in order to have it brought into the custody of the court, and subjected to whatever, after due proceedings, may be adjudged against the defendant, being within the general jurisdiction of the Kentucky circuit courts, under the Code of Practice of that state, the validity of such an attachment cannot be questioned by a federal court, in an action brought therein to replevy the property from the possession of the sheriff. The Kentucky court having necessarily decided, in issuing the writ, that a proper case was presented for the exercise of its jurisdiction, the federal court has no authority to review that decision, and consequently must respect and give full effect to the writ.]

[4. An order for the attachment "of the property of" a defendant named, issued as a provisional remedy, prior to judgment, under the provisions of Code Prac. Ky. § 223, gives the sheriff no authority to seize property, which has been conveyed to another, on the ground that such conveyance was in fraud of creditors; and such a seizure, if made, does not carry the property into the custody of the court.]

[5. Where a sheriff, under the authority of a writ of attachment issued by a state court, seizes property not within the command of the writ, a third person, not a party to the suit, may (when the other requisites of federal jurisdiction exist) maintain a suit in replevin in a federal court to recover the property from the possession of the sheriff; and this notwithstanding the fact that the state laws provide a mode in which he may intervene in the state court for the purpose of asserting his right to the property.]

At law.

J. Harlan, Atty. Gen., for plaintiff.

Morehead & Brown, for defendant.

MONROE, District Judge. 1. Plaintiff's action: This action is replevin by the plaintiff, a citizen of the state of Illinois, against the defendant, a citizen of Kentucky, to recover five slaves of the plaintiff's of the aggregate value of $2,300.

2. Defendant's possession of the property: It appears that, some time prior to the commencement of this action, Henry G. Poston and Wm. Winn had commenced a suit by petition in equity in the Clarke county circuit court against John Manier, Sr., John Manier, Jr., and some other defendants. It is alleged in the petition that the plaintiffs had some time before instituted an ordinary action in that court against the defendant John Manier, the elder, and Miller Cooper, on a demand for about $720; that this suit, on the application of the defendant Manier, had been removed to the Fayette circuit court, where it remained undetermined; but that they, the plaintiffs, had recovered a judgment against this defendant John Manier, Sr., for about twenty-five dollars for their costs of a continuance of the suit. It was represented that the defendant Cooper was without property, and that since the last term of the Fayette circuit court John Manier, the elder, had sold, conveyed, and otherwise disposed of his property, or suffered or permitted it to be sold, with the fraudulent intent to cheat, hinder, or delay his creditors; that among other fraudulent transfers thus made by him was a pretended sale of a negro woman and children to his (the defendant's) son, John Manier, Jr., who was then trying to sell said slaves as his own property. They prayed the court to grant them an attachment against the property of John Manier, Sr., or so much thereof as would be sufficient to satisfy their original demand for the seven hundred and odd dollars, and the judgment and execution for costs they had obtained at the last term of the Fayette circuit court. The plaintiffs represented that the other defendants were indebted to the defendant Manier, the elder, and asked an attachment of the debts due by them to him, and that they be enjoined from paying the same to him until the further order of the court. The petition is concluded with a prayer that the rights of the petitioners be protected, and for all proper relief. On this case the plaintiffs obtained an order of the court for "an attachment and injunction in accordance with the prayer of the petition," and the process was issued accordingly. The attachment commanded the sheriff to "attach the property of John Manier, Sr., not exempt from execution, in your county, or so much thereof as will satisfy the claim of the plaintiffs in this action," etc.; and to summon the garnishees, etc. It was directed to the sheriff of Bath county. David Trumbo was that sheriff, and, it having come to his hands, he, by the directions of the plaintiffs, and the supposed command of the writ, seized the slaves which it had been alleged in the petition had been fraudulently sold and transferred by the defendant John Manier, the elder, to his co-defendant John Manier, Jr., and thus Mr. Trumbo took and had the slaves in his possession.

3. Plaintiff's replevin: But a stranger to all this proceeding asserts that he was the owner of the slaves, and the question will be, what was the predicament of the property in the hands of Mr. Trumbo? Wesley H. Manier, a citizen of Illinois, no party to the suit in the state court, nor mentioned in the attachment or other process, in this state of things instituted in this court the present ordinary action of replevin against David Trumbo for these slaves. The plaintiff in his declaration, filed before the impetration of this writ, after the statement of his ownership of the property in the ordinary form, alleged that David Trumbo, the defendant, not adding his quality of office, wrongfully took and detained his slaves, described by their individual names and value, and still detained them; and thereupon, without showing how or under what color the wrong was committed, prayed the replevin of the property and for his damages. The writ having been issued accordingly, the marshal, after having taken the proper bond for the security of the defendant, took and delivered the slaves to the plaintiff. Whereupon,—

4. Plea to jurisdiction, and retorno demanded: Mr. Trumbo returned the attachment to the state court with his answer thereto, that by the direction of the plaintiff he had seized these slaves, without saying whose property or in whose possession found, but that they had been taken from him by the marshal on this writ of replevin; and, having thus answered the state court, he appeared here with its record, and pleaded these matters to the jurisdiction of this court; concluding with a prayer for the return of the property. The plaintiff demurred.

5. Defendant's position on demurrer: It was assumed in the argument by the counsel of the defendant that immediately on the seizure of the slaves by the defendant in his quality of sheriff, by his supposed authority under the attachment, they were in the custody of the state court, and thence inferred that this court had no cognizance of this action, afterwards commenced here to disturb such custody of that court. If the premise is true, the conclusion necessarily follows. It may be premised that the circumstances that this is a court of the United States and the Clarke circuit court a state tribunal is in no wise material to the question. If this action had been in the state circuit court of Bath, and this plea had been there pleaded, the question would have been exactly the same with this which is now here presented. But is it true that such was the predicament of the property? This must depend upon the answer to the question, was the seizure by the order of the court or the command of its process? If it was, then the act of the sheriff was the act of the court, and his apparent possession of the property thereby obtained was but as the custos for the court; and, in such case, the court not being subject to an action, he was not. But, if the sheriff acted without such command, his act of seizure was his own wrongful act, and the possession his own wrongful possession, which subjected him to the action of the party injured in any court having cognizance of such wrong. It would seem to follow that the jurisdiction of this court of the present action depends upon the interpretation of the terms of this writ of attachment, and upon this exclusively.

6. Question of jurisdiction retorted: There was a preliminary question suggested. The counsel of the defendant was asked whether the question of jurisdiction might not be retorted, and the defendant required to maintain that the Clarke circuit court had cognizance of the cause in which it had awarded this writ returnable before itself. It had been agreed by the counsel that it should be considered that the record of the case on which that court acted was fully set forth in the plea, the question is therefore fairly presented and will be disposed of first in order. This question depends upon the law of Kentucky which prescribed the jurisdiction of the state court and regulated, or ought to have regulated, the proceedings found in this record.

7. Code of Kentucky Practice: But this class of law had been, shortly before these proceedings were commenced, all broken up, essentially altered, new modeled, in short codified, and by one act of the legislature compressed into a book. It will therefore be necessary to understand what is this new system. To this end we must recognize the preliminary dispositions of the Code, and comprehend its general provisions; and when this shall have been done, and not before, its particular provisions may be intelligibly applied to the subject of discussion. The act of legislation which enacted the book declared that it should be known as the "Code of Practice in Civil Cases in This State"; and it does direct every proceeding allowed in every class of case within its title. The only object of all proceeding in every such case is immediately mentioned by a term of the utmost extension, and thereupon a division thereof made which entirely exhausts the subject. "Section 1. This act shall be known as the Code of Practice in Civil Cases in this state. Sec. 2. Remedies in civil cases in the courts of this state are divided into two classes: (1) Actions; (2) special proceedings. Sec. 3. A civil action is an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice, by one party against another, for the enforcement or protection of a private right, or the redress or prevention of a private wrong. It may be brought for the recovery of a penalty or forfeiture. Sec. 4. Every other remedy in a civil case is a special proceeding."

There is here a division of remedies into two classes, but the subject of our discussion will be found in the first class, and in this only. All the wrongs suffered and apprehended by the plaintiff in this attachment are redressed or prevented by certain conservative or provisional orders and process in the ordinary action for the principal demand, specially provided as incident thereto, and significantly denominated "Provisional Remedies," for the accomplishment of the object of such action, and not by any of the species of procedure denominated "Special Proceedings," and classed in this second division of remedies. It is therefore with this action only we are here concerned.

"The forms of all actions and suits" theretofore in use were abolished, and a new form of action established "for the enforcement and protection of private rights, and the redress and prevention of all private wrongs," regardless of all former distinctions between either legal or equitable rights or remedies.

This is an action by petition to the court, and a summons thereon for the defendant or person concerned in the defense in every case, whether the proceedings be in personam or in rem, or both a person and thing are the reus. There are two forms of proceeding, one called an "ordinary" the other the "equitable." In one the petition is headed "Petition" merely; in the other, "Petition in Equity." But the plaintiff has his election which of the two he will adopt, except when his case has been before exclusively cognizable in equity or was of common-law jurisdiction, and the defendant appears and interposes his objection to the mode adopted; and on this objection a singular preference is given to the equity docket. If the proceeding had been erroneously commenced in the ordinary or common-law mode, the defendant has a right on his mere motion to have it transferred to the equity docket, but if, on the contrary, the plaintiff had erroneously elected the equitable mode of proceeding, the defendant cannot have the mode of procedure changed, but must submit unless he present in his answer, on oath, a defense on which he is entitled to a trial by jury. So that in every case one party or the other may elect the equitable mode of procedure unless the defendant shows that he has a right to trial of an issue by a jury, and insists on such right. And where the action has been commenced by ordinary proceeding, and remains on that docket, the plaintiff may have every issue, which before the adoption of the Code was exclusively cognizable in chancery, tried in the mode prescribed in cases of equitable proceedings. And where in such case all the issues are such as had been theretofore cognizable in chancery, though none of them were exclusively so, the defendant may have them tried in this mode.

It is manifest that it was the plan to give to the equitable mode of proceeding the preference where ever it was possible. The constitution had reserved the right of trial by jury, and a method had to be provided for such trials; but in prescribing this method the equitable mode of proceeding is departed from so far only as was absolutely necessary to accomplish this object, and, that the provisions of the law for this purpose might not have a more extended effect, it is declared that where the issues of fact theretofore cognizable in equity occurred in a cause commenced by ordinary proceeding, such issues might be tried in the mode of equitable proceeding on the mere motion of the plaintiff or defendant, without having the cause transferred to the equitable docket, or changing the form or mode of proceeding in any other respect. And this seemed to produce something like a common-law suit tried by the court of equity; but the fact is, this change of the mode of the trial, divested the case of its only common-law characteristic, and made it a purely equitable cause. It thus appears that the trial by the court is not peculiar to the equitable mode of proceeding, and therefore it cannot distinguish such mode of proceeding into a class of actions. It is elsewhere provided that the court may whenever it thinks proper—as theretofore practiced—order an issue in an equitable cause to be tried by a jury. So that the trial by jury is neither universal nor simply peculiar to the action by ordinary proceeding; therefore it does not necessarily even contribute to constitute a class, and other material differences must be found before such a class can be formed. The fact is that this action of the Code, on whatever form of proceeding commenced, or conducted, or the trial is had, is essentially a suit in equity founded on the principles of the modern civil law. It is thus distinguished—by the number, complication, and shifting of the parties which is allowed—by the fact that the allegations of the several parties are all cast broad before the court, whereupon the proofs are immediately taken, after which the facts in dispute are contained by retrospection, and the proofs applied to the questions thus found—by the machinery employed—by its interlocutory orders, conservative acts, and process—by its trials by the court and its mode of trial by jury; and, finally, by its mode of relief, specific or remuneratory, remedial or protective, adapted to every case and every party. The parties to the action, plaintiffs and defendants, primary and secondary, or the rules in respect to them, are those of the court of equity, or civil law forum; and different—even in respect to the principal and indispensable parties—from the rules which govern absolutely the parties to the common-law action.

The plaintiff may be one who has either a legal or equitable right; and such plaintiff may have for the reus all the persons and things he may choose to have convened and arrested to answer his action, without the hazard of his cause by a misjoinder of parties. The defendants may be not only the thing demanded by the action and all the persons and things directly bound for the plaintiff's demand, but all the persons and property, in possession and in action, he expects to subject to the judgment he hopes to recover; and these defendants are all convened or brought before the court or into its custody, and consequently made subject to its action by the personal service of the summons, or an order entered on the record, warning the persons to appear and defend their rights, or by an attachment of the property itself by an officer of the court, or its delivery to such officer according to an order made in the cause. The process—actual or constructive and common to all cases, or principal and conservative and therefore only employed when necessary in consequence of the circumstances of a particular case—is exactly the same whether the mode of proceeding be equitable or ordinary. There is a diversity in the terms in which the defendant is required to appear and answer after the service of the process, but that is here unimportant. The persons thus made defendants on appearing to the action, thereupon defend themselves or the property in their possession or which they have an interest in defending, in the same mode on whatever docket the cause may stand. We have seen that all actions are commenced by the petition of the plaintiff. Every action whilst single is defended by either demurrer or the answer of the defendant. The plaintiff makes no express replication to the defendant's answer. He is understood to deny its affirmative allegations, and thus is made the issue. Plaintiff may demur to defendant's answer, which corresponds to setting down a cause in equity on bill and answer. But the defendant may turn on the plaintiff with his demand in reconvention or set-off, and whenever necessary call in other persons; and, making them defendants to such demands, have them brought before the court in the same mode the original defendants had been convened. In such cases the answer of the defendant, where no new party is introduced, and his petition when a third person is made a defendant, are in the nature of a cross-bill in equity. The cause is then double, and the plaintiff in the original action and the parties thus made defendants make their defense to this incidental action in the same mode a principal action is defended. What the plaintiff files is called his reply, but it is no other than an answer to the cross-bill. Thus are the issues made in every cause, however complicated it may become. The only altercations between any of the parties in respect to the facts is by petition and answer. Either may be amended.

Third persons still outstanding, whose rights are involved in the controversy, or whose possession of property is affected by any act of an officer under color of an order or process of the court, may intervene, assert their right, and submit it for discussion and decision; or oppose the actions had or threatened against their possession. The constituents of either class of such parties may be changed whenever found necessary, either from an error in the commencement of the proceedings or a casualty in the progress of the cause. Defendants may be added, struck out, and dismissed, and new persons or things substituted and added. An original plaintiff—even a sole plaintiff—may retire and a new actor be introduced in his stead; and yet the cause may be all conducted on what is called the ordinary mode of proceeding in opposition to the equitable. And in whatever mode the suit may have been commenced, on whatever docket it may stand, every order, process, and judgment, found in all the formulas of either the courts of equity or law, or their equivalents, may be entered and awarded either by the court, the clerk or a judge in each and every stage of the proceeding, from its institution to the final trial.

By these means every provisional remedy is afforded. The property in litigation or sought to be subjected to a demand is secured from waste or damage, and from being aliened or eloiend, and may when necessary be sold and its proceeds held subject to the disposition of the court. The mode of proof is not material before us; but it is substantially the same in either mode of proceeding. Every party has the right to examine his adversary either on interrogatories or on the trial in open court, touching the like facts, and the only diversity between the modes of obtaining testimony is that in the ordinary the witness must be produced and testify before the jury when within the county or an adjacent county, and able to attend. Either the jury or the court may have a view of the premises, or the object in litigation referred to in the proofs, subjected to its inspection. The same machinery is employed by the court indiscriminately—the auditor, the master, the expert, the depository, the receiver, or commissioner, as may be demanded by the circumstances of the litigation.

The several branches of the cause may be decided at different periods, either provisionally or finally. And in the final dispositions of the cause every form of judgment, decree, injunction, interdict, mandamus, or prohibition found in either the common-law court or civil-law forum may be adopted; or new forms hitherto unknown, may be devised, and all carried into execution by whatever order of process the exigency of the case may demand. These general dispositions of the Code will be sufficient.

It is manifest this action, announced at the opening of the work, is a suit in equity. It has all the distinctive characteristics of this class of proceedings in court. There is assigned in to all the remedies, provisional and final, afforded by the common-law actions, and every species of procedure known to courts of equity, and therefore it is in some sense mixed or compound; but it may be more properly said that the action at law has been merged and lost in the comprehensive equity action. The circumstance that the right of trial by jury, when demandable at common law, is preserved and a mode of proceeding prescribed for this purpose, does not make it necessary to qualify this conclusion. This amounts to only the introduction of the jury into the machinery of the court of equity in certain classes of cases, and making its employment necessary when demanded by a party, whereas it was before discretionary with the chancellor. We have seen that nothing more was done.

But to proceed and apply what we have collected to our question. It is found that the idea of two courts (or a court with two sides to it), one with cognizance of one class of rights and wrongs, and with power to afford one species of remedy, and the other with jurisdiction of another sort of rights and wrongs, and with power to afford other remedies, is totally abolished. It follows that it is impossible that there can remain any such thing as an ancillary equity jurisdiction of one court, to be exercised to secure or promote the object of an action in another tribunal. Not only is there no occasion left for such jurisdiction, but it will be found that it is directed that every provisional remedy which a chancellor could afford in the exercise of his ancillary jurisdiction shall be allowed in not only the same court but in the very action whose object the proceeding is intended to conserve and promote, whether this action is conducted in the mode of an equitable or ordinary proceeding.

There are six several classes of provisional remedies prescribed in the Code,—arrest of the defendant, claim and delivery of personal property, attachment of property, injunction, appointment of receiver, and deposit of property. These it is supposed extend to all the cases provided for by the conservative acts of the civil law, accomplish all the objects of the coercive process in an action at common law, and include every provisional remedy afforded by a court of equity in the exercise of either its ancillary, or principal jurisdiction; and all these remedies are incidental to every action in which an occasion for them can occur; all may be had at the institution of a suit, or at any time before judgment, and therefore constitute a part of the proceedings in the action. We shall however have occasion to mention again the attachment only. It is allowed in several different cases and on a number of grounds; but we need mention only one—it will be sufficient to say of the others that they are all issued out of the court in which the action is being or has been brought, to which they are provisional.

The provisions in respect to this case are to this effect: "Sec. 221. The plaintiff in a civil action may at or after the commencement thereof have an attachment against the property of the defendant in the cases and on the grounds hereafter stated. (1) In the case of an action for the recovery of money." "Sec. 222. An order of attachment shall be made by the clerk of the court in which the action is brought." Whenever in the case just mentioned there is filed in his office an affidavit of the plaintiff showing the "nature of his claim, that it is just, and the amount the affiant believes the plaintiff ought to recover"; that the defendant "has sold, conveyed or otherwise disposed of his property, or suffered or permitted it to be sold with the fraudulent intent to cheat, hinder, or delay his creditors." This attachment is against the defendant's property generally, and is executed against every species thereof not exempt from execution, corporeal or incorporeal. It is executed on a debt or demand by delivering to the debtor a notice thereof, and summoning him as garnishee to the action.

8. Code applied to defendant's case: Now it is manifest that the case of the plaintiffs in this attachment was simply the case which has been started out of the Code, and that their remedy against both the property of John Manier, the elder, and the debt owing to him by the other defendants was an attachment in the action by ordinary proceeding depending in the Fayette circuit court. There was no occasion whatever for an injunction forbidding the payment of the debt to Manier by the garnishees. Notice of the attachment to the debtors and citation of them to appear and answer in the action is an effectual seizure of the debt. The question then is, we have seen, had the Clarke circuit court jurisdiction to entertain this petition in equity—constituted of nothing but the materials for a mere provisional remedy incidental to the action by ordinary proceeding in the Fayette circuit court—and to thereupon award this process returnable before itself, and thereby constitute a second suit.

9. Question of jurisdiction retorted back: But that court did take cognizance of the cause and awarded the attachment—and the question occurs, was there not included in that act a decision that the court had jurisdiction?—which must be reviewed before the main question can be reached. If there was, then the question is, has this court the power to reverse that decision; and the question of jurisdiction is retorted back. This seems to be the case and it is proper that the preliminary question be first decided.

10. Province of courts: Every superior court of general jurisdiction has prima facie power to act upon all the persons and things within the territorial limits, and subject to the legislative power, of the government of which it is the organ. There is generally a local sphere of action prescribed for each tribunal; and the objects or subjects of the jurisdiction of each class of courts are designated in some mode by their organic law, and the jurisprudence they administer. But the question here occurs, how is this law to be applied to each case presented to the tribunals for judicial action and the jurisdiction of the court determined? There can be but one answer. The law must be applied and the question decided in the court where the judicial action is first invoked; and provisionally decided, even at the threshold of the court of the first instance. The question of the jurisdiction of the particular court occurs on the application for the original or first process in every action; whether such application is to the court or its clerk and is decided on by the clerk or the judge. It is afterwards necessarily decided preliminary to every order, sentence, and mandate of the court; a judgment upon it is implied in every such act, and every order and process exhibits on its face a decision of the court, that it is made and awarded by competent authority. It is not material whether the process is issued by the clerk on the direct and immediate order of the court or not: it is always as if by the court. In every case of the award of the process or the entry of an order which has such effect, it is either all right, in some respects wrong, or all wrong. It is only with the middle class we are concerned. If any writ or process is sued forth or prosecuted in any court of the United States or a particular state, whereby the person of an ambassador or other public minister of a foreign state received by the president of the United States may be arrested or imprisoned, such writ or process is null to all intents and constructions. This nullity of the writ is the consequence of the fact that no court had jurisdiction to award such process against a foreign minister in any case whatever which it is possible to present. In such and the like cases where the court has no jurisdiction to consider whether a sufficient case has been made out for its action or not, its whole action is all wrong and null for every purpose. But the order or process may be what the court had no jurisdiction to make, and send out for execution—on the facts or case before it—but which it had jurisdiction to make or award on a case which might have been presented for its action: in such cases the act of the court is not a nullity, nor its process void.

A capias in the common form issued on an indictment which charged no offense within the jurisdiction of the court, nor punished by any law, and which, if you choose, had never been found by the grand jury. "A true bill," will justify a sheriff or marshal in the arrest of the defendant. A writ of fiat facias issued in a cause wherein the plaintiff had shown neither the jurisdiction of the tribunal nor a cause of action in any court, to which the defendant had either appeared or been cited, and in which there had been in fact no form of judgment rendered, will justify the marshal or sheriff in not only seizing the goods of the defendant, but enable him to pass a good title to an innocent purchaser: and the reason in both these and all the like cases is, that the officer has no jurisdiction to review the decision of the court, made either by itself or its clerk, upon the case on which it acted in making the order and issuing the process; and therefore need not know what was such case; and all strangers must be allowed to trust to the validity of such process. Every such process must be allowed its full operation until quashed, reversed, or otherwise superseded by a tribunal competent to review and correct the errors of the court whence it issued, and even after such reversal, and the writ has been quashed, what has been performed according to its command remains justified and in general valid and effectual. This tribunal is the court itself, under certain limitations, which made the order, or whose clerk issued the process without an express order in the particular case; or it is an appellate court with power to review the decisions of such court, not only for its errors in assuming jurisdiction in cases of which it had not cognizance, but for its errors committed in cases of which it had unquestionable jurisdiction.

No other tribunal, whether of the same or another government, can with any propriety review such decisions or hold for nought such an order or such a writ. It is said a court can act only on the persons and things before it, and that its judgments against the absent reus are null and ineffectual. The ancients supposed it was necessary for the parties to be in fact before the tribunal and in the physical power of its officers; and it is still supposed with us that all the parties to be acted on, whether persons or things, must be in some wise before the court. Hence, when this does not appear nor can be made out by any construction, the judgment may be ineffectual. But this nullity of the action of the tribunal results from an entirely different principle from that involved in this case: in the case supposed it is assumed there was no reus in the power of the court in any mode, and thence inferred that the court, having nothing within its power, had not acted, and therefore there was no judgment. Whereas, the present question is not upon the effect of a judgment against property: which might raise the question whether it had been effected in a mode or was in a position which subjected it to the jurisdiction of the court. The question is upon an order of the court for an attachment of the property of a defendant in a personal action, in order to have it brought into the custody of the court, and there, after due proceedings, subjected to what might be adjudged against the defendant; and the jurisdiction of the court to award such process in a proper case is unquestionable: therefore it can be objected against the attachment, only that the court had not jurisdiction of the cause, and therefore had not competent power to award the process. But it was adjudged by that court that it had jurisdiction of the cause. It had jurisdiction to make that decision, and this court has no jurisdiction to reverse that decision, and consequently must respect and give full effect to the process thereby awarded.

11. Aggression of courts and its consequence: It is supposed that this conclusion is sufficiently apparent on the direct argument, and that it is hardly worth while to state any other form of argument to confirm it; but a very few words will show that its contradictory would not only defeat the uniformity in the administration of justice to the extent of its operation, but would, if carried out, lead to consequences altogether intolerable. If this court can discuss and thereupon hold for nought, such an order and process of a state court, it might determine that the act of its officer in its execution had been a mere trespass, not only whilst the propriety of the process had remained unquestioned, or, when it might be afterwards adjudged in the state tribunal that it was not merely void, but only voidable, and was therefore a full justification of the officer, and that all he performed under it was valid and effectual, but even when it might be subsequently held by the state courts that the process was in all respects valid and regular.

This is however but a small portion of the evils which might result from the operation of such a principle. If it be necessary to show that the state court had jurisdiction of the case on which it awarded its process, pronounced its judgment, and directed its execution, actions might be maintained in this court by every alien and citizen of other states against the officers of the state on every case of an execution upon them or their property of a state process whether original, mesne, final, collateral, or incidental, where this court might be of opinion that the proceeding had been had on a case of which such court had not jurisdiction. This might be done notwithstanding the acts of such state magistrate were irreversible in any superior tribunal. This court might have before it actions by the convicts of the state prisons, common jails, and work houses, against their keepers, even by a person committed for a contempt of the court, and be called upon to examine the record of the judgment pronounced against them at the bar of the state tribunal, and thereupon to decide whether, on the case thus shown, such court was authorized by law to pronounce sentence. And if the courts of the United States considered such questions, the state courts might on the same principle have brought before them any person in the custody of the marshal arrested on a capias or warrant from a court or commissioner of the United States, on a charge of an offense against the United States, and if in its opinion the indictment or case otherwise shown on which the process issued was not sufficient, he might be discharged and set at large. And on the same principle a state court might have brought to its bar the criminal in a state prison suffering the penalty of his public offense, adjudged against him by a court of the United States on a full trial at its bar, and if in its opinion an error had been committed in the construction of the constitution or an act of congress, the criminal might be set at large to defy the government and its tribunals. In the end, even persons committed for open contempt, resistance, and obstruction of the orders and process of the courts of the United States might be discharged from its custody, and thus maintained in their rebellion against all government and order. It cannot but be perceived that such cases would raise the question whether any color of office would exempt persons thus obstructing the process and defeating the judgments of the courts of the United States from the penalties denounced by the acts of congress against such offenders. But the subject will not be pursued. It had been supposed that the principle we have laid down was everywhere practically recognized: it is acted upon a thousand times every day, and it is impossible that its converse can ever obtain whilst men have common sense and judges are lawyers.

12. Term "defendant's property" in attachments: The only question then is, did the attachment command the sheriff to take these slaves? It did not do so by a term which designated them directly, and therefore the proposition, that it was done at all, can be established only by argument. The property only of John Manier, the elder, was what the sheriff was commanded to attach. If these slaves were the property of this Manier, then the sheriff was commanded to seize them—otherwise, not. The question then is, can this hypothesis be maintained? It is not averred in the plea, and nothing is found in the record which will supply the omission and warrant the assumption of the fact. It had been affirmed in the petition on which the attachment was obtained, in effect that the slaves had been the property of John Manier, the elder, and though it was averred that he had transferred them to the young Manier, yet it was charged that the sale was fraudulent against them, the creditors of the vendor; and, this record was not only referred to in the plea, but it was agreed by the counsel that this question, on the plaintiff's demurrer, should be considered exactly as if the record had been fully transcribed in the plea. The averments in the pleadings in a record which is set out in a plea are not averments in such plea. But in order that all the objects of the counsel in their liberal agreements may be fully attained, it will be supposed that this matter was all set forth in the plea in exactly the words it is alleged in the petition. The question then is, were the slaves, in this predicament, the property of John Manier the elder, in the sense of these words in the attachment? It is plain that if they, having been his property, were sold and transferred with the fraudulent intent to cheat, hinder, and delay his creditors, they did in some sense remain his property. That the property thus situated is the property of the fraudulent vendor in the sense of the terms of the writ of fieri facias against the estate, is unquestionable.

In such case the judgment creditor is allowed fictitiously to allege that no sale of such property has been made—in other words, that the sale was void and on this hypothesis a sale of it under execution will pass the title: the sheriff is therefore bound to seize and sell it as the property of the defendant. But such is not the rule in the case of this sort of attachment. It is a process before judgment, and such was never the effect of such process, whatever was its particular purpose—and the reason is that the term creditor in the rule of the common law and in the statutes which declare void donations, sales, and other transfers of property to the prejudice of creditors, signifies judgment creditors.

The sheriff was not authorized to seize such property on the ordinary mesne process of attachment prescribed by the common law. It was for the purpose of compelling the appearance of a defendant in order that the plaintiff might obtain a judgment; and the same was the rule in the execution of the mesne process of attachment prescribed by the former statute law of Kentucky. It was provided by this law, an act of 1797, that when the sheriff returned the writ to answer any civil action that the defendant was "not found," the plaintiff might have an alias, or, at his election, sue out an attachment against his estate, and if the sheriff returned that he had attached any goods of the defendant, the plaintiff should be entitled to judgment. Here the object was not exactly to compel the appearance of the defendant, but to warn him to appear and defend the action. It had been before concluded that an appearance of the defendant was not indispensable, and the execution of the attachment of his property having been substituted for the personal service of the citation, it entitled the plaintiff to judgment and in personam. Now, it was the settled rule in such cases that the return of the marshal must be positive that the goods attached were the property of the defendant. It never was imagined that under this law the sheriff could assume that the goods the defendant had transferred by donation or otherwise to the prejudice of his creditors, was still his property and that he could by its seizure entitle the plaintiff to such a judgment against an absent defendant.

There was in this case, it is true, a peculiar reason for confining the sheriff to the seizure of the property owned and claimed by the defendant. It is the disturbance of such property only the defendant is presumed to notice. But this reason was only accidental. The essential foundation of the rule in every species of this class of process is that no one but the judgment creditor has any right to question the validity of such transfers of property, and therefore no party in directing, nor any officer in the execution, of process prior to judgment, can assume that such sales and transfers are null and void. The attachment in this case is not in all respects the same with the two we have mentioned, but it is a process before judgment. It is a provisional remedy allowed to secure effects to satisfy a judgment expected to be thereafter recovered, and is therefore within the principle stated: There is a judgment for $25, recovered for costs for the continuance of the action for the debt in the Fayette circuit court, mentioned in the petition; but there had been no execution issued thereon and returned "No property found," as required by the Code to entitle the creditor to maintain such suit, and have such process, in another court; and it is not supposed the sum was sufficient to give such court jurisdiction: therefore it is not supposed this matter was any portion of the grounds on which the attachment was ordered; nor that it having been inserted in the petition, had any influence on the effect of the process.

13. "Defendant's property," in the Code: But this particular writ and proceeding was allowed and directed by a new law, and we must ascertain whether in its provisions there has been any alteration made in the general rules which have determined the effect of such process. It is allowed in every civil action, whether in equity or at common law, in eight several cases, and may be had either at the commencement of the suit or at any time before judgment. It is not intended as a substitute for personal or constructive notice. We have seen that the law required the defendant to be summoned personally, or constructively warned to appear exactly as if no such process had issued. But its object is for the satisfaction of a judgment when obtained and to this end it directs the sheriff to attach an amount of the property of the defendant, or sufficient for this purpose, and authorizes the seizure in one mode or another of every species of effects movable or immovable, corporeal or incorporeal, in possession, expectancy, or in action, not exempt by law from execution. It will not be necessary to state the several directions for the execution of the process, or the proceedings upon it, because none of them has the slightest appearance of a departure from the principles mentioned except one. It declares that "an order of attachment binds the defendant's property in the county, which might be seized under an execution against him, from the time of the delivery of the order to the sheriff; and the lien of the plaintiff is completed upon any property or demand of the defendant by executing the order upon it in the manner directed in this article." Section 223. And it might be at first supposed that the object here was first to declare in what category or predicament of the property, in what mode of its relative ownership, in respect to the parties, it was subject to this process of attachment and to establish for the rule, that wherever it was in a condition of relative ownership which rendered it subject to seizure under a fieri facias on a judgment against a defendant, it was subject to the attachment against his property. But a very brief examination of the words and the context of the law will show that the purpose was altogether different. It had been just before declared that where there were several attachments against the same person they should be levied according to the order in which they had come to the hands of the sheriff and thereupon directions had been given how the seizure should be made of every species of property, effects, and demands. It was then intended—it appears—to recognize the established principle that every attachment had its effect upon the property attached from the date it was seized, and to make this the general rule. But it was designed that one class of property, consisting of goods and lands wherein the defendant had certain legal estate, and other such property within the county, should be affected and bound from the time the sheriff received the process which commanded him to make the seizure—wherefore, in order to define this class of property without a tedious enumeration of the articles or other such inconvenient mode, it was declared that the attachment should bind such property of the defendant as might be seized and sold under execution from the day the sheriff received the process. In other words that the seizure, whenever made, should relate back to that day as in case of the execution. The object, it is manifest, was not to define the property nor the predicament of the property which was subject to be seized under the attachment, but merely to define the property which when attached was to be bound from the day when the sheriff first received the writ: and might have made the seizure. There is in fact no ambiguity in the enactment. But if it were subject to two constructions, it is an axiom that an ancient and well-established rule is not abrogated by adopting a doubtful construction of a new enactment which is not necessary to accomplish the manifest object of the law; and here there is no such necessity.

This Code of Practice provides a mode most facile in which the creditor in such cases may recover his debt and have his money levied with the greatest celerity, without at all departing from the rule in question. In his "ordinary" or common-law action against his debtor he is allowed, when necessary, to make defendants all the fraudulent vendees of his debtor's property, together with the debtors of his debtor; and thereupon have his injunction, attachment, or provisional seizure; and having thus had his debts secured by bonds for the forthcoming of the property or the delivery of it to a receiver of the court, he may proceed in the same time to prepare for the trial of his principal and all the incidental actions, bring them all on for trial at once, thereupon have both a judgment for his debt and an order for it to be levied or paid out of the attached objects. It might even happen that the court having in the meantime had the attached property sold by the receiver and its proceeds brought into court, the creditor would receive his money the same hour the judgment was recorded. Now there is certainly nothing in these provisions which favors the supposition that it was intended to alter the common law which had determined the effect of such an attachment or to afford an apology for an officer's seizing property not within the terms of the writ. The plaintiff has a right, on a proper case, to have an order for process against the property of any defendants, for the conservation of the specific or determinate objects of property he seeks to subject to his demand.

These plaintiffs might have had an order enjoining John Manier, Jr., from selling or removing these slaves, with the requirement of a bond for the observance of the injunction, and an order that if such bond should not be given that the slaves should be seized and consigned to a receiver of the court. But they took an order for an attachment of the property of their debtor only, and which gave the sheriff no authority to seize the slaves sought to be subjected unless they were his property. But it was alleged—and it is now supposed and averred in this plea—that these slaves were his property, except that they had been sold and transferred, with intent to delay and defraud his creditors, to John Manier, the younger. But on this fact they were—as between the two parties—exactly as much the property of the younger Manier as if they had been born his property. No one had a right to question the validity of such sale but a judgment creditor. And there was no judgment. It follows that the seizure of them by the sheriff was not commanded by the attachment, and therefore did not carry the property into the custody of the court.

14. Rights affected by an action: But was the property otherwise so situated as to be exempt from the jurisdiction of this court? The suit in the state court was among other things to set aside a sale of the property by one defendant to the other, and to subject it to the demand of the plaintiff against the vendor. But the plaintiff in the action here was no party to that suit and therefore cannot be affected by its pendency, nor by any judgment that may be rendered in it, unless he derived his title to the property from one of the parties subsequent to the institution of that suit; and no such deduction of title is alleged. The plaintiff stands here affirming that he was himself the owner of the property, and complaining that it was wrongfully taken from him without the authority of any process of that action, demands his remedy. Has the court jurisdiction? or must it refer him to the court where these other persons are in controversy about their rights in or upon the property between themselves on grounds which it does not appear in any wise involve either him or his title? The statement of the question ought to be sufficient to suggest the answer.

15. Intervention and opposition, elective: The plaintiff had, no doubt, the right to go into the Clarke circuit court and there on his "Third Person's Opposition" to the seizure and detention of his property under color of its process ask its surrender; or by intervention in the controversy there pending in respect to it, have its title established against the parties to that action. But had he not his election to bring his action elsewhere? The owner is not necessitated to intervene in an action between other persons concerning his property, but may institute his own action elsewhere against any of the parties who had taken or detained it from him, and on recovering a judgment have it specifically executed immediately, unless the property be in the custody of the other court—and in such case he may rest on his judgment until the determination of such suit: when if a defendant to his judgment shall have prevailed and obtained, or been restored to the possession, he may have the specific execution. This of course he might not be able to do if a party against whom he had not obtained such judgment prevailed; and in such case it might be necessary for the owner to commence a new action—hence the convenience of the intervention.

But here the defendant was no party to any such suit, nor was the property in the custody of any court. This is the whole case: The plaintiff's slaves were sold by one man to another; a third party, alleging this sale was fraudulent as to him, brought his action against the vendor and vendee, did not obtain an attachment against the slaves but against the property of the vendor: under this process the slaves were seized and detained by the sheriff. Was his only remedy by appearing in a court which had no custody of his property, and there opposing the wrongful actions of its officers, or intervening in a cause where his rights were not in litigation? He had his election, and this court has jurisdiction. The demurrer is sustained. The defendant may answer over.

MATSON (BLOOMER v.). See Case No. 18,242.

MERCHANT SERVICE—CHARGE TO GRAND JURY IN RELATION TO THE MERCHANT SERVICE. See Case No. 18,249.

MILLIGAN (BLOOMER v.). See Case No. 18,242.

MILLS, BELKNAP (CROMPTON v.). See Case No. 18,285.

MOREHOUSE (ARCHER v.). See Case No. 18,225.

N.

Case No. 18,310.

NATIONAL BANK OF COMMERCE v.
NATIONAL BANK OF MISSOURI.

[The Public (N. Y.) Oct. 10, 1878, p. 229.]

Circuit Court, D. Missouri. Oct., 1878.

NATIONAL BANKS — POWER TO BORROW MONEY —
LOANS TO DIRECTORS.

[A national bank may borrow money for the purpose of lending the same again to others with a view to making a profit. It may lend money, in good faith, without any fraudulent intent, to its directors as well as to others, provided the amount so loaned does not exceed the limitation of one-tenth of the capital stock actually paid in. Therefore one national bank, which loans money to another, knowing that the latter intends to loan the same to its directors, may recover the same from the borrowing bank, if it had no knowledge of any fraudulent intent in making the loans to the directors, even though the directors failed to repay the same.]

[Cited in brief in Seligman v. Charlottesville Nat. Bank, Case No. 12,642.]

This was an action at law by the National Bank of Commerce, of New York, against the National Bank of Missouri, of St. Louis, which suspended in June, 1877, to recover $400,000 and accrued interest, the remainder of a loan of $1,000,000 made by the plaintiff to the defendant. In 1866 James B. Eads, James H. Britton, John J. Roe, Charles K. Dickson, Amos Cotting, Barton Bates, and John A. Ubsdell, the directors of the National Bank of Missouri, borrowed $1,000,000 of the circulating notes of the National Bank of Commerce. The claim for the unpaid balance was presented to the receiver of the defunct bank, and he declined to allow it, on the ground that the bank had not borrowed the money, but that it was borrowed by the above-named directors, and used by them for their individual benefit, and that the bank did not enjoy the advantage of the loan. An attempt was also made to show that the defendant had no right to borrow money to loan again, and that a loan of this character was illegal, and known to the plaintiff to be illegal when made. It was shown, in effect, that when the negotiations with the Bank of Commerce were opened, Mr. Eads and the other gentlemen named were not directors of the State Bank, but by large purchases of the stock became possessors of a majority and elected themselves directors October 31, 1866, and that the loan was completed in the name of the bank by contract dated December 26, 1866, by the newly-elected directors. Testimony was given to show that the loan was made only for the use of the directors, because the bank itself had at the time $1,000,000 in cash and $680,000 in bonds on deposit with the Bank of Commerce, and it was part of the contract that this deposit should remain as security until the loan was paid.

30 Fed.Cas.—71

The testimony adduced in the case shows that the $1,000,000 loan was made by the defendant a special account entered in a book entitled "Bank of Commerce, No. 3." The directors gave their check on the funds of the pool and drew out money till it was all exhausted except $3,000, which stands to-day to their credit on the books of the suspended bank. These directors returned to the pool the amount that was paid back to the New York bank,—namely, $600,000,—but had paid back none of the balance of $400,000.

DILLON, Circuit Judge (charging jury). Under the pleadings, the defendant's counsel conceded at the opening of the trial that the plaintiff was entitled to the sum of $400,000 with 6 per cent. interest, amounting in all to the sum of $445,582.10, unless the defendant established one or both of its special defences to the action, and accordingly the defendant assumed the burden of proof to make out such defences. The defendant has accordingly produced its evidence, and at its close the plaintiff's counsel moves the court for a direction to the jury that such evidence has failed to establish these, or either of them, and that, notwithstanding the defendant's evidence, and all inferences which the jury can legitimately or properly draw from it, the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict.

The defences relied on are two:

1. That the contract of December 26, 1866, between the defendant bank and others, and which is the basis of this suit, and under which the $1,000,000 was lent by the plaintiff bank, is ultra vires the lawful power of the defendant bank; that is to say, that this contract was one which the defendant bank had no power, under its charter, to make under any circumstances, or, at all events, had no power to make except in case the situation and exigency of its affairs required it to borrow money, and that its situation was such that it did not need to borrow this large sum of money, or any other sum of money, and that knowledge of this fact is, by the evidence, fairly brought home to the plaintiff bank. I am of opinion that a national banking association has, under the national banking act [13 Stat. 99], the power to borrow money, and that the defendant bank, in the absence of fraud brought to the knowledge of plaintiff bank, had the power to enter into the contract of December 26, 1866, which is the foundation of this action. The legal power of the bank to borrow money does not depend upon any exigency or upon the existence of a critical condition of its affairs, or upon an actual necessity for the immediate use of the sum borrowed. It may borrow money to conduct and carry on the business of banking, and it may borrow for the express purpose of lending the same, either by discounting the notes, bills, etc., of others or on personal security, with a view to profit by the transaction. The loan of money to a national bank is not invalid because the lender may know or have reason to believe that the borrowing bank intends to lend it, when received, to others. A national bank may lend its money to its directors as well as to other persons, provided it acts in good faith and does not exceed the limitation to any one person or director of "one-tenth part of the amount of the capital stock of the association actually paid in." There is no claim that this limitation was exceeded in this case, as the capital stock of the bank was $3,410,000 actually paid in. If the law were that a national bank could not borrow money for the purpose of lending the same again to its directors, and that if the lender knew that such was the purpose of the borrowing bank, the transaction would necessarily be invalid. I admit that the evidence in the case is such as to justify the court to submit the question of the plaintiff's knowledge of such a purpose to the jury. But I am of opinion that where no fraud is intended a national bank may lend its money to its directors, and the fact that the lender knows, or has reason to believe, that when the money he lends is received it will be lent to the directors, does not, unless he knows, or has good reason to believe, that a fraudulent use or disposition of it is contemplated by the directors when received, invalidate the transaction. The directors had no more power over the $1,000,000 obtained under the contract in suit than they had over the $1,000,000 which the defendant bank had on ordinary deposit with the plaintiff bank, or over the $3,000,000 of capital actually paid in. A lender cannot knowingly aid an intended fraud, but he is not required not to lend because the borrowing bank may misuse their powers.

2. The second defence is that the money was procured by the defendant's directors (who signed the contract in suit professedly as sureties), not for the bank, but for their own purposes, and that they fraudulently made use of the name of the defendant bank as principal, intending all the time illegally to appropriate the money, when received, to their own use, and that the plaintiff bank had knowledge of such intended illegal appropriation of the money. These facts, if established, would constitute a defence, but after carefully considering all of the evidence touching this matter, I think that while it would justify the jury in finding that the directors of the defendant bank, when the money was received, intended to borrow the same from the bank of which they were directors, and thus get the use of it, I can see no basis in the evidence which would justify the jury in finding that the plaintiff bank knew that the directors of the defendant bank, when the money was received, intended to make any fraudulent use or disposition of it. If the jury should so find, I shall deem it my duty to set aside their verdict, and hence there is no propriety in uselessly submitting this question to them. I therefore instruct you, gentlemen of the jury, that the defences relied on have failed, and that you shall return a verdict for the plaintiff.

The jury brought in a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $445,582. The case has been appealed to the United States supreme court, the receiver of the National Bank of Missouri having been made a party defendant.

NATIONAL BANK OF MISSOURI (NATIONAL BANK OF COMMERCE v.).
See Case No. 18,310.

NATIONAL BANKS—CHARGE TO GRAND JURY IN RELATION TO FRAUDS OF OFFICERS OF NATIONAL BANKS.
See Case No. 18,246.

NEUTRALITY LAWS—CHARGE TO GRAND JURY IN RELATION TO NEUTRALITY LAWS. See Cases Nos. 18,264-18,269.

O.

OFFICERS—CHARGE TO GRAND JURY IN RELATION TO FRAUDS OF OFFICERS OF NATIONAL BANKS. See Case No. 18,246.

P.

Case No. 18,311.

Case of PEA PATCH ISLAND.

[1 Wall. Jr. Append. ix.]¹

Arbitration at Philadelphia. Jan. 15, 1848.

BOUNDARIES—DELAWARE AND NEW JERSEY.

The territory of the state of Delaware within the "twelve miles circle" extends across the Delaware river to low water mark on the Jersey shore.

About the year 1783-84, there appeared at low tide in the Delaware river, about five miles below New Castle, a small muddy exposure of the soil, "about the size," as was testified, "of a man's hat." By the force of alluvion and deposit the exposure became larger and larger, until, by degrees, it formed an island of about 87 acres, which in consequence of a tradition that a vessel laden with peas had once sunk on the spot where the island afterwards rose, got the name of the "Pea Patch Island." In 1784, the proprietaries of West Jersey granted this island, describing it as situate in Salem county, New Jersey, to persons whose title became afterwards vested in Dr. Henry Gale of that state; and in 1831, the same state, by an act of its legislature, relinquished to Dr. Gale whatever interest it might have in the island. It had previously declared that its west boundary, at this place, came to the middle of the main channel of the Delaware river, a location which, as the main channel was then supposed to run, included the Pea Patch Island as within the territory of New Jersey. In 1813, the state of Delaware, by an act of its legislature, conveyed the island to the United States, who soon after took possession of it and began to erect a fortress upon it. In consequence of these two grants, a controversy as to the right to the island began between Dr. Gale, claiming under the title of New Jersey, and the United States claiming under that of Delaware. In the ordinary case of a dispute as to title between an individual and the government, the matter would not have attracted public notice; but this case differed in several respects from an ordinary case. In the first place, it brought in question the boundary between the states of New Jersey and Delaware; and to common apprehension it brought, moreover, some disparagement to one state or the other, both of which had apparently treated the island as within its own limits; and both of which, it was asserted, had granted it away, as its own property. Public attention was moreover directed to the matter from the accidental position of the island itself. Above it lie many principal towns or cities of the three states of Delaware, Pennsylvania and New Jersey, which could be readily devastated by an enemy's fleet unless the river was protected from below; while it so happens, from the width, the course, or the shifting character of the Delaware channel, that there is scarcely any point either above or below, that offers a place where adequate defences could be erected for any of them. This island, however, constitutes the key of defence of the whole river. It stands just in the centre of its entrance and commands its two channels, of which the deepest runs close along its side, and the other is so curved as to lie for a great distance directly and most favourably exposed to its guns. A fortress had been partially erected on the island by the United States during the war of 1812, but was destroyed by fire some years after. And all the towns along the Delaware river, lying, as already stated, naked to attack from any enemy who might pass up it, were kept in great uneasiness during those many years in which the "Maine Boundary," the "French Indemnity," the "McCleod Arrest" and the "Oregon Boundary" had kept our relations with the two great naval powers of France and England in uncertainty, and put them, at times, in danger of immediate rupture. Of course, they were constantly imploring congress to complete or rebuild the fortress upon this island, the only place, as all agreed, where an adequate defence could be erected; while at the same time the New Jersey claimants would appear with assertions of title to the island, fortified by written opinions from the law officers of the government itself,² and by remonstrances from citizens of New Jersey against such an unlawful invasion of their territory as was contemplated by assuming possession of the island, except under grant of the individual proprietor. In addition to this, the matter had attracted attention from a great number of unsuccessful attempts—necessarily public ones—by the departments and by congress to settle it; from an uncommon number of opinions of directly opposite conclusion, from lawyers of public name, both those connected with the government and those in private station; and finally from two judgments in two different circuits of the United States, which were in like conflict, and under which, in a suit between the same parties, the harmonious operation of the federal courts was made the witness of a marshal of one district turning out of possession the tenants who had lately been put in by the marshal of another! It would unnecessarily incur this preliminary history of the case to record the various presidential recommendations, the reports of committees, the opinions of district attorneys, solicitors of the treasury and attorneys general of the United States, the congressional debates, and the various abortive agreements entered into by the departments with a view to settle the question. It would be the history of litigation and claim diligently pursued for three and thirty years; and which at last, by opinions and agreements, verdicts and legislation, had knotted and tied itself into such a complication of tangles, that it seemed past the possibility of any ordinary process of justice ever to unfold and draw it straight. And when it was remembered that opinions of directly opposite conclusion on the title, had been given by Messrs. Rodney and Geo. Read of Delaware, by Messrs. Richard Stockton, McIlvaine, Southard, G. D. Wall and J. S. Green of New Jersey, by Mr. Willis Hall of New York, by Messrs. Penrose and Gilpin, solicitors of the treasury, and finally by Messrs. B. F. Butler and Légaré, attorneys general of the United States, it was not wonderful that both congress and claimant should nearly give over in despair, all hopes of coming to any satisfactory conclusion; that the petitioner should have been weary of invoking the attention of congress, and that congress should have been impatient in listening to the prayers of the petitioner!

In this state of long protracted litigation and treaty, on the 8th of August, 1846, when the Oregon boundary had lately been giving to our relations with Great Britain a mencing aspect, congress passed an act [9 Stat. 67], authorizing the president of the United States "to take such steps as he may deem advisable for adjusting the title to the Pea Patch Island." In pursuance of this authority, communications were had between the president, in behalf of the United States, and the Hon. John H. Eaton, counsel of the New Jersey claimant, by which it was agreed to submit the question of the title to the arbitration of some professional gentleman, in whose ability, learning and honour both parties should have such implicit confidence, as to be willing to accept, as final and conclusive, whatever award he might make upon the question. Mr. Eaton having nominated to the president four gentlemen of this character from the District of Columbia, the states of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and New York, President Polk made choice of the Honourable John Sergeant of Pennsylvania, one of the persons named; a selection which was at once responded to by the other side as eminently acceptable. Accordingly on the 27th February, 1847, articles of agreement under seal were concluded between the Hon. W. L. Marcy, secretary of war of the United States, acting with the approbation of the president of the United States, of the one part, and James Humphrey, in whom Dr. Gale's title had become vested, of the other, by which they mutually appointed John Sergeant, Esquire, of Philadelphia sole arbitrator, with full power and authority, at such times and places as he might appoint, to examine witnesses and receive evidence according to the rules of law and equity, and to decide the question of the title to the said Pea Patch Island, as derived by the United States from the state of Delaware and by the said James Humphrey, claiming through Henry Gale, deceased, from the state of New Jersey. His decision and award made in writing to be final and conclusive.

² Hon. G. D. Wall, D. A. U. S. for New Jersey, J. S. Green, Esq., holding at a later date, the same office, and Mr. B. F. Butler, A. G. U. S., had all given opinions in favour of the right of Mr. Humphrey, claiming under the state of New Jersey.

¹ [Reported by John William Wallace, Esq.]

The matter being one to which publick attention in Eastern Pennsylvania, in New Jersey and Delaware had long been directed, Mr. Sergeant readily complied with the wish, very generally existing, that the case should be heard publicly; and the county of Philadelphia having offered to the arbitrator its principal judicial chamber, and the city of Philadelphia having likewise placed at his disposal the hall in which Independence was declared, the case, which occupied twenty-one days in the trial, was heard partly in the former room and partly in the latter, to which it was found convenient after a certain time to adjourn. The United States, were represented by special counsel, to wit, the Honourable John M. Clayton of Delaware, formerly chief justice of that state, and now its representative in the senate of the United States, and by James A. Bayard, Esq., of the same state, formerly district attorney of Delaware, for the United States. Mr. James Humphrey was represented by the Honourable George M. Bibb of Kentucky, successively a judge, chief justice and chancellor of that state, also, at one time, its representative in the senate of the United States, and more lately the secretary of the treasury of the United States under President Tyler: and by the Honourable John H. Eaton, of Tennessee, secretary at war under President Jackson, and subsequently minister plenipotentiary of the United States at the court of Spain. The case was learnedly and deliberately argued on both sides; and Mr. Sergeant, after taking several weeks consideration of it, having delivered a written opinion setting forth very fully the grounds of his award, it has been thought worth while thus to preserve some record of the proceeding. Of the value of the opinion, the reporter cannot speak more appropriately than in language which he finds in a contemporaneous publication: "Mr. Sergeant's opinion it is true," said one of the journals of Philadelphia (the North American and United States Gazette of January 17, 1848), in speaking of its delivery, "is not the judgment of a supreme court, and therefore is not authority in the technical sense of that word; but as the well reasoned opinion of a very able lawyer—whose greater distinction in his profession has made him unsolicitous about judicial station—and as having been formed after full and grave publick argument before him for many days together by other very able lawyers, it is far more authoritative than any opinion merely professional, and has all the intrinsic weight of the highest judicial opinion. It can scarcely be reversed in any case which may again involve the question of this boundary, and will take its place, of course, among the most enduring historical monuments of the states of New Jersey and Delaware.

The case as it appeared on both sides was as follows:

Title of Mr. Humphrey: On the 12th March, 1663-64, England being at that time at war with the Dutch, Charles II. by letters patent, granted in fee to his brother James, Duke of York, all that part of the main land of New England, beginning at St. Croix next adjoining New Scotland in America, &c. &c., and also all that island called Matowacks or Long Island, situate to the west of Cape Cod and the narrow higansetts, abutting upon the main land between the two rivers called Connecticut and Hudson rivers, "together also with the said river called Hudson's river, and all the lands from the west side of the Connecticut to the east side of Delaware Bay," with certain islands, and with all the lands, islands, soils, rivers, harbours, mines, minerals, quarries, woods, marshes, waters, lakes, fishings, &c., and all other royalties, profits, commodities and hereditaments to the said islands, lands and premises belonging and appertaining, with their and every of their appurtenances, and all our estate, &c., of, in and to the said lands and premises or any part or parcel thereof, with powers of government in extenso, and to exercise them, "not only within the precincts of the said territories and islands, but also upon the seas in going and coming to and from the same," as the duke and his assigns, &c., should think "for the good of the adventurers and inhabitants there:" with further power to admit any persons "to trade and traffique unto and within the said territories and islands," and to encounter, expulse, repel and resist by force of arms, "as well by sea as by land," all persons who without the duke's leave, "should attempt to inhabit within the several precincts and limits of our said territories and islands." Leaming & S. Laws N. J. 3-8.

The object of this grant was to enable the duke to dispossess the Dutch, who were then in possession of much of New York, New Jersey and Delaware, under the name of New Netherlands.

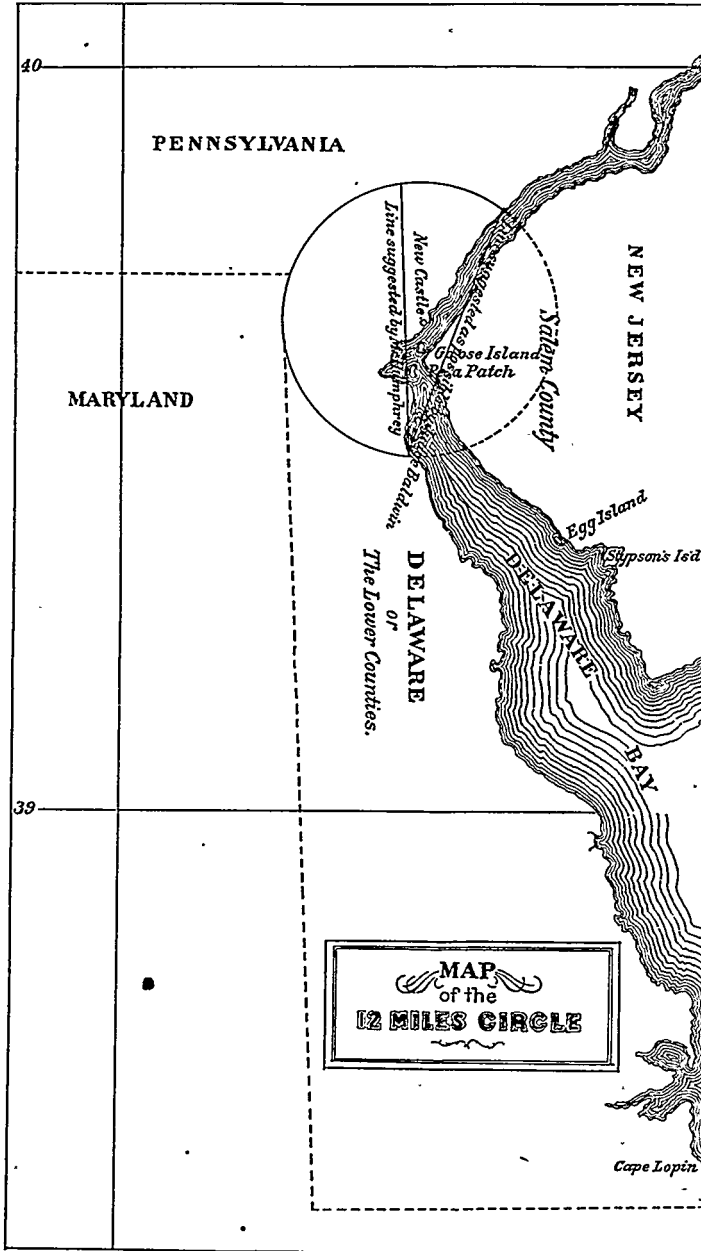

The Duke of York on the 23d and 24th June, 1664, reciting the king's grant to him, conveyed to Lord Berkeley and Sir Geo. Carteret the territory now known as New Jersey, describing it as bounded on the east, part by the main sea, and part by Hudson's river, "and hath upon the west, Delaware bay or river:" with all rivers, fishing, &c. and all other royalties, &c. to the said lands and premises belonging or in any wise appertaining, as fully as the duke himself had them. Leaming & S. Laws N. J. 8-11.

The object of this deed was the colonization of New Jersey, and under it Berkeley and Carteret entered and colonized that state accordingly.

It is unnecessary here to recite the various mesne conveyances and undisputed early historical facts through which Mr. Humphrey formally deduced his title; or to state more than that on the 7th November, 1743, the proprietors of West Jersey—in which portion of the state the Pea Patch Island was admitted to be, if in any—directed their surveyor to survey, &c., “600 acres of unappropriated land,” any where in that division, and, on the 7th August, 1782, to survey 5000 acres of like land, in the same division: and that two persons named Hall, having acquired 126 acres of the warrant and a half miles and about south half a point west from the Tile house at New Castle; containing one hundred and seventy-eight acres of marsh land, bank and mud flats and allowance for roads.” This survey was returned on the 27th of the same month, and being approved by the council of proprietors, was recorded accordingly. At the date of this survey the Pea Patch was just visible at low water, “about of 1782, and 521/20 acres of that of 1743, caused a survey to be made on the 8th October, 1784, on an “island,” as appeared by the return of survey, “called the Pea Patch, situate in the county of Salem, about one mile west from Finn’s Point, in Penn’s Neck, and is about west of the mouth of Salem creek, a little above Reedy Point; also nearly south-east and by east from Hamburg, about two the size of a man’s hat.” As the tide rose it was covered by water, and even in 1815, when the government of the United States took possession of it and embanked it, it was not unfrequently under water at high tide. In February, 1813, the title of the Halls was vested in Dr. Gale, through whom Mr. Humphrey claimed by a regular chain. On the 24th November, 1831, the Pea Patch, having become, in the meantime, by alluvion, deposit and embankment, a large island, and entirely above the point to which the tide rises even in its highest elevation, the state of New Jersey passed an act of assembly, "vesting in Henry Gale, his heirs and assigns, all the right and title of the state of New Jersey of, in and to an island called the Pea Patch, situate in the river Delaware, in the county of Salem, and state of New Jersey." The act after reciting that "it hath been suggested that the state of New Jersey hath some title" to the island, and that by reason thereof doubts have arisen concerning the title of the said Henry Gale, enacts that "all the right and title of the said state of New Jersey to the said island called the Pea Patch, situate in the river Delaware, in the township of Lower Penn's Neck, in the county of Salem, in the state of New Jersey," &c., as mentioned in the original survey of the island, be granted and conveyed to the said H. G., his heirs and assigns, and be vested in him and them "in as full and ample a manner as the state of New Jersey hath right and title to grant and convey the same," reserving jurisdiction and sovereignty, &c. 2 Harrison's Laws N. J. 366.

In order to show that the deeds from the king and duke had always been considered and acted upon from early times as not limiting the state of New Jersey to low water mark in the Delaware bay and river, or at any rate that the state had never been so bounded de facto, Mr. Humphrey's counsel adduced several statutes and public facts and records of that state, as follows:

March 3, 1676, the proprietaries of West New Jersey—William Penn himself being one of them—by certain articles of concession and agreement, which constituted a sort of charter or fundamental law, grant convenient portions of lands for wharves, keys and harbours; and that all lands laid out for the said purposes shall be exempt from taxes; and that the inhabitants of the province have free passage through or by any seas, bounds, creeks, rivers, rivulets in the said province, through or by which they must necessarily pass to come from the main ocean to any part of the province aforesaid. And, further, that all the inhabitants within the said province have liberty of fishing in Delaware river. Leaming & S. Laws N. J. 390; also, to the same effect, Id. 409.

In 1679 and 1680, Sir Edmund Andros, the governor for the Duke of York, of the colony of New York, which had been conveyed (inter alia with New Jersey) to the duke, by King Charles II. imposed a duty of ten per cent. upon all European goods imported into the Delaware, which was collected at the Hoar Kills, or Lewistown, as it is now called. But it was discontinued at the instance of the proprietors of New Jersey, who, in their remonstrance, insist that they have a right to land any where in the Delaware Bay, as the bounds of the country they bought; that the right of colonizing was part of their bargain; that they bought the soil and right of government together; and that the powers of government limited them to erect no polity contrary to the laws of England; and that, with this restriction, they had the right of making laws for the good of the adventurer and planter; that if the duke claims it by the ius regale, that power over the territory constituting New Jersey is vested in his alienees. Smith, Hist. N. J. 116.

In 1682, the legislature of New Jersey resolved that the land and government of West New Jersey were purchased together. Smith, Hist. N. J. 163.

On the 3d October, 1693, the assembly of West New Jersey passed an act reciting that the whalery in Delaware Bay has been in so great a measure invaded by strangers and foreigners, that the greatest part of the oil, &c., got by that employ, has been exported out of the province, &c.; and enacting that all persons not residing within the precincts of this province, or within the province of Pennsylvania, who shall kill or bring on shore any whale or whales "within Delaware Bay or elsewhere within the boundaries of this government," shall pay one-tenth of the oil, &c. to the governor, &c. Leaming & S. Laws N. J. 519.

In 1701 or 1702, the proprietors of East New Jersey, treating with the lords of the council of trade and foreign plantations about a surrender to the crown, of the powers of government of the state, which was then contemplated, request the king to confirm to them certain rights and privileges, among which is that of having all "wrecks and royal fish that shall be forfeited, found or taken within East New Jersey or by the inhabitants thereof, within the seas adjacent" (Leaming & S. Laws N. J. 588, 590, 591), as they had the same under a then existing grant. Though the answer of the commissioners does not give them a fully satisfactory answer, it does not deny that these rights and privileges were then lawfully enjoyed by the proprietors (Id. 596).

On the 23d August, 1725, the legislature of New Jersey passed a revenue act, laying taxes upon eight different ferries along the Delaware river, from Trenton to Gloucester across to the other shore: and for the effectual compelling of the said boats, flats or wherries belonging to the neighbouring colonies to pay such taxes as aforesaid, it enacts that "all boats, flats or wherries, that carry goods or passengers for hire as aforesaid, that shall not first pay unto the collector of his majesty's customs, &c. and get a certificate that he has paid the tax aforesaid, shall forfeit for every offence," &c. Wm. Bradford's Laws N. J. 1717, pp. 129, 130.

In 1765, the legislature of New Jersey passed "An act to regulate the method of taking fish in the river Delaware, and to prevent obstructions in the navigation thereof, and for other purposes therein mentioned." This act, which was limited to five years, and was to be dependent for its force upon the passage of a similar act by Pennsylvania, was revived conditionally, with a supplement to it passed in 1768, in the year 1771. Allinson's Laws N. J. 279, 313, 367. Pennsylvania did not pass any similar act, and the act of New Jersey not having become operative, nothing beyond its title is given in the volume referred to.

On the 21st December, 1771, the same legislature passed "An act declaring the river Delaware a common highway, and for improving the navigation in the said river." Allinson's Laws N. J. 347. It recites that the improving the navigation on rivers is of great importance to trade and commerce; that the river Delaware may be rendered much more navigable than it now is; that many persons, desirous to promote the publick welfare, had subscribed large sums of money for the purpose aforesaid, and that it was represented others will do the same if commissioners are appointed to receive subscriptions. It then enacts "that the river Delaware shall be and it hereby is declared to be a common highway for the purposes of navigation up and down the same." It then appoints commissioners to collect subscriptions, and "so much of the said moneys as may be necessary for that purpose, to lay out and apply for, and towards improving the navigation in the said river Delaware, from the lower part of the falls near Trenton, to the river Lehigh at Easton: and the residue thereof to lay out and apply for and towards improving the navigation in that part of the said river, above the said river Lehigh." It next enacts (section 3) that the commissioners, &c., shall have "full power and authority to clear, scour, open, enlarge, straighten, or deepen the said river, wherever it shall to them appear useful for improving the channels; and also to remove any obstructions whatsoever, either natural or artificial, which may or can in any manner hinder or impede the navigation in the said river: and to make and set up in the said river any dams, pens for water-locks, or any other works whatsoever, and the same to alter and repair as they shall think fit: and also to appoint, set out and make near the said river, paths or ways, which shall be free and open for all persons having occasion to use the same for towing, hauling or drawing any vessels, boats, small craft and rafts of any kind whatsoever; and from time to time to do and execute every other matter or thing necessary or convenient for improving the navigation in the said river." It afterwards (section 5) "makes it penal to hinder the commissioners or to obstruct the navigation of the river;" and, by section 6, that "every offence committed in or on the said river, against this act, shall be laid to be committed, and may be tried and determined as aforesaid in any of the counties opposite to or joining on that part of the said river, on which such offence shall be committed."

On the 28th November, 1822 the legislature of New Jersey passed an act relative to certain of its boundaries, in which it was enacted that the west boundary of certain counties, including Salem county, in which the Pea Patch was said to be, should be "the main ship channel of the river Delaware." 2 Harrison's Laws N. J. 39, § 4.

On the other hand, there were certain public acts of New Jersey which looked as if the state had considered that its west boundary came but to low water mark in the river.

Thus, in 1674 and in 1680, New Jersey having been conquered by the Dutch since the deeds of the Duke of York, 23d and 24th June, 1664, and restored again to England—the duke, by two new deeds, made after a regrant by the crown to him, and with a view, it is probable, to prevent any question of title, regrants the same territory previously granted, describing it on its west boundary, not as in the former deed, as "having on the west, Delaware river," but, in one deed, as extending "along," and, in another, as running "up" the Delaware. Leaming & S. Laws N. J. 47, 414.

So in February, 1681, the commissioners for settling and regulating lands in West Jersey agree, with the approbation of the governor and council, that the surveyor shall measure the front of the river Delaware, beginning at Assispink creek, (a creek which empties into the Delaware at Trenton,) and "from thence down to Cape May," and that every ten proprietors shall have their proportion of front "to the river." Leaming & S. Laws N. J. 436.

So in July, 1683, the assembly of West Jersey enact that the proprietary of the province of Pennsylvania be treated with in reference to the rights and privileges of this province "to or in the river Delaware." Leaming & S. Laws N. J. 480.

So on the 21st January, 1709, the general assembly of New Jersey passed "An act for dividing and ascertaining the boundaries of all the counties in this province;" which recites that by the uncertainty of the boundaries of the counties of the province, great inconveniences have arisen, so that the respective officers of most of those counties cannot know the limits of them: For preventing which in time to come, and the better ascertaining the boundaries, it enacts, &c. (after having settled the boundaries of other counties as running "to" or "by" or "up" or "down" the Delaware bay or river,) that Salem county begins "at the mouth" of a certain creek which empties into Delaware Bay. The act then carries the boundary round by that creek and certain lines "to Delaware river, then down Delaware river and bay to the place of beginning."³ It is to be remarked, however, that where counties are divided by creeks or rivers, this act frequently brings the boundaries of such counties only to those creeks or rivers on both sides, without extending the boundary into the stream; so that many of those creeks and rivers were left beyond any county jurisdiction whatever, until that matter was changed by an act of March 7, 1797, "declaring the jurisdiction of the several counties in this state, which are divided by rivers, creeks, bays, highways or roads." Id. 180.

On the 26th April, 1783, commissioners having been appointed by Pennsylvania, for the purpose of settling the jurisdiction of the river Delaware and islands within the same, New Jersey made an agreement, regulating the jurisdiction, &c., and treating the rights of the two states in the river as about equal, down to the upper portion of the twelve miles circle; which agreement was soon after ratified (by New Jersey, May 27, 1783; by Pennsylvania, September 20, 1783, Id. 41) by these two states and has regulated the matter ever since.

Title of the United States: At the date of the letters patent of March 12, 1663-64, already mentioned, from Charles II. to the Duke of York; the Dutch were in actual possession of New York, a portion of New Jersey and much of both sides, and particularly of the west side of Delaware bay and river; all which they held under the name of New Netherlands. To put the Duke of York in possession of his newly acquired estates, an English fleet was sent out under the command of Col. Richard Nicolls, who styles himself "principal commissioner for his majesty in New England, governor general under his royal highness, James Duke of York and Albany, &c., of all his territories in America and commander in chief of all the forces employed by his majesty to reduce the Dutch nation and all their usurped lands and plantations under his majesty's obedience." 4 The Dutch surrendered New York, August, 1664, and within a week afterwards Col. Nicolls sent Sir Robert Carre round into Delaware bay and river, to dispossess the Dutch there. 1 Hazzard, Pa. Reg. 37. This Dutch settlement appears to have been an appendage to the government of New York, or Manhattans, as it was then called, from which it originally sprung, and to which, as a superintending and protecting power, it appears to have constantly referred. Thus the original Dutch purchase of Delaware from the Indians in June, 1620, was concluded by the Indians in person at New York, and recorded there. 4 Hazzard, Pa. Reg. 82. So when the Swedes began to build a fort on the Delaware, about the year 1638, the director general of the New Netherlands, resident at New York, and appointed by the states general, advertises the Swedish commander, that the "whole South river has been many years in our possession, and above and below settled by our forts and also sealed by our blood." Id. So in 1646, the director general, allowed certain persons to settle upon the South river, on condition that they acknowledge the director and his council "for their lords and patrons," and submit to all taxes which they have laid or may lay. Id. 119. And there was produced before the arbitrator, ancient records of five Dutch patents for lands in Delaware, emanating from Governor Stuyvesant at New York, between the years 1664 and 1665, and recorded there (Id. 119, 120), which titles, Mr. Clayton informed the arbitrator, are recognized as valid in Delaware up to this day. Other Dutch records from New York shewed that in 1665 instructions were issued from the director general there, "for the vice director in the South river and the commissioners joined with them," in which minute directions are given as to the places in which lands are to be granted and streets laid out there (Id. 82), with various other instructions shewing that that district had a very close and depending relation upon the government at New York as a principal.

³ Statutes of New Jersey Revised and Published under the Authority of the Legislature. Trenton: Printed by Phillips & Boswell, 1847, p. 161.

⁴A. D. 1667; 4 Hazzard, Pa. Reg. 74. Several of the documents of which evidence was given on the trial, are found in this valuable repository; but more legal evidence of them was given before the arbitrator. Ancient records were produced, being the identical ones, apparently, which were given in evidence before Lord Hardwicke in 1750, on the hearing of Penns v. Ld. Baltimore. 1 Ves. Sr. 444.

In this condition of things, the Delaware country apparently stood in regard to the Dutch government at New York, when the latter surrendered to the English: And with the surrender of the principal government at New York, Sir Robert Carre had no difficulty, on the 1st October, 1664, in procuring a surrender of the settlement on the Delaware.

New York continued to be, under the English, as it had been under the Dutch, the seat of principal government; the English governours there, acting under a sort of double or mixed authority derived partly from the king and partly from the Duke of York. A variety of commissions and other publick documents, for example, were produced from Col. Nicolls, and other English governours there, granting lands in Delaware, constituting justices there, appointing collectors of customs, and doing various publick acts not necessary to be stated. In eight of them, including several grants of land,⁵ there was no recital of the authority under which the act professed to be done. In ten others, being most of them commissions to judicial office, there was a reference to "his majesty's service," or to power derived from "his majesty;" the act being sometimes done in "his majesty's name." In eleven others—including a grant of land, of which however the rent was reserved to the king—the power under which the act was done professed to be derived from the Duke of York. Two others recited a joint or double authority; being "by virtue of his majesty's letters patent, and the commission and authority given unto me by his royal highness." And a third one, a proclamation by Governour Andros, one of the British governours—on the re-conquest of New York from the Dutch—went as follows: "Whereas, it hath pleased his majesty and his royal highness, to send me with authority to receive this place and government, and to continue in command thereof under his royal highness, who hath given me his command for securing the rights and properties of the inhabitants, and that I should endeavour by all fitting means the good and welfare of this province and dependencies under his government, &c." 4 Hazzard, Pa. Reg. 55-57, 73-75, 81, 82. So again, when the Delaware country surrendered to Sir Robert Carre, Oct. 1, 1664, protection was to be afforded to all who "shall take the oath of allegiance to his majesty." While in directions from Gov. Nicolls and his council at New York, in 1663, "for the better settlement of the government on the Delaware," the newly appointed counsellors are to take the oaths to his royal highness; whose laws as established by him, are ordered to be shewed and frequently communicated to them, the said counsellors, and others." Id. 37, 38. A fact is also mentioned by the arbitrator in his opinion, as illustrative of some title in the duke, to wit, that after Mr. Penn, March 4, 1680-81, had obtained letters patent from Charles II. for the province of Pennsylvania, he took a release, August 21, 1682, from the Duke of York for the same premises.

But notwithstanding the great research of the counsel of the United States, aided by several other persons connected with historical societies and curious in archæology—whom the interest of the case had induced to study it—nothing precise was shewn as to the source from which the duke claimed to derive the power which it was in evidence that he actually exercised over the district now known as Delaware. Whether the duke was under the same mistake as Lord Baltimore, who, as late as 1737, in his answer to the bill of Penns v. Baltimore, swears that country is "on the east side" of the bay; which would have brought it strictly within the terms of the king's patent of March 12, 1663-4: Whether—taken in connection with the known object of the grant, which was the dispossession of the Dutch from all this region—he supposed that it passed under the clause of the patent, which gave him power to encounter and expulse, as well by sea as by land, any persons who should attempt to "inhabit within the several precincts and limits" of the territories granted with full appurtenances and with power to govern them: Whether he thought that the Dutch settlement on the Delaware, having been at all times, and at the very date of the conquest of New York, a part, "appendix," and dependency of that latter place, necessarily followed its course and fortune, and so passed into his hands by the terms of his patent, which gave him New York, and all powers of government over the country conveyed and all its appurtenances: Whether there might have been something, in some commission, or some instructions from the king to the English commander, which two centuries now rose up to hide from view, and by which a title by conquest might have enured to the duke and not to the crown: Whether the duke considered that he had no title in law, and took possession only as a successful conqueror, meaning to procure or make at some future time, a confirmation of what he did: Or whether, finally, he exercised the more usual privilege of royal and noble blood, and did not undergo the fatigue of thinking any thing about the subject: This was all matter on which speculation might exercise its ingenuity, but on which the case itself exhibited no direct evidence.⁶

However, possessing either a good title, an imperfect one, or no title at all, the Duke of York did, on the 24th of August, 1682, by a deed of feoffment with livery of seizin, convey to William Penn, in fee, "all that the town of New Castle, otherwise called Delaware, and all that tract of land lying within the compass or circle of twelve miles about the same, situate, lying and being upon the river Delaware, in America; and all the islands in the said river Delaware, and the said river and soil thereof, lying north of the southernmost part of the said circle of twelve miles about the said town, together with all rents, services, royalties, franchises, duties, jurisdictions," &c. &c. and all the estates, &c. "to have and to hold the said town and circle of twelve miles of land about the same, islands, and all other the before mentioned," &c. &c. The duke for himself, his heirs and assigns, then covenants and grants with and to Penn, his heirs and assigns, that he or they will, any time within seven years from the date of the deed, "do, make, execute or cause to be made, done, executed, all and every such further act and acts, conveyances and assurances in the law whatsoever, for the further conveying and assuring the said town and circle of twelve miles of land about the same, and islands and all other the premises with the appurtenances" to Penn in fee: after which he constitutes John Moll and Ephraim Herman, "jointly and either of them severally," his attorneys, and so gives them full powers for him and in his name and stead to enter into the premises granted, and every part of them, and to take quiet and peaceable possession or seizin of them, or any part or parcel in the name of the whole: And after taking such quiet and peaceable possession and seizin, to deliver the same to William Penn, his heirs and assigns, or to his and their lawful attorney. Ratifying, approving, &c.⁷

⁶ It would appear probable that no very precise notion was had by the duke himself or his governours, perhaps, as to the nature and extent of his right here: but Sir John Werden, his intelligent secretary, seems to have regarded it as a sort of pre-emption right rather than as a perfect title. When Mr. Penn was applying for a grant of Pennsylvania, the board of trade on the 14th June, 1680, refer his petition, before acting on it, to Sir John Werden, to know whether such a grant as Mr. Penn wanted, "would any way intrench upon the patent of his royal highness or otherwise prejudice the same." Sir John replies: "By all which I can observe of the boundaries mentioned in Mr. Penn's petition, they agree well enough with that colony or plantation which hath been hitherto (ever since the conquest of New York by Col. Nicolls,) held as an appendix and part of the government of New York, by the name of Delaware colony, or more particularly New Castle colony, that being the name of a principal place in it; the whole being planted promiscuously by Swedes, Finlanders, Dutch, and English; all which hath been actually under the government of his royal highness' lieutenants at New York hitherto. But what are its proper boundaries, (those of latitude and longitude being very little known, or so ill observed, as experience tells us in all the West Indies,) I am not able to say. If this be what Mr. Penn would have, I presume the right honourable the lords of the committee for trade and plantations, will not discourage his pretensions to it, because of what is mentioned, which plainly shew the duke's right preferable to all others (under his majesty's good liking) though it should not prove to be strictly within the limits of the duke's patent; but if it be, &c. &c." Letter of June 23, 1680. 1 Hazzard, Pa. Reg. 274.

⁵ In the Breviate, p. 42, mentioned post, there is a very long list of grants of land in Delaware, made by the English governours. These were referred to generally by the United States, but they are imperfect abstracts of the patents, and not material to be here copied.

The duke, on the same day, by a second deed of feoffment with livery of seizin, conveyed to William Penn, in fee, "all that tract of land upon Delaware river and bay, beginning twelve miles south from the town of New Castle, otherwise called Delaware, and extending south to the Hoar Kills, otherwise called Cape Henlopen, together with free and undisturbed use and passage into and out of all harbours, bays, waters, rivers, isles and inlets, belonging to or leading to the same; together with the soil, fields, woods, underwoods, mountains, hills, fens, isles, lakes, rivers, rivulets, bays and inlets situate in, or belonging unto the limits and bounds aforesaid, together with all sorts of minerals, and all the estate, interest, royalties, franchises, powers, privileges and immunities whatsoever of his said royal highness therein or in or unto any part or parcel thereof." Then there was a covenant for further assurance, and an appointment of Moll and Herman to be attorneys to deliver possession and seizin to Penn exactly as in the former deed.

It further appeared from an ancient record in the rolls office at Philadelphia, made 28th August, 1701, that on the 28th of October, 1682, as they certify under their hands and seals, Arnoldus de La Grange and eleven other persons, "being inhabitants of the town of New Castle upon Delaware river, having heard the indenture read, made between his royal highness, James Duke of York and Albany, &c., and William Penn, Esq., governor and proprietor of the province of Pennsylvania, &c., wherein the said duke transferreth his right and title to New Castle and twelve miles circle about the same, with all powers and jurisdictions and services thereunto belonging unto the said William Penn, and having seen by the said duke's appointed attorneys, John Moll and Ephraim Herman, both of New Castle, possession given, and by our Governour William Penn, Esq., possession taken, whereby we," says the record, "are made subjects under the king to the said William Penn, Esq.: We do hereby, in the presence of God, solemnly promise to yield him all just obedience, and to live quietly and peaceably under his government."

It appeared further from an ancient record, made at the same time, in the same office, that the same Arnoldus de La Grange and eight other persons made a memorandum under their hands, October 28, 1682, that on that day and year "William Penn, Esq., by virtue of an instrument of indenture, signed and sealed by his royal highness, James Duke of York, &c., did then and there demand possession and seizin of John Moll, Esq., and Ephraim Herman, gentlemen (attorneys constituted by his said royal highness), of the town of New Castle, otherwise called Delaware, with twelve miles circle or compass of the said town: that the possession and seizin was accordingly given by the said attorneys to the said William Penn, according to the usual form, by delivery of the fort of the said town, and leaving the said William Penn in quiet and peaceable possession thereof, and also by the delivery of turf and twig, and water and fowl of the river Delaware, and that the said William Penn remained in the peaceable possession of the premises."

Next an ancient record, made at the same time and place, the original of which was made in Delaware river, under the hands of Luke Wattson and ten other persons, November 7, 1682, which, after reciting the duke's deed to William Penn for the territory beginning twelve miles south from the town of New Castle, the power of attorney to Moll and Herman, and that Mr. Penn had substituted Captain William Markham, as attorney to receive seizin for him of that said tract, proceeds to testify and declare that livery of seizin was delivered of it also; that the persons whose names are subscribed to the document, on the day of the date thereof, "have been present and seen, that they the said John Moll and Ephraim Herman, in pursuance of his royal highness' command, and by virtue of the power given them by his said royal highness, James Duke of York and Albany, etc., by and in the above mentioned instrument of indenture, bearing date as above, have given and delivered actual possession unto the said Captain William Markham, to the sole use and behoof of the said William Penn, (of part in the name of the whole,) of the land, soil and premises in the said instrument of indenture mentioned, and according to the true intent and meaning of his said royal highness mentioned in the same."

Next came another ancient record, without date, however, from the office for recording of deeds, &c., at New Castle, Delaware; being an account by John Moll, himself, one of the persons named in the duke's deeds as attorneys for delivering seizin of both tracts to Mr. Penn, of the mode in which he did this duty. As this quaint document has not perhaps been in print, and may not be without interest to the historian, it is here inserted in the same form in which it was given in evidence.

"These are to certify all whom it may concern that William Penn Esqr. Proprietor and Govr. of the provinces of Pennsylvania and the territories thereunto belonging at his first arrival from England by the Town of New Castle upon Delaware River in the month of October anno 1682 did send then and there our messenger ashore to give notice to the Commissioners of his desire to speak with them aboard (I being then left the first in Commission by Sr. Edmund Andross Governour Genl. under his Royal highness James Duke of York and Albany etc. of all his Territories in America) did go aboard with some more of the commissioners at which time Esqr. Penn did show me two sundry Indentures or Deeds of Enfeoffment from under the hand and seal of His Royal Highness granted unto him, both bearing date the 28th day of August Anno 1682 the one for the county of New Castle with twelve miles distance North and South thereunto belonging and the other beginning twelve miles below New Castle and extending South unto Cape Henlopen together with the mills and waters of the said River, Bay, Rivulets and the Islands thereunto belonging &c. underneath both which sd. Indentures of deeds of Infeoffment were added his Royall highness letters of attorney directed unto me and Ephraim Herman deceased with full power and authority for to give in his Royall highnesses name unto the sd. William Penn Esqr quiet and peaceable possession of all what was Inserted in the sd. Indentures as above briefly is specified. But the sd. Eph. Herman happened to be gone from home so that he was not at that time aboard with me of the sd. ship, I therefore did desire from Esqr Penn four and twenty hours consideration for to communicate with the sd Herman and the rest of the Commissioners about the premises. In which compass of time we did unanimously agree to comply with his Royal Highnesses orders whereupon by virtue of the power given unto us by the above mentioned letters of Attorney We did give and surrender in the name of his Royall Highness unto him the said William Penn Esq actual and peaceable possession of the fort of New Castle by giving him the key thereof to lock upon himself alone the door which being opened by him again We did deliver also unto him one turf with a twig upon it a porringer with River water and Soyle in part of all what was specified in the sd. Indenture or Deed of Infeoffment from his Royal Highness and according to the true intent and meaning thereof. And few days after that we went to the house of Capt. Edmund Caulwell at the south side of Apokenimizing Creek by Computation above twelve miles distance from the Town of New Castle as being part of the two Lower Countys here above mentioned and specified in his Royal Highnesses other Indenture or Deed of Infeoffment and after we had shown unto the Commissioners of these Countys the power and orders given unto us as aforesaid we asked them if they could show us any cause why and wherefore we should not proceed to act and do there as we had done at New Castle, and finding no manner of obstruction We made then and there in his Royal Highnesses name the same manner and form of delivery as we had done at New Castle Which acting of us was fully accepted and well approved off by Anthony Brockhold then Commander in chief and his Council at New York as appears by their Declaration bearing date the 21st of November 1682, from which Jurisdiction we had our Dependance all along ever since the Conquest untill we had made the above related delivery unto Governour William Penn by virtue of his Royall highnesses orders and Commands &c.

⁷ There were produced two original leases for 10,000 years from the duke to Wm. Penn, his executors, &c. one dated Aug. 24, 1682, but not sealed or delivered in the presence of witnesses; another just like it only sealed and delivered, and dated three days after it, Aug. 24, 1682. The descriptions in both were the same as in the deed of feoffment. There was also a similar lease, 24th August, 1682, for the country south of the circle.

“Jno. Moll.”

The declaration of November 21, 1682, referred to in the foregoing certificate, was a circular letter (3 Hazzard, Pa. Reg. 34) by Captain Brockhold, &c., to the several justices of the peace, magistrates and other officers of Delaware, which, after reciting the two deeds of August 24th from the Duke of York to William Penn,—mentioning one of them as granting “all that town of New Castle otherwise called Delaware, and all that tract of land lying within the compass or circle of twelve miles about the same, with all islands and the river and soil thereof lying north of the southernmost part of the said circle,”—which deeds are spoken of as having been “here produced and shewn to us, and by us well approved and entered in the publick records of this province,”—proceeds to say that “we being fully satisfied of the said William Penn’s right to the possession and enjoyment of the premises, have therefore thought fit and necessary to signify and declare the same to you to prevent any doubt or trouble that might arise or accrue, and to give you your thanks for your good services done in your several offices and stations during the time you remained under his royal highness’ government. Expecting no further account than that you readily submit and yield all due obedience and conformity to the powers granted to the said William Penn in and by the said indenture, in the performance and enjoyment of which we wish you all happiness.”

So far as to the title derived to Mr. Penn from the grants of 24th August, 1682, prior to certain letters patent now to be mentioned, from King Charles II. not to Mr. Penn—but to the Duke of York—granting, March 22, 1683, to him, the same property which the duke had granted about seven months before to Mr. Penn. 2 Hazzard, Pa. Reg. 27. The letters patent describe the territory as “all that the town of New Castle otherwise called Delaware, and fort therein or thereunto belonging, situate, lying and being between Maryland and New Jersey, in America. And all that tract of land lying within the compass or circle of twelve miles about the said town, situate, lying and being upon the river of Delaware. And all islands in the said river of Delaware. And the said river and soil thereof, lying north of the southernmost part of the said circle of twelve miles about the said town. And all that tract of land upon Delaware river and bay, beginning twelve miles south from the said town of New Castle otherwise called Delaware, and extending south to Cape Lopin. Together with all the lands, islands, soil, rivers, harbours, mines, mineral, quarries, woods, marshes, waters, lakes, fishings, hawkings, huntings, and fowlings, and other royalties, privileges, profits, commodities and hereditaments to the said town, fort, tracts of land, islands and premises, or to any or either of them belonging or appertaining, with their and every of their appurtenances, situate, lying and being in America. And all our estate, right, title, interest, benefit, advantage, claim and demand whatsoever, of, in or to the said town, fort, lands or premises, or any part or parcel thereof. And the reversion and reversions, remainder and remainders thereof, together with the yearly and other rents, revenues and profits of the premises and of every part and parcel thereof. To have and to hold the said town of New Castle otherwise called Delaware, and fort, and all and singular the said lands and premises, with their and every of their appurtenances hereby given and granted, or hereinbefore mentioned to be given and granted, unto,” &c.

These letters patent gave powers of government in the same way as those of March 12, 1683–84, to which, except in the description of the property granted, their language almost exactly conformed.

The original of this patent from the king to the duke⁸ for Delaware, and of the Duke of York’s grant to Penn for the twelve miles circle were produced before the arbitrator; having both, with the original charter of Pennsylvania and two leases of August 24th to Mr. Penn, mentioned ante, p. 1129, note, been brought to Philadelphia, about the year 1834, by Mr. Coates of that city, an agent of the estates in Pennsylvania belonging to Mr. Penn’s descendants in England. Mr. Coates got possession of them on a visit to his principals in England. Being at their seat of Stoke Pogis, he was shewn by them into the charter-room of their house, where he was told that he might find some old deeds &c. that would interest him as an American, and to which he was welcome. Happening to find the patents and deeds just mentioned, he brought them to Philadelphia, where those relating to Delaware still were, on the hearing of this case.

It appeared also, by an original “Breviate” of the Hon. Mr. Murray, A. G. and Sir Dudley Ryder, S. G. solicitors for the sons of William Penn in their suit with Lord Baltimore—(1 Ves. Sr. 444) before Lord Hardwicke, A. D. 1750; the bill was filed June 21, 1735—that these identical parchment letters patent were in evidence before Lord Hardwicke in that case as the complainants' exhibit. And were put in evidence by them to shew their possession of them, and so repel an objection of Lord Baltimore's, that "the duke obtained this grant for himself and not for Mr. Penn, and never made any subsequent conveyance to Mr. Penn." Breviate.

⁸ Besides the original, there was, (1) an exemplification from the Rolls in England under the great seal, July 16 (6 Vict.); (2) a copy sworn to before the Lord Mayor of London, Feb. 4, 1735; (3) a printed copy in The Pennsylvania Votes of Assembly, published in 1754. Volume 3, p. 590.

The counsel of the United States, in order to shew that the title of the Penns as thus derived, had been subsequently recognized and confirmed by the crown, and had been asserted also by the state of Delaware just at the time of the American Revolution, then referred to certain facts of history as follows:

Penn was the intimate friend of James II. and in favour at the English court until the accession of William and Mary. In 1692 his government in America was taken from him, and Benjamin Fletcher appointed in his place. Fletcher gave dissatisfaction, and Penn was restored to his government again, in 1694, by letters from William and Mary. 1 Proud's Hist. Pa. 377, 403.

Charles I. having granted to Lord Baltimore in 1632, a tract of land between the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays, a dispute arose between Penn and him as to the extent of the king's grant and the situation of the line between them. Lord Baltimore's grant, reciting that the earl, being desirous to extend the Christian religion as well as the English empire to certain parts of America, hitherto savage, and inhabited by people having no knowledge of the Divine Being, had asked the king for that region—gave to him all the country being between the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays. An application having been made to the crown for a grant to the Duke of York, "of the parts adjacent to the Delaware Bay," Lord Baltimore, by his agent Mr. Burk, applied, May 21st, 1683, praying that the grant might not pass until the king should be satisfied as to the extent of the grant already made to the earl. The minute then proceeds (1 Votes Pa. Assem. xiv), May 30, 1683: "Counsel learned, in behalf of his royal highness, together with an agent from Mr. Penn, who solicits the passing of this grant; as also the petitioner, Mr. Burk, and his counsel learned, are called in: whereupon the counsel for my Lord Baltimore, affirming that the tract of land in question, lies within the limits of the charter granted to the Lord Baltimore, and that his lordship has always continued his claim thereunto; Mr. Penn's agent, and the counsel in behalf of his royal highness, endeavoured to make out, that the territory was never possessed by my Lord Baltimore, but originally inhabited by Dutch and Swedes; and that the grant to my Lord Baltimore, was only of lands not inhabited by Christians; so that a surrender having been made to his majesty in 1664, the Lord Baltimore can have no rightful claim thereunto; and that it having been ever since in the possession of his royal highness, the Lord Baltimore can receive no injury by the grant that is desired. Upon the whole matter, Mr. Penn's agent undertaking to prove within a short time, that this country was possessed by the Dutch and Swedes, in the year 1609, or at least before the date of the Lord Baltimore's patent, their lordships agreed to meet again as soon as the proofs shall be ready for making out the same." After numerous hearings, in which it appears that the Duke of York, the earl and Mr. Penn, all took part, a final order was made November 7, 1685, as follows (1 Votes Pa. Assem. xviii): "My Lord Baltimore and Mr. Penn, attending concerning the boundaries of the country of Delaware, are called in; and being heard, their lordships resolve to report their opinion to his majesty, that, for avoiding of further differences, the tract of land lying between the river and Bay of Delaware and the eastern sea on the one side, and Chesapeake Bay on the other, be divided into two equal parts, by a line from the latitude of Cape Henlopen to the fortieth degree of northern latitude; and that one-half thereof lying towards the Bay of Delaware, and the eastern sea, be adjudged to belong to his majesty, and that the other half remain to the Lord Baltimore, as comprised within his charter."

This being done, articles of agreement were concluded in 1732, between the Earl of Baltimore and the sons of William Penn, upon which the Penns, in 1735, filed their bill in chancery in England, praying for a specifick performance and the running and settlement of the boundaries. This bill set forth title in the Penns; the Duke of York's and the king's deeds, (giving their dates and the description of the property conveyed, including the river, soil, and islands north of the southernmost part of the twelve miles circle,) the delivery of seizin by Moll, the circular letter by Captain Brockhold, the covenant in the duke's deed for further assurance, and alleged that "immediately after the said last recited letters patent had passed the great seal, the said Duke of York, who was no other than a trustee for the said William Penn therein, and had obtained them in pursuance of his covenant for further assurance, did deliver over the same original last recited letters patent under the great seal to the plaintiff's father;" that after this, and when the duke was soliciting from the king a more beneficial grant for Penn, which was then preparing in order to pass the great seal, the same was stopt by Lord Baltimore, whose petition caused the matter to be referred by the king to the committee of trade and plantations, where both parties were heard for nearly two years and a half; that it is continually taken notice and expressly mentioned in the minutes made by the said committee thereon, that the dispute was a dispute between Baltimore and Penn, though the latter did sometimes use the Duke of York's name, and though the duke himself did by his counsel and other agents sometimes assist and interpose in the suit: which latter fact the Penns rely on as a manifest proof that the duke held the king's letters patent, for the benefit of Penn and not of himself. And finally, that, November 7th 1685, the committee made the adjudication already mentioned.

That notwithstanding this, Lord Baltimore in Jan. 1708, brought the matter before Queen Anne, who, after a counter-representation from Penn, dismissed the petition in the same month; that not yet satisfied, the earl, in May 1709, presented the matter again to the queen, who ordered it to be heard before her in council, where both Penn and Baltimore were heard, and where it was ordered that the earl's petition be dismissed, and that the order of November 7th 1685, be ratified and confirmed in all its points and put in execution.

The case, which is the well known case reported in 1 Ves. Sr. 444, under the name of Penn v. Lord Baltimore, was heard before Lord Hardwicke who, May 15th 1750, decreed in favour of the Penns, but "without prejudice to any prerogative, power, property, title or interest of his majesty, his heirs and successors in or to the said territories, &c." (Belt, Supp. Ves. Sr. 198), with liberty, in case the king should insist on any power, &c. for any of the parties to apply. Subsequent articles of 1760, and another chancery decree, twelve years later, terminated the dispute between the parties.

In 1767, the Penns and Lord Baltimore presented a joint petition to George III. reciting the before mentioned articles and decrees, and setting forth that the commissioners to run the line were proceeding in their work, and praying the king to give his allowance, ratification and confirmation of the articles and decrees already mentioned; whereupon the king, January 11, 1769, by order in council, signified his approbation of the proceedings mentioned in the petition.

On the 8th April, 1775, John Penn, then governor of Pennsylvania and Delaware, or the lower counties as they were then called, made a proclamation making known the premises, and on the 2d Sept., 1775, it was enacted by the legislature of the lower counties, in an act reciting the articles of agreement, decrees and proclamations, that certain lines which were then fixed, should be the divisional lines of the counties. The act does not profess to fix either the eastern or the western bounds of the province. 1 Booth's Laws Del. 567, 569.

The paper title of the United States was completed by an act of assembly of the state of Delaware, May 27, 1813; by which it was enacted, that "all the right, title and claim, which this state has to the jurisdiction and soil of the island in the Delaware commonly called the Pea Patch, he and the same is hereby ceded to the United States of America, for the purpose of erecting forts, batteries and fortifications for the protection of the river Delaware and the adjacent country," &c. &c. reserving jurisdiction, &c. Dig. Del. Laws (Ed. 1829) p. 673.

The same counsel, in order to show, more specifically, that absolute control over the whole river within the twelve miles circle, had been, at least, claimed from early days by the lower counties, proved that about the year 1707, a law was passed at New Castle, whereby a tax of half a pound of powder for each ton of measurement, was laid upon every vessel bound up or down the river; that the lower counties proceeded to enforce the tax by firing upon vessels which would not pay it; that although the general assembly of Pennsylvania strongly remonstrated against the matter, the law was never repealed, though its execution was stopped by defiance and resistance from Pennsylvania vessels. 1 Votes Pa. Assem. pt. 2, p. 170.

So far as to the paper title of the respective parties, as the same was proved by original deeds or early legislative action.

As to the jurisdiction exercised, de facto, in the river, it appeared on behalf of New Jersey that Egg Island, a small island low down in Delaware Bay, and Stypson's Island, whose position could not be found by counsel, but both of which were admitted to be without the circle, were held under New Jersey, though how, or for how long, did not appear. Further, that some time since 1832, a boat-man having committed an assault upon some person on the river within the circle, a constable of New Jersey pursued the criminal to the Pea Patch and arrested him. "The constable had process," that is, said the witness, a military person, "he had a pistol; he shewed no process but that." The boat-man refused to go to New Jersey, said he would go on lawful process; process from Delaware; and did not go with the constable, who went away and never came back after him. On the part of Delaware, the evidence was more full. Reedy Island and Bombay or Boonprie Hook, the only island within the circle, had always, so far as appeared, been considered as part of Delaware, to which state the people also were considered as belonging. Both these islands, however, lie close to the Delaware main land; the latter being within its profile, and separated from it only by an artificial cut or canal.

Twelve persons were examined from the state of Delaware, most of them aged, and likely, it was said, from their professions or pursuits to be acquainted with the fact of what jurisdiction generally had been exercised over the circle by Delaware, for the last seventy years or more.

Among them was the Hon. Thomas Clayton, aged seventy years and upwards, sometime a member of the legislature of Delaware, afterwards attorney general and then chief justice of that state, and more recently its representative in the senate of the United States. "It has been held," said this witness, who had resided all his life in Delaware, "it has been held, as far back as my memory goes, by the courts, publick officers, and lawyers of Delaware, that the title and jurisdiction of the state of Delaware extended to a circle of twelve miles around New Castle, to low water mark on the New Jersey shore. I never heard the title or jurisdiction of the state doubted, over that part of the river Delaware, by any one, until the claim of Doctor Gale was set up to the Pea Patch; and since that, I have heard no one in the state of Delaware, lawyer or other, doubt it. Writs have been issued by the courts of Delaware to seize vessels and persons in all parts of the river indiscriminately, within the twelve mile circle, and I never knew such a seizure to be disputed in any court of Delaware, on the ground of want of jurisdiction over all such parts of the river."

James Rogers, Esquire, sixty years old, for most of his life a resident in or near New Castle, and for twenty years attorney general of Delaware, testified as follows: "It has been uniformly considered by the courts, publick officers and lawyers of the state of Delaware, that her title and jurisdiction extended within a twelve mile circle around New Castle, to low water mark on the Jersey shore. I have never heard her title or jurisdiction over that part of the river Delaware doubted by any court, publick officer or lawyer in Delaware. I know that writs have been often issued from the courts in Delaware for New Castle county, and that by virtue of such writs, persons, vessels and cargoes have been arrested and seized within the jurisdiction above alluded to; and in no instance, within my knowledge, was the jurisdiction ever disputed, or any question made as to the jurisdiction of the state, when such persons were arrested or vessels and cargoes seized. I have in many cases caused writs to issue and persons to be arrested, and vessels and cargoes to be attached and seized upon the river Delaware, and within the aforesaid jurisdiction, and have been concerned in cases where process of attachment has been issued by other members of the bar. I recollect one case, in the supreme court,—Richards v. Duser. I was counsel for the defendant, and every defence was set up that was considered available, but no plea to the jurisdiction was set up." (The record of this suit was attached to Mr. Rogers' deposition, and showed that four pleas had been put in.)

"With respect to lands held by warrant, survey and patent, from William Penn and his heirs, the title has been universally held as good title. It has been always held by our courts that the Penn title, under the Duke of York, was the true title to the lands and waters in Delaware, so far as my knowledge extends. I know no other title than the Penn title, a few titles held by grant from the aborigines and from the state excepted."

The Honourable James Booth, chief justice of Delaware, aged fifty-seven years, who was born in New Castle, and, with the exception of four years had resided there all his life, testified to the same effect, essentially, as to the jurisdiction, though in language more qualified than Mr. Rogers. On the subject of the Penn title he added: "There never was any doubt or question, so far as my knowledge and information extends, of the justice and legality of the Penn title, under the Duke of York, to the lands within the state of Delaware. It was always considered, in this state, the true title to the lands and waters in the state of Delaware; although I have seen on record some old title papers for lands from the aborigines of the country, and from Sir Edmund Andross, before the date of the deed from the Duke of York to William Penn. I have seen many titles incepted in court by the Penn warrants, surveys, and patents, and have always understood and believed that all lands and waters in the state of Delaware, within the twelve miles circle, are held under the Penn title."

The testimony of Kensey Johns, Esquire, was particularly relied on by the counsel of the United States, as well from the venerable age to which this witness had attained, as from his most respectable understanding, attainments and character, and from the great opportunities which he had had of becoming acquainted with the subjects on which he spoke. "I was eighty-eight years and four months old," said this witness, "on the fourteenth day of last month, (October, 1847.) I reside in the town of New Castle, in the state of Delaware. I have resided here since the year 1780. My business has been a practising lawyer for twelve years; afterwards, chief justice of the supreme court of the state of Delaware for thirty-eight years; afterwards, chancellor of the state: since that time and at present living a private gentleman."

"I have known the island since the year 1780. At first it appeared about the size of a man's hat. In 1813, when the United States took possession of it, it had grown to be a large island. It was not worth a cent to any private citizen. The expense of banking would have been more than it was worth. It has always been considered and held," continued the ex-chief justice and chancellor, "by the courts, public officers, and lawyers of Delaware, as far as my memory reaches, that the title and jurisdiction of the state of Delaware extended to a circle of twelve miles around New Castle to low water mark on the New Jersey shore. I have never heard the title and jurisdiction of the state of Delaware over that part of the river Delaware doubted by any court, public officer, or lawyer in Delaware on any occasion whatever. Within my knowledge and remembrance, writs have been often issued out of the courts of Delaware to seize vessels and persons in all parts of the river Delaware within the circle of low water mark on the New Jersey shore; and no dispute, question, or plea was ever made or suggested, within my memory, before any court in Delaware against the title and jurisdiction of Delaware over all such parts. The state of Delaware, for the whole period of my remembrance, and as far as my researches extend, has claimed and exercised title and jurisdiction over the Delaware river and soil thereof, within the circle to low water mark on the Jersey shore, and the state has never failed to exercise this jurisdiction when called upon or asked to do so."

"The lands in Delaware generally are held under the title of William Penn and his heirs. The Penn proprietors granted title by warrant, survey, and patent. In action of trespass or ejectment, the plaintiff incepted his title by the warrant and survey. I never heard of any doubt, in the courts of Delaware, of the justice and legality of the Penn title to the lands in the state of Delaware. It has always been held as the settled maxim within the Delaware courts, that the Penn title, under the Duke of York, was the true title to the lands and waters in Delaware. I have seen a great many (I can't say how many) titles incepted in court by the Penn warrants and surveys. The lands and waters generally in Delaware within the twelve mile circle, are held under the Penn title."

In addition to the above testimony which, so far as it spoke of the circle generally, was corroborated to some extent by records, there were three or four well attested instances of process which issued from the state of Delaware having been served close upon the Jersey shore.

Mr. Thomas Janvier, aged seventy-five, a resident of New Castle, and for some years engaged in trade there, said: "It is within my memory that R. C. Dale, who was sheriff of New Castle county from 1803 to 1806, after summoning a posse, boarded a ship on her outward passage, and arrested a person on board of the ship after she had been run ashore on the Jersey side, nearly opposite the town of New Castle; the names of the parties and the minute detail of the affair, I do not now remember. About twenty-five years since, I accompanied the deputy of the sheriff of New Castle county, and with him boarded a sloop then between the Pea Patch Island and the Jersey shore, and was with the deputy sheriff when he arrested the captain of the sloop by virtue of a writ, issued out of one of the courts of Delaware. The matter was compromised with me, the captain of the sloop paying the demand; and we let him go."

Mr. Wm. Robinson, aged sixty-five, residing all his life in New Castle county, stated that about the year 1834, he "accompanied the deputy sheriff, in a boat, for the purpose of arresting a person on board a schooner that was coming down close on the Jersey shore; the deputy sheriff boarded the vessel in that situation, and arrested the captain. The matter was compromised, and the captain was discharged from the arrest, on his paying some amount of damages claimed of him for running into a sloop laying at anchor off this town."

Mr. John Steel of Philadelphia, aged sixty-seven, who kept a shop in New Castle in 1800, gave the following account of an arrest made within his knowledge: "While residing at New Castle, I had occasion, in July or August 1800, to serve process on a man who was boat-swain of the United States ship Scammon. I took the advice of George Read, Esq., district attorney of the United States, a lawyer of eminence in Delaware. He told me to follow the man as far as low water mark on the Jersey shore, but no further. I went over after the man, and caught him at the end of the wharf in his boat as he was going ashore. He was outside of low water mark at the wharf. I brought him back to New Castle, and he gave me an order to the officer at Washington for his back wages. I sent this order on to Washington, and got the money for it. There were people who professed to know how to keep clear of process from Delaware; they would steer close to the Jersey shore. Our custom was, in suing people, always to take process from Delaware. We never got any from Jersey. I was on terms of intimacy with the sheriff; boarded in his house a part of the time. Our instructions were never to go beyond the Jersey low water mark. I never knew any dispute about the jurisdiction. It was the well settled opinion in them days that the jurisdiction extended to low water mark on the Jersey shore. The man whom I arrested never sued me for trespass. He had a lawyer with him; Mr. Brown, perhaps, of Philadelphia, then a young man; or it might have been a student of Mr. Bayard's."

It further appeared that one Cockrin, in the employ of the United States and residing on the Pea Patch as tenant or agent, had been regularly assessed, had paid taxes and voted from 1836 to 1847, in Red Lion hundred, New Castle county, Delaware, and that his vote had never been challenged.

Touching the position of the island in regard to "the main channel," twelve persons, river pilots or captains of small vessels, testified that the western or Delaware channel was the main channel, that it was always so considered by all navigators, "always had been and always would be," said one witness; and that large vessels almost invariably took it, whether the wind was fair or adverse. They stated, however, that when the tide was high, and the wind fair, large vessels, if well navigated, could pass on the other side, as it was admitted that the United States ship of war, Pennsylvania, the largest which ever floated in the waters of the United States, had done in 1836, under those circumstances: but that vessels which could beat through the other, could not do so at all through this. The Jersey channel, it appeared was broad and very deep for a few rods just opposite the island, but at its head, in consequence of the Bulk-Head shoal, grew narrow, and therefore less safe. The Delaware channel was soft; the Jersey one hard. The statement received by consent, of Mr. Wilson M. C. Fairfax, of the United States coast survey, which had been recently made, was thus: "The main and deepest channel of the Delaware river opposite the Pea Patch is on the Jersey side. The greatest depth of water in the channel on the Jersey side is 40 feet, and on the Delaware side 25 feet. The average depth of water in the channel of the Jersey side is 32 feet, and on the Delaware side 23 feet. But to take the entire channel on either side of the island, no vessel drawing more than 19 feet water at low water of spring tides can pass through. The Jersey channel is the shortest and widest, and both about equally curved."

Touching the position of the island in regard to the two shores, it appeared that the Jersey shore had been constantly washed away within the last half century, and so receding from the island; that drawing a line midway between the shores, $21^{\circ}/_{10}$ acres of the island were on the Delaware side, $65^{\circ}/_{10}$ on the New Jersey side; that the north extremity of the island would be 2090 yards from the Delaware shore, and 2130 yards from the New Jersey shore; the south extremity 2197 yards from the Delaware shore, and 1875 yards from the Jersey shore. And that the area of the island is $87^{\circ}/_{100}$ acres.

With respect to the possession of the island, it appeared that in the spring of 1813, Dr. Gale having acquired the right of the Halls under the survey of 1784, went down there from Trenton, with fifteen or sixteen persons as fishermen, and built a fisherman's hut on piles. It was built of rough boards, was about 12 by 15 feet, had a stove in it, and the fishermen cooked and slept there. Dr. Gale fished here one season, leaving it in August, 1813. The place was not a good fishery, owing to the strength and course of the currents, which swept the nets into deep water where the fish escaped. While he was there, Gen. Bloomfield of New Jersey, who was entrusted by the United States with selecting a site for a fortress, came there, saw him fishing there, and apparently claiming the island; rowed round the island with him and asked him what he would take for it. In December, 1814, the United States sent a corps of engineers there under Capt. Clark of that service, to begin the fortress. No building of any sort, nor the vestige of one, was then on the island, which was occupied by hundreds of thousands of crows, who made it a roosting place. Captain Clark remained there till 1816, from which time till the present, with the exception of a certain term in 1836-7-8, when Mr. Humphrey was in possession under a judgment hereafter mentioned, the possession was in the United States.

The following miscellaneous facts were also put in evidence.

By Delaware:

I. That on the 7th December, 1682, Penn, styling himself proprietary and governour of Pennsylvania and the lower counties, passed, with the advice and consent of the freemen of the province and counties aforesaid, "An act of union for annexing and uniting of the counties of New Castle, Jones and Whorekills, alias Newdale, to the province of Pennsylvania, and of naturalization of all foreigners in the said province and counties annexed." 1 Booth's Laws Del. 8, Append. where this act follows the two deeds of feoffment. The preamble of this act recites the patent for Pennsylvania, and the release from the Duke of York: It then sets forth the two deeds from the Duke of York for the three lower counties, giving in full, and accurately, the description in each, and in the first, the words, "as also the said river of Delaware, and soil thereof and islands therein;" and states that the freemen of those counties have desired to be annexed to Pennsylvania. The enacting part provides for the union, and for the naturalization of such of the inhabitants as were foreigners. Then follow other acts of legislation in the same year, constituting the body of laws known by the name of "the great law."

This act Judge Baldwin, in his opinion, hereafter mentioned, supposes to have remained in force until the American Revolution.

II. That in the year 1702, the proprietaries of East and West Jersey surrendered all the royalties and powers of government which they had derived under the charters of Charles II. to Queen Anne, who accepted the surrender: and that from 1702 till 1776 New Jersey was governed, not by the proprietaries, but by governours appointed by the crown, who with the provincial legislature constituted the royal government of the colony. Leaming & S. Laws N. J. 606, 607, 614, 628, 629.

III. That in 1796, an order was given in Delaware for a warrant for "two hundred acres of marsh, to be laid on an island situated about five miles below New Castle in the river Delaware, called and known by the name of the Pea Patch." There was no evidence, however, that the warrant had issued or been laid or that any survey had ever been made. It appeared that the warrantee had abandoned the matter because he supposed that the necessary cost of reclaiming and embankment would be more than the island, when reclaimed and embanked, would be worth.

By New Jersey:

I. That King Charles I. had granted to Lord Baltimore many years before the grant to the Duke of York, all the territory between the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays. Kilty's Laws Md. 4to, Annapolis, 1799.

II. That a carefully engraved map in the breviate (or paper book as it was called by counsel,) already mentioned, being an exhibit of the Penns in their suit with Lord Baltimore, the circle was drawn but to the Delaware shore, on both the north and south parts of the circle; stopping at the river and not running into it; and that among hundreds and nearly thousands of maps of the United States and Delaware, published in all parts of the country and in the state of Delaware itself, this circle had never been brought further.

III. That on February 7, 1794, the state of Delaware passed a supplement to an act for opening and establishing a land office, and for the sale of all vacant and unlocated lands (2 Booth's Laws Del. 1174), which recites "that whereas, the right to the soil and lands within the known and established limits of this state, was heretofore claimed by the crown of Great Britain: And whereas by the definitive treaty between his Britannick majesty and the United States of America, his said majesty relinquished all rights, proprietary and territorial, within the limits of the said United States, to the citizens of the same, for their sole use and benefit, by virtue whereof the soil and lands within the limits of this state became the right and property of the citizens thereof, and who at the time of passing the act to which this is a supplement, had, and now have, full power and authority, by their representatives, to dispose of the same for their sole benefit, emolument and advantage: And whereas the claims of the late and former pretended proprietaries of this state, to the soil and lands contained within the same, are not founded either in law or equity; and it is just, right, and necessary, that the citizens thereof should be secured in the enjoyment of their estates, rights and properties." It then confirms all patents, warrants and grants, by James, heretofore Duke of York, or the pretended proprietaries of the state, made at any time before January 1st, 1760; discharging them from all manner of rents, fines and services, and then goes on to authorize the issue of patents by the state.

But the case as it came before Mr. Sergeant did not come upon the foregoing paper title, and the facts already stated which might be supposed to vary or control it. It was embarrassed by two judgments upon the title; one in 1836, in the New Jersey circuit (Gale v. Behlin [Case No. 5,189]), in favour of the New Jersey title; the other in 1838, in the Delaware circuit (U. S. v. Cockrin [Id. 14,822]), in favour of the state of Delaware. The former judgment was preceded by a trial by jury, of three days, and by a long and very laboured charge in favour of the New Jersey title from the presiding judge, the late Henry Baldwin of the supreme court of the United States; a gentleman who had enjoyed considerable reputation while at the bar of Western Pennsylvania, was admitted to possess, at all times, uncommon activity of mental action, and to bestow occasional research upon his cases that nearly passed credibility. The judgment in the other case was for default of appearance. On the present trial, however, the case was presented in a different aspect from what it then appeared in. No evidence was given before Judge Baldwin of the deed from King Charles II. to the Duke of York, the non-existence of which was asserted by the New Jersey counsel, and taken for granted by all present.⁹ The coast survey not having yet been made, the existence of any considerable channel east of the Pea Patch was unknown; the western being considered the main channel. The island was assumed to be, and at that time probably was, in all its parts, nearer to New Jersey than to Delaware, and no evidence was given like that on pp. 1132, 1133, of any exercise or belief of jurisdiction over the circle by the courts of the latter state.

The judge, in his charge, admitted fully that prior to the American Revolution the western limits of New Jersey came only to low water in the Delaware. His argument then was, that the Duke of York had no title, inasmuch as his conquest enured to the benefit of the crown alone: that accordingly Penn and his privies in estate, could have no title under those grants. He admitted that Penn and his privies did have a right in virtue of long possession, improvement and colonization, but held that the limits of their estates were designated, not by the metes and bounds set forth in the Duke of York's deeds, but only by actual claim and possession or government; and said that upon the evidence before him it was clear that Delaware had never set up rights in the Delaware, ⁹ The history of this deed is quite singular. It is not printed in any of the ancient books of Delaware Laws, though the Duke of York's are in all of them. It does not seem to have been put on record in either New York, Pennsylvania or Delaware. It appears, moreover, that when the Earl of Sutherland applied, about the year 1716, for "a charter of certain lands lying upon Delaware Bay in the three lower counties, which he represents he is ready to prove do belong to the crown," and where the persons concerned for Mr. Penn, and several mortgagees and purchasers under him, and their agents were heard before the attorney and solicitor general, Northey and Thompson, that after much search of publick offices the existence of this deed was not discovered: and that too in a case where there is so obvious an impression on the minds of the attorney and solicitor general, that there must be some other title, that they say, "they presume the said Duke of York might have some other grants thereof, which Mr. Penn might give an account of, but cannot, being under a lunacy;" and which made them therefore submit, whether it would not be reasonable that the king's title should be established in chancery before any grant should be made of the premises. 1 Chalm. Op. 39-57.

while it rather appeared that New Jersey had. Considering that the natural language of the deed for the circle, gave Mr. Penn a right to a complete circle of twelve miles round, the learned judge said he was unable to give effect to it, inasmuch as such a construction would have given to Penn a large portion of Salem county, New Jersey; a district which the duke had granted many years before to Berkeley and Carteret. He therefore thought it might be construed so as to make its boundaries agree with those which he supposed were settled by possession, which boundaries came, as he supposed, to the water and not into it, or at any rate not further than the middle of the main channel. And to support this construction, he relied on the fact that the deed for the country south of the circle—a deed for contiguous territory, between the same parties and made on the same day—did not profess to convey the river or subaqueous soil: facts which he considered authority enough for him, to explain the latter deed by the former, and to hold that this former deed could not have meant to do so either. He suggests that by the largest construction the deed for the circle could be held "to include only such islands and such parts of the river as lie between a direct line drawn from the north and south points where the circle strikes the Delaware."

But admitting that the deeds of the Duke of York might have described the true boundaries of Delaware, Judge Baldwin ruled that at the Revolution, the state of Delaware "repudiating the grants of the duke as usurpation on the acknowledged prerogative of the king," might "elect to hold the lands of the proprietaries, in the original right of the crown." And he thought that the state had made this repudiation and election by the act of February 7th, 1794, reciting that "the claims of the late and former proprietaries of this state to the soil and lands contained within the same, are not founded either in law or in equity;" that her title thenceforth became founded on the Treaty of Peace; that in this condition of facts, the two states, by the Declaration of Independence, stood on an equal footing, and were equally invested with the rights of the king to all that part of Delaware river and its islands which the king had not previously granted: and therefore that this island, being to the eastward of the "main channel," and nearest to New Jersey, belonged to that state and not to Delaware. Independently of these grounds, he relies on the doctrine of adverse possession, and says that as the Halls held the island under a survey made in 1784, and so had possession without adverse possession or claim under the state of Delaware, until 1815, a term of thirty-one years, the right of entry by that state was barred: and connected with what his honour called "the general claim of the proprietaries of New Jersey to the islands in the Delaware from 1739, would make the title good by a prescription of seventy-four years of quiet enjoyment adverse to the right of the Penns: and this idea it was supposed might derive strength from a recital in the act of the New Jersey assembly of November 24th, 1831, which says it has been represented to the assembly, that by virtue of the warrant and survey of 1784, the Halls had "become seized and possessed of the island," and assumes that by mesne conveyance, Dr. Gale had "become seized and possessed."

Under the judgment in New Jersey, the marshal of that circuit delivered possession to Mr. Humphrey, to whom all the persons on the island made themselves tenants at will.

And on the judgment in the Delaware circuit, the marshal of that circuit delivered possession to the United States.

Each party offered that judgment which was in its favour, as conclusive on the title: but as the jurisdiction of the courts which gave them, depended entirely upon the fact whether the island was within their territorial circuit, that is, whether it was within Delaware or New Jersey, and as this point was the very one here to be decided and could not be decided without hearing the whole case, the parties consented, on the recommendation of the arbitrator, to give both judgments in evidence, without prejudice, and to waive a decision of the case upon a point of mere evidence, and in a preliminary stage.

Mr. Clayton and Mr. Bayard for the United States.

Before the argument in this case, the counsel of the United States said that they begged to join with their learned friends on the other side, in acknowledging the kindness which had been extended to all the counsel who had been concerned in this trial, by the civil authorities of the city, and especially for the honour of being allowed to conduct the argument of the case in the Hall of American Independence. It seemed to be an appropriate place for the discussion of the means of defending this noble city, which was, in truth, the birth place of American freedom. They tendered the hearty thanks of themselves, their opponents and all concerned, to the city authorities for the accommodations which had been freely furnished for the hearing of the case. Those thanks were also due to the Historical and Philosophical Societies, to the Athenæum, and to the Law Association of this city, all of which had munificently furnished their books, documents, and charts, many of them being no where else to be found. On both sides, we have the benefit of libraries, yielding more information on the peculiar subject we have to discuss, than could be found in any other city of the Union. Our thanks are also due to many gentlemen of the profession in this city, and to antiquarians for the information furnished by them. With the aids thus afforded us on both sides, we are all satisfied that we have had a fair and full trial, and that the testimony in the case is so full as to develop the entire merits of the controversy.

The question is, whether Delaware has the exclusive right to all the Delaware river with the islands in it, and all the subaqueous soil contained within that circle whose centre is New Castle and which has a radius of twelve miles extending from that place as a centre. Delaware claims no right in the river above the circle, and none greater than New Jersey below it. We say 1. Mr. Humphrey has no title. 2. The United States has a good title.

On that first branch of the matter, we contend:

1. Mr. Humphrey's grant is bad in form: He claims under a proprietary warrant authorizing the survey of land; a warrant which does not authorize a location upon the bed of a great navigable river, as this place was in 1784, and in part is still. Then the surveyor, who returns this survey, certifies that he surveyed an island in the Delaware containing 178 acres. We know, from the actual measurement by the coast survey, that the island contains but $87^{60}/_{100}$ acres at this day, and the testimony has proved that about the year 1783 the island first appeared above low water, not larger than "a man's hat." It is apparent therefore, that there was no actual survey made by virtue of these fragments of warrants, and that the statement of the surveyor was made because the fragments of the warrants, when added together, made that number of acres, within an insignificant fraction. It was a fictitious survey, and no title founded on such a foundation can be good. But waving this class of objections, and admitting that Mr. Humphrey has a proprietary grant good in form, we say,

2. That New Jersey never had any title. The territory known as New Jersey was limited by its original charter to low water mark. The language of that grant and of all subsequent grants indicates an exclusion of the river. They all grant land bounded by the river, with many easements in the river; but the river itself or its soil is conveyed by none of them. The original charter grants the Hudson river. The maxim of "expressio unius" applies strongly. This natural construction of the charter is sustained by authority. In 1721, the lords commissioners of trade and plantations sent to Sir Robert Raymond and Sir Phillip Yorke, then attorney and solicitor general, the clauses of the Pennsylvania and New Jersey charters which fixed the boundaries of those provinces, and desired their opinion "whether Delaware river or any part thereof, or the islands therein lying, are by said clauses conveyed to either of the said provinces, or whether the right thereunto doth still remain in the crown?" "We have perused the said clauses," says the opinion of these great lawyers, "and have been attended by the agents of the parties who claim the province of Pennsylvania, and their counsel, who laid before us a copy of the letters patent granting the provinces, and have heard what hath been alleged on both sides. And upon consideration of the whole matter, are of opinion that no part of the Delaware river or the islands lying therein, are comprised within the granting words of the said patent, or of the said annexed extract of the grant of New Jersey but we conceive that the right to the same still remains in the crown." 1 Chalm. Op. 59.

In 1820, Virginia having granted to the United States many years before, her "right to territory northwest of the river Ohio," it was conceded by the supreme court of the United States that her title still extended all across the river. Chief Justice Marshall says: "When a river is the boundary between two nations or states, if the original property is in neither, and there be no convention respecting it, each holds to the middle of the stream. But when, as in this case, one state (Virginia) is the original proprietor, and grants the territory on one side only, it retains the river within its own dominion; and the newly created state extends to the river only, and the low water mark is its boundary." Handly's Lessee v. Anthony, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 375-379.

This case and the opinions of Raymond and Yorke were cited, and the principle just mentioned was recognized as true, by Judge Washington in 1823 (Corfield v. Coryell [Case No. 3,230]) in its application to the boundary of New Jersey, now before us. "We think," says this judge, "the claim of New Jersey under these grants, to any part of the bay or river Delaware, below low water mark cannot be maintained. * * * Neither do we conceive that the limits of the state can by construction be enlarged in virtue of the grant of all rivers, fishings and other royalties; which expressions ought, we think, to be confined to rivers, fishings and royalties within the boundaries of the granted premises." It is true he thought that the enactments now cited in behalf of Mr. Humphrey, "prove beyond a doubt that the proprietaries of West New Jersey, from a very early period, asserted a right to the river Delaware or to some part thereof below low water mark and along its whole length," yet "how far this title in New Jersey may be affected by the grants of the Duke of York to William Penn in 1682, of the tract of country which now forms the state of Delaware," was a question, he says, which in the case before him, "it would be improper to decide." Though neither of these two cases was a decision on the point, they both concede what we here labour to establish. That the state was limited by its charter to low water mark was admitted in 1830, by counsel on both sides, in Bennett v. Boggs [Case No. 1,319], and asserted by Judge Baldwin, who truly says, that though the proprietaries of New Jersey might claim to own and dispose of the fisheries in the Delaware, "their claiming beyond the limits of the charter could give them no title."

3. But admitting that the charter of New Jersey extended over the whole river, Mr. Humphrey has not got the New Jersey title. None passed by either the proprietary grant of 1784, or the legislative act of 1831.

As to the proprietary title: In 1702 the proprietaries of New Jersey surrendered all their royalties and powers of government, and from that time ceased to govern the territory of New Jersey; reserving to themselves only what Lord Hale and other writers denominate the jus privatum—nothing more than the private right to the soil, which they held then and hold still. From 1702 to 1776, the beds of all the navigable rivers within her charter, being part of the regalia, were out of their reach and beyond their control. The royal government alone could grant them away. The Declaration of Independence transferred all the regalia and powers of government to the state of New Jersey, in her sovereign capacity: the proprietaries after the surrender, held neither the jus regium nor the jus publicum. Any grant by them of subaqueous soil was void. Waddell v. Martin, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 367, being a case upon this identical charter, has decided the question. The supreme court of the United States there held a proprietary grant for subaqueous soil in the waters of the Raritan Bay and river to be void, and sustained the holding of the defendant in that case, who claimed the submerged soil under a grant from the state legislature. The ground of the decision was, that the regalia were in the state, and not in the proprietaries.

As to the state title: The legislature said truly that "doubts" had arisen as to the proprietary title. But has it cured them? In 1815, this island was reclaimed by the United States. It rose above the flow of the tides. It was no longer part of the regalia. It became vacant land, for which none but the proprietaries could make title. Mr. Humphrey then, by the largest concession of facts, is in this predicament, that when the proprietaries conveyed, in 1784, the title was in the state, and when the state conveyed in 1831, the title was in the proprietaries. We say now, arriving at our second great position:

II. The United States has a good title:

The existence of a grant by the crown cannot be doubted here. We have given all sorts of evidence of it. It can as little be doubted that it was made for Mr. Penn's benefit and not for the duke's. The brief shows that it was in the possession of Penn's sons in their suit with Lord Baltimore, brought in 1735, and heard in 1750; and other testimony here, that it was found at the seat of the Penns in 1837-8. With such evidence we incept our title. We need not re-state it. Such a title proved by original deeds, found, far onward in two centuries, in their proper places, perfected by livery of seizin most formally delivered, and confirmed by the royal and ducal government in New York is impregnable. Its exhibition is conclusive.

A question will probably be raised on these deeds as to the right of the king of England, since Magna Charta, to grant a river and the subaqueous soil to a subject so as to pass the islands subsequently arising in the river: but it is a question which is settled by authority. Maritima incrementa, says Hale (De Jure Maris, 14, 17, 18), belong, of common right, to the king, but may become the property of a subject by grant or prescription; and among these maritima incrementa, he speaks of those which come per insulæ productionem, the sort we are now considering. It is true that in such grants the jus privatum of the grantee is always subject to the jus publicum. The right of navigation and passage and repassage, unobstructed by nuisances and unimpeded by exactions, has always been admitted as a jus publicum, belonging to the people, and from which no grant by the crown could derogate. It is called a servitute belonging to the people. Id. 6.

Whether the common right of fishing in navigable streams is in the people at large, as part of the jus publicum, so as to prevent a grant by the crown excluding it, since Magna Charta, is a question yet open for discussion, but it has no bearing on this case. That the crown might grant a navigable river and the soil thereof, subject to the jus publicum, has never been doubted, and the propriety of islands arising in the river, cannot, be a part of the jus publicum, because that refers solely to common rights, and islands must, from their nature, be the subject of exclusive appropriation. The common right of navigation is now in all the people of the United States, and no state can control it; but the common right of fishery is in the people of each state, and to the extent of her jurisdiction, and within her territorial limits, the state may control or grant it. In this case, however, it is unnecessary to determine whether the right of fishing in the river Delaware, within the twelve miles circle, is exclusively within the jurisdiction of Delaware. Admitting, however, a common right of fishery in the people of the colony of New Jersey in 1682-3 and subsequently, this would not grant the river or its soil, whether the right arose from grant or prescription. A prescription, extending to a liberty, profit à prendre, or jurisdiction, such as liberty of free fishery, &c. is not an acquiescence of the soil or water, but leaves them where it found them. Id. 32.

The argument which will also be made, that the duke had no title to the property conveyed, until after the royal conveyance was made, and that therefore Penn's title was void, is not quite as "old as creation," but it was made more than a hundred years ago by Lord Baltimore in his suit with the Penns, was then answered by Lord Hardwicke himself, and, till now, answered beyond all power of renewal. The earl says: "I will lay aside the question of estoppel, which is a nice consideration; for the Duke of York, being then in the nature of a common person, was in a condition to be estopped by a proper instrument. In 1683, the Duke of York takes a new grant from the crown, and having granted before, was bound to make further assurance; for the improvements made by Penn were a foundation to support a bill in equity for further assurance. The Duke of York, therefore, while a subject, was to be considered a trustee; why not afterward as a royal trustee? I will not decree that in this court; nor is it necessary, but it is a notion established in courts of revenue, by modern decisions, that the king may be a royal trustee. And if the person from whom the king takes by descent was a trustee, there may be grounds in equity to support that. And if King James II. after coming to the crown was a royal trustee, his successors take the legal estate under the same equity; and it is sufficient for the plaintiffs if they have an equitable estate." Nothing can be more sensible; nothing better founded both in the justice of the law and in the justice of morals. The duke, no doubt, was "estopped," and the estoppel, working on the interest in the land, ran with the land. Hermitage v. Tomkins, 1 Id. Raym. 729, is in point as to the duke's being estopped. Lord Holt there ruled, "that if A, not having any thing in certain land, demises it by indenture to B, and afterwards A purchases the land, this will be a good lease by estoppel." And the second resolution in Palmer v. Ekins, 2 Id. Raym. 1550, 1551, is equally in point as to the operation of this estoppel upon any second grantee of the duke, if there ever had been such a grantee, which there certainly never was. That resolution, which makes no exception in favour of the crown, is thus: "Privies in estate, as the feoffee, lessee, &c. shall be bound by, and take advantage of, estoppels. If A lease by indenture to B lands in which he hath nothing, and afterwards A purchases the lands in fee, and sells them to D and his heirs, D shall be estopped. And where the estoppel works on the interest in the land, it runs with the land into whosoever hands the land cometh."

This doctrine is assumed as true in Trevivan v. Lawrance, 1 Salk. 276, of which case the marginal abstract (made probably by Knightly D'Anvers or Sergeant Wilson) is this: "Where estoppel works on the interest of the land it runs with it, and is a title." It may be admitted that in general the crown is not bound by estoppels; that is to say, no estoppel can arise from any grant or act of the king so as to bind the crown. But if the king acquires by descent, or otherwise, lands which are bound by estoppel as against the person under whom he claims, the estoppel will continue even against the crown.

The language in Reg. v. Delme, 10 Mod. 200, which will be cited on the other side, is the language, not of the court, for the case concludes with an "adjournatur," but of counsel in argument. The authorities referred to in support of it are 1st Siderfin, (a doubtful authority for any doubtful position) p. 412, and that is a short note deciding that the king may bring an action where he pleases; and Hobart, p. 339, where the ruling is "warranty collateral binds not the king without true and actual assets, nor by estoppels of his own recitals ex certa scientia." This is in accordance with the distinction contended for, and it is believed that no case can be found contrary to that distinction. Even if the duke was not thus technically "estopped," so to pass a title at law,—of which, when coming by estoppel, it is said in one of the preceding cases "an ejectment is maintainable upon the mere estoppel"—he surely was estopped in equity. His covenants for further assurance made him a trustee, whether a common or a kingly person; and what more is wanted here?

But however imperfect Mr. Penn's title may have been in its origin, it was made perfect in various ways by confirmation from the crown. The letter from Queen Mary in 1694, is confirmation. It was a restoration in all things; in rights of soil and in powers of government. Then, how could the sons of Penn have sustained their bill in equity before Lord Hardwicke, 1 Ves. Sr. 444., without a title and a good title. The bill in the curious breviate here produced, shews that they set out their title very fully. The act of September 2d, 1775, shews, moreover, that after being settled by Lord Hardwicke, Penn's title, as thus set out in the bill, was confirmed by Geo. III. in 1769, and by the state of Delaware on the very eve of her declaration of independence. The legislature which passed the act of September 2d, 1775, appointed the delegates who attended in this hall, and declared her independence ten months thereafter. She thus came into the Union, claiming the Penn boundaries; and the principle established by the supreme court of the United States is, that each state, on the Declaration of Independence, became invested with all the sovereign power within her colonial limits.

It has had indirect confirmation of a very strong kind. At the commencement of the eighteenth century the country was greatly excited by contests about the royal powers of government, in all the colonies, but especially those of New England. New Jersey surrendered them in 1702, and continued under a crown government from that day until the Revolution. The ministry of England procured the passage of the statute of Anne which prohibited the crown from granting charters with royal powers within the kingdom; and after that day no charter with such royal powers appears to have been granted among the colonies. But Penn's continued to be a proprietary and charter government, with royal and sovereign powers, subordinate to the crown, and in many respects resembling the government of a county palatine in England. He was never displaced but once, and then only to be restored. It derived further confirmation in 1717 when a powerful nobleman at the English court, the Earl of Sutherland, petitioned the king, without success, for a grant of Penn's three lower counties. The privy council referred the matter to Northey and Thompson, the attorney and solicitor general. The deed from the king was not before these officers: its existence was unknown to them. Penn, they say, was unable to appear, "being under a lunacy." The case was less strong than that here presented, yet the attorney and solicitor general conclude their report as follows: "On the whole matter, we humbly submit it to your majesty's consideration, whether it will not be reasonable that your majesty's title should be established by the court of chancery before any grant should be made of the premises." 1 Chalm. Op. 39-56. Was any such effort at establishing the title in chancery ever made by the Earl of Sutherland, by the king or by any one? It was not. Penn's title derived further confirmation from the decree of Lord Hardwicke (Belt, Supp. Ves. Sr. 198), which saved the rights of the crown, and gave liberty to either party to move to alter the decree in case the crown should ever disturb the possession. But no such motion was ever made that we have heard of, and we must infer that the crown never did disturb the title. Indeed, there is an opinion of Northey, attorney general, expressly in favour of Penn's title to the three lower counties. The opinion was given in consequence of a contemplated agreement between the crown and William Penn, to purchase from Penn his right of government of the province of Pennsylvania and the three lower counties. Its date is 1711, and it is stated that William Penn waited upon him with his title papers, both of the province and three lower counties, and had made out his title thereto. 1 Chalm. Op. 32.

But it is said, or will be said, that in 1685, in the controversy with Lord Baltimore, the title was decided to be in the crown. Let us look at the history of that case. At that time Lord Baltimore contested Penn's title before the privy council. He claimed that his own patent from Charles I. for wild and uncultivated land, extended to the Delaware river. The privy council decided against his title, on the ground that the territory in dispute was not a savage country, (the only sort of country granted to Lord Baltimore to settle and civilize,) but was settled by a Christian people, to wit, the Swedes and the Dutch, who had been located on the Delaware before Lord Baltimore received his patent at all. Penn's title was not before the privy council. It was not necessary for him to show it. It was sufficient for his purposes to show that the crown had never granted it to Lord Baltimore, who, having petitioned the king on that occasion for a hearing on his title, stood before the privy council like a plaintiff in ejectment, bound to show a title; and he failed to do it. Penn, being heard before the council, in behalf of the crown, like a defendant in ejectment, folded his arms, and relied on the insufficiency of his opponent's title. The decree was in favour of the king, and properly so, because, as against Lord Baltimore his claim was good. But the king's claim, which was thus adjudged good against Lord Baltimore, was, as against Penn, good to this extent only, that he was "royal trustee" for Penn, who held all the beneficial proprietary interest.

We maintain the Penn title, because it is the true title; and we are instructed by the concurring testimony of the best professional men in Delaware, that with one or two exceptions, the inception of title to land there is by a proprietary warrant and survey, whenever it is necessary to trace a Delaware title back to its origin. But whether Penn had the title or not from the Duke of York, the duke had the title from the king. So the title was out of the crown; and the boundaries in the king's patent, which are nearly identical with those in the deeds from the duke to Penn, are the proper boundaries of Delaware, even on the supposition that Penn had not the title. For, suppose the deeds from the duke to Penn to be void, still the fact appears that the Penns held possession of the country, and governed it, for nearly one hundred years. They either held under their own title, or under that of the Duke of York, or by his acquiescence; and they held by the metes and bounds in the king's deed, which have always been the metes and bounds of the colony and the state. In this aspect of the case the title is just as clear as if the Penn title were indisputable. With regard to the jurisdiction exercised since the memory of men now living, we need not enlarge. The venerable Kensey Johns, whose high character for learning and integrity, and whose great opportunities for judging, must be well known to the arbitrator—he, and all the other professional gentlemen who have been examined, swear positively that, so far as they have ever heard or known, the state of Delaware has exercised exclusive jurisdiction within the circle, and that they have never heard her right to do so questioned in Delaware, except in the single instance of these claimants under this Jersey title. Many of the witnesses give in evidence acts of jurisdiction by Delaware up to low water mark on the Jersey shore, her officers seizing vessels and persons, debtors, and offenders against the law, in all parts of the river within twelve miles of New Castle, without question of the Delaware right. On the other hand, the only evidence of the exercise of judicial jurisdiction by New Jersey, within the circle was, that a constable came to the Pea Patch to arrest a man who had assaulted another between the island and the Jersey shore. He showed no process but a pistol. The fisherman denied the jurisdiction of New Jersey and refused to go with the constable, who had to return without him; but the fisherman told him that if he would go to Delaware and get regular process from one of her courts, he would go with him! The fisherman understood the common law of the country; and the people there understood no different rule.

Without particularizing them, we need only say of the various legislative enactments of New Jersey, that none of them are of sufficient force to control the clear language of the charter, nor indeed to do more than countervail other enactments of the same state. The act of January 21st, 1709, which brings the western limits of the counties but to the river, is strongly against them all, even if the state had a right to give herself, of her own mere motion, rivers and territories which belonged to others.

As to the adverse possession, the evidence has been already stated. Was this such a pedis possessio as will constitute an adverse holding against the state of Delaware? Even if adverse possession made a title against that state; which the learned counsel on the other side, who come from states where the law may be different, will allow us to inform them that it does not. The state had no knowledge of it. It was an insignificant thing at best, which, if noticed, would not have been resisted. It proved to have been an unprofitable speculation, and because they knew that it would prove so, is the reason why the fishermen from New Castle never attempted any similar enterprise. You might as well go about to prove title to a whole forest, by showing that you had hunted the bear and the panther, or any other animals feræ nature, there, as to set up a title to an island under water at high tide, by proof that you had, at some time, fished for shad and herring on its margin. We say nothing of the absurdity of attempting to prescribe for a shoal beneath the flow of the tide. The proof of the case renders it unnecessary to discuss the law of prescription, or its application to such an object. It is said that Stypson's Island and Egg Island were held under grants from New Jersey. The islands were in the bay near the Jersey shore, and outside of the circle. We know nothing of either, or of the grants for them. In Smith's History of New Jersey (page 415), it is mentioned that as late as 1738, the Indians claimed title to "Stypson's Island, near Delaware river." If this be true, we may doubt perhaps the existence of any state grant for it prior to the Revolution. But we enter our protest against any attempts to establish a prescriptive right to either lands or waters within the limits of Delaware, by showing a trespass on what the law writers call "an unguarded possession," a trespass of which the state had no notice, or which was too insignificant to attract attention or resistance. If it could be proved that any citizen of New Jersey had built a temporary shantee on the little sand flat called Goose Island, or even pastured a cow there, would it not be ridiculous to set up an adverse holding within the circle for the state of New Jersey, when the people on the opposite shore had either not noticed the fact, or, through charity for the poor man, had not driven him away?

The object of Penn, in obtaining the grant of the river and soil of the Delaware may be readily conceived. It was to command the door and entrance to his favourite colony of Pennsylvania, including the intended city of Philadelphia. He wished to protect that colony from the exactions on its commerce to which it would be liable, in case the country on the right bank of the river, below Pennsylvania, and the river itself, should fall into unfriendly hands. The historian Ebeling, of Hamburg, tells us that the object was the safety and security of Pennsylvania (1 Haz. Pa. Reg. 34); not only the security of the navigation and commerce of the river, as necessary to the prosperity of his colony, but also the safety and defence of that colony against an invading foe. The power of establishing marshal law for the suppression of insurrection, mutiny, and rebellion, and the power of repulsing and expelling all invaders, were expressly conferred upon him by the duke's deed, as explained by the subsequent deed from the king. Without the river, he could not erect a fort on an island within it, nor plant a chevaux-de-frise, to repel a hostile fleet; for, in his prior grant of the colony of Pennsylvania, of 1680, his whole colony was bounded on the east by the low water mark on the western side of the Delaware river. Observe the language of the deeds, connected with the circle. So far as they convey the land, it is only that lying within the circle; but when they convey the river it is different. They convey all the islands in the river, "and the said river (i. e. the whole river) and soil thereof lying north of the southernmost part of the said circle." Penn had already the province of Pennsylvania, stretching its broad side for nearly two hundred miles along the river. He next gets twenty-four miles of a small sterile country below, and all the river. Can it be doubted that he meant the grant principally for the benefit of the larger tract as well as of the small one? With the policy of the compact of April 26th, 1783, by which Pennsylvania surrendered one-half the river above the circle to New Jersey, we have nothing to do. But we think it clear, from the evidence before us, that there was some mistake about the Pennsylvania title, and that Penn was as great a statesman as some who have succeeded him. The opinion of York and Raymond, in 1721, that neither Pennsylvania nor New Jersey had title to the river and its soil, by virtue of their respective charters, was true, but this opinion would have been changed by the production of the deeds under which Penn acquired his title to the three lower counties, and all the river and soil thereof north of the southernmost part of the circle.

Those deeds could not have been known, we think, to the commissioners who negociated the compact of April 26th, 1783. There is ground to believe that islands in the Delaware were granted by Pennsylvania prior to the Revolution. See Fisher v. Carter [Case No. 4,815].

As to the value of Judge Baldwin's opinion. The case was tried on the most imperfect information, and the charge is inconsistent and confused. But the doctrines of the court, as we read them, were unsound even upon the case as it there appeared. The doctrine of adverse possession we have disposed of. The line suggested as possible, from the two points where the circle touches the river, it will be seen by the chart, would actually give us the island which we claim, as well as a part of New Jersey which we don't claim. That part of the opinion in which he construes one of the duke's deeds by the language of the other, merely because they were both executed between the same parties and on the same day, though for different tracts of territory, is an example of judicial license for which our law books furnish no parallel. Then Judge Baldwin considers the act of February 7th, 1794, a disclaimer of the Penn title. We need not explain the true objects of the act, which are well known to the profession in Delaware. But whatever it may mean, or whatever it may do, it is apparent that one of its great objects was to confirm all the titles in Delaware which had ever been lawfully issued, either by the Penns or the Duke of York. The judge calls the recital in the preamble of this act of Delaware her "repudiation" of the proprietary title. What he means by repudiation our law books do not advise us. Is it that the state is estopped to assert the truth by a mere preamble in one of her legislative enactments? But New Jersey could not take advantage of such an estoppel, if there were any, because she is a stranger to the act. There can be no estoppel which is not mutual. The holding of the judge amounts to this, that Delaware, through her act of 1794, had, by way of estoppel, or, as he calls it, by "election and repudiation," ceded away a part of her territory to New Jersey. If so, New Jersey must have agreed to accept this portion of territory from Delaware, before she could become entitled to it. There must, therefore, have been some compact or agreement between the two states, the one to cede away a part of her territory, and the other to receive it as a part of hers. To this the reply is, that the constitution of the United States declares (article 1, § 9), that "no state shall, without the consent of congress enter into any agreement or compact with another state." The doctrine that Delaware, on coming into the Union, had her "election" either to affirm or repudiate the proprietary title, is a new doctrine, never heard of before. Who had the right to put her upon her election? What principle, or what rule of duty, demanded such a thing of her? If the legislature of Delaware had asserted in a thousand preambles, that the Penns, in 1794, had no title to the vacant lands in Delaware, the whole of them would not have shaken the great fact established by all history, that William Penn was the owner of the vacant lands in the territories comprising the three lower counties.

There yet remains another view of this case; and, if we are right in it, the title of the United States is good, although the utmost pretensions of New Jersey, which are that her title extends to the middle channel of the river, should be sustained. If she holds to the middle of the channel, where is that channel? Mr. Fairfax, of the coast survey, proves that the Jersey channel is the widest, deepest, shortest and most central channel. The inference must be that the volume of water which daily passes on the Jersey side, is greater than that which passes on the Delaware side. We have no definition in the books of what the "main channel" of a river is, but we suppose* that such a channel is that one through which the greatest volume of water passes, and which is nearest to the centre of the river. Indeed Mr. Fairfax says in so many words, that the Jersey channel is "the main channel." It is true that pilots, and common watermen who navigate but small craft, consider the western channel to be the "main channel;" by which they have meant, generally, that it has been more navigated by vessels than the other. But they appear to have been ignorant of the depth of water in the eastern channel, and their testimony reminds us of the refusal of some of the New York pilots to believe in the existence of Gedney's channel, long after the coast survey had published its soundings to the world. Our Delaware pilots, although among the best in the world, were unacquainted with the existence of Blake's channel, on the western side of the bay, before the coast survey disclosed its course and depth. In 1836 the Pennsylvania line-of-battle ship, the largest vessel that ever floated on the waters of the Delaware, passed down the Jersey, not the Delaware, channel. It is admitted that the bottom of the Delaware channel is soft, and the channel itself better known, which is the reason why it is preferred; as an injury from grounding on mud bottom would be less than an injury from grounding on a bottom of sand or gravel.

It has been said that in ancient days the depth of water in the eastern channel was much less than it is at present, and that the river has been constantly gaining for a number of years upon the New Jersey bank. That does not alter the relative rights of the two states. In such a case, what is lost by one of two coterminous states is gained by the other; and if it had been proved that the main channel was formerly on the Delaware side, but that it had insensibly changed its course and passed through the Jersey channel while forming the island, the law of nations would, in that case, clearly give all the alluvia and all the islands westward of the new channel to the state lying on that side of it. The distinction is between alluvion and avulsion. A state loses or gains by the former, but not by the latter.

Mr. Bibb and Mr. Eaton, for the United States. The grant of the king to the Duke of York, 12th March, 1663-64, was of an immense region extending from St. Croix in the state of Maine, to the southernmost extremity of the state of New Jersey. Its object, after dispossession of the Dutch, was colonization. It conveys all waters, fishings and royalties appertaining to the granted premises. The duke, in 1664, conveys a very large portion of the tract to Berkeley and Carteret, with the same extensive estates, rights and privileges. Colonization was the sole object of this grant. Upon such grants, made with such objects, it is difficult to presume that a right to a natural portion of the river was withheld. If not essential to the purposes of the grant, it was largely conducive to them, and all presumption must be in its favour. The river was in early days the only mode of passing from the northern part of the colony to the southern; the colonists were constantly upon it passing up and down. It would have been inconvenient, in the highest degree, that crimes committed below low water mark should have been without the limit of any cis-Atlantic jurisdiction; amenable only to courts more than three thousand miles away. The briefs produced on the other side, shews that in their suit with Lord Baltimore, the Penns actually adduced as part of their title to Delaware, this grant of 12th March, 1663-64. "It is pretended," says the briefs (page 37), "that as this grant to the Duke of York, when coming from the eastward, extends only to the east side of Delaware Bay, so that it did not by express words include the three lower counties which are on the west side of that bay. But it was a very large and extensive grant, of several very large tracts and territories in America, and passed as we say all lands appertaining to those extensive tracts." And by this the Penns claimed Delaware. This was carrying the matter certainly very far, and the intelligent counsel of the Penns properly admit, that so carried, it is a weak point in their case. It would have passed half a continent. But even in this extent, it was the doctrine of the Penn proprietaries of Delaware in 1735; and the state of Delaware cannot complain of that argument if, in 1847, we lay hold of what is but a hem of its garment.

How does the case stand upon authority?

We have no knowledge of the circumstances under which the opinion of the crown lawyers was given in 1721. 1 Chalm. Op. 59. It is probable that it was upon the application of some person for a grant of those islands. There could not well have been any other occasion for it. Crown lawyers understood the proprietaries of their office, and, as might have been predicted, the opinion is in favour of the crown. But was any grant ever made in accordance with it? any act done in consequence of it? Certainly none ever was; and considering the zeal with which these grants were asked for, we may well oppose the action of the crown, to the abstract opinion of its counsel. Looking only at "clauses extracted out of the charters of New Jersey and Pennsylvania," the crown lawyers may have been right; looking at the whole charters, their objects, the colonization under them, and the interpretation which had been made upon them, by fifty-seven years of practice and action, they were certainly wrong.

It is certain that in Handly's Lessee v. Anthony, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 374, 385, the doctrine we oppose was but conceded, not decided. The judgment went on another point. But even the concession was upon a very different case. Virginia, a populous state, having a people living on its river, grants to the United States, out of pure liberality, "the territory northwest of the river Ohio." It grants territories, nothing else. It conveys no powers of government, nor appurtenances, nor privileges, nor rights, nor estates whatsoever, connected with, or appertaining to the original territory. The gift is limited "to territory northwest of the river:" the bare territory. Compare the language of the grant by Virginia with that of the grant by Charles II. ante, p. 1124. One carries every thing; the other, land, and land alone. The difference between them is as wide as the poles. They are grants, and that is the only point of resemblance between them. Corfield v. Coryell [Case No. 3,230] is no authority either; for the case was decided upon the form of action alone; and though Judge Washington, referring to the grants of Charles II. and the Duke of York, does say, that under these grants (italicizing the words) the claim of New Jersey below low water mark cannot be maintained, he yet says, after looking at but a portion of the early New Jersey legislation produced here, that "these acts prove, beyond a doubt, that the proprietaries of West New Jersey, from a very early period asserted a right to the river Delaware or to some part thereof, below low water mark and along its whole length." It is unimportant for our case, as we shall shew hereafter, whether the right arose on a nice interpretation of the charter, or whether it arose from claim de facto. We beg to say too, that Judge Washington's limitation of the rivers, fishings and royalties granted, to those "within the boundaries of the granted premises," is a limitation different from that of the charter, which gives not those "within" the premises—but those "belonging and appertaining to them, with their and every of their appurtenances." Who can doubt that the river Delaware is to some extent naturally "appurtenant" to New Jersey? It washes her shores along her whole western length. It receives the waters of her streams and rivers. The products of her soil are shipped directly upon it. Her people drink its water, and take its fish for their sustenance. They erect their mansions upon its margin, and contemplate, with the pride of ownership, the broad and beautiful expanse which gives to the landscape its crowning grace. It has always been so; so let it ever be! You might as well tell the people of New Jersey that their title papers were blanks, and their estates "air, thin air," as tell them that the mud which the receding tide exposes, is all their right in this noble stream; this stream so nearly connected with their present enjoyment, their future wealth and their ancient glory. Of Bennett v. Boggs [Case No. 1,319] we need not speak. It was decided upon the last two cases, neither of which is authority for its doctrine. Much better authority on this particular subject is that of Chief Justice Tilghman. Kean v. Rice, 12 Serg. & R. 203, 209. In a case before him, a defendant of Pennsylvania being prosecuted by an inhabitant of New Jersey for taking oysters in Delaware Bay below low water mark of the Jersey shore, set up, among other defences, that New Jersey had no jurisdiction. "Very laborious researches into ancient records have been made, to shew that New Jersey was bounded on the west by the Bay of Delaware, and therefore could have no jurisdiction below the low water mark. Such a doctrine," says the chief justice, "would come with an ill grace from the courts of Pennsylvania, which is bounded on her charter, on the east, by the river Delaware, and yet has always claimed and exercised jurisdiction at least to the middle of the river, and finally settled, by a solemn compact with New Jersey, the right of navigation and jurisdiction as to the whole river. In the construction of the colonial charter, ancient claim and usage, are entitled to very great weight. Not long before the American Revolution, Lord Rochford attempted to obtain a grant from the crown of England of some valuable islands in the Delaware, opposite and near to the Pennsylvania shore, under pretence that the charter to William Penn was bounded on the east, by the river. The argument seemed plausible. But the proprietaries of Pennsylvania, having obtained a hearing before the king in council, and proved that they had always exercised jurisdiction on the river, always claimed those islands, and granted some of them for a valuable consideration, which had been improved at great expense by the purchasers, and were then very valuable, the claim of Lord Rochford was relinquished."

We have to regret that while this case is argued on one side by lawyers of Delaware, who are intimately acquainted with all her local and juridical history, who know instinctively where to apply for evidence of all that she has ever claimed; it should be argued in behalf of New Jersey by those who have scarcely any knowledge of what relates to her peculiar history or claims at all. There are many islands in the Delaware which lie nearest to her shore; some of them have been held under title prior to the Revolution, and no doubt the records of her land office would shew that they are held under warrants from her, as those nearer Pennsylvania are affirmed by Chief Justice Tilghman to be held under warrants from that state. It would appear from Smith, the historian (Hist. N. J. 445), that New Jersey claimed Stypson's Island, which is believed to be in the Delaware; and we are credibly informed that Egg Island is held under a New Jersey warrant. It is not important that these islands are without the circle; for according to the argument of the other side, New Jersey did not come, any where along her whole extent, below low water mark. If she came below that mark without the circle, the same charter or the same usurpation would take her below within it. As for Reedy Island and Bombay Hook, nothing can be inferred from the claim of them by Delaware, though within the circle, for they both lie much nearer to Delaware than to New Jersey. Here, let it be remembered, was New Jersey, a great state, with soil and powers of government granted away; remote from the parent country; its people stretching themselves, as is usual in a new country, along the water's margin. How naturally would they by degrees usurp rights beyond those granted by their deed! Pennsylvania we see did it; and the usurpation was admitted by the crown. New Jersey had been there sixteen years before Pennsylvania, and having no opposite neighbours, was still more likely to do it. Individuals may not be able to prescribe against the crown, but a distinction in favour of colonies—of nations as these truly were—seems entirely natural. "I am of opinion," says Lord Hardwicke in his opinion upon the disputes between the Penns and Baltimore (1 Ves. Sr. 444, 453), "I am of opinion that full and actual possession is sufficient title to maintain a suit for settling boundaries: a strict title is never entered into in cases of this kind, neither ought it. * * * I will say once for all, that long possession and enjoyment, peopling and cultivating countries, is one of the best evidences of title to lands in America that can be; and so I have always thought in all cases since I have served the crown; for the great beneficial advantages arising to the crown from settling, &c. is that the navigation and commerce of this country is thereby improved. The persons, therefore, who make these settlements ought to be protected in the possession as far as law and equity can." Now, with even our imperfect evidence we can shew, that in all probability the state of New Jersey did never consider herself as bound by low water mark. Pennsylvania, bounded just like her, we see did not. Why should New Jersey be presumed to have done so? It was against her convenience. It was no where so directly prescribed to her. Handly's Lessee v. Anthony had never raised doubts upon the question, and the general law of nations was in her favour. We find, accordingly, that six years before the Duke of York's grant to Penn for the circle, New Jersey actually grants "convenient portions of land for wharves, keys and landings." There was no limitation to their extent. A break-water to the middle of the bay and wharves to an indefinite extent in the river, were both within the right. In 1693, she declares Delaware Bay "within the boundaries of her government," and in the strongest way treats its whalery as within her jurisdiction. In 1725, she taxes the ferries across the river, and enacts such laws as shall compel the neighbouring colonies to pay the tax. In 1771, she treats the soil of the river as well as its waters completely as her own property, giving to commissioners "authority to clear, scour, open, enlarge, straighten or deepen" the river; to remove any obstructions in it; and provides for the trial of any offence against the act, committed upon the river. All these acts, with others not very unlike them, are public acts of her legislature, which it must be presumed were known, and which, so far as the evidence goes, it is certain were never opposed nor questioned by any body, least of all by Delaware. We repeat, it is of no moment that they are not specifically applied within the circle. The whole of the western boundary of New Jersey, so far as the charter limits give it, is the same: and in construing the charter as coming below low water mark, there is no limitation to those portions above and below the circle, nor exception of that part within it. Now what on the other hand is the title of Delaware? The deeds to Penn from the Duke of York certainly convey no title of themselves. But it is said that the royal charter of 22d March, 1683, to the Duke of York made good, "by estoppel" or some other operation of law, a title which, of itself, is conceded to be bad. But to this position there are objections:

I. That charter could convey nothing which had been previously granted to Lord Baltimore, as all the land between the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays had been. It is of no use to say that Penn finally established a title to the Delaware half of that same territory, in Penn v. Lord Baltimore. He did so as the report of the case shews, principally in virtue of the articles of agreement of 1732, coupled with long possession and colonization. The order in council of November 7, 1685, which was made after the charter to the duke, gave this territory to the king, not to Penn; and that order, so far as Lord Baltimore was concerned, deprived him of no right under the charter;—which could not be repealed, it is submitted, by any order of council, nor otherwise than by scire facias to repeal the charter for deception, or as having been improperly granted. What motive Lord Baltimore had for entering into the articles of 1732, by which he surrendered a portion of his territories, we need not inquire. That he thought them unjust is clear, since he strongly resisted their execution. It is enough for our purpose that on them the Penns' bill was filed, and that on them with possession and colonization he got the decree.

II. That if the charter did convey to the Duke of York, the estate which he, having nothing in, had previously granted to Penn, and if the duke had been bound, as a private person, by the estoppel which, in virtue of the two deeds, might make a title to Penn, yet the duke was freed from it so soon as he ascended the throne. "There is no arguing," said counsel in Reg. v. Delme, 10 Mod. 200, as if stating a well settled doctrine, "from proceedings at law between subjects, to suits where the crown is a party, because the crown has several privileges; as the crown may waive their demurrer, take issue and waive that issue. The crown may change their own venue. The queen may amend her pleadings at any time, nor will any estoppel bind the crown."

There is another inquiry to be made. Could the king of England, in his prerogative right, grant the beds of navigable streams where the tides ebb and flow, and which are thus reckoned arms of the sea? Does not Magna Charta prevent him, and does he not hold them in trust for the benefit of all the subjects of his realm, and not to be bestowed in monopoly or for individual benefit? Martin v. Waddell, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 411. Delaware then has no paper title; and what is the evidence of any claim, or exercise of exclusive right upon the river beyond the middle line; claim, it is meant, anterior to the Revolution. That of the fort tax was met by resistance as soon as it was made, and abandoned by Delaware as soon as it was resisted. This case shews that Delaware was ready not only to assert her rights, but to assert much more than her rights. Though Delaware incepts her title in a way which Penn always knew to be irregular, which the Earl of Sutherland asserted before the commissioners for trade and plantations, in 1717, was void, and which the crown lawyers thought was very doubtful; though she was in dispute with the Maryland proprietaries for seventy-eight years, and through two generations of both the Penns and the Baltimores; and had, on these accounts, great motive to recur to her boundaries frequently, and to define them with precision; where is the act by which she has asserted that she owned all the river, its soil and its islands clear to the Jersey shore? The decree in chancery (Penn v. Lord Baltimore, 1 Ves. Sr. 444), in 1754, had reference to the western boundary. It went upon articles of agreement between the parties. No one pretends that Lord Baltimore ever owned or even ever claimed either the river, river-soil or islands, within the twelve miles circle. His claim was to the river not over or in it; and the Penns contended that he did not even come to the river by many miles. Is it not then absurd to say that by a suit against Lord Baltimore for a specific performance, Penn could acquire the property now in question. Besides, neither William Penn nor Lord Baltimore, in their agreement of 1732, had any power to contract for New Jersey; nor to compromise the rights of the colony of New Jersey by a bill and answer, and decree of the court of chancery in England, for specific execution of a contract to which New Jersey was not a party contracting, nor a party in the suit. Lord Hardwicke, in his opinion and decree, states the case as a matter between the parties to the suit, and as not binding the tenure of the planters, nor the rights of the crown, nor the rights of any person not a party to the suit. While on the subject of Lord Hardwicke's decree, it is to be observed that so far from resting the Penns' Case on their deeds, the earl puts it upon possession and settlement as perhaps its strongest grounds.

But admit that the deeds of the duke and the king gave Delaware a right to the whole river and its soil, we think that the non-assertion of any title by herself, the constant counter-assertion and action by New Jersey,—both taken in connexion with the anomalous, ungeographical and unnatural character of the boundary—its variance, in the same continuous stream, from the boundary above and below it; its total want of definition, and the impossibility of giving it any, as to place of either beginning or ending; the uncommon facility, not to say the irresistible necessity for usurpation and encroachment; all urge to the conclusion, if the conclusion be any way possible, that she did in point of fact abandon the Jersey half. Many witnesses, of whom we need say nothing except—that they all came from Delaware—tell us that since the Revolution, Delaware has always claimed and exercised jurisdiction over the river within the circle; that they never heard it denied or doubted in the state of Delaware. Both may be admitted. As to the first, the matter depends upon ante-revolutionary claim, not upon claim since the Revolution. We all agree that whatever boundary New Jersey had in 1776, that she has still. Respecting the second, lawyers of Delaware were not in a position where they were likely to hear much of the claims of New Jersey. Of course they never heard the Delaware title doubted in Delaware, any more than they would have heard it suspected in New Jersey. They knew what they knew, but not what they did not know. They did not know what happened before they were born, nor what happened in places from which they were absent and remote. New Jersey was not heard by them, and they did not speak loud enough to be heard by New Jersey. The exclusive jurisdiction of the state of Delaware, attempted to be proved, is in its nature a negative; it amounts to nothing more than this, that they, these witnesses, men of a single generation, living in one state of Delaware, did not know every thing which, in the long track of time, had taken place in another state of New Jersey. The legislative enactments given by us in evidence rebut the negative evidence of ante-revolutionary "exclusive jurisdiction," attempted to be set up for Delaware. We have not brought the sworn testimony of the profession in New Jersey, but it is clear that Mr. Wall and Mr. Green, both of them holding office under the United States, have considered that Delaware did not have such rights as she claims; for they have both given opinions in favour of Mr. Humphrey and against the United States under which they were acting. All the trials referred to by our opponents have been in Delaware; and there is no evidence in any one of them, on which side of the middle line of the river the process in them was served. In a river so broad as the Delaware here is, having close to the Delaware shore the channel universally supposed to be the main one, and almost universally navigated; the large majority of the few cases where process appears to have been served on the river, would be on the Delaware and not on the New Jersey side of the line. They give, therefore, but little support to the Delaware claim. In no instance where the process is shewn to have been served on the Jersey side of the middle line, was there either resistance or trial. Of what judicial value—of what weight as precedents—the opinions of bound-bailiffs or of common sailors are worth, may be discovered, if it requires to be searched for, in the testimony of Mr. Janvier, taken by the United States. This gentleman who is brought to show practical illustrations of theoretical jurisprudence of more learned men, informs us that within his memory R. C. Dale, who was sheriff of New Castle county from 1803 to 1806, boarded a ship, with his posse, and arrested a person on board of her, after she had been run ashore on the Jersey side!

(The counsel then went into an argument upon the facts already stated, in order to shew that Mr. Humphrey had acquired a title to the island by possession: his warrant and survey were in 1784, from which time he was in possession until 1815, when dispossessed by a military force of the United States. This disseizin was a tortious one, and gave no title to the disseizor. Even if Delaware had a title to the island, she was not in possession in 1813, when she conveyed to the United States; and the counsel therefore assumed, that the transfer, being the transfer of a "pretence title," was illegal. The doctrine of election and repudiation under the act of February 7, 1794, was also urged, with other points which were of less importance.)

Then again, in 1784, when the survey was made for the Halls, the island was much nearer to the Jersey shore than now. That shore has been continually washing away since the formation of the island. The main channel of the river, the greatest volume of water, and greatest depth of water, then, was next the Delaware shore, however it may be at present. Now although the publick jurisdiction between two states on opposite sides of the river, having the river as their common arcifinious boundary, changes with the channel of the river, yet private rights acquired under the proper jurisdiction, before the change in the channel, are not annulled by the change of the current, nor transferred as publick domain to the other jurisdiction. The private right of property remains valid and secure through all changes of the channel of the river, if the land be not submerged or washed away. Whether therefore the island be, at this time, in New Jersey or in Delaware, it is still the property of Mr. Humphrey. It may have changed its sovereign: its owner is still the same.

But finally, the language of the duke's deed to Penn cannot be followed with the literality which a lawyer is disposed to give to every deed. "Land lying within the compass or circle of twelve miles about" the town of New Castle, would include land on the east just as much as on the north, south and west and therefore would include land in New Jersey, which the duke could not grant, as well as that in Delaware which he could. It can only grant that "land lying within the compass or circle," which the duke had a right to grant, that is to say land in Delaware. By this grant of "land," neither the river nor soil of it passes. This the counsel of the other side have themselves asserted in regard to our proprietary warrant of 1784. Besides which there is an express grant of whatever islands, river and river-soil are conveyed. The circle, then, stops with the river edge. There is nothing to carry it to "land" across. The facts of the case force us to bring it but to this margin; and it is clear from the Penns' own map, which is prefixed as an exhibit to the briefs of their solicitors in Penn v. Lord Baltimore, that this was the construction which the Penns themselves gave to it. Now throwing aside all other questions, it will be seen, by looking at the chart, that by even giving to Delaware what the duke's deed professes to grant her, that is to say, "all islands in the said river Delaware, and the said river and soil thereof lying north of the southernmost part of the said circle," she will not get the Pea Patch Island. A line drawn northward from the point where "the southernmost part of the said circle" touches the river, leaves this island on the outside. Give her, then, all she claims and she leaves us all we ask for.

OPINION.

Mr. SERGEANT, the arbitrator, having heard the evidence and arguments, and taken due time to examine and consider the matter, delivered the following opinion on the 15th January 1848, in one of the rooms of the capitol at Washington, in the presence of the counsel of the respective parties, and also of a considerable assemblage of persons who thought fit to attend:

The question submitted by the United States on the one side, and James Humphrey on the other, is thus stated in the submission: "To decide the question of the title to the Pea Patch Island, as derived by the United States from the state of Delaware, and by the said James Humphrey, claiming through the said Henry Gale, deceased, from the state of New Jersey."

The importance of the case consists chiefly in this; that it involves the question of the boundary for nearly twenty-five miles, between the two states just named. It is true that the settlement of that boundary is not submitted, nor to be decided in the arbitration; New Jersey and Delaware not being parties to the submission, nor having agreed so to submit their rights. But it is also true that in conveying, the one to the United States, and the other to an individual, the island in controversy, they have necessarily communicated to the grantees the right to assert the title respectively conveyed to them, and to dispute the adverse title: and it is very manifest that this controversy turns mainly, if not entirely, upon the question of the limits and jurisdiction of the respective states. If the Pea Patch Island is within the state of New Jersey, the title is in Mr. Humphrey. If within the state of Delaware, the title is in the United States.

The consideration and respect due to these states, as members of the Union, in whatever may touch their rights and interests, seemed to require that as much publicity as possible should be given to the proceedings; and an intimation to that effect was promptly acceded to by the city and county of Philadelphia, in liberally granting to the arbitration the use, first, of the supreme court chamber, and afterwards, of the venerable Hall of Independence. The arbitrator was attended by the counsel of the parties, who had laboriously searched out the evidence wherever it could be found, and followed its production with an able and learned, as well as interesting, discussion on both sides. It is believed that nothing has been omitted in either respect; and that there is no reason to suppose that any thing in the shape of evidence or argument remains unexplored, which could throw additional light upon the subject. It remains for the arbitrator, after careful deliberation, and with the aids just mentioned, having come to a conclusion satisfactory to himself, to make his award. In ordinary cases his duty would be performed by simply executing the needful paper, and giving it the direction which is required, in order to render it, as demanded by the submission, "final and conclusive between the United States and the said James Humphrey, claiming under the said Henry Gale, deceased."

But the same motives of consideration and respect, already stated, for giving the utmost publicity to the proceedings; the nature of the controversy; the length of time it has been pending; the names that have been connected with it, from whom he will feel himself bound to differ in his views, or at least to appear to differ; and, he must add, the great confidence reposed in him by the parties in leaving the matter so long litigated to his sole determination—a confidence which forbids him to doubt his ability to decide it, but by no means relieves him from an anxious sense of the responsibility of the task he has, by their invitation, undertaken—all these things concur to impose upon him the duty, as it is also his desire, to present, in an intelligible and somewhat permanent form, the grounds of his decision, for the satisfaction of the parties, and the examination of those who may feel any curiosity about the case, or any interest in it. He is fully aware that his opinion is of no authority whatever, except for the single purpose as to which the agreement of the parties has made it conclusive; that is, the question of title between them. He will, therefore, proceed to state these grounds as briefly as may be consistent with perspicuity.

The island in controversy, called the "Pea Patch," lies in the river Delaware, rather less than five miles from New Castle, in a south-eastwardly direction. The most satisfactory evidence respecting it was given by Wilson M. C. Fairfax, Esq. of the United States coast survey, being from actual and careful survey and measurement. It was in writing and not under oath, but was received by consent of both parties; and there is no reason to doubt its accuracy. According to this witness, the length of the island is 1,033 yards, its average breadth 461 yards, and its area $87^{\frac{60}{100}}$ acres. The mid-line of the island, at its north extremity, is 2,090 yards from the Delaware shore, and 2,130 yards from the New Jersey shore. The mid-line at the southern extremity is 2,197 yards from the Delaware shore, and 1,875 yards from the Jersey shore. The middle line of the river Delaware, he says, run through the island, would throw $21^{\frac{9}{10}}$ acres on the Delaware side, and $65^{\frac{7}{10}}$ acres to the New Jersey side. Such a line, he states, would pass through the island 46 yards north-east of the southwest extremity of the wharf at the lower end of the island which projects towards the Delaware shore, and 20 yards eastward of the middle point of the upper end of the island. With respect to the water, the witness says, the main and deepest channel of the Delaware river opposite the Pea Patch is on the Jersey side. The greatest depth of water in the channel on the Jersey side is 40 feet, and on the Delaware side 25 feet. The average depth of water in the channel of the Jersey side is 32 feet, and on the Delaware side 23 feet. But to take the entire channel on either side of the island, no vessel drawing more than 19 feet water, at low water of spring tide, can pass through. The Jersey channel is the shortest and widest, and both about equally curved.

Witnesses have been produced to show which is the main channel of the river, as to which they have differed in opinion. The greater part, probably, have thought the western or Delaware channel to be the main channel. They have stated that the bottom on that side is softer and safer, as well as better holding ground than on the east, though they state, also, that the eastern channel has undergone changes at different periods. Some of them have stated, too, and no doubt truly, that the shore on the Jersey side, opposite the Pea Patch, has been wearing away considerably for some years past. And, finally, some of them, judging only from sight, have asserted the island to be nearer to New Jersey than to Delaware. As to this, however, the evidence from survey and measurement, already referred to, is much more to be relied upon than opinions like these.

In the view to be taken of the case, and with reference to the grounds upon which it will be decided, it is not necessary to go into the particulars of the testimony just adverted to. The material facts, about which there can be no dispute, are these: The island is in the river Delaware, with a deep channel on each side; is far below the low water mark on both sides; is not connected with the land either of New Jersey or Delaware; and is at all times of tide surrounded by water. There is a shoal, called the "Bulk-Head Shoal," from the northern end, towards the northward and eastward, but it is never bare; and is, besides, pierced by a channel of such width and depth, that vessels of heavy draught of water can pass through it. The only question raised about it, and that not at all material, is, whether large sized vessels can beat through it from the western channel to the eastern, or in the opposite direction, against a head wind. The fact is, that vessels can pass entirely round the island, upon the waters of the river, at all times of the tide. The island is in the waters of the Delaware.

It is proper further to state, that this island is of comparatively recent formation. Maps and charts, as late as the middle of the eighteenth century, do not mention it. Kensey Johns, Esq. who was eighty-eight years and four months old at the time of his examination (Nov. 2d, 1847), a witness not more venerable for his years than for the high stations he has held, and the uniform excellence of his character and conduct through his long life, states that he had resided in New Castle from the year 1780 till that day. He then says, "I do know it, (the Pea Patch,) and have known it since the year 1780. At first it appeared about the size of a man's hat. In 1813, when the United States took possession of it, it had grown to be a large island. It was not worth a cent to a private citizen; the expense of banking would have been more than it was worth." The general conclusion seemed to be on both sides, that it had not made its appearance earlier than 1780, which in the argument, seemed to be an agreed time of its beginning to be visible, and was probably nearly correct. It would seem, with some allowance for what must be measurably hypothetical, to have sprung up from the bottom, in the deep channel of the river, dividing that channel into the two channels, whose respective titles to the dignity of the "main channel," have been so much controverted in the evidence and the argument. From other evidence it appears that, until the United States made some embankment, the island was nearly, if not entirely covered with water at every tide.

The main point, however, is that before mentioned, which will not be affected by any error in the conjecture just stated. From its first appearance, the island has always been where it now is, that is to say, in the deep river, below the low water mark, surrounded by navigable water, and separated at all times from the land on both sides.

The description and account thus given of the subject of controversy, are deemed to be sufficient for the present, to introduce and render intelligible the several questions to be considered and decided. They are indisputable, it is believed, and stand as facts beyond the reach of the conflicts in the evidence as to other matters, not deemed to be important, and therefore laid aside.

We are thus brought, after stating what the thing in controversy is,—enabling us to judge by what kind of title such a thing can be claimed and held,—to the examination of the case made out by the respective parties. And it is proposed to begin with the case of Mr. Humphrey, as most conducive to the right understanding of the questions to be considered.

Has Mr. Humphrey made out a title?

He begins, taking the evidence in chronological order, with the copy of the record of two warrants from the proprietaries of West New Jersey, one dated November 4th, 1743, for 600 acres of unappropriated land in West New Jersey, the other dated August 7th, 1782, for 5,000 acres: a return of a survey under them for Edward and Clement Hall, October 8th, 1874, "of an island in the river Delaware, called the Pea Patch, situate in the county of Salem, about one mile west of Finn's point, in Penn's neck, and is about west of the mouth of Salem creek, &c. containing 178 acres of marsh, sand bank, and mud flats; New Castle distant about $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles." The record adds: "November 3d, 1784, inspected and approved by the council of proprietors, and ordered to be recorded."

This record, authenticated as it was, was good evidence by the laws of New Jersey, and therefore was good evidence in the arbitration. It was accordingly admitted.

Many objections were made to the warrants, and especially to the survey, which need not be stated. The answer to them all was this, that if the proprietaries of West New Jersey were the owners of the island, and had power to grant it, it was for them, and for them only, where there was no interfering right, to object to irregularities in the warrants or in the surveys under them. By accepting and approving the return of survey, and ordering it to be recorded, they waived all such objections, and no one else could make them, unless he had a right which was interfered with. The survey must, therefore, be taken to be good, and to have vested the title in the Messrs. Hall, if the proprietaries had a right to grant. From Messrs. Hall, the title, by mesne conveyances, was regularly derived to Mr. Humphrey, so as to vest in him all the right they had, which, as we have seen, was all the proprietaries could give, neither more nor less.

The question then is, what right had the proprietaries? When Judge Baldwin gave his charge to the jury in the case of Gale's Lessee v. Behlin [Case No. 5,189], in the circuit court of the United States for the district of New Jersey, (which will be more particularly noticed hereafter,) the case of Martin v. Waddell, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 367, had not been decided by the supreme court of the United States, where it was brought by writ of error to the circuit court just mentioned, upon a judgment there rendered, Judge Baldwin presiding. The decision of the supreme court was in 1842. Being upon a question within the jurisdiction of that high court, it is deemed to be of the highest authority in all inferior tribunals, and, of course, in this, in point of authority, the most humble of all. The point there decided—to say nothing of the learned and satisfactory reasoning of the chief justice (Taney) in delivering the opinion of the majority of the court—the very point decided is, that after the surrender to the crown in 1702, by the proprietors of East New Jersey, of the powers of government, they had no right in the navigable rivers within the charter limits of New Jersey, nor to the soil under them, and have had none since. In this respect, the West New Jersey proprietaries stand upon the same ground precisely. Both surrendered the powers of government at the same time, and, it is believed, in the same terms. The decision of the supreme court equally settles the law for both. It follows, that the West New Jersey proprietors, at the date of the warrants and survey, and acceptance of the survey, had no right in the river Delaware, even though it had been within the charter limits of New Jersey, (which will be hereafter examined,) and could give no right in the island to Messrs. Hall. For, upon the survey itself, it appeared that the island was "in the river Delaware," and that it was "about one mile" from Finn's point, the nearest land on the Jersey coast.

The same point was decided in the same way by the highest judicial tribunal of the state of New Jersey. Arnold v. Mundy, 1 Halst. [6 N. J. Law] 1; Shepard v. Leverson, 1 Penn. [2 N. J. Law] 391. The first of these cases is said to have been upon a location made to try the right. In the other it came up incidentally.

The concurring judgments of the supreme court of the United States, and of the judges of the highest court of New Jersey, in such a matter, certainly do amount to binding authority. In accepting them as such, however, it is not to be understood that any doubt is entertained of the solidity of the grounds upon which they were made. It may be deemed presumptuous, perhaps, even to suggest that they are approved, where approval is of so little consequence, indeed so entirely valueless, in comparison with the proper and intrinsic weight of the judgments of these high courts, and especially of the supreme court of the United States. It may be allowable, nevertheless, to add, in vindication only of the effort to fulfil the whole duty confided to the arbitrator, that if the question were new, and to be examined without the aid of the great light thrown upon it by the opinion of the supreme court of the United States, having fully and deliberately examined the question, he should, upon original grounds, come to the same conclusion that he most willingly yields to the rightful authority of the judgment. It seems contrary to reason, and against the spirit of our institutions, that great public rights, in which all have an interest and concern in common, should be without a public guardianship, disinterested enough to regard all with impartiality, and powerful enough to protect them in the enjoyment of their privileges. Government is the proper trustee, everywhere existing with the consent or allowance of the people, and, in our representative republics, by free election, with the power of change. If, in the discharge of such trust, portions might be disposed of, so as to diminish the common fund, still there would be no contradiction, as is supposed, of one or more of the grants by the state of New Jersey, for it must be presumed that such disposition is itself in some way for the common benefit, and on terms the least injurious to the publick. A private proprietor, on the contrary, looks only, and rightfully looks only to his own advantage.

The conclusion upon this point is, that the survey was merely void, that it gave no title, and that no title can be derived from it, the proprietors themselves having no right in a navigable river, nor any power to grant.

The next evidence of title exhibited and relied upon by Mr. Humphrey, is an act of the legislature of the state of New Jersey, dated November 24th, 1831, granting to Henry Gale, his heirs and assigns, "all the right and title of the said state of New Jersey to the said island called the Pea Patch, situate in the river Delaware, in the township of Lower Penn's Neck, in the county of Salem and state of New Jersey, as mentioned and described in the before mentioned survey," meaning the survey of 1784.

This act, it will be seen, was passed about seventeen years after the present controversy began, and during the time the United States were in actual possession of the island. The counsel of Mr. Humphrey, in the course of the argument, objected to the cession of the island to the United States by the state of Delaware, on the ground that the state was not in possession, but it was adversely held and possessed, and therefore could not be lawfully conveyed. The same objection applies to New Jersey. Whether such is the law of

New Jersey or Delaware, is not known. It is believed not to be so. But it is not material to inquire into the matter, nor to examine particularly the evidence of possession, for a reason which seems to be a sufficient answer. Both acts of the respective legislatures, besides operating as grants, being passed with all the forms and sanctions of the constitution, were also acts of legislation, and, no third right intervening, could pro tanto repeal the general law, and give the required ability. Such would be their effect. If, then, the Pea Patch Island was within the limits of New Jersey, and subject to her jurisdiction, there is no doubt of the sufficiency of the grant to pass the title of the state. The same may be said of the state of Delaware, whether they had champerty laws or not. It remains, too, to be shown that a sovereign state can be affected by adverse possession, unless so long continued as to found a presumption of grant.

It may be further remarked, that in this act the state of New Jersey does not assert a right or title. In the preamble the act recites the survey of 1784, the mesne conveyances to Henry Gale, and then proceeds as follows: "And whereas, it hath been suggested that the state of New Jersey hath some title thereto, and by reason thereof doubts have arisen concerning the title of the said Henry Gale," and then goes on to grant "all the right and title of the said state of New Jersey." This remark, it must be observed, does not affect the legal sufficiency of the grant to pass all the right of the state, and entitle Mr. Humphrey to claim under it. It is good between him and the state of New Jersey, and entitles him to vouch in his own behalf all the well founded claims of the state. But the grant is not in the ordinary form of a conveyance of land. It is only a quit-claim, which one may give to quiet doubts, whether he has a right or no right. The value of the fact is only as it shows, that as late as 1831, when the island, by great expenditures upon it by the United States government for works of publick defence, had become an object of general attention and interest, the state of New Jersey made no assertion of right. The act, for a mere nominal consideration, simply relinquishes whatever right, if any, the state may have. And this remark may be further extended. It is believed that there has been no evidence to show that the state of New Jersey ever has claimed the title to be in her. It may be admitted that the proprietors of West New Jersey did assert a right by the acceptance and approval of the survey. But they did so, in their own behalf, adversely to the state, under a claim which is now settled to have been unfounded.

In the recital, however, there is a statement entitled to some attention, in connection with a part of the charge of his honour the late Judge Baldwin, in the ejectment tried in the circuit court for the district of New Jersey. The recital is, that, by virtue of the survey, "Edward Hall and Clement Hall became seized and possessed," and that, by divers mesne conveyances, Henry Gale "hath become seized and possessed." The natural and the legal import of this language is only this, that the constructive legal possession of vacant land follows the right, and it must be admitted that, if the survey had given the right, he would have been, in this sense, in possession. But the proprietors themselves having no right or possession, could give none to their warrantee.

Judge Baldwin, in the latter part of his charge, comes to the following conclusion: "In the year 1784, this island was surveyed for Edward and Clement Hall on a West Jersey proprietary warrant, under which it was held until their title became vested in the plaintiff. From this time, he stood in place of the West Jersey proprietors, entitled to all their rights by prescription against the crown, against the Penns and the state of New Jersey; and, in his own right, by his possession, such as it was, entitled to the benefit of any limitation which had commenced or begun running from the date of the survey. As there was no adverse possession or claim, his legal seizin or possession continued till his dispossession by the United States in 1815, a period of thirty-one years, which would bar the right of entry of any adverse claimant; and, connected with the general claim of the proprietaries of New Jersey to the islands in the Delaware from 1739, would make the title good by a prescription of seventy-four years of quiet enjoyment, adverse to any right under the deeds of the Duke of York to William Penn." He then concludes that the title under Gale is derived from the proprietors and is good, and, as has been seen, adverse to the state of New Jersey.

Unnecessary criticism upon the charge of Judge Baldwin, is forbidden by the respect due to the memory of a learned and able man, who so long filled an eminent judicial station. The several legal principles contained in the paragraph just quoted are neither affirmed nor disaffirmed. Nor is it required to point out the one great error which vitiates the whole of the charge. It has already been done authoritatively. The case of Martin v. Waddell, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 367, had not then been decided. The decision since has established a different doctrine from that of Judge Baldwin, upon full discussion and deliberate consideration, and in concurrence with the judgments of the courts of New Jersey, that from 1702, the proprietors never had any right in navigable rivers, and, as there will be occasion to consider more fully hereafter, the right of the state did not come into existence until July 4th, 1776. Its origin is thus distinctly marked, being connected with the great public event of that day, which will never be forgotten, as it was the birth-day of a nation, and registered with an exactness of which there is probably no other example in the annals of the world.

This then leads directly to the inquiry, whether the Delaware river was ever within the charter limits of New Jersey, in that part of it where the Pea Patch Island has since grown up. If it were, the right would have become vested in the crown by the surrender of 1702, would have so continued until July 4th, 1776, and then would have passed to the state of New Jersey as a part of her sovereignty, acquired on that day by severing her connexion with Great Britain, and assuming to herself all the powers of government. The derivation would thus have been from the crown, though not by grant.

To maintain that the part of the river in controversy was within the charter limits of New Jersey, the counsel for Mr. Humphrey have produced the following deeds and papers: Patent, March 12th, 1663-4, from Charles II. king of England, to his brother the Duke of York, his heirs and assigns, for a large tract of territory, including what is now the state of New Jersey, the last boundary of which (now the west boundary of New Jersey) is as follows: "and all the lands from the west side of the Connecticut, to the east side of Delaware Bay."

Lease and release, June 23d and 24th, 1664, the Duke of York to John, Lord Berkely, and Sir George Carteret, reciting the grant from the king to the Duke of York, grant and convey "all that tract of land adjacent to New England, and lying and being to the west of Long Island, and Manhitas Island, and bounded on the east part by the main sea, and part by Hudson's river, and hath upon the west Delaware bay or river."

Patent, June 29th, 1674, Charles II. to the Duke of York, for New Jersey by the same description as before. Between this patent and the former one, New York had surrendered to the Dutch, and it is stated that the people of New Jersey sent deputies to New York, and swore allegiance to the states general and the Prince of Orange. In February, 1674, a treaty of peace was signed between England and the states general, by which New York and New Jersey were restored to the English. This deed is supposed to have been made to remove all doubts which might arise from these occurrences.

There is no necessity for tracing the conveyances further. The title is regularly derived to the proprietors of East New Jersey, and West New Jersey, between whom the province was held in the portions it had been divided into by a partition theretofore made, and by the lines and boundaries then fixed.

In 1702, the proprietors of New Jersey surrendered to the crown the powers of government, and thenceforth were only private proprietors.

Returning, then, to the question, whether the Delaware river at the part of it now in controversy was within the charter limits of New Jersey, there can at this time of day be no question. It was not within the grant, and as far as is known, there has never been a dissentient opinion.

In 1721, the question was submitted to the law officers of the crown by the commissioners of trade and plantations. The opinion of Robert Raymond, attorney general, and Philip Yorke, solicitor general, will be found in the first volume of Chalmers' Opinions (page 59). They say as follows: "We have perused the said clauses," (in the charters of New Jersey and Pennsylvania,) "and have been attended by the agents of the parties who claim the province of Pennsylvania, and their counsel, who laid before us a copy of the letters patent granting the said province, and have heard what hath been alleged on both sides; and, upon consideration of the whole matter, are of opinion that no part of Delaware river, or the islands lying therein, are comprised within the granting words of the said letters patent, or of the said annexed extract of the grant of New Jersey; but we conceive the right to the same still remains in the crown." The opinion seems to have been acquiesced in, for there appear to have been no further proceedings before the commissioners of trade and plantations, nor before the king in council, whom the commissioners were sometimes employed to aid in colonial investigations; and if it should be suggested that there were no agents present on the part of New Jersey, the answer is, the question was one and the same as to both, for Pennsylvania was bounded by the Delaware on the east, just as New Jersey was on the west.

Some stress might, perhaps, be laid upon the nature of this opinion, partaking, as it does, of the character of a judicial proceeding, and some, too, upon the names of the eminent men by whom it was given, and the high stations they afterwards adorned. But this is needless. The law of nations furnishes the same rule of decision. Here was the crown owning a large territory on both sides of a navigable river, (for, at the time of the latest of the patents to the Duke of York, neither the grant of the three lower counties nor of Pennsylvania, had been issued,) and it makes a conveyance of territory on one side of the river, bounding on, or bounded by, the river. Is the river, or any part of it, included in the grant? This is the very question which came before the supreme court of the United States in Handly's Lessee v. Anthony, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 375-385, in the year 1820. The decision of the court was delivered by Chief Justice Marshall, that the grantor retains the river within his own domain, and the grantee extends to the river only, and the low water mark is his boundary. The same point was decided, in the same way, by the supreme court of New Jersey, in Arnold v. Mundy, 1 Halst. [6 N. J. Law] 1, in 1821, with only this difference of expression, "the grant is to the edge of the river only," leaving a doubt whether it is a line shifting with the rise and fall of the tide. The same point, as to the limits of New Jersey on the Delaware river and bay, namely, that it was bounded by the low water mark on the west side, was decided by Judge Washington, in Corfield v. Coryell [Case No. 3,230], in 1823; by Judge Baldwin, in Bennett v. Boggs [Id. 1,319], in 1830; and it was approved by him in Gale's Lessee v. Behlin [Id. 5,189], in 1833-4. It must, therefore, be considered as settled that, by her charter limits, the territory of New Jersey extended only to the low water mark of the Delaware river on the east side, and included no part of the river. It is, accordingly, so considered.

The states of Pennsylvania and New Jersey, as has been seen, being both bounded by the low water mark on their respective sides, and the river itself belonging to the crown, upon the Declaration of Independence, a new state of things arose. The right of the crown was extinguished, and the river lay vacant, a boundary between them. "When," says Chief Justice Marshall (Handly's Lessee v. Anthony, 5 Wheat. [13 U. S.] 375-379), "a great river is the boundary between two nations or states, if the original property is in neither, and there be no convention respecting it, each holds to the middle of the stream." The states of Pennsylvania and New Jersey adopted this rule. In 1783, a compact was made by commissioners mutually chosen, which was ratified by acts of their respective legislatures, in 1785. By this compact, concurrent jurisdiction upon the water was given to both states, with some restrictions not necessary to be detailed; some islands were specifically allotted to each state, probably from motives of convenience; and it was agreed that the rest should belong to the state to which they lay nearest, and that all the islands which should thereafter be formed in the river, should be governed by the same principle. This agreement was limited, southerly, to "where the circular boundary of the state of Delaware toucheth upon the same." (Delaware river.) As between Pennsylvania and New Jersey, this compact was formed upon great deliberation, and with a full knowledge of the subject, as must be believed from the high character of the commissioners on both sides, and is in conformity with the principles afterwards laid down by the supreme court of the United States in the case, before cited, of Handly's Lessee v. Anthony.

If, then, that part of the river Delaware lying between the states of New Jersey and Delaware, which includes the Pea Patch Island, was in the crown on July 4th, 1776, "the original property not being in either," it would, on that day, have become vested in the two states. In that case, New Jersey would be entitled to the eastern portion of the river, though not within her charter limits; succeeding to that extent to the rights of the crown, which had been divested by the Declaration of Independence. Delaware, in the same case, would be entitled to the western portion. Both would commence their right from that day. How the line would be drawn, or whether it would place the island on the side of the one state, or of the other, it is not material to inquire; for the view to be taken renders it unnecessary.

The question, having already shown that the "original property" was not in New Jersey, is thus reduced to the single inquiry, whether on the eventful day referred to, the right to that part of the river was in the crown of England, or whether the "original property" was not in the province or colony which then became the state of Delaware. The "original property" of Delaware, that is, her title previously acquired and continued up to that day, becomes, therefore, the subject of examination, and has been accordingly examined, carefully and deliberately. The evidence, as far as necessary, will now be stated.

The title begins with two deeds of August

24th, 1682, commonly termed the deeds of feoffment, from James, Duke of York, to William Penn. The first of these deeds grants and conveys to Mr. Penn, his heirs and assigns forever, as follows: "all that the town of New Castle, otherwise called Delaware, and all that tract of land lying within the compass or circle of twelve miles about the same, situate, lying and being upon the river Delaware, and all islands in the said river Delaware, and the said river and soil thereof, lying north of the southernmost part of the said circle of twelve miles about the said town." The deed then covenants for further assurance, and appoints John Moll, Esquire, and Ephraim Herman, gentleman, his attorneys, jointly and severally, to enter into and take possession and seizin of the premises, and to deliver possession and seizin to Mr. Penn, his heirs and assigns.

The second of these deeds conveys to Mr. Penn all the territory from the south line of the preceding deed, that is, from "twelve miles south of New Castle, and extending south to Capin Lopin," meaning Cape Henlopen. In this deed, there is no grant of "islands in the said river Delaware, and the said river and soil thereof."

These two deeds, it will be perceived, embrace the whole of the territory of what were called the "Three Lower Counties," now the state of Delaware.

On October 28th, 1682, the attorneys appointed in the deeds of the Duke of York, made livery of seizin to Mr. Penn of the first of the tracts, of which a record is made and is still preserved, and is, in all respects, exact and particular. On November 7th, 1682, as also appears of record, livery was made of the tract in the second grant to Captain William Markham, Mr. Penn's attorney. The declaration is signed by twelve witnesses, "in Delaware river," probably on their passage up from below the twelve miles. Of both a record was made, and still remains, in all respects exact and particular.

There is this remarkable difference in respect to the two grants; that, in the first, the livery is stated, besides "twig and turf," to be of "water and fowl of the river Delaware;" in the other, it is of "the land, soil and premises" in the indenture mentioned.

They state, also, that Mr. Penn remained in quiet possession. John Moll, the attorney appointed by the Duke of York to deliver seizin, in his certificate, also recorded, is still more precise. Of the livery, under the first deed, he says, they did give and surrender to the said W. Penn, Esq. actual and peaceable possession of the fort at New Castle, by giving him the key thereof, to lock upon himself the door; which being opened by himself again, "we did deliver also unto him one turf, with a twig upon it, a porringer, with river water, and soil, in part of all what was specified in the said indenture," &c. As to the other, he says that a few days after, they went to the south side of Apoquinimig creek, by computation beyond the twelve miles, and there made livery of seizin of the lower part. The distinction thus made, it may be necessary hereafter to refer to.

From a book kept in the government at New York, begun in 1682 and ending in 1683, a copy has been produced of an entry or paper, of course made during that period, from the commander and council, beginning thus: "The record of the commander and council; declaration on Esquire Penn's grant for New Castle, St. Jones and Whorekills, by the commander and chief, in council." It then proceeds to recite the two deeds from the Duke of York to Mr. Penn, of August 24th, 1682, setting out, at large, and accurately, the description in each; states the appointment of attorneys to deliver free and actual possession, and adds: "as by the said indentures here produced, and shown to us, and by us well approved and entered in the publick records of this province, doth and may more at large appear; and we being thereby fully satisfied of the said William Penn's right to the possession and enjoyment of the premises." The paper which is addressed "to the several justices of the peace, magistrates and other officers, at New Castle, Saint Jones, Deale, also Whorekill, at Delaware," or within any of the bounds and limits above mentioned; and then after thanking them for their good service, during the time they had remained under his royal highness' government, dismisses them, "expecting no further account than that you readily submit and yield all due obedience and conformity to the powers granted to the said William Penn, in and by the said indentures, in the performance of which we wish you all happiness."

John Moll, in the certificate before mentioned, after stating the livery of seizin already referred to, adds this statement: "Which acting of us was fully accepted and well approved by Anthony Brockhold, then commander in chief, and his council at New York, as appears by their declaration, bearing date November 21st, 1682, from which jurisdiction we had our dependence all along, ever since the conquest, until we had made the above related delivery unto Governour William Penn, by virtue of his royal highness's order and commands."

On October 28th, 1682, as appears from evidence of record, sundry inhabitants of the town of New Castle, upon Delaware river, having heard the first of the two deeds read, and having seen the possession delivered by the Duke of York's agents, "whereby we are made subjects under the king to the said William Penn," make a solemn promise, in the presence of God, to yield him obedience, and to live quietly and peaceably under his government. Soon after, an act of naturalization was passed.

The objection to these two deeds, however, is, that the Duke of York himself had, at that time, no grant for the premises from the crown, and therefore had no title to convey. It is certain that no such grant has been produced, and it is assumed, as a fact, that no formal grant had been made to him by the crown. But, if the question were open, there would be grounds for believing that the Duke of York was some how empowered to deal with the territory on the west side of the Delaware river, and the river itself, as connected with the operations he was conducting to protect or recover it from the Dutch. Not that being a subject, he could acquire any right for himself by conquest, which cannot be pretended, but that in such a war, for enabling him to quiet the inhabitants, or strengthening the defence of the country, it was not unnatural nor unreasonable to suppose that he might be entrusted with a large discretionary power, and even with rights in himself for its better execution, especially considering the relation he stood in to the king, and that he was himself the heir presumptive to the crown. John Moll says, they always "had their dependence from the jurisdiction of New York," which was the Duke of York's government, and it was by that jurisdiction we have seen that the actual transfer of the powers of government was made to William Penn, which he began immediately to exercise. There is other evidence to the same effect. The Duke of York and his governours did make grants along the Delaware, and did confirm titles derived from the Dutch and Swedes. There are instances of titles beginning with the Swedes, confirmed by the Dutch, afterwards confirmed by the Duke of York and his officers, and always treated with respect. But there is another transaction of those times, of publick notoriety, more important than any of these, not only on account of its magnitude, but also for the judicial interpretation it has received. In 1681, William Penn obtained his charter for the province of Pennsylvania, bounded on the east by Delaware river, from twelve miles north of New Castle town, and on the south by a circle drawn twelve miles north of New Castle. On August 21st, 1682, the Duke of York gave him a release of all his claim upon the province. In the recital it is stated that he "is willing and pleased to confirm and make any further assurance of the said tract of land and premises unto the said William Penn and his heirs." This deed has always been deemed a part of William Penn's title; and, furthermore, it has been held that he took subject to grants previously made or confirmed by the Duke of York's government. The Swedes held a large body of land immediately below the city of Philadelphia. The titles derived from them are still respected. They owned also the land now occupied by the city of Philadelphia. William Penn obtained it from them by exchanging lands on the Schuylkill. And yet there was no formal grant from the crown to the Duke of York.

But it is unnecessary, for a reason that will presently appear, to pursue this inquiry further. Perhaps, indeed, the Duke of York, by subsequently accepting a patent from the crown, and those deriving from him, if they claim under that patent, must be deemed to be concluded by it from setting up any prior title in the Duke of York.

Be that as it may, the important fact deduced from what has been stated, and leading to consequences in law which will be more fully developed as the history advances, is this: that it was under these deeds, by the description and boundaries contained in them, and none other, and with the possession and seizin then delivered, that the three lower counties became, at least de facto, a province or colony, and acquired a name and identity which they maintained thenceforward for a century, less only six years, and then, of their own will, exchanged for the higher title of a sovereign and independent state. The same community still exists after nearly three quarters of a century more, with only such modifications as it has chosen to make in the mode of its existence, and as it rightfully might make, but still preserving its identity as the same corporate body which first had its being in the year 1682. The province was, and always continued to be, an unit.

Immediately after, the freemen began their work of government by acts of legislation. The first act (7th December, 1682) was the "Act of Union." In the volume of laws referred to, this act is immediately preceded by the two deeds from the Duke of York to Mr. Penn, set out at large. The preamble recites the patent for Pennsylvania, and the release from the Duke of York. It then goes on to set forth the two deeds from the Duke of York for the three lower counties, giving in full, and accurately, the description in each, and especially in the first, the words "as also the said river of Delaware, and soil thereof, and islands therein;" and states that the freemen of those counties have desired to be annexed to Pennsylvania. The enacting part follows, providing for the union, and for the naturalization of such of the inhabitants as were foreigners. Then follow sundry other acts of legislation in the same year, constituting the body of laws well known by the name of the "Great Law." They profess to be enacted by the deputies of the freemen of the province (Pennsylvania) and the counties aforesaid (the three lower counties.) The legislature was, indeed, constituted of equal numbers from the province and counties. To understand the whole bearing of this evidence, it must now be remembered that these laws were to be transmitted and delivered to the privy council in England, and, if disapproved by the crown within six months from the delivery, and so declared, were to become void; otherwise, to remain and stand in full force, "according to the true intent and meaning thereof." The "Act of Union" was, of course, submitted to the council, and approved by the crown. Looking at the recital and enactments of that act, and its preamble, it is impossible to avoid saying that the crown assented to them, thus acknowledging the validity and legal operation of the two deeds from the Duke of York, the boundaries defined in them, the possession and right of possession according to those boundaries, and the rightful exercise of the powers of government under them. An existing colony was thus acknowledged as rightfully created, and lawfully enjoying the powers and privileges of a colony by known and settled boundaries; and this acknowledgment was by all who had an interest. New Jersey had none, Pennsylvania had none, the Duke of York had none. The new province encroached upon none of them; Lord Baltimore asserted a claim on the land, but it was afterwards decided to be unfounded. The crown alone could object, and the crown assented. This assent, let it also be borne in mind, was not an informal and hasty one, nor upon insufficient knowledge. The king was in the exercise of his royal power, was aided by his privy council, and had full information before him of all the facts necessary to enable him to understand what he was doing. That he could, if so minded, have retracted his assent, it would be difficult to maintain. But he never did retract his assent, nor intimate any disposition to do so.

On March 22d, 1682-3, Charles II. made a grant by patent to James, Duke of York, of the same premises which had about seven months before been conveyed by the Duke of York to Mr. Penn. This deed in its description is the same as in the two deeds of August 24th, 1682. It describes separately and grants separately, the two parts of the lower counties as in those deeds. The only difference is, that in the former, there are two instruments; in the latter, only one.

The original patent was here produced—brought from England some years ago by the late J. R. Coates, Esq. (who was an agent of the Penns.) where it was given to him by John Penn, Esq. a lineal descendant of William Penn, from among the title papers of the Penn family; rather, it was understood as a thing no longer of use to him, which might gratify curiosity in Pennsylvania and Delaware, than for any other purpose. At Mr. Coates's death it went into the hands of J. G. Morris, Esq. who has carefully preserved it, and now comes to us from the possession of Mr. Penn, with a presumption that it has been there accompanying his possession as a part of his title.

Of this deed there have also been produced various exemplifications; one from the rolls in England, one from the records in Delaware, a copy, sworn to be a copy, before the lord mayor of London, in 1735, and perhaps others. It is referred to, also, in the Votes of the Assembly. The original, or a sworn copy or exemplification of it was an exhibit accompanying the bill of the complainants in the case of Penn v. Lord Baltimore, filed in the high court of chancery of England, in the year 1735, and was in evidence in that case, and the original was offered to be, and probably was, produced.

If this deed had preceded the deeds of the Duke of York, the regular derivation of the title from the crown to the lower counties could not have been disputed, and there would have been no question open but upon the construction of the terms of the patent, as to what was conveyed. But above a century ago, in the case just cited of Penn v. Lord Baltimore, the defendant set up the argument against the Penns, supposed to be derived from this order of the instruments, "that the grant to the duke being made after the deed by the duke to Penn, this grant must have been for the duke's use, and not for Penn's." The answer on the other side was, "We have a fact that will determine that case; for we have the very original charter itself, under the great seal, in our custody, ready to produce, which if the duke had intended for himself, and to defeat our title by, he would have kept, and not Mr. Penn, who was at this time of passing it, and for a considerable time longer, over in America." These things are gathered from a large folio printed book, (belonging to Thomas Gilpin, Esq.) produced on the part of the United States, which contains the pleadings and evidence in the case, and is called in the statement the "Breviate." The case was decided by Lord Hardwicke, in 1750, and is reported in 1 Ves. Sr. 444. As the decision is deemed to be of great weight in every aspect, and made a final end of all controversy in England, (for there never has been a dispute since,) and thus fixes a new epoch in the history of the province, it will be conducive to the right understanding of its proper bearing upon the immediate subject of controversy, to look back upon the earlier evidence which has been produced upon the hearing of the present case.

The foundation of the new province upon the basis of the deeds from the Duke of York, the exercise of legislative power, the declaration of allegiance in New Castle, and the union with the province of Pennsylvania, all approved by the crown of England, have already been seen. The union appears to have been only a sort of league, betraying a want of cordiality in the beginning, and leading very soon to uneasiness and dissatisfaction; and after a few years of restlessness and irritation, they finally separated, with Mr. Penn's consent, in 1703. In the following year an attempt was made to bring them together again, and the people of the lower counties would appear to have been willing; but the people of Pennsylvania would not consent. From 1703, therefore, they became separate provinces, to all intents and purposes, (except that the government powers and right of property in both were in Mr. Penn,) and so continued till the Revolution. In this respect Judge Baldwin was misinformed, and supposed the union to have remained uninterrupted.

Very soon after the deeds, Lord Baltimore set up a claim to a large part of Pennsylvania, and to the whole of the lower counties, quite to the Delaware river, upon the allegation that they were embraced in his patent. In 1685, the council, to whom the jurisdiction belonged, decided against him, directing a line to be run north and south, which is the present western line of the state of Delaware. Soon after, an agreement was entered into between Mr. Penn and Lord Baltimore, for settling all disputes between them.

In 1692, Mr. Penn was removed from his government, and Benjamin Fletcher was appointed by the crown. The alleged ground for this measure was, that disorder had occurred in his government. There was no question about title, nor was either province disturbed. They went on as before. In 1694, Mr. Penn was restored, and the government descended to his children. There has been a very general belief, that the real offence of Mr. Penn was his supposed regard for the Stuart family, and particularly for James II. then banished from the throne and kingdom.

In and about the year 1711-12, a surrender of his government powers to the crown was contemplated by Mr. Penn, and it is understood that a negotiation for the purpose was considerably advanced, when his capacity to proceed further was arrested by illness, which prostrated his mind and memory for the remainder of his life. Pending the treaty, the crown consulted the attorney general, Edward Northey, and his opinion, as reported by him, is in Chalmers' collection (volume 1, p. 32), dated February 25th, 1711-12. Mr. Northey, among other things, says, "and he has made out to me his title thereto," that is, to the government of Pennsylvania, and of the "town or colony of New Castle, alias Delaware." This was in the time of Queen Anne.

In 1717, the Earl of Sutherland, alleging that he was a creditor of the crown to the amount of £20,000, applied for a grant of the three lower counties. It was referred to the attorney and solicitor general, Edward Northey, before mentioned, and W. Thompson. They made an elaborate report, which is published by Chalmers (Id. p. 39), dated October 28th, 1717. They heard the parties, who were before them—the Earl of Sutherland on one side, and on the other, “Mr. Penn’s mortgagees and other purchasers under him.” Mr. Penn took no part. They state, also, that no deed from the crown was produced. For both these things they give a very sufficient reason, when they say (page 45): “But they presume the said late Duke of York might have some other grants thereof, which Mr. Penn might give an account of, but cannot, ‘being under a lunacy.’” Mr. Penn died in the following year, 1718. They conclude their report by submitting for consideration, “whether it will not be reasonable that your majesty’s title should be established by the court of chancery, before any grant should be made of the premises.” This was in the reign of George I. The application does not seem to have been further pursued, nor was any use made of the hint about chancery on that application. The title, therefore, passed undisturbed by the crown, through five reigns and a revolution, and the province continued as it was founded in 1682, though it was always in view of the authorities of England, and as has been seen, frequently subjected to the examination of the king’s legal advisers.

In 1735, William Penn being dead, a bill was filed in the high court of chancery, in England, by John Penn, Thomas Penn and Richard Penn, his sons, against Charles Calvert, Lord Baltimore, to enforce the performance of the agreement made in the preceding century, for fixing the boundaries between Pennsylvania and Maryland, and between Maryland and the lower counties. Recurring now to the advice of Mr. Northey and Mr. Thompson to the crown, to have the question of title determined in chancery, there is no reason to doubt that this suit was allowed, if not directed, by the privy council. “It is certain,” says Lord Hardwicke, replying to an objection to his jurisdiction, “that the original jurisdiction in cases of this kind, relating to boundaries between provinces, the dominion, and proprietary government, is in the king and council.” “The king, in council, is the proper judge of the original right.” He adds, that the king, in council, might look upon the agreement, and allow it as evidence of the original right, but he could not decree it as an agreement. “And therefore,” he says, “the lords of the council have remitted this matter, very properly, to be determined in another place, on the foot of the contract.” Lord Hardwicke was well aware of the questions to be decided finally in this case, as appears in the striking exordium of his judgment, “it being for the determination of the right and boundaries of two great provincial governments and of three counties, of a nature worthy of the judicature of a Roman senate, rather than a single judge;” adding, “and my consolation is, that, if I should err in my judgment, there is a judicature equal in dignity to a Roman senate, that will correct it.” 1 Ves. Sr. 444, 445. No appeal was ever taken to the house of lords.

In the decree, liberty was reserved to either party to apply to the court, if, by “any act or right of the crown,” execution of it should be obstructed. This liberty was never used. No act or right of the crown was interposed.

One of the objections, among many, made by Lord Baltimore, was upon the order of the deeds—that is, that the deed to the Duke of York was subsequent to his two feoffments. Lord Hardwicke lays aside the doctrine of estoppel, evidently not because it was inap-licable or insufficient in law for answering the objection, but because the expression of it was unnecessary, and perhaps inconsistent with the deference due to the crown. What his opinion was, is evident enough; for he says, “the duke being in the nature of a common person, was in a condition to be estopped.” Being liberated from the restraints of the lord chancellor, we are at liberty to say, that the duke, at the date of the deeds, being a subject, was, in this respect, only “a common person,” and as much bound by estoppel as any other subject. He did not succeed to the throne till two years after. Admitting it to be true (which cannot be admitted for reasons it would take too much time now to enter into) that the king is not bound by estoppel, it would be an unreasonable and most unjust stretch of the prerogative to suppose that, when a man ascends the throne, he is liberated from all estoppels he had previously incurred as a private person. It might as well be contended that he is freed from all grants he had previously made; for the real equity of an estoppel, in such a case as this, is neither more nor less than to make the two deeds operate as one grant, and thus do plain justice between the parties. It is no subtlety nor refinement of law, but the natural dictate of common sense and common honesty. There may, perhaps, be instances of estoppel, such as from recitals and the like, which would affect a private man, and do not touch the king; and, on this account, what is now said is limited to the very case in question. The conclusion is, that the deed of 1683 was an estoppel.

But there is another answer to the objection which satisfied Lord Hardwicke, and is fully satisfactory. If there were no estoppel, and the deed of 1683 vested the legal right in the Duke of York, where it remained when he became king, he was a trustee, a royal trustee, and the equity would be in Mr. Penn, or in the people of the province, it matters not which. That the king can be a trustee, would seem to be settled, whatever may have been formerly thought from a supposed analogy to the doctrine of uses. Lord Hardwicke is authority for this, in Penn v. Lord Baltimore, 1 Ves. Sr. 444. So is the Earl of Kildare v. Eustace, 1 Vern. 439. So is Burgess v. Wheate, 1 Eden, 223. Trusts have, in equity, a sort of independent existence for their own preservation. With reference to the trustee, actual confidence in the person is not essential. Hence, a corporation may be a trustee, and so may the king. Indeed it is an established maxim of equity, that a trust shall not perish for want of a trustee. The real difficulty, in the case of the king, is about the remedy. “The arms of equity,” says Lord Northington, in Burgess v. Wheate, “are very short against the prerogative.” Chancery, the appropriate forum of trusts, is without power, because it is said “it has no jurisdiction over the king’s conscience: for that it is a power delegated by the king to the chancellor to exercise the king’s equitable authority betwixt subject and subject.” So said by counsel in Pawlett v. Attorney General, Hardr. 468. Hence, the caution of Lord Hardwicke, in Penn v. Lord Baltimore, “I will not decree a trust against the crown in this court,” though he did not hesitate to declare his opinion that the king was a royal trustee. The right of the cestui que trust, however, is not questioned; nor is it questionable. There has been a suggestion that, in such cases, perhaps relief might be obtained through the exchequer, and the subject may certainly prefer a petition of right. But that is not material to the present purpose. If the right be established, no remedy is wanted; and that the equity is sufficient to raise a trust is clear, as well from what has been stated, as also from the covenant for further assurance in the deeds of 1682. There was, at all events, therefore, an equitable estate, which is quite as available as a legal estate.

This decree of Lord Hardwicke settled the validity and legal sufficiency of these deeds, the right of the province under them, and, of course, its boundaries, as described in the deeds. No appeal was taken, nor did either party ever apply, under the reservation in the decrees, to set up any "act or right of the crown." It was universally acquiesced in, and became, by its own force and common consent, the law of the land from that time forth, till the crown of England ceased to have power either to confirm or to dispute the rights about which it was made. Now, this was the same province which had been founded, as we have seen, in 1682; these were the deeds under which it was founded; and these were the boundaries by which it had been defined from the beginning.

Twenty-four years more elapsed, without controversy or question in England, its boundaries acknowledged by the crown, (the crown, in truth, had never disputed them,) when the delegates from "New Castle, Kent, and Sussex, on Delaware," on September 5th, 1774, met the delegates from the several colonies and provinces in North America, assembled at the Carpenter's Hall, in the city of Philadelphia. Journals of Congress 1774. New Jersey had also delegates there, and so had Pennsylvania and Maryland, all immediate neighbours, by whom they were bounded.

As a province or colony they were received, having a definite existence under the crown of England. Such as this province was under the crown of England on that day, such was she acknowledged to be by being received into that congress. On that day, we have seen this colony's rights under the crown, and her boundaries, which were part of them, had stood the shocks of twenty years of controversy, and finally were settled by a solemn decree in chancery, and rested securely and quietly upon the foundations laid in 1682. In the struggles and hazards which ensued this province took her full share. On July 4th 1776, she declared herself a sovereign and independent state, by the name of "Delaware," and by the united efforts of herself and her sister states was enabled to maintain it. But this state was the same that was a feeble colony in 1682, with the same metes and bounds; the same that in her more advanced age had had her metes and bounds judicially established by the high court of chancery, and, let it be added, whose boundaries had never been even questioned by the crown from the beginning, but in every way sanctioned. Could such a state, after all this, be called upon to vindicate her original rights? Lord Baltimore had a long controversy with her, because their grants interfered. But it was settled in England before the Revolution. The state of Maryland has never claimed to revive it. With New Jersey there was no interference, nor is there now. New Jersey has had no controversy with Delaware, and has none at present, so far as is known. When Delaware became a state there was no subsisting controversy with any body as to her boundaries. The change which then took place was from the condition of a dependent province of the crown of England to that of an independent sovereign state, achieved by conquest. Allegiance to England was thrown off; the royal rights reserved by charter were ended, and with them the government powers of the proprietaries derived from the crown, and all their incidents. They fell together, at the same time. The blow was not struck at the proprietaries. It was aimed at the crown, and when it took effect there, the subordinate government gave way with the head it depended upon, and ceased to exist. As far as there was any derivation in the case it was, in this sense, from the crown of England; and if there had been (as there was not) an outstanding royal claim of any sort, that, according to Martin v. Waddell, would have instantly become vested in the new sovereignty. From this view it follows, unavoidably, that if the deed from the king to the Duke of York had never existed, but only the two deeds from the Duke of York, still—as the province had been founded under them, had existed upon its original foundation for nearly a century, was de facto a province or colony, and received as such into the union of the colonies, and was by them all declared to be a state of the Union, has been so ever since, and still is—it would be very difficult indeed to maintain that her limits and boundaries were not incontestably proved by those deeds, unless they interfered with some superiour and better right. The de facto existence became a legal one, to all intents and purposes, by the affixing of her own sovereign seal, which had superseded the great seal of England, and acquired all its virtue and power. If necessary, this view might be carried even further. A colony or province, without any deed at all, would, under the like circumstances, have become a state; and if, from July 4th, 1776, to the present day, she has been, and still is, a state of this Union, with the same rights and privileges as the other states, and there were any authentick document to prove her boundaries, (though not a royal patent or grant,) and they interfered with no other rights, it would be very difficult to impeach her title. But even if the royal consent or recognition were indispensable, it is surely to be found in the treaty of peace, for Delaware as clearly as for any other state. And now, it is proper to remark, that all the arguments urged against her upon the very question to be decided, namely, her rights in the river, the islands, and the soil, however they may profess to be restricted, have one common fault; they go too far; they prove too much. They would take away the whole right of Delaware, land, river, islands, and all. For example, one of the learned counsel has produced the charter or patent to Lord Baltimore, and insisted that it went entirely to the river Delaware. If so, and it is in force now, the whole territory of Delaware on the main land would be taken away, and nothing left but the river right, if, indeed, that could stand alone. Whereas, as has been shown, the right between them was decided in council, November 13th, 1685, by fixing the present line; they entered into an agreement between them in conformity, and the specifick performance of that agreement was decreed in chancery in 1750. The original right has never been open since. Judge Baldwin, on the other hand, allows her title to the main land to be good by possession, which, it is respectfully submitted, is a low and precarious ground to place the title of a state upon; but he seems to deny any right but possession, and altogether to deny it as to things which were not of a nature to be actually possessed. These objections are now too late, if they ever had any foundation at all. They were long ago decided and settled in England. They were decided and settled at the Revolution; and, as to her boundaries, they stood defined and authenticated in the deeds of the Duke of York, in the patent of the king, in the proceedings of council, and in the high court of chancery, never having undergone a change from what they were at the beginning.

This course of observation, however, must here be suspended for a moment to examine the construction of the deeds, as respects the immediate question upon original grounds, lest it might be supposed that they were doubtful or insufficient, or stood in need of aid, to give them a meaning they do not of themselves properly import. Upon a careful and deliberate consideration of the whole subject, and of the arguments urged against the right of Delaware, it is believed that the deeds are quite clear. The question is, did the boundaries of the province go into the Delaware within the twelve miles circle, or did they not? The first great rule in regard to such inquiries is, that there is to be no interpretation where there is nothing that requires to be interpreted. If the words be clear in themselves, they are to be accepted. "Words," says Rutherford (Inst. Nat. Law, bk. 2, c. 7, § 2), "are the common signs that mankind make use of to declare their intention to one another; and when the words of a man express his meaning plainly, distinctly, and perfectly, we have no occasion to have recourse to any other means of interpretation." And for this he cites the support of Grotius. Book 2, c. 16, § 1. This is the same rule that is laid down by Blackstone. 1 Comm. 59. They all agree, too, that words are to be taken in their most usual and known signification; and technical terms and terms of art, according to the interpretation of the learned in each art, trade, or science. And how can it be otherwise? Words make contracts between parties, which are to be understood in one sense by both. How can that be, unless there be a standard to be resorted to, as nearly fixed as possible, especially, in the more important transactions of life? Now, if with this single rule, any man, learned or unlearned, will read the Duke of York's deed for the upper part of the province, and that part of the king's deed which is for the same, he will be at no loss to say what it is that they grant. They are the appropriate legal words for the purpose, and evidently used skillfully and upon deliberation, and with comparatively accurate knowledge, for the New Jersey grant and the grant to Lord Baltimore, and the charter of Pennsylvania, were all prior, and there had been a long contest with the Dutch and Swedes, who had settlements and forts on the west side of the Delaware river, from Cape Henlopen to the north line of the city of Philadelphia, where they had been in possession for nearly sixty years. Two of the principal were within the twelve miles circle; that is, one at New Castle and one at the mouth of the Christina. Besides, the words employed are the appropriate legal terms for making the grant. When the same subject comes up for judgment, the same terms are employed for describing what was granted, as may be seen in Martin v. Waddell, and Munday v. Arnold. The same terms were used, substantially, in patents and grants which conveyed or intended to convey navigable rivers, as in the patent to the Duke of York, the grant to Lord Berkeley and Sir George Carteret, and from them to the proprietaries of New Jersey. There is still another test. If the object was to grant the river, islands and soil, could any lawyer or conveyancer have devised, or can any one now devise, a better or even as good a form of words to accomplish it? Strike them out, and all the other purposes of the deeds, it is true are effectuated without them. They are thus rendered surplusage. This would be an offence against another established rule of construction, which requires that all the words of an instrument should, if practicable, be allowed to have some sense and operation. But while these words stand, it seems to be impossible that now, after more than a century and a half, any one, and particularly any third person, and, above all, a third person without right, power or interest in the subject matter of the grant at the time it was made, and for nearly a century after, can claim to have them stricken out or disregarded.

The intimation by Judge Baldwin, in his charge, that the two grants are to be construed together as that one may control the other, so as to give them the same eastern boundary, with all respect for his learning and ability, cannot be admitted. In a legal estimate, they are not one deed, because they are two deeds; and they are not the same, because they are different. Why were they two, and why should they differ? The grantor so willed it, and he did as he willed, and as he had a right to do, in language evidently framed by learned advisers. They can well stand together, for there is no contradiction between them. If a man were to give estate A. in fee simple, estate B. in fee tail, and estate C. for life or years, it would seem extraordinary to say that he gave the same estate in all.

Nor is the difficulty overcome when the first step is taken. Admit (if it be possible) that the deeds are thus to be construed, which of them is to have the controlling power? the one that carries the boundary over to the low water mark, on the Jersey shore, or the one that stops at the low water mark on the Delaware side? It is apprehended that there is no legal principle to aid in deciding that question, and that in the apparent search for reasons, we should find ourselves in the region of fancy and imagination. Of what consequence can it be what were the reasons of the king and the Duke of York, or whether they had any reasons at all? Their will decided them to give what was their own, and they had a right to give. If they were not deceived in the grant, (as certainly there is no reason to believe they were,) it is wholly immaterial whether the act commended itself to other men's reason or not; whether it was wise or unwise. Neither of them has had much credit with posterity for wisdom. But this act has never been imputed to them as a crime or folly. In the most sober judgment, it must rather be deemed reasonable and meritorious. The three lower counties, at New Castle, had a width on the land of but twelve miles, being cut off to the westward by the line between them and Lord Baltimore. They had no great navigable rivers. That line, probably running upon the summit between the Delaware and Chesapeake, where the heads of the streams were turned in opposite directions, probably left them no water communication with that great estuary and its tributaries. Their neighbours, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Maryland, all with extensive territories on the land, abounded also in great navigable rivers within their limits. Was it then, it may be inquired, so unreasonable to allot them, as a part of their possession, a little addition to their width, by giving them a part of the river, reserving only the publick rights (navigation for instance) which were free and common to every subject, and now are to every citizen of the United States? Was it so unreasonable as of itself to condemn the grant, and compel a construction against the clear words to secure its condemnation? From the circle downwards, the breadth of the land increased, and did not so much demand enlargement. Besides, at the southern point where the circle strikes the water, the river begins to widen rapidly and becomes the bay, which there might be good reasons for not granting. There is nothing which seems at all unreasonable in the grant. It was made to freemen, capable of holding and enjoying it, of transmitting it to their descendants, who, in due time, asserted and maintained their right to independence; and in the conflict which ensued, and in all the duties of its more intimate union with the other states under the constitution, Delaware has contributed its full proportion of what was required for the publick welfare and honour. So has New Jersey. In this respect they are equal. But who can say that it was more unreasonable or less conducive to the well being and happiness of our country, or of mankind, that it should have fallen to the lot of Delaware rather than of New Jersey, or been left to be equally divided between them?

But this can hardly be called legal argument. There is too much in it that is apart from the real question. What is the construction of the grant? Is it in any respect wrongful? These are the true questions. Both are believed to be with the state of Delaware.

Returning to the point digressed from, when the question of construction of the deeds was taken up, it is only necessary to observe that the colony of the three lower counties having been received into the congress, became in due time a state. This was a great change. But, great as it was, it was the whole change. No one ever thought that by becoming a state, the territorial rights and possessions previously belonging to it, were reduced or altered. Where was there a power to do either? Not, surely, in any other state. As surely, not in the congress of the United States; and these two descriptions embrace the whole circle of acknowledged authority. When the charters of some of the states were found to include large masses of vacant land, which might be dangerous to the peace of the Union, did congress, or either or all of the states, attempt to define or limit their boundaries? Congress invited them to make cessions, which they freely and patriotically did, by compact, and with the conditions they thought fit to insist upon and congress to accept. The Declaration of Independence, from the day it was made, is thenceforth the title of every state.

What remains, then, to be considered, may be embraced in this general inquiry: Has the state of Delaware, by any act or default of her own, parted with or lost the right she then had, or any part of it?

The examination of this question must, however, be preceded by an observation no one will refuse his assent to, which, nevertheless, when fairly carried out, will be found to meet and conclusively to answer most, if not all, the objections alleged to the title of the United States, derived from the state of Delaware. It is this: that the inquiry is to be understood as applied to a sovereign state, with all the attributes of sovereignty, except such as have been yielded to the United States. Whoever would claim from her, or would claim against her, must, therefore, make out such a case as will be available against a sovereign. More clearly must it be so, if the claim be to take from her a portion of her territory, and a part of her boundaries; not to come in under her and be one of her community, but to transfer them to an alien jurisdiction; in other words, to make them part and parcel of another state. Such is the claim made by Mr. Humphrey. The right he asserts is not under the state of Delaware, but adverse to her.

As long as the discussion was upon the boundaries of the respective states, every argument which conduces to show the right to be in one rather than the other, is fairly applicable and entitled to respectful attention, which they have accordingly received. But the moment that point is settled, and the boundaries established, all within the line on the respective sides is part of the territory of the one it is adjudged to, and it is subject to her exclusive sovereign jurisdiction. To her alone belongs the rightful power to govern and make laws for it, without interference by the United States, or by any state. That there was a dispute about boundaries, was a good reason for settling it; but none for holding it less the territory of the state after the dispute is settled, than any other part of her possessions. No one, for example, would affirm that what fell into Maryland or Delaware by fixing the line between them, or into Pennsylvania or Maryland, or into Pennsylvania or Virginia, by fixing their lines, is less within their jurisdiction than any other portion of the territories of these states. Wherever their limits are, up to that line, their law making power extends and governs. This principle, believed to be undeniable, applies in full force to the present case. If it has been necessary, for the purpose of deciding the controversy about the Pea Patch, to determine, incidentally, the question of the boundaries of the two states at that part of the river, (and it has been so argued on both sides,) and it has been determined that the island is within the territory of Delaware, it must follow that the island is also within her sovereignty; and whoever puts his foot upon it, is subject to her laws just as much as if he resided in New Castle or in Wilmington. Whoever would seek to recover it at law, must go into her courts, including in that description the circuit court of the United States, where there are proper parties; a court established for administering the laws of the state, in civil cases, where one of the parties is an alien, &c of another state, or otherwise entitled to the aid of an United States tribunal: but still to administer those laws. In regard to the Pea Patch, there has been a conflict of jurisdiction. Dr. Gale brought an ejectment in the circuit court of the United States for the district of New Jersey, recovered a judgment, and obtained an execution. The United States brought an ejectment in the district of Delaware, got a judgment, issued an execution, and the marshal of Delaware was authorized to turn out those whom the marshal of New Jersey had been authorized to put in. Records of both were produced. Both were necessarily disregarded as affecting the question now under consideration. The only thing certain about them was, that both could not have jurisdiction; and which of them had, depended upon exactly the same point as the present case turns upon, namely: whether the island was in New Jersey or Delaware. And it may also be remarked, that in one of them (Delaware) the judgment was by default; in the other, it was upon a trial essentially ex-parte, with a very imperfect exhibition of evidence, by no means to be compared with what has been produced in this arbitration.

Considering it to be established that the island is within the limits of Delaware, Mr. Humphrey is to make out a title to it in one of two ways: by showing that he has himself acquired it, in which case he must show that his acquisition of it has been under or according to the laws of Delaware; or that New Jersey has acquired it, and that her title enures to his use.

As to the first, nothing has been alleged but possession. By the laws of Delaware, possession does not avail against the state. The statute of limitation, between individuals, is truly said to be a law of peace. An exception to it, in favour of states, or a considerable extension of time in their behalf, may be as truly said to be a law of necessity; for states cannot occupy, as individuals, so as to have an actual manifest possession, which is notice; nor can they apply the same vigilance which is reasonably required of private proprietors. It is not necessary to dwell on this. Actual possession there has not been. His honour, the late Judge Baldwin, says, that by the survey of 1784, and its acceptance by the proprietaries, the Messrs. Hall, and Dr. Gale under them, stood in the place of the West New Jersey proprietaries, with all their rights. "His legal seizin or possession," continued for thirty-one years, till 1815, would bar the right of entry of any adverse claimant. Had the right been in the proprietaries, and the island within New Jersey, the legal seizin or possession, as before stated, would have accompanied the grant. But neither part of the postulate is correct. The proprietaries had no right, as has been seen, and the island was not within New Jersey. When Dr. Gale, or some one claiming under him, obtained the title of the state, in 1831, he could get no legal seizin, for one of the reasons already stated; and for this additional one, that the United States were then in actual adverse possession.

Thus, then, there was no legal seizin or possession. That there was no actual possession under the survey, worthy to be so called, or to found a right upon, seems to be an unavoidable inference from the evidence. The survey could not have been made on the ground. Its date, 1784, is near the time when the island was about the size of "a man's hat," and overflowed every high tide. There was no resting place upon it for the surveyor's foot or his instrument. But there is something else, much more conclusive. The surveyor returns the contents to be 178 acres. More than fifty years afterwards, when the island had been growing all the time, it contained by accurate measurement, only 87.60 acres. The surveyor, therefore, did not begin a possession, though he made a sufficient survey if the proprietaries accepted it, as they certainly did. No survey, indeed, was necessary, for an island is sufficiently defined by the waters. The only other evidence of possession is, that in the spring of 1813, April or May, Dr. Gale took down a large party of men. The witness who proved it was one of the company. He said they went there to fish, and it was stated that Dr. Gale had in view to make a fishery, but it did not answer, on account of the strength and direction of the currents, which swept the nets into deep water and let the fish escape. They found upon the island a rough frame house, recently erected, (probably by Dr. Gale,) of one story in height, with one room in it, and no chimney or fire-place. They used, for cooking, a stove they carried down in a boat and brought away with them. They left the island in August, and, as far as appears, never returned. What became of the house is not in proof. The occurrence just related was after the military officers of the United States had fixed their attention upon the spot as a site for the defence of the river. About the same time, General Bloomfield, who was in command of the military district, went to Delaware to negotiate a cession of the island to the United States, being himself a citizen of New Jersey, and having been her governor and ex-officio chancellor, and it is reasonable to suppose acquainted with her rights. In December 1814, Captain Clarke, of the United States topographical engineers, under orders from the war department, taking with him one hundred soldiers and some thirty or forty workmen, and the frame of a block house, went upon the island to commence the work of a fortification, and remained there till June, 1816. He states that there was nobody on the island when he went there, nor any building or "vestige" of one, and that nobody was there during his stay but those under his command. From the survey, then, until 1816, there was no possession, and from that time the United States have been in possession. The fishing visit of 1813, cannot be called a possession, and if, connected with Dr. Gale's claim of title, it might be so termed for the time, still it was abandoned, leaving no mark of ownership. There was no actual possession, therefore, even if that could have been available. The evidence is that the island was occupied only by crows, selected by them as a lodging place for its solitude and security.

Has the state of New Jersey acquired any right under which his claim could be covered? If a case were established, in point of fact, it would be necessary to inquire how such a right could be acquired by New Jersey, the territory in question being within the state of Delaware, and subject to her laws and government. But it does not seem requisite to enter upon that inquiry, inasmuch as the proofs are deemed to have made out no such case. The controversy, it will be seen, embraces two descriptions of rights, namely, the river and the soil under it, and islands in the river. The former is not susceptible of actual possession—the latter are. To begin with the latter. The evidence is, that within the twelve miles circle, before the Pea Patch made its appearance, there were only two islands, (so called,) Reedy Island and Bombay Hook. They have both been in the possession and under the jurisdiction of Delaware. Bombay Hook, it is believed, cannot with propriety be called an island in the river. It lies within the line of the main land of Delaware, above the low water mark of the river, and has been surrounded by water only by reason of an artificial outlet being cut for Duck creek into the bay. There remains then, only Reedy Island. It may be said that it lies nearest to the Delaware shore. But it was in the river, and if the right to the river and islands was in the crown, while Delaware was a province, Delaware could have no right in Reedy Island, whether it was on one side or the other of the channel. Her possession, as of right, is thus a strong proof that her title was prior to that which would have accrued to her by the divestiture of the right of the crown, and the leaving of the river vacant between two states. New Jersey had no island within the twelve miles circle.

A passage in Smith's History of New Jersey, it was thought, disclosed some right of New Jersey to an island there called Stuyppson's Island. The author, in giving an account of a negotiation with the Indians, says: "Also Stuyppson's Island, near Delaware river. Tom Store claims thirty acres," &c. The island was not found upon the map during the investigation, being searched for in the river, though Smith's language, "near Delaware river," indicated that the distance was not from the land into the river, but from the river into the land. A close examination since, has shown that it is what may be called an "inland island," formed by small streams, with, perhaps, the river on one side, but above the low water mark, and within the outline of the land, as "Bombay Hook," is on the other. It is far below the twelve miles circle, and is undoubtedly a part of New Jersey, by her original right; but not an island in the river or bay.

Something was also said about Egg Island, but no evidence given. From the map it appears to be a very small island, low down in the bay, out of the circle, lying near the main land of New Jersey. Whether it is separated from the main, or adjoins it, by whom it is held, if by any body, and under what tenure, there is no proof in the case. New Jersey, or those claiming under her, had no island within the twelve miles.

As to the Pea Patch Island, New Jersey had at no time possession, and cannot be said to have set up a right to it. The contrary is quite clear. The right asserted was that of the West New Jersey proprietaries, which, as has been seen, was adverse to the state, and could not in any way enure to her use. So of the right of Dr. Gale and those deriving from him. And when, at last, it came to be doubted whether the proprietaries had any right at all, and when the United States were in actual possession, and New Jersey was asked for an act, that act did not assert any title, but only released her right and interest, whatever it might be. Delaware, on the other hand, was in possession, as far as a state could be. There is satisfactory evidence as to one individual residing on the island after the United States entered upon it; that he was assessed and voted in Red Lion hundred.

So much for the islands. Now as to the jurisdiction. There is no evidence to establish a single instance of its exercise by New Jersey over that part of the river and islands, and there is no reason to believe that there was one. One witness was called, to show that process from New Jersey had been once served upon the Pea Patch Island, in recent times; but it failed entirely. There was no process; there was no arrest, and all that was made out was that a constable from Salem county came with a pistol, and went away without a prisoner. The ejectment in the circuit court of the United States for the New Jersey district, is of no weight. It was brought by an individual, of his own authority; it was after this controversy had begun, and for the purpose of determining this controversy.

On the part of Delaware, the evidence is full and complete of the exercise of jurisdiction over that part of the river and islands, as far back as evidence can be expected to go. The process of her courts, and of the courts of the United States sitting in that district, for the arrest of persons and property afloat, has been issued and executed, and continues so to be, quite over to the low water mark on the Jersey side; and this, not occasionally, but habitually, without doubt or question, as a matter of course, whenever applied for. Such arrests have been made of persons and property escaping from above. The cases have been contested upon every ground that ingenuity could suggest, or the zeal of parties prompt; but there never has been an instance of any one disputing the jurisdiction in the courts either of the state or of the Union. This must be admitted to be very persuasive evidence. In the absence of proof to the contrary, it must be deemed conclusive.

Now, this evidence comes from numerous witnesses, of great intelligence and unquestionable credit, well informed upon the subject they speak of, by their pursuits in life, and it coincides (for it did not require support or corroboration) with the proof of particular instances, both by parol and exemplifications of records here produced. The exhibition of the evidence at large, or even a considerable part of it, would be tedious and unnecessary. The whole was carefully reduced to writing, and will be preserved.¹⁰ But it is quite impossible to look at the list of witnesses without feeling unbounded confidence that, from their own experience, and from the traditions and other sources of information of the past, which lawyers and judges are obliged to explore, and to follow as their guide, we have the whole knowledge of what has been held and done from an early, perhaps the earliest, period, concentrated and condensed in this body of testimony. With nothing to contradict it, (and there is nothing,) one might safely say, such has always been the law of Delaware. Kensey Johns, Esq. for example, above eighty-eight years of age, states "that he has resided in New Castle since 1780, now sixty-seven years. He was a practising lawyer for twelve years, afterwards chief justice of the supreme court for thirty-eight years, afterwards chancellor of the state, since that time, and at present, living a private gentleman." Any one else, speaking of him, would add, and during the whole of this lengthened period, exercising a most wholesome influence by example and precept, upon the minds and morals of the community he lived in. He says: "It has always been considered and held by the courts, public officers and lawyers of Delaware, as far as my memory reaches, that the title and jurisdiction of the state of Delaware, extended to a circle of twelve miles around New Castle, to low water mark on the New Jersey shore. I have never heard the title and jurisdiction of the state of Delaware, over that part of the river Delaware, doubted by any court, public officer or lawyer in Delaware, on any occasion whatever. Within my knowledge and remembrance, writs have been often issued out of the courts of Delaware, to seize vessels and persons in all parts of the river Delaware, within the circle to low water mark on the New Jersey shore, and no dispute, question, or plea was ever made or suggested, within my memory, before any court in Delaware, against the title of Delaware over all such parts." And, again: "The state of Delaware, for the whole period of my remembrance, and as far back as my researches extend, has claimed and exercised jurisdiction over the Delaware river and soil thereof, within the circle, to low water mark on the Jersey shore, and the state has never failed to exercise this jurisdiction when called upon or asked to do so." Eleven other witnesses, eminent citizens of Delaware, with large means of knowledge, whose names, if repeated, would command respect for their testimony, make similar statements, and some of them give an account of particular cases of arrest and seizure, known to them personally. John Steele, also a citizen of Pennsylvania, gives an account of his following a vessel down the river, getting process against her from a court in Delaware, and having it executed far over on the east side of the river.

New Jersey, as before stated, never objected to the claim of Delaware, nor, as far as appears, set up any claim of her own. In 1709 the boundaries of counties were fixed by an act of the legislature. Those on the Delaware were bounded on the west by the river, the lines running along the river shore, and not into the river. In 1822, it is true, an act was passed to extend one or more of the lower counties into the river. But this was after the United States had obtained the cession from Delaware, was in actual possession, and this controversy had begun. Besides, of what avail is such an act of the legislature, except as some evidence (under the circumstances just mentioned, very feeble, indeed) of a belief of right, and keeping up of a claim over her own territory. A constitutional act of a state legislature, touching any part of such territory, is undoubtedly potent, and is notice to all the world; but as to territory of another state, it is inoperative, and it is notice to nobody. This act, therefore, is of no effect.

Upon all the grounds thus reviewed, the conclusion is, that the title to the Pea Patch Island was in the state of Delaware. On May 27, 1813, that state, by an act of her legislature, ceded it to the United States upon conditions having regard to the public benefit, and not for any selfish interest of her own. No doubt can be entertained that New Jersey would, in the like case, have done as her sister Delaware did, had she been free to do so. But a private claim had intervened, which she had no rightful power to dispose of; and, if it has so happened that, after a long and costly litigation, that claim has proved to be unfounded, it is to be regretted that the claimant should have been put to useless expense and trouble; but this feeling can have no influence in determining the question of right.

By the cession of Delaware the title passed to the United States. The award, therefore, must be, and is, that the title is in the United States.

Award.

Under and by virtue of the foregoing agreement and submission, having heard the parties by their counsel, their proofs and allegations, and duly and deliberately considered the whole matter, and weighed the evidence and arguments on both sides, I do hereby award that the title to the Pea Patch Island is in the United States.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal, this fifteenth day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-eight, at the city of Washington.

JOHN SERGEANT. (Seal.)

Witness:

JOHN WM. WALLACE, Secretary of the Reference.

JOHN M. CLAYTON, Senator from Delaware.

WILLIAM L. DAYTON, Senator from New Jersey.

PIRACY—CHARGE TO GRAND JURY IN RELATION TO PIRACY. See Cases. Nos. 18,256 and 18,277.

¹⁰ This, with the other evidence and proceedings in the case, all which were recorded by the secretary of the reference, was transmitted by the arbitrator, after making his award, to the office of the solicitor of the treasury of the United States. A call was subsequently made by the senate for these papers. Having been transmitted to that body and read there, they were ordered to be printed, and will be found among the senate documents (Executive, No. 21) of the first session of the 30th congress.

POSTAL LAWS—CHARGE TO GRAND JURY IN RELATION TO OFFENSES AGAINST POSTAL LAWS. See Case No. 18,248.

POSTAL LAWS—CHARGE TO GRAND JURY IN RELATION TO VIOLATION OF POSTAL LAWS. See Case No. 18,251.

POTOMAC BLDG. ASS'N (JOHNSTON v.). See Case No. 18,303.

PRIZE CASES—COSTS, FEES, AND COMPENSATION IN PRIZE CASES. See Case No. 18,283.

PROCESS—CHARGE TO GRAND JURY IN RELATION TO THE OBSTRUCTION OF LEGAL PROCESS. See Case No. 18,250.

PUBLIC OFFENSES—CHARGE TO GRAND JURY IN RELATION TO INVESTIGATION OF PUBLIC OFFENSES. See Case No. 18,255.

R.

RAINEY (FIELDS v.). See Case No. 18,296.

RAINEY (LATTON v.). See Case No. 18,296.

RATCLIFF (JOHNSTON v.). See Case No. 18,303.

REGISTERING, FEES FOR. See Case No. 18,295.

REVENUE—CHARGE TO GRAND JURY IN RELATION TO FRAUDS ON REVENUE. See Cases Nos. 18,247 and 18,251.

REVENUE—CHARGE TO GRAND JURY IN RELATION TO INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS. See Case No. 18,248.

ROSS (BLOOMER v.). See Case No. 18,242.

RUDELL (BLAKELY v.). See Case No. 18,241.

S.

SECRETARY OF TREASURY (BELL v.). See Case No. 18,231.

SECRETARY OF TREASURY (CLARKE v.). See Case No. 18,280.

SECRETARY OF TREASURY (JUDSON v.). See Case No. 18,304.

SEVIER (BENTLEY v.). See Case No. 18,233.

SMITH (GORMLEY v.). See Case No. 18,298.

STEAM VESSELS—CHARGE TO GRAND JURY IN RELATION TO THE ACT OF CONGRESS OF JULY 7, 1838. See Case No. 18,253.

T.

TREASON—CHARGE TO GRAND JURY IN RELATION TO LAW OF TREASON. See Cases Nos. 18,269-18,277.

TRUMBO (MANIER v.). See Case No. 18,309.

U.

UNITED STATES (BARGIE v.). See Case No. 18,229.

Case No. 18,312.

UNITED STATES v. BLODGETT.

[35 Ga. 336.]¹

District Court, S. D. Georgia. Nov. Term, 1867.

GRAND JURY—OATH PRESCRIBED BY ACT 1862—AIDING REBELLION—WHO MAY CHALLENGE—WHEN CHALLENGE TO BE MADE—TESTIMONY.

1. Although the oath prescribed by the second section of the act of June 17, 1862 [12 Stat. 430], will not, except at the instance of the attorney representing the government, be administered to jurors in the federal courts, yet, by the first section of said act substantially the same matters specified in the oath are made cause of challenge; and it is the right of any party to a case, civil or criminal, to challenge for such cause the jurors about to take action on such case. It does not follow, because the government attorney only can call for the oath to be administered, that he alone can urge the disqualifying conditions laid down by the first section of the act.

¹ [Reported by Logan E. Bleckley, Esq.]

2. If, under said act, and by a party other than the government, jurors be challenged, the challenge may be disposed of by allowing those who deem themselves disqualified under the first section of the act to retire from the panel without any sworn evidence of their incompetency.

3. Grand jurors may, for cause, be challenged by any person to be affected by their finding. The right is not restricted to such persons as are in prison or under bail upon charges of crime; it may be exercised by one who, though still at large, has been warned by the prosecuting attorney of the court that he will be made, during the term, the subject of an indictment for perjury.

4. Where there is reasonable excuse for the delay, challenges to members of the grand jury will be heard after the body has been fully organized.

5. The accused party has no right to submit evidence in his behalf to the grand jury, not even with the consent of the prosecuting attorney. The grand jury are to examine the foundation on which a charge is made by the government, not that on which it is denied by the alleged offender.

In the matter of the oath to be taken by jurors in the federal courts, under the act of June 17, 1862 [12 Stat. 430], in the case of the United States against Foster Blodgett.

ERSKINE, District Judge (charging grand jury). On the first day of the present term (November 7th) you were empanelled and sworn for this judicial district,—your foreman, and each of you, then taking the ancient common-law oath of grand jurors, and the court, at the same time, delivering to you its general charge. The court feels that it is due to you, as well as to the district attorney and the counsel for the challenger, Foster Blodgett, that such remarks as may be deemed proper to be made, and such decision as may be pronounced, be addressed to you, rather than to the learned counsel themselves; because the matters in controversy concern, and are directly against, the legal status of several members of your body. Blodgett comes here before the court, and demands the right to challenge the polls; and for this he relies on the first section of the act of congress of June 17, 1862, which statute is entitled "An act defining additional causes of challenge, and prescribing an additional oath for grand and petit jurors in the United States courts." The first section declares that, "in addition to the existing causes of disqualification and challenge of grand and petit jurors in the courts of the United States, the following are hereby declared and established, namely: Without duress and coercion to have taken up arms or to have joined any insurrection and rebellion against the United States; to have adhered to any rebellion, giving it aid and comfort; to have given, directly or indirectly, any assistance in money, arms, horses, clothes, or anything whatever, to or for the use or benefit of any person or persons, whom the person giving such assistance knew to have joined, or to be about to join, any insurrection or rebellion, or to have resisted, or to be about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States, or who he had good ground to believe had joined, or was about to join, any insurrection or rebellion, or had resisted, or was about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States; and to have counselled and advised any person or persons to join any insurrection and rebellion; or to resist with force of arms the laws of the United States." 12 Stat. 430.

The oath embodied in the second section—and which substantially follows the language of the disqualifying causes enumerated in the first—will be read to you, not that you may take or decline it, for it can be presented under the second section only, and at the suggestion of the prosecuting officers of the government, but upon hearing it read, you will be better able to conclude whether you are, or are not, vulnerable to any one or more of the disqualifications mentioned in the first section. If you find that you are, you may retire from the panel. And, in my judgment, the defect, in a case of challenge for cause like this, may, in this manner, be shown. U. S. v. Cornell [Case No. 14,868]; State v. Marshall, 3 Ala. 302.

The following is laid down in a late accurate work on Criminal Procedure: "The most natural method is to require the witness to declare the matter under oath, on the voir dire. But witnesses are not generally required to answer questions which will tend to their disgrace; therefore, in England, the inquiry whether the juror has delivered an opinion adverse to the prisoner cannot be put to the juror himself, but it must be shown by other evidence. This point has been held the same way in some of our states. But generally in this country this class of questions is allowed to be put by the parties directly to the jurors; and in some of our states this doctrine is also aided by express statutes. When this is not done, and even when it is, the court will sometimes, in aid of the general object, and without prejudice to other methods, call upon the jurors, collectively or singly, to declare if they know any impediment to their serving, or if they are obnoxious to a particular objection which may have been suggested." 1 Bish. Cr. Proc. § 795. And see Id. § 768; Cook's Case, 13 How. St. Tr. 311, 337; Respublica v. Dennie, 4 Yeates, 267; McCarty v. State, 26 Miss. 299. See concluding sentence in section 2, Act June 17, 1862 (12 Stat. 430). The challenger states in his affidavit, that the district attorney distinctly promised him that he should be permitted on the trial before the grand jury to have evidence in his defence laid before them. No such promise or agreement can have the sanction of this court. To allow evidence, either oral or written, to go before the grand inquest, on behalf of a defendant, would be subversive of the ancient and well-settled rules of courts of justice. McKean, C. J., in Respublica v. Shaffer, 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 236, said: "It is a matter well known, and well understood, that by the laws of our country, every question which affects a man's life, reputation, or property must be tried by twelve of his peers; and that their unanimous verdict is, alone, competent to determine the fact in issue. If, then, you undertake to inquire, not only upon what foundation the charge is made, but, likewise, upon what foundation it is denied, you will, in effect, usurp the jurisdiction of the petit jury, you will supersede the legal authority of the court in judging of the competency and admissibility of witnesses, and, having thus undertaken to try the question, that question may be determined by a bare majority, or by a much greater number of your body, than the twelve peers prescribed by the law of the land."

Foster Blodgett does not ask to challenge the entire panel, but he avers that there are individual disqualifications attaching to particular jurors, because of their being within one or more of the clauses of the first section of the statute. In his petition, of file in this court, and which is before you, he states, among other matters, in substance, that he is informed and believes that a charge for perjury is now pending before you, but that as yet no presentment has been made, nor indictment found and returned, into court; that most of you are, under this statute, incompetent to inquire into his case; that he does not believe he can have a fair and impartial investigation of his case before you, or receive justice at your hands. He sets forth the names of the persons to whom he objects, and interposes a challenge to each.

It was contended by the district attorney that, under this statute, it is only the government that possesses the right to challenge. This court, at the last term, in the case of U. S. v. Cohen [unreported], which was an action of debt on bond, ruled that under the first section, the defendant, as well as the United States, was free to challenge the polls. And such is still the opinion of the court; nor can I perceive any difference in this respect between a grand and petit juror—between a civil suit and a criminal prosecution.

It is the general, if, indeed, it is not the universal, doctrine of the common law, as administered in the courts of our country, that when a person is charged with crime, and his case is to come before a particular grand jury, he may be present at its organization, and present challenges either to the array or to the polls; but if he be not held, by process, to answer to an indictment, he is not thus entitled. If Mr. Blodgett does not come within the spirit of this rule (for he does not within the letter of it), his motion to challenge must be denied.

In addition to the written petition of the challenger, he has also filed in court an affidavit, which has been read to you without objection on the part of the district attorney. A synopsis of so much of this affidavit as is necessary for the court to pass upon will be stated. Blodgett swears that the district attorney, Henry S. Fitch, Esq., in the city of Atlanta, during the last session of the United States court there, informed deponent that he (the district attorney) "expected to prosecute deponent before the grand jury of this court, at this term, for the offence of perjury." Deponent says that he laid before the district attorney, by the hands of a friend, documents and papers which deponent expected to use in his defence, and informed him that he had witnesses by whom he could prove his innocence. He further says, that the district attorney distinctly promised deponent that he should be permitted, on the trial before the grand jury, to have his evidence in his defence laid before them. Further, he states that he was in attendance on this court on Thursday (7th instant), but being informed that the district attorney was then in New York sick, and that it was not probable that any action could be had on his case during the term, under advice of his counsel, he returned home, with the promise of his counsel that he would telegraph him if the district attorney arrived and he was needed. Receiving a telegram on Wednesday last (13th instant), he came down with his witnesses on the succeeding morning, and informed the district attorney (who had just arrived) that he was ready with his witnesses, when the district attorney replied, "Your case is now before the grand jury; and I will see what can be done with it." Deponent adds that he was afterwards informed by his counsel that the grand jury refused to hear his evidence.

And here the prime question presents itself, and it must be answered. Has Foster Blodgett now the right to challenge any individual member of the grand panel? True, he was not arrested and imprisoned on any criminal charge, and now brought hither by order of the court, nor is he under bail or recognizance; but because he is not in any of these constrained positions, is he any the less entitled to a grand jury of his country, legally qualified under its laws? Surely not. At the time of the empanelling of this grand jury, the district attorney for this district was in New York, confined to his bed by sickness; and had Foster Blodgett, by virtue of this statute, then demanded of the court the right to present his challenge, I should have felt it to be my duty, as a judge, to have postponed the consideration of the question until the coming of the district attorney, or until his place was filled pro tem., in pursuance of the sanction of the honorable secretary of the interior. Nor ought the unavoidable absence of the district attorney, at the time of the organization of the grand jury, to prejudice the rights of the government, and, in my judgment, he may still present challenges under the first section of the statute, or he may move the court, under the second section, to have the oath, incorporated therein, presented to the grand jurors, and the motion will be granted. But that Mr. Blodgett comes within the spirit and true intent of the rule as to the right of challenge and the time to present challenges, I do not think there is any doubt whatever. He was informed by the prosecuting officer of the United States for this district, that he expected to prosecute him before the grand jury at this term of the court for perjury. In Breeding v. State, 11 Tex. 257, it was held that any person to be affected by the finding of the grand jury may object to their fitness. 1 Bish. Cr. Proc. § 724. From this authority, and others that might, if necessary, be cited, and on principle, it would seem that it is not essential to the right of challenge to grand jurors that the challenger should be in prison, or out on bail; for if he be warned, as Blodgett was in this case, by the district attorney for this district—the officer to whom the duty of prosecuting for crimes against the laws of the United States is confided—that he intended to prosecute him before a grand jury at a particular term of the court, the person thus notified is thereby affected.

After a most careful consideration of the proceedings before the court, I am of the opinion that Foster Blodgett had the right to present his challenges at the organization of the grand jury, and, further, that he has not waived that right, and may present them now.

In accordance with this judgment, thirteen of the panel were excepted to under the first section of the statute. And for the reasons already given in the early part of the opinion, the clerk read the oath in the second section to the jurors challenged, upon which the court said that if any one of the jurors included in the challenge believed that he came within one or more of the causes of disqualification mentioned in the first section, he could retire from the jury box. All those who had been challenged, except two, withdrew.

The district attorney then said that he desired to present a motion to the court to review and reverse its decision on this point, to-wit, that the mode adopted to try the challenges was erroneous. Leave was given, and he asked time to prepare his argument and produce authorities, which was also granted.

The following morning, the motion being put in writing, argument was had in support of it by the district attorney, and, contra, by

H. R. Jackson, for Foster Blodgett.

THE COURT denied the motion, and the jurors who had retired the day preceding were discharged for the term. The panel was then filled from the talesmen, subpoenaed on the previous day, who were immediately sworn in chief.

THE COURT, on motion of the district attorney, and in pursuance of the second section of the statute, caused the oath therein to be read by the clerk to the jurors. But, the district attorney declining to have said oath administered, the grand jurors, under the instructions of the court, retired to enter upon their duties.

UNITED STATES (CORPORATION OF GEORGETOWN v.). See Case No. 18,281.

UNITED STATES (CROSS v.). See Case No. 18,286.

UNITED STATES v. GANSEVOORT. See Case No. 18,313.

UNITED STATES (HICKERSON v.). See Case No. 18,301.

UNITED STATES (KEENAN v.). See Case No. 18,305.

Case No. 18,313.

UNITED STATES v. MACKENZIE et al.

[1 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 371.]

District Court, S. D. New York. ✓

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — LEGISLATIVE POWER — CRIMES COMMITTED ON NAVAL VESSEL — JURISDICTION OF CIVIL COURTS AND COURTS MARTIAL.

[1. The fifth amendment to the constitution of the United States provides that "no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger." Held, that the limitation "when in actual service in time of war or public danger" refers only to the militia, and does not apply to the regular land and naval forces. In respect to these latter, the power of congress is irrespective of the actual condition of the country, and the same in time of peace as in time of war or public danger.]

[2. Congress has constitutional power to provide that crimes, even of a capital character, committed on board a naval vessel, by persons who form part of the naval forces of the United States, shall be tried exclusively by courts martial; and the act of April 23, 1800 (2 Stat. 45), establishing rules for the government and regulation of the navy, is valid, even if this be its true construction and effect.]

[3. Congress has not, by the crimes acts of 1825 and 1835 (4 Stat. 115, 775), given to the civil courts any jurisdiction over the crime of murder, when committed on board a United States ship of war, and triable before a court martial under the navy regulations.]

[4. The fact that manslaughter is not named in the naval code as an offence punishable by court martial is no ground for holding that the civil courts of the United States have jurisdiction thereof. In the absence of any statute conferring jurisdiction upon these courts, it is sufficient, in any case, to exclude such jurisdiction, that the accused is charged with the offence, in taking the life of a seaman belonging to a naval ship, in the exercise of what was claimed to be his rightful authority as an officer in command.]

[5. To warrant a court in declaring unconstitutional a law passed by congress, the defect of legislative power must be of the most plain and indisputable character.]

[6. The fact that a law of congress has been in course of execution for many years, and has been acquiesced in during that time, is a strong reason why the courts, especially those of a subordinate character, should not decide the same to be unconstitutional.]

[Alexander S. Mackenzie and Guert Gansevoort were charged before the grand jury with murder and manslaughter.]

B. F. Butler and Charles O'Connor, for the United States.

G. Griffin and John Duer, for Mackenzie and Gansevoort.

BETTS, District Judge (charging grand jury). In my charge to you on your organization, in leading your attention to subjects that might probably be brought before you, I stated, in substance, that you had cognizance of all crimes and offences in violation of the laws of the United States, and triable before the civil tribunals, whether committed within this territorial district, or within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of our laws. It was intended so to guard and qualify that instruction as to avoid asserting or denying a jurisdiction over crimes committed on the high seas on board a ship of war of the United States; the court wishing to leave that question, if it should be agitated before you, open for deliberate consideration and decision.

In the progress of your deliberations you came into court, and submitted in writing two inquiries, and prayed the advice and instruction of the court upon the points of law involved in them: First. Whether the grand jury has jurisdiction or is to make inquiry into offences committed on board of American ships of war on the high seas? Second. If so, is it their province to inquire into the offence alleged to have been committed by Captain Mackenzie, or any other person on board the ship of war Somers?

With these inquiries you submitted to the court three several charges in writing, which had been laid before your body, and which supply, in part, the foundation upon which the specific advice is requested: One is a complaint by Henry Morris against Alexander Slidell Mackenzie and Guert Gansevoort "for the murder of Philip Spencer, committed on the high seas, on board the United States brig Somers, within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, on the first day of December, 1842"; one by Margaret E. Cromwell, charging, in the same terms, the murder of Samuel Cromwell at the same time and place; and one by Charles Cleveland, charging the same persons with "the crime of manslaughter, in putting to death Elisha Small, at the same time and place."

No other facts are communicated by your body to the court, but the observations I shall proceed to offer, in reply to these questions, will be on the assumption that the parties named in these charges were, at the time of the alleged offences, all regularly attached to the brig of war Somers as officers and seamen, in the service of the United States, and that their several deaths were produced by the public execution of the deceased, under the orders of Mackenzie, commander of the brig, and that Gansevoort was a commissioned lieutenant in the navy, serving in that rank on board, and in that capacity aided and assisted in the executions. It will also be taken as connected with the facts of the case that on the return of the brig to the United States a court of inquiry was ordered by the secretary of the navy to investigate this transaction, and that court found and reported to the secretary that the conduct of Commander Mackenzie and Lieutenant Gansevoort in the matter was fully justified by the circumstances in which they and the ship were placed. That thereupon a court martial was ordered and convened by directions of the secretary of the navy, for the trial of Commander Mackenzie on a charge of murder, and that the court is now in session at Brooklyn, proceeding with the hearing and trial of the complaint now brought before your body.

These facts, in substance, are admitted by the prosecutors in court, and this dispenses with the necessity of referring to you the investigation and decision of the facts, in order to give application to the rules of law that will be stated to you. The right of a grand jury to apply to the court with which they are connected for advice and direction, in aid of the duties they are called upon to discharge, is fully recognized by the laws of this country and of England, and its free exercise is cherished and encouraged. For, although a jury, without a satisfactory certainty that the facts proved before them fall within any provision of the criminal law, may excusably direct an indictment, and leave it to the court afterward to decide whether the matter presented be a criminal offence, yet it is more consonant to a humane administration of justice to exempt the citizen from the pain and obloquy of a public accusation, where it is plain that no crime has been committed.

What has been said by great authorities with respect to imperfect or uncertain proof in support of a criminal charge applies with equal force when there is defective evidence that any law exists punishing the act; it being an indispensable ingredient to a criminal accusation that there be clear law both against the act charged as an offence, and to sustain the prosecution as presented. Lord Hale, Blackstone, and Chitty, in adverting to the ancient dogma that the grand jury ought to find the bill where there is probable evidence to support it, because it is only an accusation, and the prisoner will afterwards defend himself before a more public tribunal, have all recommended a more merciful view of the subject, and, considering the ignominy, the dangers of perjury, the anxiety of delay, and the misery of a prison, insist that the grand jury should be well convinced of the guilt of the accused before subjecting him to a trial. 2 Hale, P. C. 61, 157; 4 Bl. Comm. 303; 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 318. The same reason should restrain the jury from finding an indictment, unless satisfied that the facts they present will subject the accused to a legal arraignment and punishment.

These considerations render appeals by grand juries to the court for preliminary counsel and direction proper and commendable, whenever they are not thoroughly satisfied that the case justifies their interference, in order that the citizen need not stand exposed to the reproach and terror of an infamous and perhaps capital charge, where there is a want of probable cause, either in law or evidence, to support it; as, also, that they may have the countenance and support of the court in unusual or difficult cases, or those of exciting interest, to help them to a clear understanding of their duties and an efficient execution of them. The practice to which you have been most accustomed in similar instances has undoubtedly been for the court to respond at once, or after a slight consideration, and without argument, to the inquiries propounded. But as the questions you submitted involve an inquiry into the constitutionality of an act of congress, and also into the just powers and duties of this court in the administration of criminal law in capital cases, together with the determination of the rightful authority of naval courts martial, and the effect of trials and sentences by those courts, I have thought these points to be of such weight and importance as to require, not only a mature and careful examination by me, and to justify the suspension of the other business of the court for that purpose, but also that they presented a proper occasion for me to invite counsel, as well representing those who prefer these complaints as the parties affected by them, to afford the court the benefit of an argument in aid of the decision to be rendered. The request has been acceded to, and most satisfactorily fulfilled, by the eminent gentlemen who have discussed the various and interesting topics arising out of these questions.

You have given your attendance from day to day, throughout this highly able and instructive argument, occupying more than five successive days, and you will accordingly fully comprehend that neither the time I have allowed myself to study and reflect upon the argument, nor the space within which these observations to you must necessarily be compressed, will permit me to follow out, or scarcely advert to, the multifarious positions and illustrations introduced into the discussion.

Gentlemen, it may be proper, in this connection, to add that you are not to consider the argument in court as addressed to you in your official character. In intimating to you, when your inquiries were submitted, that it would be left to your option to continue your deliberations in your room, or attend the discussion here, and in assigning you a place within the bar, the court expressed, and intended to signify, no more than its respect toward you personally. You are aware that you have not been called from day to day as embodied and in official attendance, nor is it recorded on the minutes that the grand jury has appeared in court since the day you presented these inquiries. It seemed necessary to notice these particulars, lest it might be supposed that these proceedings attempted to introduce or sanction the precedent that the grand inquest, organized and sitting as a jury, could have arguments of counsel or parties on matters under their inquiry and deliberation addressed to them, and that it was their province to weigh and decide the points so discussed. This transaction is intended to have no such bearing, nor is it intended to consider your presence here as in any way varying or diminishing the rightful authority or responsibilities of the court. The questions proposed are strictly questions of law, which it is the province and duty of the court to decide, and I have not the slightest reason to doubt that in asking this advice you meant to recognize the authority of the court over the matter, and to abide by the replies that may be given; otherwise, this solemn investigation, and the prolonged toils attending it, would be but an idle parade.

The court cannot fail to perceive and appreciate the delicacy and importance of the points it is called upon to decide. Your inquiries are so framed as to present the subject in its most solemn form, as well as to awaken those solitudes and sympathies naturally accompanying the application of general rules to individual cases. You ask whether your authority extends to the investigation of offences committed on board American ships of war on the high seas; and, if so, whether the matters set forth in these specific complaints are within your jurisdiction. The occurrence on board the Somers, with all its painful consequences, is thus brought directly in view, but is manifestly of subordinate importance in your estimation, as ministers of the law, to the great question propounded touching the administration of criminal justice, and which interests and affects alike the individual citizen and the government, in the whole extent and duration of their rights and responsibilities under this branch of the law. This question ought to be calmly investigated and decided as a naked proposition of law, and without allowing the judgment to be disturbed by apprehensions that the conclusion adopted may, in its operation, place the parties accused in this instance under increased liabilities and dangers, or may tend to afford them extraordinary privileges and advantages of defence.

You are undoubtedly aware, gentlemen, that the subject matter involved in this special case has been under consideration before me, on several instances previous to the sitting of this court, and that I declined awarding a warrant to arrest these parties.¹ The disposition then made of the case was under special aspects of the subject, and does not necessarily embrace the main points now submitted; and, even if it involved the same matters, I feel called upon to examine and consider the whole subject, under the aid of the argument now heard, as if it had never before been brought to my attention.

In proceeding to the investigation of the juridical facts demanded by your inquiries, it may be fitting the occasion for me to say that it cannot be of the slightest consequence to the court how those facts may be found. I shall not hesitate to assume for my learned associate who presides in this court, nor to assert for myself, that the court never hesitates or shrinks from applying the full jurisdiction conferred upon it by law over whatever subjects or persons such jurisdiction may operate; and never seeks, or permits itself to exercise, one that it does not find clearly bestowed upon it by the law. Neither can it be of any moment to the judges whether they sit in judgment over crimes committed on the high seas, on board merchant vessels or war vessels, nor whether the individuals brought to trial be commanders and officers of private ships, or commissioned officers of the navy. The records of this court will show numerous instances in which the judges now in commission have tried sea offences of every denomination, and have sentenced to capital punishment many persons convicted of homicides and other atrocious crimes committed on the high sea; and the question as a law fact now raised is whether the like powers extend to, and are to be exercised over, offences committed on board the armed vessels of the United States.

¹ See opinion of the learned judge [Case No. 15,690].

The answer to this inquiry must depend upon the true import and operation of the crimes act of April 30, 1790 [1 Stat. 112], and of March 3, 1825, in connection with the act of April 24, 1800 [2 Stat. 54], if the latter be a valid act, and still in force. This court can exercise no jurisdiction in criminal matters not allotted to it specifically by act of congress. This principle is definitely settled by the adjudications of the supreme court ([U. S. v. Hudson] 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 32; [U. S. v. Coolidge] 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 415; [U. S. v. Wiltberger] 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 76); and U. S. v. Bevans, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 336, determines that point most unequivocally, whatever may be its effect and influence on other questions connected with this case, upon which it has been so frequently cited. The objections to the jurisdiction of the court over the subjects of your inquiry result in these propositions: (1) That congress has power under the constitution to provide for the punishment of offences committed in the army and navy, without trial in the courts of law. (2) That the statute establishing rules for the government and regulation of the navy (April 23, 1800 [2 Stat. 45]) is an execution of that power in respect to the naval forces. (3) That the crimes acts of 1790 and 1825, neither in terms nor by necessary intendment, embrace offences committed in the navy; and only such offences committed in the army are punishable under them as are expressly reserved in the rules and articles of war for trial in the civil courts.

In support of the jurisdiction of this court over the matters charged before you, these general positions are contended for: (1) That the judicial power of this court under the constitution extends to all crimes against the United States committed on the high seas, and that such offences affecting the public peace or welfare must be proceeded against by indictment and trial before a jury. (2) That the crimes acts give to this court cognizance of murder and manslaughter committed on the high seas, without distinction between public and private vessels, and are a full execution of the constitutional power in that behalf. (3) That the power in congress to erect courts martial and punish offences by their sentence is an implied, and not a direct, power, and must be exercised in subordination to the positive powers reserved to the judiciary. (4) That the act establishing rules and regulations for the government of the navy, under the constitutional restriction, can give no authority to courts martial to try offences other than of a strictly military or disciplinary character, or such offences as are both committed and brought to trial out of the local jurisdiction of the circuit courts, or during the existence of war or public danger.

I do not attempt to lay down these positions in the precise language of counsel, but this statement exhibits the main conclusions which the arguments on the one side and the other labored to establish or combat, at least so far as they enter into the opinion I am about to submit to you.

The counsel have discussed the constitutional question as to the extent and character of the powers of congress in the government and regulation of the navy with the highest ability and learning, and if the duty devolved upon this court to settle that question definitively, I should feel constrained to bestow on it a much more labored and thorough examination, and give to the preparation of the opinion supporting my views a fuller development and wider range of illustration. But it does not appear to me that the case has assumed a posture rendering it necessary or fitting for this court to enter at large into the consideration of the constitutional point. The circuit court has but a limited authority, and, though its decision affords the rule of action in the particular case, and may control the district court within its own district, yet beyond that it has no force or efficiency in fixing the construction of the constitution or a law, and the court will accordingly cautiously forbear carrying its adjudication beyond the demands of the special point under judgment. The point to which that discussion is alone pertinent here is whether, if the act of April 23, 1800 [2 Stat. 45], confers on naval courts martial jurisdiction over murder and manslaughter committed in the navy on the high seas, congress had competent authority to pass such a law.

Under our system of jurisprudence the written constitution is the supreme law, and not only bestows on congress all legislative powers that can be rightfully employed, but, furthermore, limits with paramount authority the extent within which such legislation may be exercised. An enactment by congress, therefore, in violation of the constitution, or not authorized by its provisions, becomes inoperative and void, and no court, of the humblest powers, can be called upon to enforce it. Vanhorn v. Dorrance [Case No. 16,857]. No court would be bound by an ex-post-facto law, by an act of attainder, a statute directing magistrates to try capital cases without the aid of juries, &c. But it is a principle equally sound and clear that the collision between the constitution and statute, or the defect of power in congress to pass the law, must be of the most plain and indisputable character to justify in any tribunal a refusal to recognize its validity. The supreme court restrains its high powers within such limits, and the caution is more needful, and should be more imperative, with every subordinate magistrate and court. The presumption is always to be in favor of the validity of statutes, until the contrary is clearly demonstrated. [Cooper v. Telfair] 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 14. Full effect will be given by every judiciary to a statute, unless its opposition to the constitution is of that nature that the court feels a clear and strong conviction of their incompatibility. [Fletcher v. Peck] 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 87; [Fullerton v. Bank of U. S.] 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 604; Serg. Const. Law, c. 34. Under these principles of decision, it is manifest that, unless the discrepancy between the constitution and the act in question is palpable and irreconcilable, this court must acquiesce in the authority of congress to pass it, and receive the act as the law of the land. In connection with this point, the constitution will be adverted to only for the purpose of ascertaining whether there is colorable or probable authority given to congress in this behalf, and accordingly all doubts, if any arise, will apply in support of the validity of the law, and not against it.

The provisions of the constitution which have been cited and commented on as applicable to this question are article 1, § 8, subs. 9, 11-15, and article 3, § 1, subs. 1, 2, and amendments 5 and 6.

To discern more distinctly the bearings of these several clauses on the subject under consideration, those parts deemed essential will be recited in connection. Congress shall have power to constitute tribunals inferior to the supreme court; to define and punish felonies committed on the high seas and offences against the law of nations; to raise and support armies; to provide and maintain a navy; to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces; to provide for calling forth the militia, &c.; and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States. The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as the congress may from time to time ordain and establish; the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity under this constitution and the laws of the United States, and to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. The trial of all crimes shall be by jury, and no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger. In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the state and district wherein the crime shall have been committed.

It may conduce to a clearer apprehension of the nature and extent of the powers thus imparted by the constitution, and of the manner in which they were practically to be applied, to advert to the condition of the country in relation to these particulars antecedent to the adoption of the constitution. During the colonial dependency of this country, the power to raise and support armies and provide and maintain navies was solely with Great Britain, and the British forces on land or at sea were subject to her laws alone. The civil polity of the colonies was, however, ample, and, in many instances, sovereign, within their respective boundaries, but it is believed was never recognized as extending beyond their territorial limits. Accordingly, although all crimes and misdemeanors committed on land were punished in the local courts, offences on the high seas or on waters within the admiralty jurisdiction were placed under the cognizance of the vice-admiralty courts, and were punishable under the laws and authority of the mother country. This jurisdiction was conferred by commissions issued from the high court of admiralty, and was exercised in capital cases by the vice-admiralty judge or commissary, in conjunction with the local judges of the superior court, governor, or lieutenant governor, and, it is believed, always up to the Revolution, without the intervention of juries.

A commission issued to Lewis Morris, in 1738, appointing him commissary of the provinces of New-York, Connecticut, east and west New-Jersey, empowered him personally, or by surrogate or deputy, to try all crimes and offences committed on the high seas, &c., according to the civil and maritime laws and customs of the high court of admiralty of England anciently used. Other commissions of the same tenor issued to the vice-admiralty here, and were undoubtedly granted in all the provinces. De Lovio v. Boit [Case No. 3,776]; Serj. Const. Law, Introduction, 4, 5. The archives of the court exhibit a trial for piracy before such court, without a jury, as early as the year 1701, and the valuable treatise of Mr. Washburne shows that trials in that form were common in this district, while composed of the New-England states, New-York, and New-Jersey, and in the Northern district, after it was separated in 1703 from New-York, from the year 1673 to the Revolution. Jud. Hist. Mass. 172, 176.

Time will not permit my examining with fullness and accuracy into the constitution of the admiralty courts of the several states, or the manner in which offences at sea were tried during the Revolutionary War. Some of the courts were probably first erected under the resolution of congress of 1775 (Sergt. Const. Law, 10, 11; 1 Jour. Cont. Cong. 142; 1 Laws [Bior. & D.] 620); and others, the organization of which had been retained by individual states as they existed at the Declaration of Independence, may have still continued their accustomed jurisdiction under the authority of the state. [Ross v. Rittenhouse] 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 162; 3 Hall, Law J. 211, 221; Dup. Jur. 136; De Lovio v. Boit [supra]; Washburne, 185. But whatever may have been the character of the jurisdiction employed by these local admiralty courts from 1774 to 1781 in the trial and punishment of crimes committed at sea, it is most manifest that none was ever exercised in them over offences occurring in the naval forces. These forces were under the exclusive government and control of the continental congress, and in no way made amenable to the jurisdiction of the state courts. On the contrary, the earliest exercises of national authority by the congress, and not the least emphatic ones during the period of its existence, in the form of positive legislation, were the enactment of rules and articles of war for the government of the army, and rules and regulations for the government of the navy, by which the entire authority over both these branches of the public service was assumed by congress, and enforced by courts martial, without reference to the local tribunals. 2 American Archives, 1855; 1 Jour. Cont. Cong. 128, 139, 262. This separation of the land and naval forces from connection with the local courts, and method of punishment of offences committed within either by the appropriate courts martial, was resumed and maintained under the confederation, while that government continued, and until it passed into the national constitution. By the 9th article of the confederation, congress was empowered, with the assent of nine states, to enter into war. They had plenary power to appoint courts for the trial of piracies and felonies on the high seas, and to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces, and to direct their operations; and, on authorizing the raising of land forces in 1787, they recognized the existing rules and articles of war as in force for the government of the troops (12 Jour. Cont. Cong. 173); and this understanding of the continued operation and force of the rules and articles of war is shown by various statutes passed since the adoption of the constitution (Sept. 29, 1789, § 4 [1 Stat. 96]; April 30, 1790, § 13 [1 Stat. 121]; April 10, 1806, § 3 [2 Stat. 359]).

Congress executed the power to appoint courts for the trial of piracies and felonies on the high seas immediately after its organization under the confederation. By resolve of April 5, 1781, they directed that such offences should be inquired of, indicted, and tried by grand and petit juries according to the course of this common law, and constituted the justices of the supreme or superior courts of judicature and judges of the courts of admiralty of the several and respective states, or any two or more of them, judges for hearing and trying such offenders. 7 Jour. Cont. Cong. 76; 1 Laws [Bior. & D.] 670, 671. The members of the convention who framed the constitution, the citizens of the respective states, who finally adopted it, had been familiar through the Revolution, and the period of the confederation, with this arrangement and practical exercise of those respective powers.

When then they transferred to the new constitution the language of the confederation in relation to the government of the land and naval forces, and the spirit of the provision in respect to piracies and felonies, it is natural to suppose that these provisions were understood in the same sense, and were designed to convey the same power, as that affixed to them in the usages and practices under the preceding government. These circumstances would justly have great significance in denoting that the constitution on its adoption was understood and designed to leave to congress the power to govern the land and naval forces as heretofore, by means of courts martial, and that piracies and felonies in their ordinary common-law acceptation should be referred to the judiciary, and be indicted and tried by juries.

It is also a circumstance of some weight, in ascertaining the understanding and intent of the convention in the provisions of the constitution under consideration, that the usages of the continental government were designed to be in strict correspondence with those of England in the same particulars. The rules and articles of war were borrowed in substance from the English mutiny acts, and those of the navy were copied literally, in all important features, from Act 22 Geo. II. c. 25 (1 MacArthur, Ct. Mart. 348, Append. No. 1; Jac. Law Dict. "Navy," 3), and the trial of sea felonies was made to conform to the proceedings in like cases before the oyer and terminer of the admiralty sessions. I think the English law, as understood at that day, was definite and clear that courts martial, army or navy, had exclusive cognizance over all offences against the rules and articles, unless jurisdiction was expressly given by statute to some other tribunal. Such acceptance of the import and operation of the articles connected with the familiar usages under the continental government tends strongly to show that, in giving congress power to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces, that power was intended to be broad enough to cover what was to that time practiced in England, and in this country, in that behalf. The implication of such full power from the terms used in the first article (section 8, cl. 13) would probably be of equal force with an express grant,—Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 209,—with out the intervention of the third article, which attaches to the judiciary department the prosecution and trial of all crimes. It is to be remarked the expression "all crimes," in the article, is not to be taken in an absolute sense, as embracing every description of criminal offences; for the fifth amendment excepts from prosecution before a jury some cases arising in the land and naval forces and the militia. Whether all of that class of cases are excepted, it is not necessary to inquire, in this connection. There must, upon the plain meaning of the exception, be left to congress a power to legislate to some extent over the punishment of offences committed in the army or navy, by other means than trial by jury.

The next consideration is, whether this reserved power by the terms of the exception is limited to cases arising when the forces are in actual service in time of war or public danger; or whether there is an implied limitation of it to cases of a strictly disciplinary or military character, or to cases tried out of the territorial jurisdiction of the United States. As to the first of these positions, it appears to me that the arrangement of the excepting clause to the fifth amendment, obviously imports that the qualification of actual service and a state of war or public danger applies to the militia alone. By the provisions of the first section the militia are liable to be called into the service of the United States, and placed under their government, only under the existence of the exigencies of public danger in war. The terms of the limitation would therefore apply to this peculiar service exacted from the militia, but would be unusual and extraordinary in respect to forces under the regular enlistment, and whose subjection to the authority of the general government had no necessary connection with a condition of war or public danger. I have therefore no hesitation in deciding that the power of congress over the land and naval forces is irrespective of the actual condition of the country, and is the same in time of peace as in time of war or public danger.

The farther limitation argued for, to military offences strictly, or such as are committed abroad, does not arise out of the language of the power, but is inferred because of a supposed conflict with the authority of the judiciary, if the power be understood in an unlimited sense. Whatever may be the force of this argument, it does not establish an inevitable collision between the two clauses of the constitution, but only a possible one, dependent chiefly upon the construction of the fifth amendment, whether the exception embraces the entire subject of cases arising in the army and navy, or only special and peculiar instances. To show a mere equivocal or dubious power in congress is not enough to nullify a law; the want of authority to pass it must be palpable.

It has been urged that there is an inherent restriction in the power to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces, confining the authority over these arms of public service to them in their organized and collective capacity. That to govern and regulate these forces, obviously imports an authority to control their operations and act upon them in their aggregate character, and that the power over the individuals composing the forces is only incidental, and can be carried no farther than is indispensable to maintain such organization and conduct such operations. It may be worthy of remark, that this power as expressed in the articles of confederation, was that of "making rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces, and directing their operations," implying, probably, that a doubt might exist whether the authority to govern and regulate the forces might not be construed as confined to the individuals composing them, and that therefore it was needful to obviate this possible qualification of the power, by a direct one over the forces in their united and combined character, and to that end the clause empowering congress to direct their operations was added. The convention, in copying from the articles of confederation the body of the power, omitted the closing clause. It was obviously superfluous, because the disposition and operation of the forces must be one incident to and inseparable from their government. The alteration, however, is significant to show that the states when the articles of confederation were established, and the convention in framing the constitution, understood the power to govern and regulate forces as indubitably comprehending legislative authority over the individuals constituting the forces. This is palpably the natural force of language; a different reading would be an artificial and constrained construction. A power to make rules for the government and regulation of a nation, a province, a city, necessarily imports full authority over the individual subjects as well as the community collectively. Neither in the ordinary acceptance, is the idea of land or naval forces limited to bodies combined and acting only in an organized form; each component part is as distinctly signified as if separately named. The grand total of the national powers is expressed in the term forces. But so also are its constituents to whatever diminution of sub-divisions. Armies, divisions, brigades, regiments, companies, guards, sentinels; fleets, squadrons, separate vessels, boats, crews, are land and naval forces, integrally and independently, no less than when compounded in the general mass, and so is the individual soldier and seaman. These observations, gentlemen, are all I propose to offer you on this branch of the subject.

It is not my purpose to attempt to settle the true construction of the constitution in the particular under consideration. The provisions of the constitution have been reviewed to ascertain whether they plainly interdict to congress the power to pass laws to punish by courts martial, common law crimes committed in the army or navy; and if no such prohibition exists, whether there is in those provisions probable cause to imply the existence of such power in congress.

I have already stated to you that, upon general principles, and in consonance with the adjudications of our highest tribunal, it is the duty of this court to accept an act of congress as of full authority and binding, if there be only color of authority or probable cause in the constitution to uphold it. I limit myself therefore to the remark that the incongruity insisted on between the constitution and an act of congress assuming to take from the judiciary and confer on courts martial jurisdiction over criminal offences in the navy, is not direct and palpable, and is no more than supposititious and inferential, and accordingly reaches no farther than to raise a doubt whether the power is vested in congress. If such doubt exists, it is not to apply against the validity of the law, but in support of it. I therefore decide that in respect to this court and the action of your body, the act of congress of April 23, 1800, is valid and obligatory, even if in its true construction it gives exclusive jurisdiction to a court martial over the homicides complained of before you.

Under this view of the subject, gentlemen, there can be no doubt of the power of congress to govern the army and navy, by bringing offences committed in either under the cognizance of the courts of law. Heuston v. Moore, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 1. This power is fully executed in respect to the army in the rules and articles of war adopted April 10, 1800. Rule 33, 4 Laws [Bior. & D.] 18 [2 Stat. 364]. But no such expression of intention is introduced into the navy code. Whether then the courts of the United States are to take cognizance of offences committed in the naval forces depends entirely upon the true intent of congress in that behalf as expressed in the crimes acts of 1790, 1825 and 1835, and the navy act of 1800. The competency of this court under the constitution and the judiciary act—section 11 [1 Stat. 78]—to exercise the jurisdiction cannot admit of question.

The sole inquiry then is, has the jurisdiction been given it over the subject matter, by act of congress, in express terms, or by necessary implication? The argument on this branch of the case has on both sides been exceedingly thorough and acute; and although it has been my duty and pleasure to study the reasonings and authorities adduced, with minute care and attention, it will not be necessary, nor will it be physically in my power, within the limits of these instructions, to state to you the details of this examination or its results in respect to all the particulars of the argument. The necessity of the case compels me to attempt no more than to lay before you the general conclusions of my judgment upon the controlling points embraced in your inquiries. The first crimes act was passed April 30, 1790 [1 Stat. 112], at the second session of the first congress. No action had been taken on the subject at the previous session, other than to provide for the apprehension and trial of criminals. Act Sept. 24, 1789, §§ 11, 33 [1 Stat. 78].

In proceeding to institute and establish a system of criminal jurisprudence, congress acted upon the assumption that there were four great classes of national offences over which it had supreme authority: (1) Infractions of the law of nations; (2) violations of the laws of the Union within the territorial limits of the United States; (3) piracies and felonies on the high seas or criminal offences committed there; and (4) offences committed in the army and navy and militia, when in actual service of the United States.

It was unquestionably competent for congress to legislate over all those subjects in a single statute or section, and when language is employed specifically applying to some of the subjects, and broad enough to embrace others, but not designating them expressly, it becomes a question of construction resting upon the intent of the legislature, whether the law is to have the more extensive or the more limited application. For instance, this statute punishes, but not capitally, misprision of felony, manslaughter, mayhem, embezzlement of public property or receiving stolen goods, committed in any port or place under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States; and this language is plainly extensive enough to include the commission of those crimes by the land forces of the United States stationed at such places. Was it the intention of congress to apply this general legislation over crimes on land to like offences committed in the army? By the fiftieth article of the rules and articles of war, all crimes not capital, though not mentioned in the articles of war, are to be taken cognizance of by court martial and to be punished at their discretion. The second additional article provides for the punishment of embezzlement, by courts martial, etc. Those rules and articles of war were re-enacted by a general adopting clause in Act Sept. 29, 1789, § 4 [1 Stat. 96], and were accordingly in force when the crimes act was passed.

If, then, the general intendment might be that the posterior law repealed or superceded the antecedent one, that presumption or rule of construction could not be applied to the act of 1790, because on the same day that statute was enacted, congress passed another regulating the military establishment, by the thirteenth section of which it was declared that the commissioned officers, non-commissioned officers, privates, etc., of the army shall be governed by the rules and articles of war which have been established by the United States in congress assembled, as far as the same may be applicable to the constitution of the United States, etc. 2 Laws [Bior. & D.] 102 [1 Stat. 121].

Here then is a most positive and authoritative exposition of the crimes act, showing that it had no paramount operation over the land forces, but must be construed in subordination to the rules and articles of war applicable to the case. The thirty-second article of the existing rules of war—4 Laws [Bior. & D.] 18 [2 Stat. 359]—is pertinent to show the understanding of congress that express legislation was necessary in order to bring officers and privates of the army to trial before the civil courts for capital crimes, or acts of violence to the persons or property of citizens, and affords additional evidence that the crimes act of 1790 was not intended to apply to the land forces. At that time the United States had no ships of war in commission, and though the language of the act of 1790 is broad enough to include offences committed in the naval forces, yet the punishment provided for offences on the high seas would not as a fact have that direct and certain application to the navy that the statute had to crimes on board merchant vessels. There is, however, nothing incongruous or unusual in legislating prospectively in contemplation of a state of things likely or probable to exist. Nothing could be more probable with a maritime people having the habitudes of ours and connected with all the trading nations of the earth by an active and increasing commerce, than that ships of war and navies would speedily be constructed and put in service, and language in an act of congress adapted to vessels of that character, though not in fact in existence, would most properly be held as contemplating their existence and be applied to them when they should be called into service, if the construction and application of the language were to be gathered from the act alone.

I shall not go into a critical scrutiny of the phraseology of the crimes acts of 1790 and 1825, to test the force of the internal evidence, or how it preponderates, indicating an intent of the legislature to limit those acts to merchant vessels or to embrace within them national vessels also—supposing the language used in its general import to be alike applicable to either. I consider the act of April 23, 1800 [2 Stat. 45], a more satisfactory key to the intent of the act of 1790, or if not legitimately operating as an exposition of the crimes act, yet as fixing with clearness and certainty the rule thereafter to be applied to public vessels. It harmonizes with the legislation in respect to the land forces, placing each under its own laws and courts to such extent as the discretion of congress deemed proper. Offenders in the land forces in certain cases were to be delivered over to the courts of law for trial and punishment. A similar provision is contained in the English mutiny act (2 MacArthur, 229), without which it would seem to be thought that under the general authority to try all cases not capital, courts martial would have exclusive cognizance of that class of offences when committed in the army (1 Toml. Law Dict. 482; 2 MacArthur, 296). But no such direction or authority is incorporated in the naval code, and the design of congress therefore to give the entire jurisdiction over the offences enumerated to the naval courts martial would seem indubitable. In this connection the reasoning of the supreme court, in U. S. v. Bevens, has direct pertinency and force (3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 336). That case was argued with great talent and fulness, and the opinion delivered by the court manifests that it was considered with deep attention.

The question before the court was solely as to the operation and meaning of the crimes act of 1790. The indictment was on the eighth section of that act, here also in question. The act was cautiously explored by the court to ascertain whether there was any provision within it authorizing a circuit court to try one indicted for murder on board a ship of war, within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States; and a leading inquiry was whether language in the crimes act which might embrace a ship of war should be applied to it. First, the court repudiates the signification claimed for the word "place" under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States used in the act, as comprehending a ship of war. But then not satisfied with that conclusion upon the mere import of a word and phrase, draws from the act what must be regarded an adjudged conclusion by the court as to its language and meaning, that there was no provision in that act adapted to the punishment of crimes in the navy. The court assigns a reason in fact why it was omitted or postponed, and then adverts to the act of April 23, 1800 [2 Stat. 45], as fortifying the conclusion, because that statute specifically relating to offences in the navy, gives no jurisdiction to courts of law of any crime committed in a ship of war, wherever it may be stationed. Although this is not an authoritative adjudication upon the specific point now raised, yet as to the intention of congress as expressed in the act of 1790, and the design and effect of the act of 1800, it affords high and commanding evidence that congress has power to legislate specifically for the government and regulation of the navy and to place that government in courts martial to the exclusion of courts of law. Almost forty years have elapsed since this law was passed. In that period the navy has augmented in numbers and force, and has been in service in all quarters of the globe. No instance is produced in which, during that period and under circumstances so probable to give occasion for it, the jurisdiction of the courts of law has been applied to the trial of offences in the navy cognizable by naval courts martial. This fact is of commanding cogency to establish the common conviction of the executive, legislative, and judicial departments of government, that no such jurisdiction exists. The supreme court regard it as a circumstance of deserved weight in support of the constitutionality and validity of an act of congress, that there has been a uniform course of action, or a partial acquiescence for a long period of time in consonance with the power exercised under the act. [Stuart v. Laird] 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 299; 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 257.

In respect to the institution of the circuit courts, most of the judges when applied to by General Washington, on the first adoption of the judiciary act, gave their opinions that the act in that particular was not authorized by the constitution. 1 Story, Const. Law, 437, 479, note. Yet the supreme court, after the law had been in a course of execution and acquiesced in for less than 15 years, decided that it was too late to call its constitutionality in question. [Stuart v. Laird] 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 299. Cases to this point may be largely multiplied, but I deem the labor unnecessary, and should regard it an exceedingly unadvised and hasty act in this court, after so long and notorious an execution of the act of 1800, to assume the authority to pronounce it unconstitutional and void as to any of its provisions.

The jurisdiction of courts martial over the subject matter within their cognizance, I regard to be absolute and exclusive. From the examination I have bestowed on this point, I am persuaded this is the result of the English authorities, but I do not introduce them here or comment on them, because if in that country the courts of general jurisdiction would retain their powers, unless expressly taken from them by act of parliament, and might thus have cognizance of cases also assigned to courts martial, as inferior courts, that principle does not apply to the organization of our judicatories. The circuit court is a special court and of statutory jurisdiction, in precisely the same sense as a court martial. The circuit courts have no residuary or general jurisdiction, and none whatever over subaltern courts, except it be bestowed by positive law. The case of Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.], is clear to the point, that the jurisdiction of courts martial is exclusive and final as to matters submitted to such courts by act of congress. Serg. Const. Law, 130; Rawle, Const. 209; Opinion of Judge Kent, Case of Somers.

Gentlemen, I shall be able to condense with a few remarks, what I propose saying to you in respect to the operation and effect of the crimes acts of 1825 and 1835 on these questions. The naval code had been in force a quarter of a century as a distinct and independent system of jurisprudence over the offences assigned to its jurisdiction, when the act of 1825 was passed. The decision in the case of U. S. v. Bevens [supra] made in 1818, had indicated to the public what was the judicial acceptance of that code, and also as to the effect of the crimes act of 1790, in relation to offences in the navy. The presumption therefore would be of the most violent character, that if congress designed by either of the later statutes to interfere with this known and settled course of the law in this respect, that intent would be directly and plainly expressed; and that a mere re-enactment of any provisions of the statute of 1790 would not be designed to have an operation broader than they were known to have under the former act. It is to be farther observed that though the act of 1825 (section 4) denounces the crime of murder in the same language as is used in section 8 of the act of 1790, yet other offences are introduced into the former section not found in that of 1790—and the one is accordingly not a precise re-enactment of the other, nor to be regarded as supplanting the former law, or establishing a substantively new one. But what is still more pointed and direct, and becomes in my judgment conclusive on this point, is that in the only section of the act of 1825 (section 11) in which offences on board vessels of war, or in relation to vessels of war, are specifically mentioned, the authority of naval courts martial is expressly reserved.

In my opinion the effect of this evidence is not varied, if that proviso is understood as limited to that section only, for the body of the section demonstrates that if congress means its penal law shall apply to ships of war, those vessels will be specifically named, and imports furthermore that without being so named, they will not come within the range of legislation in respect to crimes, and the proviso affords direct and positive evidence that congress recognized the power of naval courts martial as an existing jurisprudence over crimes of a general bearing and character, and affecting the public otherwise than merely in the preservation of discipline. To the same effect is the first section of the act of 1835, which provides for the punishment of mutiny or revolt, a crime denounced in the act of 1790, and in the naval code of 1800, for it repeals the punishment of death for the offence imposed by the act of 1790, commuting it to fine and imprisonment, and leaves the act of 1800, which inflicts the same punishment for the same offence, in full force.

Without pursuing the discussion farther, I state to you, gentlemen, that in my judgment, neither of the acts of 1825 or 1835 gives to this court jurisdiction over the crime of murder committed on board a ship of war, and triable before a naval court martial. Manslaughter is not named in the naval code as an offence punishable by court martial, and it is contended that there is therefore nothing to intercept the jurisdiction of this court, given by the crimes act over that offence.

It is a general principle governing prosecutions in courts martial as well as in criminal courts of law, that the court may convict the accused of a crime of less degree than that charged in the accusation, but not of a distinct crime. 12 Petersd. Abr. 591, note; 1 Toml. Law Dict. 483. This is the same rule that prevails at law (1 Chit. Cr. Law, 521), and accordingly on a charge of murder the accused may be acquitted of that and be convicted of manslaughter. Article 32 of the naval code provides that all crimes committed by persons belonging to the navy which are not specified in the foregoing articles, shall be punished according to the laws and customs in such cases at sea. 3 Laws Bior. & D. 246 [1 Stat. 709]. Manslaughter falls within the general denomination of a crime. 4 Bl. Comm. 5. The thirty-second article is taken from the article in the rules of 1773, and is also in substance the same with the English article 36 (1 MacArthur, 336), except that the expression in the latter is "used at sea." Numerous offences of various grades were from an early day known and recognized as crimes according to the customs of the sea, and were proceeded against and punished under a species of common law made applicable to them. They were originally punished in the admiralty court alone, and subsequently by inquest and petit juries before the admiralty sessions. The latter method of proceeding is particularly illustrated in an ancient inquisition in the year 1376 (Clerke, Praxis, Adm.), and in Sir Lionel Jenkins' charge to a grand jury at the admiralty session (about) 1668. 1 Sir L. Jenkins' Works, 90. See, also, Black Book of the Admiralty; Zouch. Adm. 1-34; God. Adm. Jur. 26; Sea Laws, 195. Manslaughter is mentioned in the first document, but not in the second, as one of those offences punishable under the customs of the sea. The English naval articles no doubt had relation to those ancient customs (Sutton v. Johnstone, 1 Durn. & E. [1 Term R.] 784, 520, per Lord Mansfield), but it is unnecessary now to decide whether our code is to be understood to confer jurisdiction over offences by that name. The article refers to that custom only for the measure of punishment, and not for the authority to try; and as it expressly gives jurisdiction over all offences committed in the navy, a defect or failure of authority to designate a punishment, might not affect the question of jurisdiction as between one court and another. But I think the true ground to place this point upon is, that the accused are charged with manslaughter in taking the life of a seaman belonging to the ship, in doing what they claim to be the exercise of their rightful authority and command on board of a vessel of war, and that no statute of the United States gives this court jurisdiction to inquire into and punish that offence. This point is not so clear in my mind as the others, but from the best consideration I am able to bestow on the subject, I am led to the conclusion that naval courts martial have jurisdiction to punish the offence of manslaughter committed at sea on board of ships of war.

Gentlemen, questions affecting the jurisdiction and rightful powers of courts of law are always of a delicate and embarrassing nature. The law imperiously demands of every tribunal that it shall employ all its rightful functions in the furtherance of public justice, and it no less emphatically forbids to it the usurpation of authority not clearly bestowed upon it by acts of congress. In its supreme power over all the subjects of criminal jurisprudence, the legislature is to be supposed to allot jurisdiction to one tribunal or another, or withhold it from all, in the exercise of a wise and just discretion, and so as most efficiently to subserve the ends of public justice and the protection of the citizen.

It belongs to no court to arrogate to itself a wisdom beyond that of the legislature in this respect; and in conducting the inquiry into what the law has ordained and established in this behalf, and with the facts before us, that the naval code, as a distinct system of jurisprudence under our laws, has been in force for nearly forty years, that thirty of the last years of that period have witnessed a large increase of the naval forces, and a vast scope of employment, and that the application of the naval code by means of courts martial has been constant and notorious to every department of the government,—that a quarter of a century since the highest judicatory of the land intimated and published its opinion that the general crimes act did not apply to offences committed on board ships of war,—and that congress since that period has legislated at large over felonies and offences at sea, without directly bringing vessels of war within that legislation, except where the authority of courts martial was also reserved,—and that throughout the time the events on board the Somers have most agitated the public attention, and when the civil authorities of this district openly declined to exercise jurisdiction over the case, congress continued in session without changing the law or acting upon the matter, I think we must all feel a deep conviction that this court ought not to be the first to assume such a jurisdiction, and arraign the parties accused on a matter touching their lives.

W.

WALKER (DIXON v.). See Case No. 18,291.
WASHINGTON, THE CITY OF. See Case No. 18,278.
WATERS (BIBBS v.). See Case No. 18,235.

WILMINGTON & R. R. CO. (HANCOCK v.). See Case No. 18,300.
WINDER (CALDWELL v.). See Case No. 18,245.
WYLIE (BALDWIN v.). See Case No. 18,228.

APPENDIX.

COMPRISING THE LAWS OF OLERON, THE LAWS OF WISBUY, THE LAWS OF THE HANSE TOWNS, AND THE MARINE ORDINANCES OF LOUIS XIV., MISCELLANEOUS MATTERS FROM THE APPENDICES OF THE UNITED STATES CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT COURT REPORTS AND BIBLIOGRAPHIC NOTES CONCERNING THE SAME, AND BIOGRAPHICAL NOTES OF THE FEDERAL JUDGES.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
Laws of Oleron.....	1171
Laws of Wisbuy.....	1189
Laws of the Hanse Towns.....	1197
Marine Ordinances of Louis XIV.:
Introduction.....	1203
Mariners and Ships.....	1203
Maritime Contracts.....	1207
Table of Land Claims.....	1217
Governors of California.....	1259
Notes Concerning the United States Circuit and District Court Reports..	1261
Resolutions and Other Proceedings upon the decease or retirement of the following judges:
Betts, Samuel Rossiter.....	1285
Boyle, John.....	1286
Campbell, John Wilson.....	1286
Chase, Salmon Portland.....	1287
Cranch, William.....	1291
Curtis, Benjamin Robbins.....	1292
Davis, David.....	1300
Davis, John.....	1302
Dillon, John Forrest.....	1304
Holman, Jesse Lynch.....	1313
Hopkins, James Campbell.....	1314
Ingersoll, Charles Anthony.....	1315
Johnson, Alexander Smith.....	1315
Johnson, Benjamin.....	1319
Leavitt, Humphrey Howe.....	1319
McLean, John.....	1321
McNairy, John.....	1323
Marshall, John.....	1323
Nelson, Samuel.....	1326
Pitman, John.....	1332
Pope, Nathaniel.....	1334
Sprague, Peleg.....	1334
Story, Joseph.....	1335
Taney, Roger Brooke.....	1341
Thompson, Smith.....	1348
Thruston, Buckner.....	1348
Trigg, Connally F.....	1348
Ware, Ashur.....	1349
Woodruff, Lewis B.....	1356
Biographical Notes of all of the Federal Judges.....	1361

THE LAWS OF OLERON.

[Reprinted from 1 Pet. Adm. Append. iii.]

This justly celebrated code was originally promulgated by Eleanor, Duchess of Guienne, the mother of Richard I. of England. Returning from the Holy Land, and familiar with the maritime regulations of the Archipelago, she enacted these laws at Oleron in Guienne, and they derive their title from the place of their publication. The language in which this collection of laws was originally clothed is that of Gascony, and their first object appears to have been the commercial operations of that part of France only.

By Richard I. of England, who inherited the dukedom of Guienne from his mother, this code was improved, and introduced into England. Some additions were made to it by King John, it was promulgated anew in the 50th year of Henry III., and received its ultimate confirmation in the 12th of Edward III.¹

England and France contend for the honour of having originated this system of laws; but we only notice this circumstance to introduce the observation, that it affords the strongest testimony of the value of the collection, and of the high respect in which it is held by the two greatest nations of the world. Indeed it forms the basis of the celebrated Ordinances of Lewis XIV. of France, and it is admitted as authority in the courts of common law, as well as the admiralty courts of England.

The translation now published is printed from the "Sea Laws," and the editor has carefully compared it with the copy published in French by Cleirac, in a work entitled "Les Us. et Coutumes de la Mer." He has not considered himself authorized to make any alterations in the text, but wherever a variance between the copies has been discovered, he has pointed it out, and he has given the words of the French copy, with a particular reference to the passage from which, in his opinion, they differ.

The "notes and illustrations," which are highly valuable, will be found by a reference to Cleirac, to have been principally abridged from his work, and, indeed, in some instances they are extracted verbatim. While an acknowledgment of the source from whence they were derived, would have been honourable to the candour of the compiler of the Sea Laws, these Commentaries would have obtained increased authority from the reputation and talents of their real author, who is justly estimated among the most distinguished jurists of France.

ARTICLE I.

When several joint owners make a man master of a ship or vessel, and the ship or vessel departing from her own port, arrives at Bordeaux, Rouen, or any other such place, and is there freighted to sail for Scotland, or some other foreign country; the master in such case may not sell or dispose of that ship or vessel, without a special procuration² from the owners: but in case he wants money for the victualling,³ or other necessary provisions of the said vessel, he may for that end, with the advice of his mariners, pawn or pledge part of the tackle or furniture of a ship.

Observation.

The title of master is so honourable, and the command of a ship of such importance, that great care has been taken by all maritime nations, that none may be employed but honest and experienced men. By an ordinance of the admiralty in France, A. D. 1584, every master of a ship before he took upon him that trust, was to be examined whether he was fit for it. The Spanish naval laws require the same thing: El maestro de la nave, para serlo, ha de ser marinero y examinado. Cedula real del Anno 1576. Impresa con las de Indias quarto tomo. The ordinances and regulations of the Hanse Towns, do not only demand experience and capacity, but honesty and good manners. And none was to be admitted into the service of any citizen aboard his ship, without a certificate of his qualifications, as to his honesty and capacity. See their Book of Ordinances, book 6, art. 1.

The Greeks called the master of a ship Πιστόν, cujus fidei navis concreditur, to whom the government of the ship is entrusted; but so, that the master cannot sell the ship itself, nor any of her tackle or furniture, without the order or consent of the owners. However, in case of necessity, when he is in a far country, he may pawn or pledge her tackle for provisions, and if that will not do, he may borrow money on the ship's bottom, though not without the consent of his officers and seamen. According to the Ordinances of Wisbuy, arts. 13, 15, and Philip II. King of Spain's Ordinances in the year 1563, art. 12. Those of the Hanse Towns forbid a master of a ship, notwithstanding he is part owner, not only to sell, but to do any thing, even to buy tackle or victuals, without acquainting the other owners of it, unless it be in a strange country, and in a case of necessity, well and lawfully attested. Articles 3-5 et seq.

By the ordinances and customs of the sea, it appears, that formerly it was not thought safe to entrust a master of a ship with the vessel and cargo, unless he was a freeman of that city, and part-owner of the ship; and if he was part-owner, when he had betrayed or abused his trust, the other owners might turn him out of the ship, paying him what his part of her came to at the same price he gave for it. See Ordinances of the Hanse Towns, art. 14. And if he pretended he had sold his part to another person for more than it was worth, the other owners might have it appraised, and take it to themselves, paying him what it was valued at by such appraisement. Article 53.

² In the copy of the Roll d'Oleron, published by Cleirac, in the original French, the words are, "procuracion ou mandement spécial."

³ "Pour les dépens," in Cleirac's copy.—E.

¹ 2 Brown, Civ. & Adm. Law, 40.

The master commonly took care of every thing belonging to the ship, from the poop to the mainmast. He was obliged to understand the art of piloting and navigation, that he might know how to control the pilot, and mind how he steers the ship, y si el maestre no fuere piloto es obligado a vevar un marinere diestro en la navegacion, tel' que, pueda regir la nave a fala de piloto, according to the ordinances of Spain. The mate's command reached from the stern to the mizzenmast, the latter included. It will not be thought improper by the curious to mention here the several officers of a ship, either men of war, or merchantmen, as they were distinguished aboard, a century of years ago.

In royal navies the first officer was the admiral; then the vice-admiral, then the captain-major or chief of a squadron. In every man of war, the first officer was the captain, the second the pilot, who enjoyed that place in honour of the sciences he professed and practised; next to him was the master, who had the charge of the tackle and furniture, and then the captain, and lieutenant of the soldiers. In a merchantman the first officer was the master, the second the pilot, the third the mate, the fourth the factor, or supercargo; then his assistant, accomptants, the surgeons, the steward, four corporals, the cook, the gunner, the cockswain; the gunner and cockswain used to work before the mast, as well as the rest of the ship's crew, but their wages were more. There is a great deal of difference between the order of precedency on board of a ship now, and what was formerly: for the captain and lieutenant of the soldiers would think it very hard to give place to the pilot and master of a ship; and the factor, or supercargo, will as difficultly be persuaded to own the master of a vessel's superiority, except in what relates to the navigating the ship.

ART. II.

If a ship or other vessel be in a port, waiting for weather, and a wind to depart, the master ought when that comes, before his departure to consult his company, and say to them, Gentlemen, what think you of this wind? If any of them see that it is not settled, and advise him to stay until it is, and others, on the contrary, would have him make use of it as fair, he ought to follow the advice of the major part: If he does otherwise, and the vessel happens to miscarry, he shall be obliged to make good the same, according to the value upon a just appraisement.⁴

Observation.

It is a maxim, or general sea law, that a master of a ship shall never sail out of a port, never weigh or drop anchor, cut masts or cable, or indeed do any thing of consequence, let him be in whatever danger may happen, without the advice of the major part of his company, and the merchants, if there be any aboard.—He must call all together to consult. Wisbuy, art. 14.

⁴ "Ou la somme qu'elle sera prisée." Cleirac. —E.

ART. III.

If any vessel, through misfortune, happens to be cast away, in whatsoever place it be, the mariners shall be obliged to use their best endeavours for saving as much of the ship and lading as possibly they can: and if they preserve part thereof, the master shall allow them a reasonable consideration to carry them home to their own country.⁵ And in case they save enough to enable the master to do this, he may lawfully pledge to some honest persons such part thereof as may be sufficient for that occasion. But if they have not endeavoured to save as aforesaid, then the master shall not be bound to provide for them in any thing, but ought to keep them in safe custody, until he knows the pleasure of the owners, in which he may act—as becomes a prudent master; for if he does otherwise, he shall be obliged to make satisfaction.

Observation.

The ship's crew are obliged to do all that lies in their power to save things from shipwreck, and gather up what they save, on pain of losing their wages; and those that hinder or dissuade them from it, shall be severely punished. This law is very well explained by an ordinance of King Philip II. of Spain, in the year 1563, by which it is ordained, that the seamen shall be bound to save as much as they can from shipwreck; and in such case, the master is bound to pay them their wages, and to give them a further reward for their labour out of the goods. But if the seamen refuse to do their endeavor to save the goods, they shall neither have pay nor reward. Hanse Towns Ord. art. 44; Wisbuy, art. 15.

ART. IV.

If a vessel departing with her lading from Bordeaux, or any other place, happens in the course of her voyage, to be rendered unfit to proceed therein, and the mariners save as much of the lading as possibly they can; if the merchants require their goods of the master, he may deliver them if he pleases, they paying the freight in proportion to the part of the voyage that is performed, and the costs of the salvage. But if the master can readily repair his vessel, he may do it; or if he pleases, he may freight another ship to perform his voyage. And if he has promised the people who helped him to save the ship the third, or the half part of the goods saved for the danger they ran, the judicatures of the country should consider the pains and trouble they have been at, and reward them accordingly, without any regard to the promises made them by the parties concerned in the time of their distress.

Observation.

This law does not relate to an entire loss, but only to salvage, or rather not to the shipwreck, but to the disabling of a ship, so that she cannot proceed in her voyage without refitting. In which case the merchants may have their goods again, paying the freight in proportion to the way the ship made. If the merchant has not money to pay the freight, and the master will not credit, the latter may take his goods in payment at the market price. Wisbuy, art 33; Emperor Charles V. Ordinance, art. 40.

⁵ "Le maître est tenu de leur bailler salaire raisonnable pour venir en leurs terres." Cleirac.

If the master can in a little time refit his vessel, and render her fit to continue her voyage, that is, if he can do it in 3 days' time at the most, according to the Hanse Town Laws; or if he will himself take freight for the merchandize aboard another ship bound for the same port to which he was bound, he may do it; and if the accident did not happen to him by any fault of his, the freight shall be paid him. Leges Rhodior. Numb. 42, secundo & ultimo tomo juris Græco-Romani in fine; Wisbuy, arts. 16, 37, 55; King Philip II. of Spain's Ordinance, under the head of "Averages," art. 30.

As for the charges of salvage, there are very great allowances made to the salvors, lege Rhodior. secundo tomo juris Græco-Romani Nos. 45, 47; Hermopolis in Promptuario Juris, lib. 2, tit. 6. By this law there was adjudged to the divers and salvors, the half, the third or the tenth of the things saved, and that according to the depth of the water out of which they were fished, fifteen, eight or one fathom; as also a tenth part for salvage on the coast, and the fifth to him that saving himself, carries and saves something with him. The promises that are extorted in danger on this account, ought always to be regulated according to justice, with reason and proportion, without keeping to the expressions of such promises; for this there are several laws in France, and an instance of it is thus recorded. A gentleman named La Mothe, embarked at St. Machaire with two horses in a boat, going for Bordeaux; as they were in their passage, one of the horses grew furious, and leaped overboard. La Mothe held him by the bridle; the horse splashed the water up in his face, and the gentleman pulling his handkerchief out of his pocket to wipe it off, at the same time pulled out a purse that had thirty pistoles in it, which fell into the water. The boatmen came, and La Mothe desired them to take notice of the place, by observing the trees and buildings that were near it, and when the tide was out, to seek after the purse; promising if they found it, to give them a pistole for their pains. The boatmen excused themselves; nevertheless, when they had put La Mothe and his horses ashore, they went to look for the pistoles when it was low water, and one of them found them where they were dropt. His companions demanded their share of them, but he who had the good fortune to find the purse, would not let them have any of the gold, and there was a law-suit about dividing it, before the judge of St. Machaire. Monsieur La Mothe hearing of it, came thither and put in his claim to the purse and pistoles; but the judge gave it against him. He then appealed to the seneschal of Guienne's court, but with no better success; at last he appealed to the parliament of Bordeaux, and that court decreed, he should have his pistoles, but should pay 60 livres to the boatmen for their pains and trouble.

ART. V.

If a vessel departing from one port, laden or empty, arrives at another, the mariners shall not leave the ship without the master's consent: if they do, and by that means she happens to be lost or damaged, they shall be answerable for the damage; but if the vessel be moored, and lying at anchor, with a sufficient number of men aboard to keep the decks and lading, they may go without the master's consent, if they come back in good time; otherwise they shall be liable to make satisfaction, if they have wherewithal.

Observation.

This article relating to seamen, it will not be unacceptable to the reader to observe what other customs and ordinances we have met with concerning them.

Mariners are obliged to look carefully after every thing that relates to the preservation of the ship and goods. Consolato, c. 169; Wisbuy, art. 47. For which reason, they ought not to go ashore and leave the vessel, without the master or mate's permission: if they do, they are bound to answer all the damages that happen to the ship or merchandize in their absence. Wisbuy, art. 17. The emperor Charles V.'s Ordinance in the year 1552, arts. 9 and 10, conformable to the Rhodian Law, secundo tomo juris Græco-Romani, Num. 20. The Regulations of the Hanse Towns, art. 40, ordain, that if any seaman goes ashore without license, and if in his absence the ship happens to be lost for want of hands, the seaman thus absent shall be apprehended, and kept a year in prison on bread and water; and if any one should be killed or drowned in his absence, and that be the cause of it, he shall be corporally punished. The same ordinances condemn those mariners that lie out of their ship all night, to pay all the damage that shall happen while they are absent. Those of the Hanse Towns, arts. 22, 23, add imprisonment. Some laws forbid them to undress themselves, and the Hanse Towns, art. 32, to lie with their wives aboard. The reason is, that they may always be ready to assist their fellows in the discharge of their duty in the preservation of the ship and goods. The obligation of the mariner to the master, begins as soon as he is hired and terms are agreed; and ends when the voyage is finished, and they are returned. The obligation of the mariner to the merchant is from the beginning of his charge, and the mariner is obliged to stow and un-stow the goods, according as the place they are in is commodious or not, to keep them from damaging, and promote or hinder the ship's trimming; and if by their refusing to do so, the merchandize is damaged or spoiled, they are bound to make the damage good. Wisbuy, art. 48; Philip II. art. 19. By the laws of Wisbuy, they are also bound to unlade some goods with the shovel, and some to hand ashore; for which they are to have no extraordinary allowance; but for letting things up or down, they are by the same laws to be allowed something extraordinary, that is above their wages. The laws are very severe against those seamen that run away from ships after they are hired. In men of war, desertion is punished with death; in merchantmen, by the Hanseatic laws, or those of the Hanse Towns, they are to be marked in the face with a red hot iron, that they may be known, and be infamous as long as they live. If the mariner runs away before the voyage, when he is taken, he ought to refund half as much as the master was to have paid him for the whole voyage. If he hires himself to two masters, the first may demand him, and by the Hanseatic law, art. 1, he is not bound to pay him any wages. Provision is made for such seamen as run away, only because the master has used them ill. By the same laws, if any master entices away a mariner hired before by another, the last master shall forfeit to the first 25 livres, and the mariner, half the wages he was to have had of the master that so enticed him. That master who knowingly hires a mariner who was hired before, shall pay double the wages he was to pay the mariner, and the latter be bound to follow and serve the first master. However, a mariner may demand, and ought to have his discharge, either before or during the voyage, for these four reasons: in case he is made master or mate of another ship; if he marries, and then he is obliged to refund what he has received; if he made any provision in his bargain for quitting the ship; if the voyage is finished, the ship disarmed, unloaded and light, the sails, tackle and furniture taken away and secured. See Laws Wisbuy, arts. 54, 63.

If the master gives a mariner his discharge, without any lawful cause, and for his pleasure only; in case he does it before the voyage, and while the ship is in port, he ought to pay half as much as he was to give him for the whole voyage; but if he discharges him after the ship is sailed, he ought to pay him all his wages. Wisbuy, art. 111.

By the Hanseatic law, the master is to pay a third of the wages only, and not to bring it to his owners' account. He is obliged also to pay him not only all his wages, if he discharges him in his voyage, but to defray the charges of his return. If after a bargain is made between the master and mariner, if the voyage happens to be hindered by war or pirates, or any other lawful account, the mariner, according to King Philip's Laws, art. 9, shall have a quarter part of the wages that were promised him for the voyage; and the master by a French law shall have half the freight. A master may turn off a mariner if he finds he is ignorant in maritime affairs, and incapable to perform the voyage, particularly a pilot, to whom in such cases he is not bound to pay any wages, and at his return may have him punished for his rashness, according to King Philip's and the Hanseatic laws. If it happens that the master finds out the pilot or mariner's ignorance when he cannot discharge them, they shall be obliged at their return to refund all the money he had advanced to them, and pay the master besides half what he had promised them: but if the pilot declares first he is dubious, and cannot depend on his knowledge, that he is out of the way, and does not very well understand his business; if it is when he is outward bound, he shall be paid half what was promised him; if homeward bound, all. If the master finds that any officer or seaman aboard his ship has any infectious distemper that is dangerous, he may put him ashore at the first place he comes to, without paying him any thing; but then he must prove it by two or three witnesses. He may also turn away any thieving mariner, or any quarrelsome or factious fellow; but as to the latter, he should have a little patience, to see if he can be brought to reason. Vide Hanseatics, art. 29; Laws of Wisbuy, art. 25.

ART. VI.

If any of the mariners hired by the master of any vessel, go out of the ship without his leave, and get themselves drunk, and thereby there happens contempt to their master, debates, or fighting and quarrelling among themselves, whereby some happen to be wounded: in this case the master shall not be obliged to get them cured, or in any thing to provide for them, but may turn them and their accomplices out of the ship; and if they make words of it, they are bound to pay the master besides: but if by the master's orders and commands any of the ship's company be in the service of the ship, and thereby happen to be wounded or otherwise hurt, in that case they shall be cured and provided for at the costs and charges of the said ship.⁶

⁶ "Ils doivent être guéris & pansés sur le coût de ladite nef." Cleirac, 15.—E.

Observation.

By the Laws of Wisbuy, art. 18, those mariners that are mutinous and quarrelsome, are obliged to refund all they have received, and pay besides what the master is forced to give to others whom he hires in their places above the wages he was to give them.

The Laws of Charles V. art. 23 et seq., ordain certain punishments, according to the heinousness of the offences and crimes committed by seamen. If the mariners are wounded, or any wise hurt in serving the master of the ship, they shall be cured, taken care of, and indemnified at the charge of the ship. Wisbuy, art. 18; Hanseatics, art. 39; Charles V. arts. 27, 28; Philip II. art. 16. If mariners are taken by corsairs in his, and his ship's service, the master is bound to redeem them, and besides that, to pay them their wages, during their captivity, as much as if they had all that time been in his service. This law is in the Consulat, c. 182. If in defending himself, or fighting against an enemy or corsairs, a mariner is maimed, or disabled to serve on board a ship for the rest of his life, besides the charge of his cure, he shall be maintained as long as he lives at the cost of the ship and cargo. Vide the Hanseatic Law, art. 35. An instance of this is told by our author.

In the year 1621, Giles Esteben, a citizen and merchant of Bordeaux loaded a vessel of 36 tuns with wine for Calais, and gave the charge of the cargo to one Fiton his servant. The vessel set sail, and when she was at sea met with a Turkish rover. The corsair came up with her, and took her, but did not meddle with the vessel or the wine, either because the Alcoran forbids the Mahometans to drink or deal in wine, or because he held intelligence with the master of the vessel, who was a Scotchman; for he did him nor any of his crew no manner of hurt, but took away Fiton and sold him in Barbary for a slave. He remained there four years and a half in great misery and poverty; at last he was redeemed by alms in the year 1625, and paid for his ransom 780 livres. Fiton returning to Bordeaux, found that his master Esteben was dead; however, he entered an action in an inferior court against the widow, for his wages, as well for the time he was detained in slavery, as for that before his captivity, as also for the reimbursement of his ransom money, his losses and interest. The widow removed the suit to the higher courts, and from thence it came before the parliament, who decreed, that the widow should pay Fiton 1000 livres in full for his wages, redemption, expenses, loss and interest.

ART. VII.

If it happens that sickness seizes on any one of the mariners, while in the service of the ship, the master ought to set him ashore, to provide lodging and candlelight for him, and also to spare him one of the ship-boys, or hire a woman to attend him, and likewise to afford him such diet as is usual in the ship; that is to say, so much as he had on shipboard in his health, and nothing more, unless it please the master to allow it him; and if he will have better diet, the master shall not be bound to provide it for him, unless it be at the mariner's own cost and charges; and if the vessel be ready for her departure, she ought not to stay for the said sick party⁷—but if he recover, he ought to have his full wages, deducting only such charges as the master has been at for him. And if he dies, his wife or next kin shall have it.

⁷ "Et s'il guerit il doit avoir son loyer tout comptant, en rabattant les frais, si le maitre lui en a fait, et s'il meurt, sa femme et ses prochains le doivent avoir pour lui. Voyez le

Observation.

The nineteenth article of the Laws of Wisbuy, the forty-fifth of the Hanseatic law, the twenty-seventh of Charles V., and the sixteenth of Philip II., which he compiled for the Low Countries, were all founded upon this law of Oleron, in what relates to a sick mariner, and agree exactly with it, both if he recovers his health, or dies in the voyage. The Spaniards have another custom in the West India voyages; for in case a mariner falls sick, he must substitute another in his place, otherwise he loses all his wages for the time in which he could not work. By the Hanseatic law, art. 45, if a mariner is detained ashore by sickness, the voyage ought not to be retarded on his account. By Charles V.'s ordinances, if the mariner dies as he is outward-bound, his wife and heirs shall receive half his pay: if as he is homeward-bound, they shall have all, deducting the charge of his funeral, if there has been any. In ships of war the custom in some places has been more favourable to sailors; for we find in a treatise written by Francis Pyrrard de Lalval, entitled, "Advis pour aller aux Indes Orientales," that if a man died the first day of the voyage, his heirs were to be paid as much as if he had completed it.

ART. VIII.

If a vessel be laden to sail from Bordeaux to Caen, or any other place, and it happens that a storm overtakes her at sea, so violent, that she cannot escape without casting some of the cargo overboard for lightening the vessel, and preserving the rest of the lading, as well as the vessel itself; then the master ought to say, "Gentlemen, we must throw part of the goods overboard"; and, if there are no merchants to answer him, or if those that are there approve of what he says by their silence, then the master may do as he thinks fit; and if the merchants are not pleased with his throwing over any part of the merchandize, and forbid him, yet the master ought not to forbear casting out so many of the goods as he shall see to be for the common good and safety; he and the third part of his mariners making oath on the Holy Evangelists, when they arrive at their port of discharge, that he did it only for the preservation of the vessel, and the rest of the lading that remains yet in her. And the wines, or other goods, that were cast overboard, ought to be valued or prized according to the just value of the other goods that arrive in safety. And when these shall be sold, the price or value thereof ought to be divided livre a livre among the merchants. The master may compute the damage his vessel has sustained, or reckon the freight of the goods thrown overboard at his own choice. If the master does not make it appear that he and his men did the part of able seamen, then neither he nor

tit. 6 de l'Ordonnance de 1681. Au surplus les malades sont mis a l'hôpital, & traités aux dépens du navir tant que dure le voyage." Cleirac, 17.—E.

they shall have anything. The mariners also ought to have one tun free,^s and another divided by cast of the dice, according as it shall happen, and the merchants in this case may lawfully put the master to his oath.

Observation.

Of two evils, to choose the least is the law of nature as well as of nations; and when a ship is in danger of perishing, the lives of the seamen, and the safety of the rest of the cargo make the throwing part of it overboard the least evil. But that the master's ignorance or fear might not hurry him to do any thing to the detriment of the merchant, without good grounds for it, he must consult the merchants, passengers, or mariners aboard his ship, and, according as the necessity of it appears to them, to throw the goods overboard. This he is warranted to do by the Rhodian Law. Secundo Tomo Juris Græco-Romani, Num. 9, and by 20th, 21st, and 38th articles of that of Wisbuy. The 20th and 38th articles provide also, that if the merchants alone are against the proposition of throwing the merchandize overboard, and the rest, who have their lives and goods also to lose, consent to it, the master and third part of the seamen purging themselves as soon as they come ashore by oath, that necessity forced them to do it, and that otherwise they could not have been saved, may do it, and shall then be justified for what they did. The master is not obliged, when he comes to this extremity, to throw his own goods overboard first. The custom of the Levant is, the traveller or merchant first flings out something of his own. Philip the Second's Ordinances, under the title of Avarages, require, that the ship's utensils should be first thrown overboard, such as old cables, firewood, anchors and guns, which weigh heavy, and are not of the greatest service; then the chests belonging to the ship's crew, as being of the least value. All those things which are thrown overboard come into an average, except those that belong to the sovereign.

By the thirty-eighth article of the Laws of Wisbuy, the clerk of the ship ought to register all the goods that are thrown overboard; and if there is no clerk aboard, it is convenient for the mariners to make attestation of them at the first port they come to.

By the Rhodian Laws, the goods that are damaged by the storm come into an average. By the same laws, if the master, by overloading his ship, is the occasion of the goods being thrown overboard, he shall make good the damage. The Laws of Wisbuy, art. 46, except, in this case, those goods which were so laden with the consent of the merchant. If the master has let out more freight than he has stowage for, he must not therefore overload his own ship, but by the Consolato is bound to find freight for them in another. If the merchants, passengers or mariners have any plate or other precious goods in their chests or cabinets, they ought to inform the master and clerk of it; otherwise their chests will not be liable to any average for any thing more than what is known to be within them. Persons never are reckoned in an average, but all sorts of goods whatsoever. Victuals belonging to the ship are exempted from the laws for throwing goods overboard, and privileged from paying contributions in averages. Seamen's wages are not liable to averages. By the Hanseatic Law, art. 28, these wages ought to be paid by three payments, a third part before the ship goes out of the port, a third part when she is unladen, and a third part at her return.

By the Rhodian Law, the sailors ought to have a ton freight free from contributions in averages, when goods are thrown overboard. To explain this it will be necessary to observe—that sailors were used to hire themselves out for a voyage for several considerations; some had a certain sum of money for the whole voyage, or so much a month, or so much a day; others hired themselves for such a proportion of the freight, or a liberty to load so much goods aboard, or let out so much freight to others. But the most common way, and the best of hiring themselves, was for part in wages, and part in freight, either for themselves or to let out. Those seamen who had wages only, contributed nothing to the average for goods thrown overboard. Those who had goods contributed, unless those goods were bought with their wages, and they had only one ton exempted. The merchants who hired their freight of them had the same privilege by it as themselves.

^s "Et pour recouvrer le dommage, les mariners doivent avoir un tonneau franc." Cleirac, p. 18.—E.

Having had occasion to make mention of livre a livre, an explanation of it will not be unacceptable to the reader. The civilians consider every thing as one whole; as for example, an inheritance composed of several parts, makes together one whole or mass of inheritance, of whatever importance it may be, great or small, as if the whole of his inheritance made one livre, one pound, as hereditatis. This pound divided into twelve equal parts, is named ounces. The merchants and masters of ships, in case of averages for goods thrown overboard, or damaged in storms, have the same view; that is, they consider the ship and cargo together as one pound, and the goods lost or damaged as another; so that he who had a tenth in the pound of the cargo, a fifteenth, or any other share, must carry a tenth, a fifteenth, or any other share to the pound of the average; and this proportion of one pound to another, is what is called by the French naval laws, "livre a livre," pound to pound.

ART. IX.

If it happen, that by reason of much foul weather the master is like to be constrained to cut his masts, he ought first to call the merchants, if there be any aboard the ship, and such as have goods and merchandize in the vessel, and to consult them, saying, "Sirs, it is requisite to cut down the mast to save the ship and lading, it being in this case my duty." And frequently they also cut their mooring cables, leaving behind them their cables and anchors to save the ship and her lading; all which things are reckoned and computed livre by livre, as the goods are that were cast overboard. And when the vessel arrives in safety at her port of discharge, the merchants ought to pay the master their shares or proportions without delay, or sell or pawn the goods and employ the money he raises to satisfy by it the same, before the said goods be unladen out of the said ship: but if he lets them go, and there happens controversies and debates touching the premises, if the master observes collusion therein, he ought not to suffer, but is to have his complete freight, as well for what goods were thrown overboard, as for what he brought home.⁹

Observation.

No merchant is obliged to pay average for goods thrown overboard, unless the master can prove he did it for the safety of his own and his men's lives, and the preservation of the ship and the rest of her cargo. What loss happens by accidents, breaking the masts, or burning the sails, or pirates taking part of the goods, shall not come into the common average. By the Rhodian Laws, every merchant shall bear his own loss, and the master shall do the same. See also the twelfth article of the Laws of Wisbuy. Averages are by that to be paid for damages done ad intra, and not for those ad extra; therefore the master and mariners are obliged to purge themselves by oath, how the damage came, in the first court of admiralty they come to, and that it was done in very great necessity. Indeed if pirates take the ship and cargo entire, and both are redeemed for a sum of money, the average for that shall be common, and all the concerned shall pay contribution. If the merchants and passengers aboard the ship desire the master to put into any port out of his way for fear of pirates, and in going out of that port he loses anchors or cables, those who desired him to put in there shall pay for them, and the ship ought not to pay anything toward that loss. After a general shipwreck there is no average or common contribution, but save who save can, as is vulgarly said on this occasion. If any goods that were thrown overboard in a storm, to lighten the ship, happen to be recovered, the owner of them ought to restore what he had recovered for damages by average, to those that paid him, deducting for the loss he may be at by his merchandize being damaged. The Rhodian Law enjoins this.

⁹ "Ains doit avoir son fret, comme si les tonneaux fussent p ris." Cleirac, 24.

ART. X.

The master of a ship, when he lets her out to freight to the merchants, ought to shew them his cordage, ropes, and slings, with which the goods are to be hoisted aboard or ashore; and if they find they need mending, he ought to mend them; for if a pipe, hogshead or other vessel, should happen by default of such cordage or slings to be spoiled or lost, the master and mariners ought to make satisfaction for the same to the merchants.¹⁰ So also if the ropes or slings break, the master not shewing them beforehand to the merchants, he is obliged to make good the damage. But if the merchants say the cordage, ropes or slings are good and sufficient, and notwithstanding it happens that they break, in that case they ought to divide the damage between them; that is to say, the merchant to whom such goods belong, and the said master with his mariners.

Observation.

By the twelfth article of the Laws of Wisbuy, and the seventh of King Philip's, the master when he lets his ship out to freight, is bound to shew her to the merchants or their agents. The Consolato requires the same, and that the master should let the merchants visit not only the ropes, but all the ship above decks and below, that they may see what is wanting, and have it mended; and if it is not mended, and the merchandize is damnified, the master shall make good the loss. The forty-ninth article of the Laws of Wisbuy enjoins the mariners to give the master notice of the faults and defects in the cordage; otherwise they shall be responsible for all accidents that may happen; and if after such notice given, the master does not take care to have them mended, he shall answer the damage out of his own pocket.

¹⁰ The following important passage has been omitted in the translation of this article: "Et si doit le ma tre payer selon qu'il doit prendre du guindage, et doit le salaire du guindage  tre mis   recouvrer le dommage, et le rest ou surplus doit  tre d parti entr'eux." Cleirac, p. 26.

In France the owners of ships receiving freight, are not obliged to pay the expenses of loading or unloading, but they form a separate charge against the owners of the cargo. The passage above quoted authorizes a deduction from this charge, of the value of any article lost or injured from the negligence of the master to furnish proper cordage, &c. If this charge is not sufficient to compensate for the loss, the master and mariners are to make up the difference.—B.

The Rhodian Laws Secundo Tomo Juris Græco-Romani, Num. 11, wills and ordains, that the merchant who loads a ship, shall inform himself exactly of every thing, "Diligenter interrogare debet mercatores qui prius in ea navi navigaverunt." The law says he should enquire of those that have sailed in her before; but that is of little use, except as to her sailing, for ships grow daily more and more out of repair, and should be always viewed by the person that is going to be concerned in them, without trusting to the information of others.

ART. XI.

If a vessel being laden at Bordeaux with wines, or other goods, hoists sail to carry them to some other port, and the master does not do his duty as he ought, nor the mariners handle their sails, and it happens that ill weather overtakes them at sea; so that the main yard shakes or strikes out the head of one of the pipes or hogsheds of wine; this vessel being safely arrived at her port of discharge, if the merchant alleges, that by reason of the main yard his wine was lost; and the master denies it: In this case the master and his mariners ought to make oath (whether it be four or six of them, such as the merchant hath no exception against) that the wine perished not by the main yard, nor through any default of theirs, as the merchants charge them, they ought then to be acquitted thereof; but if they refuse to make oath to the effect aforesaid, they shall be obliged to make satisfaction for the same, because they ought to have ordered their sails aright before they departed from the port, where they took in their lading.

Observation.

This article is explained by the 23d of the Laws of Wisbuy, which ordains, that if the cargo is ill stowed, and the ship ill trimmed, and the mariners do not manage their sails rightly, and any damage happens by it to the ship or goods, they shall be responsible for the damages as far as they have wherewithal to do it with. There were formerly, in several ports of Guyenne certain officers called "arrameurs" or stowers, who were master-carpenters by profession, and were paid by the merchants, who loaded the ship. Their business was to dispose right, and stow closely all goods in casks, bales, boxes, bundles or otherwise; to balance both sides, to fill up the vacant spaces, and manage every thing to the best advantage. It was not but that the greatest part of the ship's crew understood this as well as these stowers; but they would not meddle with it, nor undertake it, to avoid falling under the merchant's displeasure, or being accountable for any ill accident that might happen by that means. There were also sacquiers, who were very ancient officers, as may be seen in the 14th book of the Theodosian Code, Unica de Saccariis Portus Romæ, lib. 14. Their business was to load and unload vesels loaden with salt, corn, or fish, to prevent the ship's crew defrauding the merchant by false tale, or cheating him of his merchandize otherwise.

ART. XII.

A master, having hired his mariners, ought to keep the peace betwixt them, and to be as their judge at sea; so that if there be any of them that gives another the lie, whilst they have wine and bread on the table, he ought to pay four deniers; and if the master himself give any the lie, he ought to pay eight deniers; and if any of the mariners impudently contradict the master, he also ought to pay eight deniers; and if the master strike any of the mariners, he ought to bear with the first stroke, be it with the fist or open hand; but if the master strikes him more than one blow, the mariner may defend himself: but if the said mariner doth first assault the master, he ought to pay five sols, or lose his hand.

Observation.

The law restrains the correction of the master to one blow with his fist, which the mariner ought to bear, and no more. The Consulate, c. 16, explains how far the mariner is bound to suffer his master's assaulting him, in these terms: "The mariner is obliged to obey his master, though he should call him ill names, and is enraged against him, he ought to keep out of his sight, or hide himself in the prow of the ship; if the master follows him, he ought to fly to some other place from him; and if he still follows him, then the mariner may stand upon his defence, demanding witnesses how he was pursued by the master; for the master ought not to pass into the prow after him."

The twenty-fourth article of the Laws of Wisbuy punishes the giving the lie. The same article is very severe against the mariner that strikes the master. The mariner that strikes, or lifts up arms against his master, was to lose half his hand in a very painful way. If the mariner has committed a crime too great for the master's authority to punish, then the master and his officers ought to seize the criminal, put him in irons, and bring him to justice at his return.

ART. XIII.

If a difference happens between the master of a ship, and one of his mariners, the master ought to deny him his mess thrice, ere he turn him out of the ship, or discharge him thereof: but if the said mariner offer, in the presence of the rest of the mariners, to make the master satisfaction, and the master be resolved to accept of no satisfaction from him, but to put him out of the ship; in such case the said mariner may follow the said vessel to her port of discharge, and ought to have as good hire or wages, as if he had come in the ship, or as if he had made satisfaction for his fault in the sight and presence of the ship's company; and if the master take not another mariner into the ship in his stead, as able as the other, and the ship or lading happens thereby to be, through any misfortune, damnified, the master shall be obliged to make good the same, if he hath wherewithal.

Observation.

To deny him his mess, is, in the original, oter la touaille, an old Gascon phrase, which signifies to deny him the table-cloth or victuals for three meals; by which is understood a day and a half. The Wisbuy Law, art. 25, provides for the master's making satisfaction for the damages that may happen through the want of the mariner he turns off. And the Laws of the Hanse Towns, art. 27, require the master not to give the seamen any cause to mutiny; not to provoke them, call them names, wrong them, nor keep any thing from them that is theirs; but to use them well, and pay them honestly what is their due. Some French laws ordain, that no mariner should be admitted under 18 years, nor above 50. The choice of the crew is entirely in the master: the reason is, that he ought to be himself very well assured of his seamen's ability, and not take it upon trust by report of others.

ART. XIV.

If a vessel, being moored, lying at anchor, be struck or grappled with another vessel under sail, that is not very well steered, whereby the vessel at anchor is prejudiced, as also wines, or other merchandize in each of the said ships damaged. In this case the whole damage shall be in common, and be equally divided and appraised half by half;¹¹ and the master and mariners of the vessel that struck or grappled with the other, shall be bound to swear on the Holy Evangelists, that they did it not willingly or wilfully. The reason why this judgment was first given, being, that an old decayed vessel might not purposely be put in the way of a better, which will the rather be prevented when they know that the damage must be divided.

Observation.

This law agrees exactly with the 26th, 50th, 67th, and 70th articles of the Ordinances of Wisbuy. The dividing the loss in halves, is, to prevent any cheat; for an old vessel that's worth little or nothing, might else be put in a new one's way: and if she runs against her, more damages be pretended, than the old ship might fairly be valued at.

ART. XV.

Suppose two or more vessels in a harbour, where there is but little water, so that the anchor of one of the vessels lie dry; the master of the other vessel ought, in that case, to say unto him whose anchor lies dry: "Master, take up your anchor, for it is too nigh us, and may do us a prejudice;" if neither the said master nor his mariners will take up the said anchor accordingly, then may that other master and his mariners (who might be otherwise thereby damaged) take up the said anchor, and let it down at a farther distance from them; and if the others oppose or withstand the taking up of their anchor, and there afterwards happens damage thereby, they shall be bound to give full satisfaction for the same: but if they put out a buoy or anchor-mark, and the anchor does any damage, the master and mariners to whom it belongs are not bound to make it good; if they do not, they are; for all masters and mariners ought to fasten such buoys or anchor-marks, and such cables to their anchors, as may plainly appear and be seen at full sea.

Observation.

The 28th and 51st articles of the Ordinances of Wisbuy, require masters to put out buoys to warn others where their anchors lie, on pain of making satisfaction for whatever damage may happen for want of them: for anchors hid under water, may do a great deal of mischief at ebb and low water. If any master spies them, and they lie near him, he may remove them, and prevent any damage coming to his ship. Harmenopus in promptuario titulo de rebus nauticis, licet in discrimen adductis, qui se aliter explicare non possunt, alterius navis anchoras salutis sue causa præcidere. The buoys that are made use of, are either empty barrels, or pieces of the trunk of a tree, or any other light wood with baskets that swim on the top of the water, and shews where the anchors lie.

ART. XVI.

When a ship arrives with her lading at Bordeaux, or elsewhere, the master is bound to say to his company, when she is ready to load again, "Gentlemen, will you freight your own share yourselves, or be allowed for it in proportion with the ship's general freight?" the mariners are bound to answer one or the other. If they take as the freight of the ship shall happen, they shall have proportionably as the ship hath; and if they will freight by themselves, they ought to freight so as the ship be not impeded or hindered thereby. And if it so happen, that they cannot let out their freight, or get goods themselves, when he has tendered them their share or stowage, the master is blameless; and if they will there lade a tun of water instead of so much wine, they may: and in case there should happen at sea, an ejection or a casting of goods overboard, the case shall be the same for a tun of water, as for a tun of wine, or other goods, livre by livre.¹² If they let out their proportion of freight to merchants, what freedom and immunity the said mariners have, the said merchants shall also have.

Observation.

This articles has some relation to the eighth, which treats of mariners' wages and their freight aboard. The thirtieth article of the Laws of Wisbuy is founded upon it. By the seamen's immunity, is meant the privilege of being the last that must throw overboard in a storm, and having a tun free from all averages. The mariners' freight should be first full; for the master is not obliged to stay for them when his cargo is all aboard. The reasons given by our author, why, in case of throwing overboard, the mariners' tun of water shall come in equally in the average, livre a livre, for a tun of wine, are, a mariner may make what use he pleases of his stowage, because he takes it as part of his pay: besides, in such case, the water he has aboard, lightens the ship as much as if it was wine. And the mariner by throwing over his water, which by his privilege he may refuse to do, not only helps to save the ship and cargo, but to save the latter the more entire; for if any thing the merchant had aboard, of more value than wine, stood before his tun of water, it must have gone first, and his throwing his water overboard being so much for the common interest of the ship and cargo, he is allowed to come in upon an average, as if it had been a tun of wine. How far this law of Oleron prevails in our maritime courts now, the civilians must determine; but by the common law of England, a tun of water would never be rated livre a livre, pound by pound, with a tun of wine.

¹¹ "Le dommage du coup doit être prisé et parti moitié des deux nefes." Cleirac, 33.—E.

¹² "Parquoi les mariniers se puissent défendre et s'aider a la mer." Cleirac, p. 36. This is omitted in the translation of the XVth article.—E.

ART. XVII.

The mariners of Brittany ought to have but one meal a day from the kitchen, because they have beverage going and coming. But those of Normandy are to have two meals a day, because they have only water at the ship's allowance; and when the ship arrives in a wine country, there the master shall procure them wine to drink.

Observation.

The custom of giving every man a certain allowance is very ancient, and to prevent jealousies, complaints and disorders, that allowance is settled at so much a head, and exactly delivered out to all alike. As to the allowance of wine and meals by this article, the twenty-ninth of the Ordinances of Wisbuy agrees with it. In those voyages where wine is to be had, the master is bound to provide it for the mariners, and then they shall have but one meal a day. But when they drink water only, they shall have two meals. Charles V. and Philip II.'s Laws ordain, that the master shall order the mariners to have three certain meals a day, and if they would have more meat, they shall only have what was last at their meals, unless upon extraordinary occasions. By the fifty-second article of the Hanseatic Laws, the masters of German ships bound for France and Spain, are not to provide victuals for their mariners when they are outward bound; but when they are homeward bound, if the ship is let out to freight and loaden, the masters are obliged to maintain their mariners; if they return light or empty, they are not obliged. The Portuguese in their East India voyages, maintain both mariners and soldiers outward bound, and allow each a pound and a half of biscuit, 3 pints of wine, and 3 pints of water a day, and 31 pound of salt fish a month, some dry fish, garlic and onions. But in their homeward bound voyages, they have only biscuits and water to the Cape of Good Hope, and after that they live every man on his own provision.

—Facilis descensus ad Indos:

Sed revocare gradum, veteremque evadere ad Orbem,

Hoc opus, hic labor est—

In cases of necessity, when provisions fall short, those that have victuals aboard ought to communicate to those that have not, by the Rhodian Law.

ART. XVIII.

When a vessel is unladen, and the mariners demand their freight, some of them having neither bed, chest, nor trunk aboard, the master may lawfully retain part of their wages, till they have brought back the ship to the port from whence she came; unless they give good security to serve out the whole voyage.

Observation.

The thirty-first article of the Ordinances of Wisbuy agrees exactly with this. The seamen's wages are not regularly due till after their work is entirely done, or the time they hired themselves for expired; except there are any private agreements to the contrary. The twenty-eighth article of the Hanseatic Law ordains, that their wages should be paid at three several payments; one third when they set sail upon a voyage, one third when they arrive at their port of discharge, and the other third when the ship is returned home.

ART. XIX.

If the master hire the mariners in the town to which the vessel belongs, either for so much a day, week or month, or for such a share of the freight; and it happens that the ship cannot procure freight in those parts where she is arrived, but must sail further to obtain it: in such case, those that were hired for a share of the freight, ought to follow the master, and such as are at wages ought to have their wages advanced course by course, that is, in proportion to the length of the voyage, in what it was longer than they agreed for, because he hired them to one certain place. And if they go not so far as that place for which the contract was made, yet they ought to have the whole promised hire, as if they had gone thither; but they ought likewise to bring back the vessel to the place from whence she at first departed.

Observation.

This article is explained by the eighth and sixteenth, and what is said upon them. The thirty-second of the Laws of Wisbuy, the twelfth and thirteenth of Charles V., and the twenty-fourth of the Hanseatic Laws, are to the same purpose. By the ninth article of Philip II.'s Laws, if the voyage is broken off by wars, pirates, or the command of the sovereign, the seamen ought to have a quarter part of the wages they agreed to have, if they had completed it. In the year 1626, about October, all the English ships that were then in the river of Bordeaux, were stopped by order of Monsieur de Luxemburgh, governor of Blaye. Several of these ships were loaden with wine, and others with other merchandize. They were forced to return to Bordeaux, and unload; after which the masters demanded the whole freight of the merchants who had freighted them, by virtue of the law. Colonus §. Navem conduxit. D. Locati. Inasmuch as it was not their faults that they did not make their voyage, and carry the goods to their intended port: the freight was then 15 or 16 livres a tun: the admiralty court adjudged them a quarter part of it; they appealed to the sovereign court, who after two hearings set aside their appeal. Which instance of our author, makes somewhat against his own remarks.

ART. XX.

When a vessel arrives at Bordeaux, or any other place, two of the mariners at a time may go ashore, and take with them one meal of such victuals as are in the ship, therein cut and provided; as also bread proportionably as much as they eat at once, but no drink: and they ought very speedily, and in season, to return to their vessel, that thereby the master may not lose his tide;

for if so, and damage come thereby, they are bound to make satisfaction; or if any of their company be hurt for want of their help, they are to be at such charge for his recovery, as one of his fellow mariners, or the master, with those of his table shall judge convenient.

Observation.

The reason of this law now ceases for Bordeaux, for which place it was originally intended; for the said river is so full of eating-houses and taverns on both sides, that it is not likely sailors will carry any of their salt provisions ashore, when they can get fresh. The reason of it was to keep the seamen in health and vigour; for by encouraging them to go ashore, two at a time, when their attendance was not necessary aboard, the master gave them an opportunity to refresh themselves at land, which is the best remedy in the world for the scurvy, contracted on shipboard by living on salt meats and dry biscuit, and being crowded up in a close place for a considerable time: their eating fresh provisions, and breathing the free air at land, makes them strong, and the better able to go through their business. It was not lawful for mariners to be drunk, nor to feast on shipboard, unless there was good cause for their feasting, and the master allowed it. As we find by the thirty-first article of the Hanseatic Law, and the old law of Rhodes, Vector in navi piscem ne frigit, & exercitor id ei ne permitto,—as one of his fellow mariners. In the original, it is "son matelot," which we in English call "comrade": for it is the custom at sea to divide the ship's crew into couples; every two are comrades, and this the French call "matelotage." These two companions, or comrades should be loving and assisting to one another. Their task is generally the same, and they are always posted together.—Those of his table. The mariners in Spanish ships dress their meat, and pay for it, each man for himself; but in the English, Dutch, German and French, there is always a cook, and the seamen eat all together at the same table, six in a mess. There is commonly two tables; the master's, which is served with a table-cloth, and there himself and his officers eat; and the mariners, where they have their messes.

ART. XXI.

If a master freight his ship to a merchant, and set him a certain time within which he shall lade his vessel, that she may be ready to depart at the time appointed, and he lade it not within the time, but keep the master and mariners by the space of eight days, or a fortnight, or more, beyond the time agreed on, whereby the master loses the opportunity of a fair wind to depart; the said merchant in this case shall be obliged to make the master satisfaction for such delay, the fourth part whereof is to go among the mariners, and the other three-fourths to the master, because he finds them their provisions.¹³

Observation.

The thirty-fourth article of the Ordinances of Wisbuy, and the thirty-ninth of the emperor Charles V., are entirely agreeable to this law. By the Hanseatic Law and Philip II.'s the merchant is obliged to pay the whole freight, if he does not load the ship in 15 days after the time agreed upon; and by the Theodosian Code de Naviculariis, when a vessel arrives at a port laden, the merchant to whom the cargo belongs, must unload in 10 days; but in our times, on account of holydays and Sundays, the common time for unloading a ship is 15 days: but that should not hinder the paying the freight, which ought to be cleared in eight days, whether the ship be discharged or not. The master for his pay cannot detain the merchandise aboard; but when they are in the boat or lighter, he may stop them until he is satisfied.

ART. XXII.

When a merchant freights a vessel at his own charge, and sets her to sea, and the said vessel enters into an harbour, where she is wind-bound, so that she stays till her monies be all spent, the master in that case ought speedily to write home to his own country for money; but ought not to lose his voyage on that account; for if so happen, he shall be obliged to make good to the merchant all damages that shall ensue. But the master may take part of the wines or other merchant goods, and dispose thereof for his present necessities; and when the said vessel shall be arrived at her port of discharge, the said wines that the master hath so disposed of, ought to be valued and appraised at the same rate as the other wines shall be commonly sold for, and accordingly be accounted for to the merchant. And the master ought to have the freight of such wines, as he hath so taken and disposed of, for the use and reason aforesaid.

Observation.

The thirty-fifth and thirty-ninth articles of the Laws of Wisbuy are to the same purport as this; but by the sixty-eighth article of those laws, if the ship happens afterwards to be cast away, the master shall pay the merchant for the wines or other goods he sold in a case of necessity, without pretending to deduct any thing for the freight. The Hanseatic Laws forbid any master to borrow any money on any other security but the ship's bottom, that if she should be lost the debt might be paid; nor do they allow him when he is at home, to borrow any thing on her bottom, or otherwise, without acquainting the owners with it. By the forty-fifth article of the Laws of Wisbuy, the ship is bound to the merchant whose goods the master has sold in this manner, to make him satisfaction, though she should be herself sold, and have other owners.

ART. XXIII.

If a pilot undertakes the conduct of a vessel, to bring her to St. Malo, or any other port, and fail of his duty therein, so as the vessel miscarry by reason of his ignorance in what he undertook, and the merchants sustain damage thereby, he shall be obliged to make full satisfaction for the same, if he hath wherewithal; and if not, lose his head.

ART. XXIV.

And if the master, or any one of his mariners, or any one of the merchants, cut off his head, they shall not be bound to answer for it; but before they do it, they must be sure he had not wherewith to make satisfaction.

¹³ The right of the mariners to a part of the compensation allowed for the delay of the ship, could only arise, when they received a part of the freight instead of wages.—E.

Observation on the Two Foregoing Articles.

The original calls these pilots "locmen"; for when those laws were written, there were officers aboard all ships, called pilots, who went the whole voyage, whereas the locmen were like our pilots, mariners hired at every river to guide the ship; for, dwelling on the place, the locman was supposed to know the shore better than the ship's pilot, who perhaps was never there before; for which reason he commonly required the master to have a locman, to avoid rocks, shelves, shoals and sands, which he must be well acquainted with by long using the river: that of Roan is very dangerous on this account, and there are sworn pilots every two leagues to guide ships up the Seine. They are very necessary all over Brittany. The forty-fourth and fifty-ninth articles of the Ordinances of Wisbuy, oblige the master to take a new pilot, if his own and the ship's crew demand one of him. The master finds him maintenance, and the merchant pays him, by the sixtieth article of the Ordinances of Wisbuy. The loss of the pilot's head, if through his ignorance or negligence the ship is lost, is taken from the Consolato, c. 250,—and answers to that known maxim in the law, "Qui non habet in aere, luet in corpore."

ART. XXXV.

If a ship or other vessel arriving at any place, and making in towards a port or harbour, set out her flag, or give any other sign to have a pilot come aboard, or a boat to tow her into the harbour, the wind or tide being contrary, and a contract be made for piloting the said vessel into the said harbour accordingly; but by reason of an unreasonable and accursed custom, in some places, that the third or fourth part of the ships that are lost, shall accrue to the lord of the place where such sad casualties happen, as also the like proportion to the salvors, and only the remainder to the master, merchant and mariners: the persons contracting for the pilotage of the said vessel, to ingratiate themselves with their lords, and to gain to themselves a part of the ship and lading, do like faithless and treacherous villains, sometimes even willingly, and out of design to ruin ship and goods, guide and bring her upon the rocks, and then feigning to aid, help and assist, the now distressed mariners, are the first in dismembering and pulling the ship to pieces; purloining and carrying away the lading thereof contrary to all reason and good conscience: and afterwards that they may be the more welcome to their lord, do with all speed post to his house with the sad narrative of this unhappy disaster; whereupon the said lord, with his retinue appearing at the places, takes his share; the salvors theirs; and what remains the merchant and mariners may have. But seeing this is contrary to the law of God, our edict and determination is, that notwithstanding any law or custom to the contrary, it is said and ordained, the said lord of that place, salvors, and all others that take away any of the said goods, shall be accursed and excommunicated, and punished as robbers and thieves, as formerly hath been declared. But all false and treacherous pilots shall be condemned to suffer a most rigorous and unmerciful death; and high gibbets shall be erected for them in the same place, or as nigh as conveniently may be, where they so guided and brought any ship or vessel to ruin as aforesaid, and thereon these accursed pilots are with ignominy and much shame to end their days; which said gibbets are to abide and remain to succeeding ages on that place, as a visible caution to other ships that shall afterwards sail thereby.

ART. XXVI.

If the lord of any place be so barbarous, as not only to permit such inhuman people, but also to maintain and assist them in such villainies, that he may have a share in such wrecks, the said lord shall be apprehended, and all his goods confiscated and sold, in order to make restitution to such as of right it appertaineth; and himself to be fastened to a post or stake in the midst of his own mansion house, which being fired at the four corners, all shall be burnt together, the walls thereof shall be demolished, the stones pulled down, and the place converted into a market place for the sale only of hogs and swine to all posterity.

Observation on the Two Foregoing Articles.

We shall find something very curious in the remarks made by the French author on these articles. These two laws, says he, were made upon account of that inhuman Droit de Bris sur le Naufrages, the right of lords of coasts to shipwrecks; by which those miserable wretches who were cast away, their very persons, and the goods that were saved, were confiscated for the prince who was lord of the coast. In the barbarous times men used to put this law in practice, especially the Gauls, who took all strangers for their enemies, and not only robbed them of their goods, but of their lives, sacrificing them to their false gods. From which bloody custom, Hercules brought them off according to Diodorus Siculus, lib. 5, Hist. cap. 2. Pomponius Mela, lib. 3, de Situ Orbis, cap. 2. The Romans, though they were covetous to excess, and greedy after other men's goods, never approved of this cruelty, but condemned and abrogated the use of it to the utmost of their power. Toto titulo de Incendio, Ruina & Naufragio. Et de Naufragiis libro undecimo Codicis, leg. 1, and leg. 3. But the empire degenerating in its decadency, when so many barbarous nations poured in upon it out of Scythia and Scandinavia, and tore it to pieces; this wicked Droit de Bris sur le Naufrages was renewed, particularly on the coasts of Gaul, called Littus Saxonicum, on account of the frequent invasions of the Saxons there. Sidonius Apollinaris, lib. 8, epist. 6, & carmine septimo. Afterwards the Normans being by chance thrown upon that coast, were immediately dispatched by the inhabitants; and in course of time this pretended right insinuated itself, and prevailed not only against enemies and invaders, but against any persons that were shipwrecked. Quid quid evadabat ex naufragiis totum sibi fiscus lege patriæ vindicabat, passosque naufragium miserabilibus violentia principis spoliabat quam procella, as says Hildebertus Turonensis, Archiepisc, epist. 32 & 65. At last the counts and dukes of Armoreck, Bretagne, and Gaul, were obliged by civility, and the request of the neighbouring people of Bordeaux and Rochelle, to change this barbarous custom of slavery and confiscation, into a tax for all such as procured licences from them; of which licences there were three sorts, Bref de Sauveté, Bref de Conduite, and Bref de Victualle. The first was to save them in case of shipwreck from the old forfeitures to the lord, and exempt them from the cruel Droit de Bris. The second was to allow them convoy upon reasonable terms. The third was for liberty to buy provisions in Bretagne. The dukes of Bretagne established an office and officers for giving out these licences, as at Rochelle and other places. The Droit de Bris was also practised in Guienne, Saintonge, Artois and Poictou, but much more civilly and humanely than it was used in Bretagne; for the lords of the coasts took only a third or a quarter part, according to their several customs; the salvors as much; and the rest was restored to the poor wretches that were shipwrecked, and their persons were free. This barbarity is abolished in England, Italy, Germany, Spain and France, unless it be practised against the enemies of the state, infidels or pirates; but the Spaniards observe this custom beyond the line against all but natural Spaniards. This Droit de Bris, which was not however so cruelly executed in Guienne, as in Bretagne, was solemnly abrogated by Henry III., king of England and duke of Aquitain and Guienne. His edict for this purpose is registered and preserved among the rolls at Bourdeaux, and is as follows:

"Henricus Dei gratia rex Angliæ, dominus Hiberniæ, dux Normandiæ, Aquitan. & comes Andegavensis. Archiepiscopis, episcopis, abbatibus, prioribus, comitibus, baronibus, justitiæ præpositis et magistris, et omnibus ballivis et fidelibus salutem: Sciatis quod nos pro salute animæ nostræ, et antecessorum et hæredum nostrorum, et ad malas consuetudines abolendas concedimus, et hac nostra carta confirmamus pro nobis et hæredibus nostris in perpetuum, quod quotiescunque contigerit de cetero aliquam navem periclitari in potestate nostra, sive in costera maris Angliæ, sive in costera Pictaviæ, sive in costera insulæ Oleronis, sive in costera Vasconniæ. Et de navi taliter periclitata aliquis homo vivus evaserit, et ad terram venerit, omnia bona et catalla in navi istæ contenta remaneant, et sint eorum quorum prius fuerant, et eis non deperant nomine Ejecti. Et si de navi taliter periclitata nullo vivo homine evadente contingat, qualemcunque bestiam vivam evadere, vel in navi illa vivam inveniri; tunc bona et catalla illa per manus ballivorum nostrorum, vel hæredum nostrorum, vel per manus ballivorum dominorum in quorum terra navis fuerit periclitata libenter quatuor probis hominibus custodienda deponantur usque ad terminum trium mensium: Ut si illi quorum catalla illa fuerunt intra terminum illum venerint ad exigenda catalla illa, et probare possint catalla illa sua esse, eis libenter restituant. Si vero infra prædictum terminum nullus venerit ad exigenda catalla sua, tunc nostra sint et hæredum nostrorum nomine Ejecti, vel alterius qui libertatem habet ejectionem habendi. Si veru de navi taliter periclitata nullus homo vivus evaserit, nec alia bestia sicut prædictum est, tunc bona et catalla in navi illa contenta nostra sint et hæredum nostrorum nomine Ejecti, vel alterius ubi navis fuit periclitata qui libertatem habet ejectionem habendi: Quod volumus, et firmiter præcipimus pro nobis et hæredibus nostris. His testibus, venerabili patri Edwardo Karkol, episcopo, Bertrando clerico comiti Lincol. et constabulario, Petro de Mulo-lacu, Henrico de Trubleville, tunc senescaldo Vasconniæ, Hugo de Dispencie, Godefrido Cran-tonibus, Amande Santo-Amando, Gulielmo de Crob. Anno 1226. Regni nostri vigesimo."

As to that part of these laws requiring traitorous pilots to be hanged on the shore, in some eminent place, to be a warning to all mariners: Andronicus, emperor of Greece, who reigned about the year 1150, ordered the same or the like punishment for such as made spoil of wrecks, as Nicetas reports in the second book of his Annals. The Lord Verulam in his History of Henry VII. writes, that it was heretofore the custom in England to leave the dead bodies of pirates on gibbets near the water side, for a warning to seafaring men. Morte affecti circa oras maritimas, ut loco signorum nauticorum & laternarum essent, & asseclas a littoribus Angliæ absterreere possent. The hanging such as are condemned for crimes committed at sea by the water side, and some of the most criminal in chains, has been practised since in this kingdom. Those malicious fishermen, who in the night make fires in dangerous places to attract mariners thither, to the loss of their ships by making them believe they are near ports and inhabited places, deserve the same punishment. The author whom we have made use of on this occasion tells us, that "catalla," a word in king Henry's charter, is originally Gascon, and signifies riches or merchandize. The Picards in their idiom have it "cateus," in Spanish it is "caudal," and in English "chattels," than which no term is more frequent in the common law. The word in the French which is rendered "caution" in English, is "belise," properly a beacon; but in this place it is used metaphorically: for a gibbet would be an odd sort of a beacon in our language. There are several sorts of these belises or beacons at sea, set up to direct mariners to the right course they ought to take to avoid danger. These are very necessary in those parts where there are bars, that is, entrances, where there must be a high tide to carry ships over them. Sometimes buoys are made use of for belises, and sometimes trees, light-houses, and other things. The burning the criminal's house, mentioned in these two articles, and all that is in it, shews what an opinion the legislator had of the heinousness of the crime. Coiners were in France burnt in old times, and their false money with them; their buildings were levelled with the ground, their woods felled and rooted up, and the places that belonged to them condemned and strewed with salt, as was the town of Poicters, in the reign of King Dagobert.

ART. XXVII.

A vessel being arrived at her port of discharge, and hauled up there into dry ground, so as the mariners deeming her to be in good safety, do take down her sails, and so fit the vessel aloof and aft, the master then ought to consider an increase of their wages kenning by kenning; and if in hoisting up wines, it happens that they leave open any of the pipes or other vessels, or that they fasten not the ropes well at the ends of the vessel, by reason whereof it slips, and falls, and so is lost, and falling on another, both are lost; in these cases the master and mariners shall be bound to make them good to the merchants, and the merchants must pay the freight of the said damaged or lost wines, because they are to receive for them from the master and mariners, according to the value that the rest of the wines are sold; and the owners of the ship ought not to suffer hereby, because the damage happened by default of the master and mariners, in not making fast the said vessels or pipes of wine.

Observation.

Kenning by kenning, veue par veue, is a phrase used by mariners, as is also course by course, in the nineteenth article of these laws. These phrases are very ancient, and kenning was particularly used when navigation was performed by views, and by observations on the land from one prospect to another (Plin. lib. vi, c. 13), which was before the invention or knowledge of the use of the compass. It signifies what the logicians or metaphysicians called agreement; the arithmeticians and geometricians proportion, and others express otherwise.

ART. XXVIII.

If two vessels go on a fishing-design in partnership, as for mackarel, herrings, or the like, and do set their nets or lay their lines at Olonne, St. Gilles, Survie, or elsewhere; the one of the vessels ought to employ as many fishing engines as the other, and so shall go in equal shares, as to the gain, according to the agreement betwixt them made. And if it happens that one of the said vessels, with her fishing-instruments, engines and crew, perish, and the other escaping, arrives in safety; if the surviving friends of those that perished, require of the other to have their part of the gain, as also of their fish, fishing-instruments, and boat, they are to have, upon the oaths of those that escape, their part of the fish, and fishing-instruments; but they shall not have any part or share in the vessel itself.

ART. XXIX.

If any ship or other vessel sailing to and fro, and coasting the seas, as well in the way of merchandizing, as upon the fishing account, happen by some misfortune through the violence of the weather to strike herself against the rocks, whereby she becomes so bruised and broken, that there she perishes, upon what coasts, country or dominion soever; and the master, mariners, merchant or merchants, or any one of these escape and come safe to land; in this case the lord of that place or country, where such misfortune shall happen, ought not to let, hinder, or oppose such as have so escaped, or such to whom the said ship or vessel, and the lading belong, in using their utmost endeavours for the preservation of as much thereof as may possibly be saved. But on the contrary, the lord of that place or country, by his own interest, and by those under his power and jurisdiction, ought to be aiding and assisting to the said distressed merchants or mariners, in saving their shipwrecked goods, and that without the least embezzlement, or taking any part thereof from the right owners; but, however, there may be a remuneration or consideration for salvage to such as take pains therein, according to right reason, a good conscience, and as justice shall appoint; notwithstanding what promises may in that case have been made to the salvors by such distressed merchants and mariners, as is declared in the fourth article of these laws; and in case any shall act contrary hereunto, or take any part of the said goods from the said poor, distressed, ruined, undone, shipwrecked persons, against their wills, and without their consent, they shall be declared to be excommunicated by the church, and ought to receive the punishment of thieves; except speedy restitution be made by them: nor is there any custom or statute whatsoever, that can protect them against the aforesaid penalties, as is said in the twenty-sixth article of these laws.

Observations on the Two Foregoing Articles.

The civil law almost every where allows all shipwrecked persons, a right to gather up their shipwrecked goods. The Codex and the Rhodian Laws are particular in this matter. King Henry III.'s charter, before recited, is very plain upon it; and the reader is referred to it.

ART. XXX.

If a ship or other vessel entering into harbour, happens by misfortune to be broken and perish, and the master, mariners and merchants, which were on board her, be all drowned; and if the goods thereof be driven ashore, or remain floating on the sea, without being sought after by those to whom they belong, they being ignorant of this said disaster, and knowing nothing thereof; in this most lamentable case, the lord of that place or country ought to send persons to save the said goods, which he ought to secure and to put into safe custody; and give the relations of the deceased persons who were drowned, notice of it, and to satisfy for the salvage thereof, not out of his own purse, but of the goods saved, according to the hazards run, and the pains taken therein; and what remains must be kept in safe custody for one year or more; and if in that time they to whom the said goods appertain, do not appear and claim the same, and the said year be fully expired, he may publicly sell and dispose thereof to such as will give most, and with the monies proceeding of the sale thereof, he ought to give among the poor, and for portions to poor maids, and other charitable uses, according to reason and good conscience. But if he assumes the said goods either in whole or in part unto himself, he shall incur the curse and malediction of our mother the holy church, with the aforesaid pains and penalties, without ever obtaining remission, unless he make satisfaction.

Observation.

The keeping such goods a year, is in the civil law (l. ii, Cod. Naufragiis); but the parliament of Paris in the year 1584, pretended to reduce the time to two months: which time was to commence from the day of proclaiming such goods in public market and fixing a placquard of it on the doors of the parish church. The Consulate provides for the salvors more largely, allowing them half of the goods saved, and the lord and the poor the other half (chapter 252). By some laws in France, as long as the goods are in being and unalienated, the merchant to whom they belong, has a claim to them, paying the charge of salvage: but if after a lawful time, they are sold and become another's property, he has no claim to them. The casuists are of opinion, that if he who finds them is rich, he ought to give all to pious uses: if poor, to keep all himself, hostiensis in summa de pœnitentia. And the thirty-sixth article of the laws of Oleron agrees with the judgment of the casuists

ART. XXXI.

If a ship or other vessel happens to be lost by striking on some shore, and the mariners thinking to save their lives, reach the shore, in hope of help, and instead thereof it happens, as it often does, that in many places they meet with people more barbarous, cruel, and inhuman than mad dogs, who to gain their monies, apparel, and other goods, do sometimes murder and destroy these poor distressed seamen; in this case, the lord of that country ought to execute justice on such wretches, to punish them as well corporally as pecuniarily, to plunge them in the sea till they be half dead, and then to have them drawn forth out of the sea, and stoned to death.

Observation.

To plunge them in the sea, "plonger en la mer," is what the French now call "bailler la cale," and we "keel-hawling." The word "Καλαποντισμός," in Greek, signifies as much. The Goths heretofore used to practise it as a sport or exercise, Olaus magnus historiæ Septentrionalis, lib. v, et lib. x, c. 16. And one may conceive an idea of the barbarity of the northern nations, when that was a diversion to them, which was a punishment to others; as it was of old among the Celtes and Franks, and is now among the modern navigators. Lazy and scandalous persons had some such sort of punishment by the customs or laws of the old Germans, Tacitus de Moribus Germanorum, Num. 5. Turnus Herdonius was punished thus to death for abusing and railing at the king Tarquinius Superbus, T. Livius, lib. primo decadis primæ. Bawds and whores are served so at Bordeaux; and scolds something like it in England, when they are put into the ducking stool. By an old ordinance of Philip II, of France, blasphemers had the same punishment. The comparison of a mad dog is perhaps made use of here, on account of the cure for his bite, by plunging in the sea before the poison has taken too deep root, which is reckoned the most sovereign remedy for it. Augustine de Moribus Manicheor, lib. ii, cap. 8. Apuleius Metamorphos, lib. 9. It is said Baldus the great civilian, died miserably of the bite of his favorite dog, though the bite was very inconsiderable, as to any thing but the effects of it; see the twenty-first book of Ambrose Parre's Treatise of Poisons; and Diogenes the cynic, according to Laertius, died the same death. My author has tempted me unawares to this digression, which he very ridiculously continues about a hundred times as long; for in truth it may well be called a digression, at least, all that is not necessary to explain the metaphor in the text, and much farther we have not gone.

ART. XXXII.

If by reason of tempestuous weather, it be thought expedient, for the lightening of any ship or vessel at sea, or riding at anchor in any road, to cast part of the lading overboard, and it be done accordingly for the common safety, though the said goods so ejected, and cast overboard, do become his that can first possess himself thereof, and carry them away: nevertheless, it is here to be further understood, that this holds true only in such cases, as when the master, merchant, and mariners have so ejected or cast out the said goods, as that they give over all hope or desire of ever recovering them again, and so leave them as things utterly lost and given over by them, without ever making any enquiry or pursuit after them: in which case only the first occupant becomes the lawful proprietor thereof.

Observation.

The property of things thrown overboard remains in the merchant, and the finder has no right to them, unless they were thrown out with an intention to leave them there, and look no more after them (l. 2, in fine, l. qui levandæ D. Lege Rhodia, l. quod ex naufragio). D. de acquirenda vel amittenda possessione. Neptunus fastidiosus ædilis est. Siquæ sunt improbabæ merces jactat omnes; as Plautus says in Stichor. The sea drives all things to land: mari hæc est natura, ut omne immundum, stercoreumq; littoribus impingat, Seneca naturalium quæst. lib. iii, cap. 26. On this assurance, every one that flings his goods overboard in time of danger, hopes and desires to recover them again after seeking for them, and those things non sunt in derelicto, sed in deperdito. l. Si quis merces. D. pro derelicto. It is true, what is abandoned through contempt or carelessness belongs to the first occupiers; quod dominus ea mente adject, ut in numerum rerum suarum esse nolit, qui primus occupaverit statim dominus sit Jure Naturali, Instit. de Rerum divisione 5, qua ratione: & Lege l. D. pro derelicto.

ART. XXXIII.

If a ship, or any other vessel, hath cast overboard several goods or merchandizes, which are in chests well locked and made fast; or books well clasped and shut close, that they may not be damaged by salt water; in such cases it is to be presumed, that they who did cast such goods overboard, do still retain an intention, hope, and desire of recovering the same: for which reason, such as shall happen to find such things, are obliged to make restitution thereof to him who shall make a due enquiry after them; or put them to pious uses, according to his conscience and the advice of some prudent neighbour.

Observation.

Well clasped; this is conformable to the gloss on the Rhodian law. D. Lege Rhodia.

ART. XXXIV.

If any man happens to find any thing in the sea, or in the sand on the shore, in floods or in rivers, if it be precious stones, fishes, or any treasure of the sea, which never belonged to any man in point of property, it belongs to the first finder.

ART. XXXV.

If any searches the sea-coasts to fish, or find gold or silver, and he finds it, he ought to restore it all without any diminution.

ART. XXXVI.

If any going along the sea-shore to fish, or otherwise, happens to find gold or silver, he shall be bound to make restitution thereof, deducting for his own pains; or if he be poor he may keep it to himself; that is, if he knows not to whom to restore it; yet he shall give notice of the place where he found it, to the neighbourhood and parts next adjacent, and advise with his superiors, who ought to weigh and take into consideration the poverty of the finder, and then to give him such advice as is consonant to good conscience.

Observations on the Three Preceding Articles.

There are three sorts of goods which the sea naturally drives to land: as entire wrecks; for which the cruel droit de bris was in old times established by pernicious and barbarous custom: but humanity, licenses and passports have abolished it in ours. The second is, what is flung overboard for the preservation of men's lives, the ship and cargo. Neither of these, by law, nor the custom of the sea, change their proprietors, but may be claimed and recovered by them, within the lawful time appointed by ordinances and customs to claim them, even while the goods are in being and unsold, as appears by what has been said in and upon the 30th article. The third sort comprehends the two first, which are not owned and demanded by the proprietor, and besides that, includes all the treasures of the sea which come out of its bowels, and it naturally drives ashore; as aromatic amber on the coast of Guienne, amber succinum in the German ocean, red, black, and white coral on the coast of Barbary, precious stones, fish-shells, and other riches which the sea produces, and which in the thirty-fourth article of these laws are called "herpes marines," in English, "treasures of the sea"; for it cannot be otherwise so fully expressed. The word "herpes" was taken from an old Gaulish term "harpir," which signifies to take, and its contrary "voerpir," is to leave: perhaps, says my author, taken from the Greek word "ἄρπαζω," aurum mihi intus harpagatum est, Plautus in Aulularia; that is, the property of such things is in the finder, or the person who first takes them from off the ground. Vocari autem elecirum harpaga, eo quod attritu digitorum accepta anima folia paleasque vestium fimbrias rapiat. Isidorus, orig. lib. xvi, cap. 8. Nor is he who first lays his hand on them, obliged to give those that are there with him a share of what he has found, unless he pleases to do it out of courtesy, l. si is qui ultimo. D. acquirendo rerum Dominio. Robustus de Privilegiis Scholasticorum, num. 61, notwithstanding the constitution of the Emperor Leo, which is contrary to it. This is the law of nature, but princes and lords of the coast have usurped this privilege, and laid claim to all the treasures of the sea, that it throws on their royalties. The lords of the coasts, that is, of the manors or lands on the coasts of France, were notorious usurpers in this, till the reign of Louis XIII., when Cardinal Richelieu, by an order of the council bearing date the 13th of December, 1629, took away the pretended rights of several lords, or very much abridged them; but he did not restore the law of nature in this case; he only enlarged his own and his successor's privileges and authority, he being great master and superintendant general of the navigation and commerce of France. This order of council caused great disorders, and the Count de Oleron was particularly so enraged at it that his officers by main force drove away those of the admiralty, who came upon his royalty. But the French kings were now masters of their subjects' lives and fortunes, and it would have been in vain for many such counts to have disputed the king's edict with these words in it, "Car tel est notre plaisir"; the standing reason of the French laws at this time.

ART. XXXVII.

Touching great fishes that are taken or found dead on the sea shore, regard must be had to the custom of that country where such great fishes are taken or found. For by the custom, the lord of that country ought to have his share, and with good reason, since the subject owes obedience and tribute to his sovereign.

Observation.

This law declares, that by the ancient customs of countries, as well sovereigns as all particular lords of royalties to whom duties and tribute were due, had both heretofore certain rights to the espaves de mer, strays of the sea. The Coustoumier de Normandie under the article of Varech, specifies what belongs to the one, and what belongs to the other, and particularly that whales and other oil fish, belong to the particular lord of the royalty where they were found, that is, off whose land they were taken: on the shore—in the original it is—a la rive de la mer; and how far that is to be understood to belong to the lord of that royalty, may be found in the above mentioned coustoumier: where the Varech understands as far as a man on horseback can reach with his lance; for if the fish is found farther off the shore, the lord has no right to it, though it be brought or driven a-shore afterwards.

ART. XXXVIII.

The lord ought to have his share of oil fish, and of no other, according to the laudable custom of the country where they are found; and he that finds them is no farther obliged than to save them, by bringing them without the reach of the sea, and presently to makè it known to the said lord of the place, that he may come and demand what is his right.

Observation.

The Coustoumier de Normandie mentions two sorts of fish, the royal fish, which are the dolphin, the sturgeon, the salmon, the turbot, the sea-dragon, the sea-barbel, and in general all fish fit for a king's table: and oil fish, as whales, porpoises, sea-calves, and the like, of which oil may be made: all other fish are the property of those that take them in the sea, near the shore or afar off. The duke of Espernon, which is the capital of a little territory called de Buch, had a right to the eighth penny of all the fish sold in the market at Bordeaux, that were taken within his precinct of de Buch, the fishermen having been heretofore vassals to the Lords de Buch. And further, whatever part of the province of Guienne the duke was in, those fishermen were on all fast days bound to supply his table with fish for himself and his family; but then the duke must pay a reasonable price for them, and allow them something for their trouble: this right is called "bian," and is still, or was thirty years ago, in being.

ART. XXXIX.

If the lord of the place pleases, and if it be the custom of the country where the fish is found, he may cause the same to be brought by him that found it, to the public and open market place, but no where else; and there-the said fish shall be appraised by the said lord, or his deputy according to custom. And the price being set, the other party that made not the price, shall have his choice, either to take or leave it at that price; and if either of them, whether per fas or nefas be an occasion of loss or damage to the other, though but to the value of a denier, he shall be obliged to make him restitution.

ART. XL.

If the costs and charges of carrying the said fish to the said market place would amount to a greater sum than the fish itself may be worth, then the said lord shall be bound to take his share at the place where such fish was found.

ART. XLI.

The said lord ought likewise to pay his part of the aforesaid costs and charges, because he ought not by another's damage to enrich himself.

ART. XLII.

If by some chance or misfortune the said fish happens to be stolen away, or otherwise lost from the place where it was found, after or before the said lord has visited it; in this case he that first found it shall not any ways be obliged to make it good. Casus fortuiti in quibus est aggressura latronum a nemine præstantur l. quæ fortuitis. C. pignoratitia actione.

ART. XLIII.

In all other things found by the sea side, which have formerly been in the possession of some one or other, as wines, oil, and other merchandize, although they have been cast overboard, and left by the merchants, and so ought to appertain to him that first finds the same; yet herein also the custom of the country is to be observed as well as in the case of fish. But if there be a presumption that these were the goods of some ship that perished, then neither the said lord, nor finder thereof, shall take any, to convert any part of it to their own use; but as has been said, distribute the money it produces amongst the poor and needy.

ART. XLIV.

If any ship or other vessel at sea, happens to find an oil fish, it shall be wholly theirs that found it, in case no due pursuit be made after it; and no lord of any place ought to demand any part thereof, though they bring it to his ground.

Observations on the Preceding Articles.

The French author pretends, that by the forty-fourth article of these laws, which he says answers to the thirty-seventh, the kings of England, who were also dukes of Guienne, acknowledged that the sea is no man's particular property; but that, as well as the air, it is common to all, Instit. de Rerum Divisione, § 1, l. injuriarum, § si quis me prohibeat. D Injuriis; which, says he, contradicts what the learned Selden writes in his treatise De Dominio Maris, composed by him for the kings of England, whom he supposed to be kings of the sea, exclusive of all other kings and sovereigns; and unless the opposers of Selden can find out some better arguments than hitherto they have alleged, the kings of England will always believe the dominion of the sea is annexed to their crown. Under this article the author makes a long digression on the whale fishery on the coasts of Guienne, which might in former times be very famous, but now is very inconsiderable. After a description of whales, not at all pertinent in our sea laws, he tells us, when those animals used to come on these coasts; and because there is something historical in the relation, we shall give the reader a short abstract of it. The whales used to pass by the coasts of Guienne, near the ruins of the old castle of Ferragers, about a league from Bayonne, from the autumnal equinox till the winter was almost over. The fishermen had then some of their band always out upon the watch night and day, in huts built on purpose by the sea-side, having their boats and fishing tackle ready. When these centinels discovered a whale, which they knew by the noise he makes in breathing, and the exhalation that rises from it like smoke, they gave notice, by a token they had for that purpose, to their fellows, who immediately ran to them, and leaping into their boats put off to sea, rowing up to the animal, to whom they approached very near, and attacked him in the head, that the wounds they gave him might be the more mortal; besides they were afraid of being struck by it, which was commonly mortal to them: when they had killed him, they towed him ashore and extracted the oil. The fishermen were for the most part Biscainers, who were very bold and dexterous in this dangerous fishery: but what my author says on this subject will surprize the reader. The great gains the inhabitants of Cape Bezton near Bayonne, and the Biscainers of Guienne, found in the whale fishery, and the ease with which they did it, tempted them to run any hazards to come at whales. They ventured into the ocean, and set out ships to seek after the common abode of these monsters: inso-much, that following their route, they discovered the great and little banks of cod-fish, the island of Newfoundland, and Canada or New France, where the sea abounds in whales, one hundred years before Christopher Columbus's navigation; and if the Spaniards have been so unjust, as to rob the French of the glory of having first discovered the great Atlantic isle called the West Indies, they should confess with Cornelius Vuytler and Anthony Magin, Flemish cosmographers, F. Antonio St. Roman, Monge de St. Benico, del Historia General de la India, lib. i, cap. ii, p. 8, that the pilot who carried the first news to Christopher Columbus, and gave him any knowledge of the New World, was one of the French Newfoundland Biscainers. But all this is so contrary to every other history, that there is no credit to be given to it. Indeed it would have been very extraordinary, if there should have been any honour pretended to by any nation, and the French had not put in a claim to it. In the year 1627, some Biscainers, assisted by the merchants of Bordeaux, fitted out a ship for the whale fishery towards the frozen sea of Greenland, to the north of Ireland and Scotland, and at Spitzberg: where they at last found the common station of the whales during a six months stay which they made there. But now we come to what he is pleased to say of the English.

The English, who had not the address or industry for this fishery being advised of it, grew jealous. They hastened thither and did all they could to molest them in their work, and hinder their landing, which they did every year. At last they positively forbad them to land in Greenland, to melt their whales' fat into oil. The Biscainers complained to Lewis XIII, and Cardinal Richelieu; but there were so many things of more importance then negotiating between the crowns of France and England, that they could not obtain any article in their favour, nor truce for their fishery. Afterwards they fished in the open sea, caught whales where they could, and with much trouble brought the fat home, where they melted it into oil. The company of north Holland, tempted some of these Biscainers to shew their fishermen the art of whale-fishing, and after they were become expert in it, they also forbade them to fish on the coast of Greenland, and then this fishery was lost to them. There is an air of fiction in this history:—By what authority could the English forbid the Biscainers to land in Greenland; does that country belong to the crown of England? But it is not a little the French will go out of their way to carry any point they drive at.

ART. XLV.

If a vessel by stress of weather be constrained to cut her cables or ropes by the end, and so to quit and leave behind her both cables and anchors and put to sea at the mercy of the wind and weather; in this case the said cables and anchors ought not to be lost to the said vessel, if there were any buoy at them; and such as fish for them, shall be bound to restore them, if they know to whom they belong; but they ought to be paid for their pains, according to justice. And if they know not to whom to restore them, the lords of the place shall have their shares, as well as the salvors; but for preventing further inconveniences, every master of a ship shall cause to be engraven, or set upon the buoys thereof, his own name, or the name of his ship, or of the port or haven to which she belongs: and such as detain them from him shall be reputed thieves and robbers.

ART. XLVI.

If any ship, or other vessel, by any casualty or misfortune happens to be wrecked and perish, in that case, the pieces of the hulk of the vessel, as well as the lading thereof, ought to be reserved and kept in safety for them to whom it belonged before such disaster happened, notwithstanding any custom to the contrary. And all takers, partakers, or consenters of, or to the said wreck, if they be bishops, prelates or clerks, they shall be deposed and deprived of their benefices respectively; and if they be laymen they shall incur the penalties aforesaid. De his autem quos diripuisse probatum sit, præsidet ut de latronibus, gravem sententiam dicere convenit. I. ne quid. I. quo Naufrag. D. Incendio, ruina, & naufragio. I. navigia, C. furtis. The penalties aforesaid are in the 25th, 26th, and 29th articles.

ART. XLVII.

This is to be understood only when the said ship or vessel so wrecked, did not exercise the trade of pillaging, and when the mariners thereof were not pirates, sea-rovers, or enemies to our holy Catholic faith; but if they are found to be either the one or the other, every man may then deal with such as with rogues, and despoil them of their goods without any punishment for so doing.

Observations on the Three Foregoing Articles.

Every one has a Droit de Bris against pirates. Piratæ communes generis humani hostes sunt, quos idcirco omnibus rationibus persequi incumbit, says the lord Verulam, de Bello Sacro, p. 346. For which reason, according to the civilians, Sunt ipso jure dissidiati, cum quibus publice bellum habemus. Strachia in tertia parte de nautis; and again it is cruelty to have any mercy towards pirates, Solum pietatis genus est in hac re esse crudelium. There is no right of action amongst them, and they have none to bring against one who attacks them or robs them. Quia in omnium furum persona constitutum est, ne ejus rei nomine furti agere possint, cujus ipsi fures sunt, lege cum qui § quarto, lege qui re sibi § primo. lege qui res. § si ego. De Furtis, &c. They have no action among themselves. Comuni dividundo lege. communi § inter Prædiones. D. communi dividundo. On the contrary, for one pirate to take from another is very lawful, and will bear no action. Lege sed ipsi Nautæ, &c.

The test of these laws in this copy, is,

Witness the seal of the isle of Oleron, established for all contracts in the said isle, the Tuesday after the feast of St. Andrew, in the year one thousand two hundred and sixty-six.

This date of 1266, is too modern, and does not agree with the time when this piece was put forth, as the learned and curious Selden, libro secundo, capite 24. De Dominio Maris, very well observes: so that it is thought that this date of the time of the delivery of the copy, from whence the edition printed at Rouen was taken, and the test the seal established for contracts in the isle of Oleron, denotes, that it was a copy taken out by a notary from the original.

THE LAWS OF WISBUY.

[Reprinted from 1 Pet. Aöm. Append. lxvii.]

Wisbuy was the ancient capital of Gothland, an island in the Baltic sea. It formerly belonged to Sweden, but was afterwards annexed to Denmark, to whose crown it still continues an appendage. In Gothland there are several fine ports, the access to which is easy and safe. It is rich in cattle, of which it affords immense numbers, and abounds in venison, fish, forests of fine timber for building ships, naval stores, and excellent marble. In the north-west part of the island Wisbuy was situated, a fair and noble sea-port, built by foreigners, and whose first settlement in the country was opposed by the Gothlanders, but who successfully resisted them, and, in the year one thousand two hundred and eighty-eight, obtained an important victory over them; after which the citizens, to defend themselves against their enemies, obtained a permission from Magnus king of Sweden, to wall their city, and erect bastions and other fortifications. They flourished more and more, and grew great by their trade and navigation, to which they entirely gave themselves up; insomuch, that this town was a long time the most celebrated market of Europe; there being no city so full of merchants, and so famous for its commerce. Either came Swedes, Russians, Danes, Prussians, Livonians, Germans, Finlanders, Vandals, Flemings, Saxons, English, Scots and French to trade. Each nation had their quarter, and particular streets for their shops or warehouses. All strangers were safe and welcome there, and enjoyed the same privileges as the townsmen themselves. The magistrates of this city had the jurisdiction, or rather the arbitrement of all causes or suits relating to sea affairs. Their ordinances were submitted to in all such cases, and passed for just on all the coasts of Europe from Muscovy to the Mediterranean. In this account we are supported by Olaus Magnus, lib. x, cap. 16, and Baron Herbestain in Rerum Muscovitarum Commentario, p. 118. In the course of time, this town was entirely destroyed, except the citadel, which stands to this day. The Gothic historians do not tell us when, nor how its destruction came upon it, only that it was through civil dissensions which arose from trifles, but occasioned great factions; which set them so against one another, that it ended in the entire ruin of them all, city and citizens. The ruins of it are now to be seen, and under them are often found tables of marble, porphyry and jasper; evidences of the ancient splendor and magnificence of the citizens. The houses were covered with copper, the windows gilt with gold, and all that is said or that is discovered of it, shews the inestimable riches of the former inhabitants. The citizens who survived the ruin of the city, retired to the country of the Vandals and eastern Saxons, who were enriched with their wealth. Albert, king of Sweden, rebuilt the city, and granted great privileges to all that should come and inhabit it; but it never could recover its trade and former magnificence.

It was in this city of Wisbuy that the sea laws and ordinances which the Swedes brought into credit, were composed; they were received as righteous and just, and are kept in the Teutonic language till now. The Germans, Swedes, Danes, Flemings, and all the people of the north observe them; but none have been so curious as to preserve the date and the remembrance of the time when they were composed and published.

Northern writers have contended that the laws of Wisbuy are more ancient than the Roll d'Oleron, and have even asserted the Consolato del Mare to have been composed subsequent to them. These claims are opposed with some irritation by Cleirac, who denies their having been promulgated prior to the year 1266. In this opinion he is supported by many historical facts. But at whatever period they may have been composed, these laws have been for ages, and still remain, in great authority in northern Europe. Lex Rhodia navalis, pro jure gentium in illi mari Mediterraneo vigeat, sicut apud Galliam leges Oleronis, apud omnis transcribannos, leges Wisbuensis. Grotius de Jur. Bel. lib. ii, c. 3.

ARTICLE I.

Whatever mariner, whether pilot, mate, or sailor, binds or hires himself to a master, if he afterwards leaves him, he shall refund what wages he has received; and besides that, pay half as much as the master had promised him for the whole voyage. And if a mariner has hired himself to two several masters, the first that hired him may claim him, and force him to serve him. Nevertheless he shall not be obliged to pay him any wages at all for the whole voyage, unless he does it of his own good will.

ART. II.

Every pilot, mate or mariner that does not understand his business, shall be obliged to repay to the master whatever wages he had advanced him, and be besides bound to pay half as much more as he had promised him.

ART. III.

A master may turn off a mariner without any lawful cause given, before he sets sail, paying him half what he had promised him for the voyage. After he has set sail, and is gone out of his port, that master who turns off a mariner without lawful cause given, is obliged to pay him all his wages as much as if he had performed the voyage.¹

ART. IV.

² No mariner shall lie or stay a night ashore without the master's leave, on pain of forfeiting two deniers, nor shall he unmoor the ship's boat in the night, under the same penalty.³

ART. V.

The mariners shall have three deniers a last for loading, and three for unloading, which is to be reckoned only as their wages for guindage or hoisting.⁴

ART. VI.

It is not lawful to arrest or imprison the master, pilot or mariners of a ship in an action of debt, when they are ready to sail; but the creditor may seize and sell any thing he finds in the ship that belongs to his debtor, l. i, de Naviculariis, lib. iv, cod.⁵

ART. VII.

A ship being freighted for all the summer, the season shall end on the feast of St. Martin, or the eleventh of November.

ART. VIII.

Whoever shall make use of another man's lighter, without his leave, shall pay the owner four sols a day, unless it was in a case of necessity, as of fire or the like.

ART. IX.

If any one has occasion to have a debt witnessed, he need not carry strangers aboard; but may make use of the people in the ship. The same he may do in all acts where witnesses are necessary, lib. x. cod.

ART. X.

It is not lawful to sell or mortgage a vessel let out to freight; but it is lawful to freight it or underlet it to others for the same time, and the same voyage.⁶

¹ Laws of Oleron, arts. 12, 13, 20.

² Laws of Oleron, art. 5.

³ By deniers here are understood, those of which twenty-four make an ounce of silver. The double deniers are now called carolus's or grand blancs, by the French and other nations.

⁴ These duties are never fixed on account of the dearness of provisions, and the value of money, which changes and increases daily. The rate of *guindage or reguindage, is commonly in France five sols a last. Which is two sols six deniers tournois a tun.

⁵ Ord. Louis XIV. Mariners and Ships, tit. 1, art. 14.

⁶ The words of this article are, "de le fretter ou sous-louer à d'autres pour le même temps, et pour même voyage": which we think we have rendered right, notwithstanding the difficulty there seems to be in the sense, or the equity of this law.

* Hoisting up and down, or loading and unloading.

ART. XI.

If a ship that was freighted for a voyage is sent upon another longer than that, or upon several voyages; if there is no protestation or dissent entered against it, the freighter shall pay but half the damages that may happen to the ship in such longer voyage or voyages.

ART. XII.

If a mast, sail or any other tackling is unfortunately lost when the ship is under sail, or otherwise, the loss shall not be brought into an average. But if the master is obliged to cut his mast by the board, or spoil any of his tackling for the preservation of the ship, the bottom and the cargo shall make good the damage by an average.⁷

ART. XIII.

The master shall not sell the ship, nor any part of her tackling, without the consent of the owners; but if he wants victuals he may pawn his cables and cordage: always observing to have the advice of the mariners.⁸

ART. XIV.

The master being in port, ought not to depart and set sail without the advice and consent of the major part of the mariners; if he does, and there happens any loss, he is bound to make satisfaction.⁹

ART. XV.

The mariners are obliged to the utmost of their power to save and preserve the merchandize, and for doing it, ought to be paid their wages, but not otherwise. It is not lawful for the master to sell the ship's cordage, without the consent of the owners or factors: but he is bound to preserve all, as much as in him lies, on pain of making satisfaction.¹⁰

ART. XVI.

The mariners are obliged to save as much as they can, and the merchants may take away their goods, paying the freight or satisfying the master; otherwise the said master may fit out his ship if he can do it in a little time, in order to accomplish his voyage; if he cannot do it he may relade the merchandize upon other vessels, bound for the port to which he was to carry them, paying freight for them.

ART. XVII.

The mariners shall not go out of the ship without leave of the master, on pain of paying the damage that may happen in their absence, unless it is when the ship lies ashore moored with four cables. In such

⁷ Laws of Oleron, art. 9.

⁸ See art. 10; and Laws of Oleron, art. 1.

⁹ Laws of Oleron, art. 2.

¹⁰ Laws of Oleron, art. 3.

case they may go out of her for a little time, taking care not to transgress in it.¹¹

ART. XVIII.

A mariner being ashore in the master's or the ship's service, if he should happen to be wounded, he shall be maintained and cured at the charge of the ship: but if he goes ashore on his own head to be merry, and divert himself, or otherwise, and happens to be wounded, the master may turn him off; and the mariner shall be obliged to refund what he has received, and besides to pay what the master shall be forced to pay over and above to another whom he shall hire in his place.¹²

ART. XIX.

If a seaman falls ill of any disease, and it is convenient to put him ashore, he shall be fed as he was aboard, and have somebody to look after him there; and when he is recovered, be paid his wages; and if he dies, his wages shall be paid to his widow or heirs.¹³

ART. XX.

If by stress of weather it is thought necessary to throw any goods overboard to lighten the ship; and the supercargoes or merchants aboard, will not consent to it, the merchandize shall nevertheless be thrown overboard, if the rest of the people aboard think it safest to do so. In such case as soon as the ship puts into port, a third part of the mariners must go ashore, and purge themselves by oath, that they were forced to do it for the preservation of their own lives, the ship, and the rest of the cargo. The merchandize so thrown overboard, shall be brought into a gross average, and be rated at the same price the other merchandize of the same sort, that was saved, was sold for.¹⁴

ART. XXI.

Before the master throws any goods overboard, he is bound, in the absence of the merchant, to ask the pilot and mariners' advice, and the loss shall be made good by contribution: the ship and cargo being accountable towards it.¹⁵

ART. XXII.

The master and mariners are obliged to shew the merchant the cordage that is used for hoisting his goods in and out of the ship; if he does not do it, and there happens any accident, they shall stand to the loss; but if the merchant has seen and approved of it, the damage he sustains shall be borne by himself.¹⁶

ART. XXIII.

If a ship is ill trimed, and it happens that the wine she has aboard is lost through the master's ignorance or negligence in governing her, the said master is bound to pay for it; but if the mariners clear him upon oath, the leakage or loss shall be borne by the merchant.¹⁷

ART. XXIV.

No man shall fight, or give another the lie aboard. He who offends in this kind shall pay four deniers; and if the mariner gives the master the lie, he shall pay eight deniers: but he who strikes him shall pay 100 sols, or lose his hand.¹⁸ If the master gives the lie he shall pay eight deniers; if he strikes he ought to receive blow for blow.¹⁹

ART. XXV.

The master may turn off a mariner for a lawful cause; but if the said mariner compensates for his fault, and the master nevertheless refuses to admit him again: the mariner may follow the ship to her destined port, and he shall be paid his wages, as much as if he had made the voyage in the same ship. If the master hires a less able seaman in his place, and there happens any damage by it, the master is to make good the loss.²⁰

ART. XXVI.

If a ship riding at anchor in a harbour, is struck by another ship which runs against her, driven by the wind or current, and the ship so struck receives damage, either in her hulk or cargo, the two ships shall jointly stand to the loss; but if the ship that struck against the other might have avoided it, if it was done by the master on purpose, or by his fault, he alone shall make satisfaction. The reason is, that some masters who have old crazy ships, may willingly lie in other ships' way, that they may be damnified or sunk, and so have more than they were worth for them. On which account this law provides, that the damage shall be divided, and paid equally by the two ships, to oblige both to take care, and keep clear of such accidents as much as they can.²¹

¹⁶ Laws of Oleron, art. 10.

¹⁷ Laws of Oleron, art. 11.

¹⁸ Per dignitatem injuriam preferentis, crescit culpa facientis. Salvianus lib. sexto, de gubernatione Dei. Lose his hand. This was a common punishment among the Scythians and the people of the north. Lucianus de Toxari. And also among those in the east. Harmonopolus de Poenis.

¹⁹ Laws of Oleron, art. 6.

²⁰ Laws of Oleron, art. 13.

²¹ Laws of Oleron, arts. 14, 15.

¹¹ Laws of Oleron, art. 5.

¹² Laws of Oleron, art. 6.

¹³ Laws of Oleron, art. 7.

¹⁴ Laws of Oleron, art. 8.

¹⁵ Id.

ART. XXVII.

A ship being at anchor in a harbour where there is so little water that she touches; another ship comes and anchors near her; if the ship's company of the former vessel require those of the latter to take up their anchor, because it is too near them, and they do not do it, the former may take it up themselves; and if the latter hinders them, they shall make satisfaction for all the damage that may happen by that anchor.²¹

ART. XXVIII.

No master of a ship shall lie at anchor in a haven without fastening a buoy to his anchor, to give notice to others where it is. If he omits to do so, and any damage is sustained by it, he is obliged to make it good.

ART. XXIX.

In all voyages where wine is the trade, the master is obliged to find the seamen with it, and then he may give them but one meal a day; but where it is not to be had, and the mariners drink water, he shall give them two meals a day.²²

ART. XXX.

When a ship is let out to freight, the master ought to assign and shew the seamen where they are to have the stowage that belongs to them; and they must declare whether they will load it themselves, or will let the master freight it with the rest of the ship, and be paid for their proportion.²³

ART. XXXI.

A ship being arrived at her destined port, those seamen who would be paid their wages there, if they have no chest nor bedding, or other movables aboard, equivalent to their wages, they must give the master security that they will serve out the rest of the voyage, and see it completed, or he may refuse to pay them before.²⁴

ART. XXXII.

Those seamen who bargained for a certain proportion of the ship's freight, instead of wages in money, in case freight is not to be had for her when she arrives at the port for which she was bound, and she must go further in quest of it, they must go with her: but those seamen who agreed to be paid in money, shall have their wages there.²⁵

ART. XXXIII.

When a ship is safe at anchor, the seamen may go ashore one after another, or ²² Laws of Oleron, art. 17.

²³ Laws of Oleron, art. 16.

²⁴ Laws of Oleron, art. 18.

²⁵ Laws of Oleron, art. 19.

two together, and carry sufficient meat and bread with them for one meal, but no drink. Nor must they stay any long time ashore; for if through their absence any damage happens to the ship or goods, they are obliged to make satisfaction. And if any one of the crew is wounded, or comes by any other ill accident in doing the merchant's business, the merchant is bound to cure him, and indemnify the master, pilot and mariners.²⁶

ART. XXXIV.

A ship being let out to hire to a merchant to freight her, and he agrees to load her in a certain time; if he fails and exceeds that time, fifteen days or more, and by this means the master loses his opportunity to freight his ship; the said merchant shall make him satisfaction for his delays, and pay his damages and interest, a quarter of which belongs to the mariners, and three quarters to the master.²⁷

ART. XXXV.

If the master being upon his voyage wants money, he must send home for it; but ought not to lose a fair opportunity of proceeding; if he does, he shall satisfy the merchant for all the damage he may sustain by his delay; but in case of great necessity he may sell part of the merchandize, and when he arrives at his destined port, he shall pay the merchant for them at the same price the rest was sold at, and the merchant shall pay freight as well for the merchandize the master sold, as for those he delivered him.²⁸

ART. XXXVI.

When the master arrives in a port, he should be careful to place his ship well, to moor her well; for if by his neglect in this the merchandize aboard comes by any damage, he is obliged to make it good.

ART. XXXVII.

If a ship has been in a storm, and the merchant, master or crew think she ought to be refitted, to enable her to continue her voyage, they may do it, and then proceed. However, the master shall be paid his freight for the goods saved, which are for the merchant's profit only. If the merchant has no money, and the master will not give him credit, he may take his merchandize in payment at the market price.²⁹

ART. XXXVIII.

The master shall not throw any goods overboard, without first consulting the mer-

²⁶ Laws of Oleron, arts. 5, 6, 20.

²⁷ Laws of Oleron, art. 21.

²⁸ Laws of Oleron, art. 22.

²⁹ Laws of Oleron, art. 4.

chant; and if the merchant will not consent to it, yet if two or three of the most experienced mariners think it necessary, they may be thrown overboard, but the mariners must swear they thought it was expedient so to do. If there is no merchant or factor aboard, the master and major part of the mariners may resolve upon what is fit to be done.³⁰

ART. XXXIX.

The merchandize thrown overboard shall be valued in the average, at the price the rest was sold for, freight only deducted.³¹

ART. XL.

The master in the average shall pay his proportion for the goods thrown overboard, either by calculating what the ship is worth, or what the freight amounts to, at the choice of the merchant; and the merchant shall pay his, according to the value of the remaining merchandize. It shall be left to the merchant to leave or take the ship at the price the master rated her at.

ART. XLI.

³² If any one has plate or merchandize of great price in his chest, he is bound to declare it before hand, and so doing he shall be paid for his merchandize according to its worth, and the plate after the rate of two deniers for one.

ART. XLII.

If any one has money in his chest, let him take it out and carry it about him, and he shall pay nothing.

ART. XLIII.

If a chest is thrown overboard, and the proprietor does not declare what is in it, it shall not be reckoned in the average, but for the wood and the lock, if it is locked, according to their value.³³

ART. XLIV.

If it is thought convenient in any river, or off any dangerous coast to take aboard a pilot of the country, and the merchant opposes it, yet if the master, the ship's pilot, and the major part of the seamen are of another opinion, he may be hired, and the pilot shall be paid by the ship and cargo, as averages are calculated for goods thrown overboard.³⁴

ART. XLV.

If a master is reduced to straits for want of money or victuals, and for that reason forced to sell part of his merchandize aboard, or borrow money at bottomry, he ought to pay within 15 days after his arrival, for the merchandize at a reasonable price, neither the highest nor the lowest; and if he does not, and the ship be sold, and another master put in her, the merchant to whom the merchandize belonged, or the creditor that lent the money on bottomry, shall at any time within a year and a day, have a good right to the ship, until satisfaction is made for the goods sold, or money borrowed.³⁵

ART. XLVI.

A ship being laden, the master ought not to take in any more merchandize, without leave of the merchant; if he does, and there happens any occasion to throw goods overboard, he shall pay as much as he took in goods over and above the ship's loading. Wherefore he ought when he is lading, to declare how much goods he has, and ought to have aboard.

ART. XLVII.

The seamen are obliged to keep and watch the merchandize at the request of the merchants, master and pilot.

ART. XLVIII.

If for the preservation of the commodity, the seamen turn up the corn aboard, they shall be allowed a denier a last for each time; and if they will not do it, they are liable for the damage that comes to it for want of it. They shall also be allowed a denier a last for unloading, and so for other merchandize.

ART. XLIX.

The mariners ought to represent to the master what condition their tackling for lading and unloading is in; that if the cordage is out of repair, or any other part of it, it may be mended. And if the master does not do it, he shall be accountable for whatever damage happens by that means; but if the mariners do not make their representation, the accidents that befall the merchandize shall be indemnified at their expense.³⁶

ART. L.

If two ships strike against one another and receive damage, the loss shall be borne equally between them, unless the men on board one of them, did it on purpose; in which case that ship shall pay all the damage.³⁷

ART. LI.

To prevent all inconveniences, all masters of ships are required to fasten buoys to their anchors, on pain of making satisfaction for all

³⁰ Laws of Oleron, art. 8.

³¹ Laws of Oleron, art. 8.

³² Laws of Oleron, art. 8.

³³ Laws of Oleron, art. 22.

³⁴ Laws of Oleron, arts. 23, 24.

³⁵ Laws of Oleron, art. 22.

³⁶ Laws of Oleron, art. 10.

³⁷ Laws of Oleron, art. 10.

the damage that may happen for want of them.³⁸

ART. LII.

When a ship arrives at her port of discharge, she ought to be unladen with all possible dispatch, and the master to be paid in eight or fifteen days at farthest, according to the circumstances of the voyage.³⁹

ART. LIII.

If a ship freighted for one port, enters another, the master together with two or three of his chief mariners, ought to clear themselves upon oath, that it was by constraint and necessity that they went out of their way. After which he may proceed in his intended voyage, or ship the cargo aboard other ships, paying freight for the goods, which the merchant shall also pay him, and what else is due on account of the merchandize.

ART. LIV.

It is forbidden to any mariner to go out of the ship, and leave it, after the voyage is done and the ship discharged, unless her sails are all in, her furniture taken away, and she is sufficiently lightened of her ballast.⁴⁰

ART. LV.

If a ship strikes, the master may take out part of his cargo, and relade it aboard other ships, and the charges of it shall come into a general average upon ship and goods. However, the master and two or three of his seamen shall purge themselves upon oath, that they were forced to do it to save the ship and cargo.

ART. LVI.

When a ship arrives at the mouth of any river or harbour, and the master finds she is too heavy loaden to sail up, he may put part of the cargo aboard hoys, lighters, or barges, and an average shall be made for it, of which the master shall pay two thirds, and the merchant one third; but if after the ship is entirely discharged, the ship draws too much water, and cannot sail up, then the master shall pay all the charges.

ART. LVII.

The merchandize being put aboard lighters, in order to be landed, if the master has any jealousy of the merchant's ability or honesty to pay him, he may stop it at his ship's side, and refuse to let it go, till the merchant has paid him in full for his freight and charges.

ART. LVIII.

All lighters, open or close, shall be discharged in five days.

³⁸ Laws of Oleron, art. 14.

³⁹ Laws of Oleron, art. 21.

⁴⁰ Laws of Oleron, art. 5.

ART. LIX.

When a ship is at anchor before a harbour with which her pilot is not well acquainted, the master ought to hire one at the place to carry his ship into it, who shall be paid by ship and cargo.

ART. LX.

When a ship is in a harbour or river, and the master does not know the coast nor the river, he ought to take a pilot of that country to carry her up the river or harbour, which pilot shall be maintained by the master, and paid by the merchant.

ART. LXI.

If a seaman deserts his ship, and carries away what he has received of the master, and the master apprehends him, the fact being proved upon him by the depositions of two other seamen, he shall be condemned to be hanged, and executed.

ART. LXII.

If a master discover that a mariner is infected with any contagious distemper, he may put him ashore on the first land he makes, without being bound to pay him any wages, provided the case be proved by the attestation of two or three of the other mariners belonging to his ship.

ART. LXIII.

If a pilot or mariner buys a ship, or is made master of one, he shall be discharged from his own master, paying him back what he received of him; and it shall be the same if he marries.

ART. LXIV.

If the master, merchant and owners have any difference, and the owners will not furnish their quota of the charge of the out-set; the master may nevertheless proceed in his voyage or voyages with the said ship, paying the seamen what he thinks reasonable.

ART. LXV.

If the master lays out any money in repairing or refitting his ship, or buys any tackling, or any thing else for her use, he shall be reimbursed, and every owner pay his part.

ART. LXVI.

If the merchant obliges the master to insure the ship, the merchant shall be obliged to insure the master's life against the hazards of the sea.

ART. LXVII.

If two ships strike against one another, and one of them unfortunately perishes by the blow, the merchandize that is lost out of both of them, shall be valued and paid for pro rata by both owners, and the damage of the ships shall also be answered for by both according to their value.

ART. LXVIII.

In case of necessity the merchant may sell part of the merchandize to raise money for his ship's use; and the ship happening to be lost afterwards, the master shall however be obliged to pay the merchant for the said merchandize so sold, without pretending to deduct any thing for the freight.

ART. LXIX.

When the master is forced to sell any of the merchandize, he is obliged to pay the same price for them, as the same goods were sold for at the market for which they were designed, and the master shall be paid his freight for what goods are sold.

ART. LXX.

If a ship under sail does damage to another, the master and mariners of the ship doing the damage must swear they did not do it designedly, and could not help it, and then the damage shall be borne by both ships in equal proportion; and if they refuse to swear, the damage shall be paid by the ship that did it.

*

THE LAWS OF THE HANSE TOWNS.

[Reprinted from 1 Pet. Adm. Append. xciii.]

Before we give an abstract of the laws of the Hanse Towns, the confederacy which enacted them, and whose commercial policy they regulated, is entitled to some notice.

During the progress of successful commercial enterprize among the Italians, and towards the middle of the thirteenth century, the activity of the north was excited, and its attention was awakened to commerce. The Baltic was surrounded by nations immersed in extreme barbarism, whose piracies prevented the success of almost every maritime adventure, and compelled the cities of Lubeck and Hamburg, who had opened an intercourse with those people, to unite in a league of mutual defence. The immediate and extensive benefits resulting from this union, induced other towns to accede to it, and in a short time eighty-one cities of considerable importance, placed in those fertile and extensive countries which occupy the space between the lower part of the Baltic and the Scheld, became members of the Hanseatic league. It now obtained an influence in the affairs of Europe; and while its allies were enriched by an intercourse with its members, its friendship was courted, and its hostility dreaded by the most powerful monarchs. Among the means adopted by this association to insure prosperity to their trade, and protect them from controversies with each other, was the formation of a code for the regulation of their maritime enterprizes, and the circumstances incident to them. These laws are evidently founded on those of the neighbouring city of Wisbuy, and the justly celebrated Roll d'Oleron. They appear to have been first enacted and promulgated in the year 1597, at Lubeck, which is styled the "Mother of the Hanse Towns." They were formed by a general assembly, called together for the purpose, and first appeared in the German language. Afterwards, in the year 1614, they were revised by another delegation from each of the towns, and many new ordinances were added.

For the convenience of their commercial operations, different towns were selected by the confederacy where they established warehouses and factories, and at which their intercourse with other countries was chiefly conducted. Among the principal of these was Bruges and Antwerp, in the latter of which was erected a splendid hall, at that period the boast of the modern world. There, were brought by the Italians, the rich productions of India, with the ingenious manufactures of their own country, to be exchanged for the bulky and useful products of the north. The articles obtained by the Hanseatic merchants in this intercourse, were transported to the Baltic, and from thence along the larger rivers into the interior of Germany.

An intercourse so profitable to those who were immediately engaged in it, produced other effects than an augmentation of the wealth of the Hanseatic confederacy. The arts of southern Europe began to be known; and a desire to imitate them, and to possess their productions, was the result of this knowledge. This intercourse created new wants as it increased the means of their gratification; and by the demands it excited among the inhabitants of the Netherlands and Germany, for commodities of every kind, industry was promoted; and at a very early period the manufactures of flax and wool had made considerable progress.

As Bruges became the centre of communication between the Hanseatic and the Lombard merchants, the Flemings traded with both in that city, to such extent and advantage as spread among them a general habit of industry, which long rendered Flanders and the adjacent provinces the most opulent, the most populous, and best cultivated counties in Europe.¹

The pleasure which is derived from tracing the progress of such associations to prosperity, and noting their influence and connection with the welfare of other states, has induced us to enter more minutely into the history of the Hanseatic body, than was originally proposed.

If their example stimulated other nations to industry and trade, their laws must necessarily have obtained a corresponding estimation. Those institutions which protected the rights and regulated the contracts of these industrious adventurers, could not fail to obtain a due portion of praise and value. Accordingly we find them in extensive application among the northern powers of Europe, and governing them in their commercial transactions. By the most distinguished men of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, whose avocations induced their attention to them, they are spoken of with great respect, and esteemed as the production of great wisdom and extensive experience.

ARTICLE I.

No master shall undertake to build a ship, unless he is assured that his owners and undertakers are agreed upon what model it shall be built, and on every thing relating to the building of it; which undertakers and owners shall be burghers and inhabitants of one of the Hanse Towns, and no others. However, if the master will go through with the building at his own expense, he may do it; otherwise he must always have the consent of those burghers that are concerned with him, on pain of forfeiting half a dollar a ton.²

¹ Robertson's History of Charles V.

ART. II.

No master shall begin to build a ship,^o after he and his joint owners or partners have resolved upon it, until they have agreed among themselves of what size, height and depth she shall be, how broad and how long, and this agreement shall be taken in writing on pain of forfeiting 12 sols a ton.³

ART. III.

The master in like manner shall not repair the ship, sails or cordage without the owner's consent, on pain of being at all the charge of it himself, unless in case of necessity, when he is in a strange country.

ART. IV.

The master may not buy any thing whatsoever for his ship, unless it is in the presence, and with the consent of one or two of the partners; if he does he shall forfeit 50 sols: nor shall the master, or any of the owners buy any thing for the ship's use, upon the credit of the other owners who would pay ready money for their part of the disbursement.

ART. V.

An inventory shall be taken of every thing the ship wants, that it may be bought by the master and owners jointly.

ART. VI.

The master ought to buy every thing at the cheapest rate without fraud, on pain of corporal punishment; and he shall enter in his account the name of the person of whom he bought the goods, and where they live.

ART. VII.

If a master or mariner keep back any of the merchandize he took in on freight, they shall be apprehended and punished as robbers, unless it was in case of necessity.

ART. VIII.

Nor may they give above the market price for any provisions, and what they shall buy

² In the stile of the Hanse Towns, the owners of ships are called burghers; because none but the burghers of those cities in Germany, were permitted to build ships. The inconvenience provided against by this article is to save the materials of building, that none might undertake what they could not go through with, and thereby the materials be lost: for if he who begins to build a ship, is not very well able to perfect it, and has not the approbation of his joint owners or partners, such is often the end of too rash beginnings of this kind.

³ It is the custom in the Levant, if during the building of a ship, any one of the owners die, his heirs are not obliged to continue the partnership; but the master undertaker is bound to look out for another owner in the room of him that is dead; and this new owner must pay the heirs of the deceased what the latter advanced on this account.

shall be carried to the ship's store-house, and be kept there till she is ready to sail.

ART. IX.

All masters are forbidden to sell any of the ship's provisions, on pain of being punished as thieves, except it is at sea, when they meet with other ships in distress and danger of perishing for want of them: for which they shall however be accountable to the owners.

ART. X.

The master when the ship is returned, is obliged to deliver up to the owners, the remains of his victuals and ammunition.

ART. XI.

The master is obliged to set sail two or three days after his ship is loaden, if the wind is fair, on pain of forfeiting 200 livres; and in case any one of the owners has not paid his quota of the charge of the ship's outset by that time, he shall forfeit as much; and the master may besides, borrow money on bottomry, for the deficient owner's quota. The merchants are bound to load the ship by a prefixed time, on pain of paying the whole freight, notwithstanding the ship proceeds in her voyage light, and in her ballast only.

ART. XII.

When the master gives in his account, he shall summon all his owners together, on pain of 100 livres forfeit.

ART. XIII.

The master shall not take any merchandize aboard on his head, or by the consent of one of his owners, without the approbation of them all: if he does, the penalty is confiscation, or other punishment.

ART. XIV.

The owners having lawful cause, may turn off a master, paying him for what share he has in the ship, at the price it cost him.

ART. XV.

All owners are forbidden to entertain any master unless he produces a certificate of his honesty and ability, and that he quitted the service of the merchants he served last, with their consent: if they do, they shall pay 25 crowns penalty.

ART. XVI.

Before the master hires any mariner or pilot, he ought to acquaint the owners with what wages he is to give them, and have their allowance of it, under penalty of 25 crowns.

ART. XVII.

If several ships are in company on the same voyage, they are obliged to stay for one another, or be liable to all the damages that may happen to the others by an enemy or pirates.⁴

ART. XVIII.

No master shall hire a mariner, before he has seen his pass or certificate of his faithful behaviour in the service of his last master, on pain of forfeiting 100 sols, unless he is necessitated to it in a strange country.

ART. XIX.

Masters are obliged to give mariners certificates of their faithful service; and if any one refuses, or delays, he shall forfeit 100 sols.

ART. XX.

A ship being forced to stay or winter in a strange country, the mariners are not to go out of her without the master's permission, on pain of losing half their wages.⁵

ART. XXI.

If the master maintains the mariners all the winter, they cannot oblige him to give them more wages; but if they endeavour to do it, they shall forfeit half of what they were to have had, and be punished further, according to the circumstances of their offence.

ART. XXII.

No seaman may go ashore without the consent of the master, pilot, mate or clerk of the ship, under penalty of 25 sols for each time.

ART. XXIII.

The seamen who are ashore with the master, are obliged to look after the boat, and return on board as soon as they are commanded: and he who stays or lies ashore, shall pay a forfeit, or suffer imprisonment.

ART. XXIV.

If the master changes his voyage, and steers another course than was intended, he ought to have the consent of his mariners, or pay them what the major party of them shall adjudge to be due to them for his changing of the voyage: and if then any one of them will not obey him, he shall be punished as a mutineer.

ART. XXV.

If any mariner sleep on a watch, he shall pay four sols forfeit: and whoever finds him asleep, and does not discover it, two sols.

ART. XXVI.

All seamen are forbidden to moor any skiffs or boats to a ship's side, on pain of imprisonment.

ART. XXVII.

He who shall be found incapable of discharging his duty as a pilot or mariner, for which he has received wages, shall forfeit all that was promised him, and be besides punished according to his demerit.

⁴ Laws of Oleron, art. 28.

⁵ Laws of Oleron, art. 5; Laws of Wisbuy, art. 17.

ART. XXVIII.

Masters shall pay their seamen at three payments, one third when the ship sets sail, outward bound; one third when she is unladen, and the other when she is returned home.

ART. XXIX.

A master may at any time turn away a mariner that rebels against, or is unfaithful to him.⁶

ART. XXX.

If one mariner kills another, the master is bound to seize him, and keep him in safe custody till he arrives at his port, and then to deliver him up to justice to be punished.

ART. XXXI.

The seamen may not feast and carouse in the ship without the master's leave, on pain of losing half their wages.

ART. XXXII.

No seaman shall let his wife lie aboard under penalty of 50 sols.

ART. XXXIII.

No seaman ought to carry powder and shot without the master's consent, on pain of paying double the value of it.

ART. XXXIV.

The master is bound when he returns home, to give an account before the magistrate, of what forfeitures he received, and for what, under penalty of 25 crowns.

ART. XXXV.

The seamen are obliged to defend the ship against rovers, on pain of losing their wages; and if they are wounded, they shall be healed and cured at the general charge of the concerned in a common average. If any one of them is maimed and disabled, he shall be maintained as long as he lives by a like average.

ART. XXXVI.

If the mariners, or any of the company refuse to assist on the like occasion, and the ship be taken or lost, they shall be condemned to be whipped as cowards and rascals.

ART. XXXVII.

If the mariners resolve to defend the ship, and the master is afraid and against it, he shall be turned out of his post with infamy, and declared incapable of ever commanding a ship afterwards.

ART. XXXVIII.

The ship's ballast shall be carried to the place designed for it, and those that are refractory, and will not help in it, shall be punished by the magistrates of the place.

ART. XXXIX.

If any seaman is wounded in the ship's service, he shall be cured at the charge of the ship, but not if he is wounded otherwise.⁷

ART. XL.

If any one of the seamen goes ashore without leave, and the ship happens to receive any damage in the time, or to be lost for want of hands, he shall be kept in prison upon bread and water for one year; and if any seaman dies or perishes with the ship for want of the assistance of the absent seaman, the latter shall be punished with corporal punishment.⁸

ART. XLI.

If a mariner behaves himself ill the master may turn him off; but if he discharge him for no reason before the voyage begins, he shall pay him a third part of his wages, but shall not charge it in the ship's account.

ART. XLII.

If the master discharges a seaman during the voyage, for no lawful cause given, he is bound to pay him his whole wages, and defray the charge of his return; but if the mariner desires the master's leave to quit the ship, he shall be bound to restore all the money he received, and pay his own charges.⁹

ART. XLIII.

If an officer or seaman quits a ship, and conceals himself; if afterwards he is apprehended, he shall be delivered up to justice to be punished: he shall be stigmatized in the face with the first letter of the name of the town to which he belongs.

ART. XLIV.

If a ship is lost the mariners are obliged to save as much of the goods as they can, and the master ought to reward and satisfy them for it, and pay the charge of their journey home: if the mariners refuse to assist the master, they shall have neither wages nor reward.¹⁰

ART. XLV.

If any mariner falls sick of any disease, he shall be put ashore and maintained in like manner as if he was on shipboard, and be attended by another mariner.¹¹ How-

⁶ Laws of Oleron, arts. 12, 13.

⁷ Laws of Oleron, art. 6; Laws of Wisbuy, art. 18.

⁸ Laws of Oleron, art. 20.

⁹ Laws of Oleron, art. 18.

¹⁰ Laws of Oleron, art. 3.

¹¹ Laws of Oleron, art. 7.

ever, the master is not obliged to stay for him; if he recovers his health, he shall be paid his wages as much as if he had served out the whole voyage; and in case he dies, his heirs shall have what was due to him.¹²

ART. XLVI.

If mariners mutiny, and force the master to enter into any harbour or port, and the ship or cargo is lost, either in whole or in part, for which the seamen run away; if afterwards they are taken, they shall be corporally punished.

ART. XLVII.

The master shall not give the seamen any cause to mutiny, but supply them with what is convenient, and pay them what is their due punctually and faithfully.¹³

XLVIII.

The master who shall debauch a seaman, and hire him after he had hired himself to another master, shall pay 25 livres, and the mariner shall pay to the first master for damages, half the wages the second had promised him.

ART. XLIX.

If a ship is stopped in a strange country, or the mariners are forced to stay there for their freight, or on another account, they shall all that time be maintained as is usual; but shall not pretend to demand any extraordinary wages; and what is due to them shall be paid to them or their assigns, when the ship is discharged. If any seaman is so bold as to leave the ship because of her stay, he shall be corporally punished according to his demerits.

ART. L.

If a master takes any gold, silver, diamonds, or other merchandize of great price, which obliges him to have a more than ordinary care of it, a fourth part of the freight of such rich goods shall be allowed him, and the owners shall have the other three fourths.

ART. LI.

The master ought to put a mariner in each boat or lighter that is to carry salt to land as well to take care of it, as to see that a right account is kept of its measure.

¹² The Spaniards are the most unkind, and indeed unjust, to their sick mariners of any people: for they neither pay them any wages, nor maintain them, unless they pay for others to serve in their stead: and what is still worse, if during their sickness any accident or damage happens to the ship or goods, those mariners that were ill, are obliged to make satisfaction, their sickness being no plea for them, according to the Laberinto de Comercio, libro tertio, cap. "Navigantis," numero 18.

¹³ Laws of Oleron, art. 13.

ART. LII.

Mariners hired aboard ships bound for France or Spain, shall not be maintained by the masters when they are outward bound, but shall live on their own provisions; but when they are homeward bound, the master shall maintain them: and if the master advances or lends them any money, he may pay himself by deducting it out of their wages. If the ship is not loaden home, the master is not obliged to maintain them.

ART. LIII.

The masters may not alienate or sell any part of their provisions or furniture until the voyage is made, and when they do, the owners shall be preferred to any other in the sale of them.

ART. LIV.

The mariners shall not take any grains of salt belonging to the ship's loading, but shall put some aboard for their own use, with the knowledge and consent of the merchant or others concerned, on pain of being severely punished.

ART. LV.

The master or the pilot may each load 12 barrels on their particular account; the other officers six each, and the seamen four each; the cook and the boys two each.¹⁴

ART. LVI.

If a master, to displease his owners, sells his part of a ship for more than it is worth, the said part shall be appraised by men of experience; after which the owners may take it or leave it at the price it was appraised at, as they think fit.¹⁵

¹⁴ This is what is called "portage" in France, where 12 barrels make a last, and one last 2 tons.

ART. LVII.

If a master, fraudulently, shall borrow money upon bottomry, and mortgage his ship for it, or stay with it in any port a long time, and sell it, together with the merchandize, the said master shall be incapable of having the command of a ship afterwards, and never be admitted into any city, but shall be punished without mercy.

ART. LVIII.

A master being at home, may not borrow any more money on bottomry, than his own part of the ship is worth; if he does, the other shares of the ship shall not be liable for it; neither shall he take any freight without the knowledge and consent of the owners.

ART. LIX.

If the owners are at variance, and cannot agree about the freight of their ship, that opinion shall carry it, which has the majority on its side by two or three. The master may also in such case, take up money upon bottomry, as well on their shares who do not consent, as on theirs who do.

ART. LX.

A master being in a strange country, if necessity drives him to it, may take up money on bottomry, if he cannot get it without, and the owners shall bear the charge of it.¹⁶

¹⁵ Laws of Oleron, art. 45.

¹⁶ Laws of Oleron, art. 27; Laws of Wisbuy, art. 45.

THE MARINE ORDINANCES OF LOUIS XIV.

[Reprinted from 2 Pet. Adm. Append. iii.]

While the French historians have employed themselves in tracing the commercial prosperity of their nation, at the conclusion of the seventeenth, and opening of the eighteenth centuries, to these ordinances, the civilians and lawyers of every period which has followed their promulgation, have avowed the greatest admiration of their wisdom and their justice. To the genius of Colbert, the celebrated minister of Louis XIV, France is indebted for this excellent code. Desirous of establishing the commerce of his country on a basis which nothing could successfully assail, he selected a masterly hand to compile and arrange these laws, from the prevailing maritime regulations of France and other states, and from the experience of the most respectable commercial men of his country. To these regulations which, having formed a part of the maritime code of Europe, had been acknowledged as authority by all, were added others which were considered as peculiarly necessary for the trade of France. The ordinances thus formed, were published by the French king in 1681, and have since enjoyed an uncontrolled authority over the commerce of the country for which they were intended, and have obtained the respect of every maritime state.

To the testimony in favour of this collection, which has so often been given by the most celebrated jurists of Europe, I can add that of a gentleman of distinguished legal acquirements, who has been recently selected, with the approbation of his country, to occupy the first judicial situation in the state of Pennsylvania. In the case of Morgan & Price v. The Insurance Company of North America, decided by the supreme court of this state in January, 1807, Chief Justice Tilghman, having referred to one of the articles of these ordinances, thus expressed himself: "They and the commentaries on them, have been received with great respect in the courts both of England and the United States, not as conveying any authority in themselves, but as evidence of the general marine law. When they are contradicted by judicial decisions in our own country they are not to be regarded: but on points which have not been decided, they are worthy of great consideration." The commentaries on these ordinances by Valin, we have reluctantly consented to omit, and the design of this work necessarily excludes from it, those articles in the ordinances which are local in their nature, or are confined to the regulation of the courts or the offices of the admiralty of France. Those only have been selected, which are founded on the general principles of maritime law, and which are thought peculiarly entitled to the notice of every commercial lawyer.

MARINERS AND SHIPS.

TITLE FIRST.

Of the Captain, Master and Patron.¹

I. No person shall be capable of being received captain, master, or patron of a ship, till he has navigated five years, and has been publickly examined in navigation, and judged capable by two ancient masters, in presence of the officers of the admiralty, and of the professor of hydrography, if any be in the place.²

II. We forbid all mariners to sail in quality of masters, and all owners to constitute any in their ships, before they be received in the aforesaid manner, under pain of three hundred livres, to be paid by each offender.³

III. However, such as are already masters shall not be obliged to undergo any examination.

IV. Such as have been received pilots, and have navigated two years in that quality, may be constituted masters without any examination, and without any act of the court of admiralty.

V. The master shall chuse the ship's company, and hire the pilots, mates, mariners and sailors; but he shall advise with his owners when at the port of their residence.

VI. In places where there are hospitals of poor boys, the masters shall be obliged to chuse amongst them their ship-boys.

VII. The master who shall entice away a mariner from another master, shall be fined in one hundred livres, applicable one half ¹ In France those who command vessels of war, or merchant ships destined on long voyages, are called "captains"; masters or patrons are those who command vessels employed in the coasting trade.

² A professor of hydrography is appointed to teach navigation and the sciences immediately connected with it, in all the considerable sea ports in France. His school is open to every one, and formerly each hospital sent two or three boys, annually, to be instructed in the sciences taught by him. Book 1, tit. 8.

³ Laws of the Hanse Towns, art. 15.

to the admiral, and the other half to the first master, who may take the mariner back again if he pleases.⁴

VIII. A master must take care before he puts to sea, that the ship be right ballasted and laded, and well provided with anchors and tackle, and all things necessary for the voyage.

IX. He shall be answerable for all the goods laded aboard his ship, which he shall be obliged to deliver according to the bills of lading.

X. He shall be obliged to keep a book or register, quoted and flourished on every leaf by one of his principal owners, in which he shall insert the day that he was constituted master, the names of the officers and mariners of his company, the rates and conditions of their engagement, the payments he makes them, what he receives and expends for the use of the ship, and generally every thing that concerns the functions of his employment, or of which he has to render any account, or any demand to make.

XI. If, with the master's consent, there is a clerk established in the ship, to take an account of all such things, the master shall be exempt from it.

XII. No master shall lade any goods upon the ship's deck, without the order or consent of his merchants, under pain of being answerable for all the damage that may happen.

XIII. Masters shall be obliged, under pain of an arbitrary fine, to be aboard their ships themselves when they go out of any port, harbour or river.

XIV. No master, patron, pilot, nor mariner, shall be arrested for a civil debt, being a shipboard to put to sea, except it be for debts contracted for the voyage.

XV. The master, before he sets sail, shall take the advice of the pilot, mate, and other principal men of the ship's company.⁵

XVI. He shall be obliged before he puts to sea to give into the admiralty office, of the place of his departure, the names, surnames, and dwelling-places of his company, passengers, and persons engaged for the West Indies, and to declare at his return such as he has brought back again, and the places where he left the others.

XVII. He shall not, while in the place where his owners reside, cause the ship to be refitted, buy sails, ropes, or other things for the ship, nor take up money for that account upon the ship, without their consent, under pain of paying the same himself.⁶

XVIII. However, if with the owner's consent, a ship be freighted, and any of them refuses to contribute towards the necessary charges for fitting out the ship; in that case the master may take up money for bottomry for the account and upon the parts of the refusers, within four and twenty hours after he has sent them a summons in writing to furnish their proportions.⁷

XIX. He may likewise, during the voyage, take up money upon the ship, either for refitting, victuals, or other necessaries, or may pawn some of the rigging, or sell some goods of his lading, upon condition to pay for them at the rate that the rest shall be sold; all which must not be done without the advice of the mate and pilot, who shall write down in the journal the necessity of such borrowing of money, or selling of goods, and the manner how the money was laid out: but the master shall not in any case have power to sell the ship, without a special procuration from the owners.⁸

XX. If any master, without necessity, takes up money upon the ship or rigging, sells goods, pawns the tackle, or states in his accounts false and supposed averages and expenses, he shall pay what he takes up himself, be declared unworthy of being a master, and banished from his ordinary place of residence.

XXI. Masters hired to make a voyage shall be obliged to accomplish it, under pain of making good the damages and losses to the owners and merchants; and to be proceeded against extraordinary if that happens.

XXII. They may, with the advice of the mate and pilot, cause to be ducked or put in the hold, and inflict such sort of punishments upon drunken and disobedient seamen, or upon such as abuse their comrades, or commit such other faults and offences during the voyage.⁹

XXIII. And such as shall be guilty of murder, assassination, blasphemy, or other capital crimes committed at sea, the masters, mates and quarter-masters, shall be obliged under the entire penalty of one hundred livres, to inform against them, to seize their persons, and make the necessary proceedings for instituting process, in order to deliver the criminal into the hands of the officers of the admiralty, at the place of the lading or unloading of the ships within our kingdom.¹⁰

XXIV. We forbid all masters, under pain of exemplary punishment, to enter, except in cases of necessity, into any foreign port; and in case they be forced into any by tempest or pirates, they shall put to sea again with the first conveniency.¹¹

XXV. We enjoin all captains and masters, making long voyages, to assemble every day at noon, and oftener if necessary, the mates and pilots, and other expert persons, ⁷ Laws of the Hanse Towns, arts. 11, 59.

⁸ Laws of Wisbuy, art. 45; Laws of the Hanse Towns, art. 60.

⁹ Laws of Oleron, art. 15.

¹⁰ Laws of the Hanse Towns, art. 30.

¹¹ Laws of Wisbuy, art. 53.

⁴ Laws of the Hanse Towns, art. 48.

⁵ Laws of Oleron, art. 2; Laws of Wisbuy, art. 14.

⁶ Laws of the Hanse Towns, arts. 3, 4.

and to confer with them about the latitudes taken, the courses made, and to be made, and about their calculations.

XXVI. They shall not abandon their ships during the voyage, notwithstanding any danger, without the advice of the most expert officers and mariners; and in that case, they shall be obliged to carry off with them the money and the most precious goods they have on board, under pain of answering for it themselves, and of personal punishment.

XXVII. If the effects so taken out of the ship be lost by any accident, the master shall be free from any danger.

XXVIII. The masters and patrons who sail in partnership with other owners, shall have no separate dealings for their own particular account, under pain of confiscation of their goods for the benefit of the other partners.

XXIX. They shall not borrow for their voyages any more money than what is necessary for their lading, under pain of being deprived of their places, and their share in the profits.

XXX. They shall be obliged, under the like penalty, to give before their departure, to the proprietors of the ship, a signed account of the quality and price of the goods they have aboard, and of the sums of money borrowed by them, together with the names and dwelling places of the lenders.

XXXI. If the common stock of provisions fail at sea, the master may compel such as have any in particular to deliver them up for the use of all, subject to the payment of the price thereof.

XXXII. No master shall sell the provisions of his ship, nor divert and conceal them, under pain of bodily punishment.¹²

XXXIII. They may however, with the advice and consent of the officers, sell to ships found in necessity at sea, provided they have enough remaining for their own voyage, and render an account thereof to the owners.¹³

XXXIV. At the return of the voyage, the victuals and ammunitions shall be remitted by the master into the hands of the owners.¹⁴

XXXV. If the master steer a false course, commit any robbery, or suffer any to be committed in his ship, or fraudulently give way to any alienation or confiscation of ship or goods, he shall be punished corporally.

XXXVI. A master being convicted of having delivered to the enemy, or maliciously run his ship aground, shall be punished with death.

¹² Laws of the Hanse Towns, art. 9.

¹³ Laws of the Hanse Towns, art. 9.

¹⁴ Laws of the Hanse Towns, art. 10.

TITLE SECOND.

Of the Mate.

I. The mate shall take care of the fitting out of the vessel, and before they put to sea, shall examine whether it be sufficiently provided with ropes, pulleys, sails, and other rigging necessary for the voyage.

II. At the departure he shall see the anchor hoisted; and during the voyage, he shall visit once a day all the tackle high and low; and if he observes any thing amiss, shall acquaint the master.

III. He shall execute in the vessel, and cause to be executed, day and night, the orders of the master.

IV. Arriving at a port he shall cause the cables and anchors to be prepared, and shall have the care and management of the sails and yards, and moorings of the ship.

V. In case of the absence or sickness of the master, the mate shall command in his place.

TITLE THIRD.

Of Seamen.¹⁵

I. The seamen shall be obliged to appear at the days and places appointed, to take aboard the provisions, rig out the ship, and set sail.¹⁶

II. A seaman hired for a voyage must not leave the ship, without a discharge in writing, till the voyage is ended, and the ship moored at the key and unladed.¹⁷

III. If a seaman leaves a master without a discharge in writing before the voyage is begun, he may be taken up and imprisoned wherever he can be found, and compelled to restore what he has received, and serve out the time for which he had engaged himself for nothing; and if he leaves the ship after the voyage is begun, he may be punished corporally.¹⁸

IV. However, if after the arrival and unlading of a ship at the intended port, the master, instead of returning, takes a freight to go elsewhere, the seamen may leave him if they please, except it be otherwise provided by their agreement.

V. After the ship is laded, the seamen shall not go ashore without leave from the master, under pain of five livres for the first fault: and may be punished corporally if they commit a second.¹⁹

VI. We forbid the mariners and seamen to take any bread or victuals, or draw any

¹⁵ Un matelot est un homme de mer qui a acquis une expérience suffisante au fait la manœuvre d'un vaisseau. Valin, Com. tom. 1, p. 509.

¹⁶ Laws of the Hanse Towns, art. 18.

¹⁷ Laws of Wisbuy, art. 63; Laws of the Hanse Towns, art. 24.

¹⁸ Laws of Wisbuy, art. 1; Laws of the Hanse Towns, art. 43.

¹⁹ Laws of Oleron, art. 5; Laws of Wisbuy, art. 17.

drink without the permission of the master or steward, under pain of the loss of one month's wages, and of a greater punishment if the fault deserves it.²⁰

VII. The seamen or other that spoils the drink, destroys the bread, makes the ship leaky, excites a sedition to break the voyage, or strikes the master having arms in his hand, shall be punished with death.²¹

VIII. Any seaman sleeping in his post or upon the watch, shall be put in irons during fifteen days; and any of the company finding one asleep, and not acquainting the master therewith, shall pay five livres.²²

IX. Any mariner abandoning the master, and the defence of the ship in time of battle, shall be punished corporally.

TITLE FOURTH.

Of the Owners of Ships.

I. All our subjects, of any quality or condition whatsoever, may cause ships to be built or bought, fit them out for themselves, freight them to others, and drive a trade at sea by themselves, or by persons interposed; by which gentlemen shall not be reputed to do any act derogatory to their quality, provided they sell nothing by retail.

II. ²³The owners of ship shall be answerable for the deeds of the master; but shall be discharged, abandoning their ship and freight.

III. However, the owners of armed ships shall not be answerable for their crimes and piracies committed at sea by the crews of their ships, any further than for the sums for which they may have given security, except it appear that they are partakers or accomplices in the crimes.

IV. The owners of ships may dismiss the master, reimbursing him, if he requires it, for his part in the ship, according to the estimation of understanding persons.²⁴

V. In every thing concerning the common interest of the owners, the opinion of the greater number shall prevail; and the number shall be computed according to the shares that every man has in the ship.²⁵

VI. No person may constrain his partner to proceed to the sale of a ship, except the opinions of the owners be equally different about the undertaking of any voyage.²⁶

²⁰ Laws of the Hanse Towns, art. 9.

²¹ Laws of Wisbuy, art. 24; Laws of Oleron, art. 12.

²² Laws of the Hanse Towns, art. 25; Id. art. 37.

²³ The better to oblige owners of ships to be diligent and careful in providing themselves with honest masters, it is by this article declared, that they shall be answerable for the behaviour of the masters they put in their ships, for any sum not exceeding the value of their ships, and of their freight. See Valin, Com. tom. 1, p. 568.

²⁴ Laws of the Hanse Towns, art. 14.

²⁵ See Valin, Com. tom. 1, p. 575.

²⁶ Valin, Com. tom. 1, p. 584. See, also, the case of Willings v. Blight, Case No. 17,765.

TITLE FIFTH.

Of Ships and Vessels.

I. All ships and vessels shall be reputed personalty, and shall not be subject to redemptions,²⁷ nor to pay any duties to the lords of manors.

II. All vessels however, shall be liable for the debts of the seller, until they have made a voyage under the name, and at the risque of the new acquirer, except they have been sold by adjudication.²⁸

III. The sale of a ship in voyage, or under a private contract, shall not in any manner be prejudicial to the creditors of the seller.

IV. All ships shall be gauged immediately after they are perfected, by the viewers or overseers of the trade or mystery of carpenters; who shall give an attestation of the burthen of the ship, which shall be registered in the admiralty office.

V. To discover and regulate the burthen and capacity of a ship, the hold shall be measured at the rate of two and forty foot cube for the sea ton.

VI. The officers of the admiralty shall be obliged under pain of interdiction of their offices, to take every year, in the month of December, an account of all the ships belonging to the inhabitants of their jurisdiction; which shall contain their burthen, age, quality and shape, with the names of the owners; all which they shall send to the secretary of state, who has the management of the marine affairs of that department.²⁹

²⁷ The word which I here render "redemption," is in the original "retrait lignager," and implies a power inherent in an heir to revoke some grant, or redeem something mortgaged by his predecessors; to which sort of redemption ships are declared by this law not to be subject.

²⁸ The design of making ships sold privately, liable for the debts of the last owner, until they have made a voyage at the risk, and under the name of the new acquirer, is only to prevent the sham sales of ships frequently made only to defraud the creditors of the seller; which certainly is a very just and commendable constitution.

²⁹ The injunction in the last article upon the officers of the admiralty, to take a yearly account of the shipping belonging to the places of their residence, and others within the district of their courts, in order to send it to the proper secretary of state, is a very convincing proof of the regular and excellent methods observed by the French court for the improvement of navigation; which if (by the account brought in once a year) they find to decay in any place of the kingdom, diligent enquiry is made into the cause of this fact, and all manner of impediments by which the prosperity of their shipping has been obstructed, are carefully removed. Nor is this the only advantage attending their diligence and exactness in such matters; for, by those yearly lists, the French king knows, within the number of 100 men or less, how many mariners and seamen, foreigners as well as natives, there are within the extent of his dominions; and he likewise knows what number are abroad in long voyages, when they may reasonably be expected back again, and where they are to arrive, and consequently when and where they may be serviceable to him.

MARITIME CONTRACTS.TITLE FIRST.*Of Charter Parties and Freighting of Ships.

I. All articles for freighting of ships shall be reduced into writing, and agreed to by the merchants that freight, and the master or owners of the ships freighted.

II. The master shall observe the orders of his owners, when he freights the ship at the place of their residence.³⁰

III. The charter party shall contain the name and burthen of the vessel, the names of the master and freighters, the place and time of the lading and unlading, the freight, the time the vessel is to stay at the respective ports, and the conventions about demurrage; to which the parties may add such other conditions as they please.

IV. The time of the lading and unlading the goods shall be regulated according to the custom of the respective ports, except it be determined by the charter party.

V. If a ship be freighted by the month, and the time of the freight be not regulated by the charter party, it shall only commence from the day that the ship shall sail.

VI. He who after having received a summons in writing to fulfil the contract refuses it, or delays it, shall make good all the loss and damage.

VII. But if before the departure of the ship, there should happen an embargo, occasioned by war, reprisals, or otherwise, with the country whither the ship is bound, the charter party shall be dissolved, without any damages or charges for either party, and the merchant shall pay the charges of lading and unlading his goods: but if the difference be with one another, the charter party shall be valid in all its points.

VIII. If the ports be only shut, and the vessel stopped by force for a time, the charter party shall still be valid, and the master and merchant shall be reciprocally obliged to expect the opening of the ports and the liberty of the ships, without any pretensions for damages on either side.

IX. However the merchant may at his own charge unload his goods during the embargo, or shutting up of the port, upon condition either to load them again, or indemnify the master.

X. The master shall be obliged, during the voyage, to have aboard the charter party, and the other necessary deeds concerning his lading.

XI. The ship, rigging and tackle, and the freight and goods laded, shall be respectively affected by the conventions of the charter party.

TITLE SECOND.Of Bills of Loading.

I. All bills of loading for goods put aboard a ship, shall be signed by the master or the clerk of the ship.

II. All bills of loading shall contain the quality, quantity, and mark of the goods, the names of the persons that lade them, and of those to whom they are consigned, the places of departure and unloading, the names of the master and the ship, and the value of the freight.

III. All bills of loading shall be triple, one shall remain in the hands of the lader, another shall be sent to the person to whom the goods are to be consigned, and the third shall be left in the hands of the master or clerk.

IV. The merchants shall be obliged within four and twenty hours after the goods are laded, to present the bills of loading to be signed by the masters, and to give them the acquittances and discharges for the customs of their goods, under pain of paying the damages of the retardment.

V. Factors and others, receiving goods expressed in bills of loading, or charter parties, shall be obliged to give a receipt thereof to the masters upon their demanding it, under pain of all expenses, damages and losses, and those of the retardment as well as others.

VI. In case of any diversity in bills of loading taken for the same goods, that which shall be in the hands of the master shall be authentic, if filled up by the merchant or his factor; and that which is in the hands of the merchant shall be good, if filled up by the captain.

TITLE THIRD.Of Freight.

I. The freight of ships shall be regulated by the charter party or bill of lading, whether the ships be freighted in whole or in part, for the voyage, or by the month, expressing the burden by the ton, the quintal, by parts, or any other way.

II. If a vessel be hired, and the freighter does not put her full loading aboard, the master shall not take aboard any other goods without his consent nor without rendering him an account of the freight.

III. A merchant not loading the quantity of goods mentioned by the charter party, shall notwithstanding pay the freight as if he had done it; and if he loads any more, he shall pay freight for them.

IV. A master that declares his vessel to be of greater burden than she is, shall sustain the damages thereby happening to the merchant.

V. It shall not be reputed an error in the declaration of the ship's burden, if the difference does not exceed one fortieth part.

VI. If the vessel be laded by parts, or by the quintal, or by the ton, a merchant being desirous to take out his goods before her departure, may do it at his own charge, paying half freight.

VII. A master may likewise unlade and lay down upon the shore any goods found in his ship, and put on board there without his knowledge, or take freight at the highest rate that any goods of that quality pay.

³⁰ Laws of the Hanse Towns, art. 58.

VIII. A merchant unloading his goods during a voyage, shall nevertheless pay the whole freight, except he be obliged to unload them by the deed of the master.

IX. If a ship is stopped in her course, or at the port of her unloading, by the deed of the merchant that freights her, or if she, after having been freighted outward and inward, is forced to return empty, the damages of the retardment, and the whole freight shall be, notwithstanding, due to the master.

X. The master shall be likewise answerable for the damages of the freighter, if according to the judgment of intelligent persons, a vessel is stopped in her course, or at a port, by the deed of the master.

XI. If a master is obliged to cause his ship to be refitted during a voyage, the freighter shall be obliged either to wait or pay the whole freight; and if the ship cannot be rigged out, the master shall forthwith hire another; and if none can be found, he shall only be paid in proportion to the part he has performed on the voyage.

XII. However, if the merchant prove that when the ship put to sea she was unfit for sailing, the master shall lose his freight, and pay the other damages and losses.

XIII. The master shall be paid the freight of goods thrown overboard for the common safety, out of the contribution.

XIV. Freight shall likewise be due for goods that the merchant may have been forced to sell for victuals, refitting, and other pressing necessities, an account being kept by him of their value, according as the rest are sold at the place of unloading.

XV. If there happens an interdiction of commerce with any country to which a vessel is bound, and in her course, so that she returns with her loading, there shall only be due to the master the freight for going thither, even though the ship be freighted to go and come.

XVI. If a vessel, in the course of her voyage, be arrested by a supreme power, there shall be no freight due for the time of their detention, if freighted by the month; nor no augmentation, if freighted by the voyage; but the food and wages of the seamen, during the detention, shall be reputed average.

XVII. In case the person mentioned in any bill of loading refuse to accept the goods, the master, by the authority of the judges, may cause some to be sold for the payment of his freight, and deposit the rest in a warehouse.

XVIII. No freight shall be due for goods lost by shipwreck, or taken by pirates or enemies; and in that case, the master shall be obliged to restore what has been advanced to him, except there be some agreement to the contrary.

XIX. If the ship and goods be ransomed, the master shall be paid his freight to the place where they were taken; and he shall be paid his whole freight if he conduct them to the place agreed to, he contributing towards the ransom.

XX. The contribution for the ransom shall be made according to the current price of the goods at the place of their unloading, deducting the charges, and upon the total of the ship and freight, deducting the victuals made use of, and the money advanced to the seamen; who shall likewise contribute towards the discharge of the freight, in proportion of what shall remain due to them of their wages.

XXI. The master shall likewise be paid the freight of goods saved from shipwreck, he conducting them to the place appointed.

XXII. If he cannot find a ship to carry thither the goods preserved, he shall only be paid his freight in proportion to what he has performed of the voyage.

XXIII. The master shall not detain the goods in his ship for default of the payment of his freight, but at the time of unloading, he may hinder them from being carried away, or cause them to be seized in the hoys or lighters.

XXIV. The master shall be preferred for his freight upon the goods of his lading, as long as they are in the ship, in lighters, or upon the quay; and he shall likewise be preferred wherever the goods may be, within fifteen days after the delivery, provided they are not passed into the possession of a third person.

XXV. Merchants may not oblige masters to take for their freight goods that are fallen in price, or that are spoiled or damaged by their own fault, or by accident.

XXVI. However, if goods contained in casks, such as wine, oil, honey, and other liquors, have leaked so much that the casks are empty, or almost empty, the merchants that laded them, may abandon them to the master for the freight.

XXVII. We forbid all brokers and others to cause, underhand, more freight to be paid for goods than is expressed in the first contract or charter party, under pain of one hundred livres, and a severer punishment if they deserve it.

XXVIII. However, the freighter of a whole ship that has not completed her lading, may take in other goods to make it up, and apply the freight to his own use.

TITLE FOURTH.

Of the Contracts and Wages of Seamen.

I. All agreements between masters and their seamen, shall be reduced into a writing, which shall contain all the conditions, whether they engage themselves by the month, or for the voyage; whether by the profit or freight; if otherwise, the seamen's oath shall be believed.

II. The seamen shall not load any goods upon their own account, under pretence of portage,³¹ nor otherwise, without paying the freight, except it be mentioned in their agreement.

III. If by the fault of the owners, masters or merchants, a voyage be broke before the departure of the ship, the seamen hired for the voyage shall be paid for the time taken up in rigging and equipping the ship, and have one fourth of their wages; and those engaged by the month, shall be paid in proportion, regard being had to the ordinary length of the voyage: but if the voyage be broke after it is begun, the seamen hired for the voyage shall be paid their whole wages, and those hired by the month what is due to them for the time they have already served, and for that which will be necessary for returning to the place from whence the ship departed; and both shall be paid for their maintenance till they arrive there.

IV. In case of a prohibition of trade, with the place to which the ship is bound, before the voyage begins, there shall be no wages due to the seamen of either sort; who shall only be paid for the time spent in fitting out the ship: and if such prohibition happens during the voyage, they shall only be paid in proportion to the time they have served.

V. If the ship be stopped by a sovereign order before the voyage be begun, there shall be nothing due to the seamen, but their wages for fitting out the ship; but if it is during the course of the voyage, those engaged by the month shall have half wages during the detention of the ship, and those engaged by the voyage shall be paid according to their agreement.

VI. If the voyage be prolonged, the wages of the seamen hired by the voyage shall be augmented proportionably,³² and if they voluntarily unlade in a nearer port than that mentioned in the agreement, their wages notwithstanding shall not be diminished: but if they are hired by the month, they shall be in both cases paid for the time they serve.³³

VII. And as for the seamen and others going by the profit or freight, they shall not pretend any wages for equipping or damages, if the voyage be broke, retarded or prolonged by a superior power, whether before or after the departure of the ship; but if the breaking, retarding or prolonging of the voyage, happens by the fault of the freighters, the seamen shall have share in the costs and damages allowed the master, who, as well as the owners shall pay damages to the seamen, if they be the cause of the hindrance.

VIII. In case the ship be taken, or suffer

³¹ By portage is here meant the privilege generally allowed the seamen in France, to carry a venture for their own account.

³² The first part of this article, has relation only to contracts with mariners for the voyage.

³³ Laws of Oleron, art 19; Laws of Wisbuy, art. 2.

shipwreck, and ship and goods be entirely lost, the seamen shall pretend to no wages; but they shall not however be obliged to restore what has been advanced to them.

IX. If some part of the ship be preserved, the seamen shall be paid the wages that are due to them out of the wreck they have preserved; and if there be only goods saved, the seamen, even those that are engaged by the freight, shall be paid their wages by the master, proportionably to the freight he receives; and whatever way they be hired, they shall be over and above paid for the time they are employed in saving the wreck and goods.³⁴

X. If a master dismiss a mariner without a sufficient cause before the voyage is begun, he must pay him one third of his wages; and if after the voyage is begun, he shall pay him his whole wages, together with his charges for returning to the place of his departure; nor shall he state that to the account of his owners.³⁵

XI. If a seaman be wounded in the service of a ship, or fall sick during the voyage, he shall be paid his wages, and treated at the charge of the ship, and if he be wounded in fighting against enemies or pirates, he shall be cured at the charge of ship and cargo.^{36 37}

XII. But if being on shore without leave, he be there wounded, he shall not be dressed at the charge of the ship, nor of the loading; and he may be dismissed, without pretending to any more than the wages that are due to him.³⁸

XIII. The heirs of a seaman hired by the month, and dying in the voyage, shall be paid his wages until the day of his decease.³⁹

XIV. The half of the wages of a seaman hired by the voyage shall be due to his heirs if he dies outward bound, and the whole if he dies in the way home: and if he sailed by the profit or freight, his heirs shall enjoy his full share, if the voyage be begun before his death.⁴⁰

XV. The wages of a seaman killed in defending the ship shall be entirely paid as if he had served all the voyage; provided the ship arrives safe at a good harbour.

XVI. Seamen taken in ships and made slaves, shall pretend nothing against the ³⁴ Laws of Oleron, art. 3; Laws of the Hanse Towns, art. 24.

³⁵ Laws of the Hanse Towns, arts. 41, 42; Laws of Wisbuy, art. 3.

³⁶ Laws of Wisbuy, arts. 18, 19; Laws of the Hanse Towns, arts. 39, 45; Laws of Oleron, arts. 1, 6, 7; Valin, Com. tom. 1, p. 721.

³⁷ "Treated" and "cured" are varied translations of the word "panse" in the original, and should in both places be "cured," which is the true meaning of "panse."

³⁸ Laws of Wisbuy, art. 18; Laws of the Hanse Towns, art. 39.

³⁹ Laws of Oleron, art. 7; Laws of Wisbuy, art. 19; Laws of the Hanse Towns, art. 45.

⁴⁰ Cleirac, p. 34.

masters, owners, or merchants for their ransom.

XVII. But if any of them, being sent out for the service of the ship, be taken ashore, or at sea, his ransom shall be paid at the expenses of the ship; and if he was sent out for the service of ship and cargo, his ransom shall be paid by both, if they arrive happily at a good port: however the whole shall not exceed three hundred livres besides his wages.⁴¹

XVIII. The master, immediately after the arrival of the ship, shall take care to regulate the sums appointed for the ransom of captives, and the money shall be deposited in the hands of the principal owner, who shall be obliged forthwith to apply it to that use, under pain of four times the value to be paid by him, for the benefit of the seamen that are in servitude.

XIX. The ship and freight shall be specially liable for the seamen's wages.

XX. The seamen's wages shall not contribute towards any average, except it be for the ransom of the ship.

XXI. What is ordained in this title for the wages and ransom of the seamen, and dressing and treating of the sick, shall take place for the officers and all others belonging to the ship.

TITLE FIFTH.

Of Contracts of Bottomry, etc.⁴²

I. All contracts of bottomry may be made either by a public notary, or under a private signature.

II. Money may be given upon the body and keel of the ship, and upon her rigging and tackle, munitions and provisions, jointly or separately, and upon all, or any part of her loading, for one whole voyage, or a time limited.

III. We forbid all persons to take up, upon their ships or goods on board thereof, more than their real value, under pain of being obliged in case of fraud, to pay the whole sums, notwithstanding the vessel should be lost or taken.

IV. We also forbid, under the like penalty, to take up any money upon the freight for the voyage to be made, or upon the profit expected on the lading, or even upon the seamen's wages; except it be in the presence and with the consent of the master, and under one half of the aforesaid wages.

V. We moreover forbid all persons to advance any money to seamen upon their wages and voyages in that manner, except it be in the presence and with the consent of the master, under pain of confiscations of the sums lent, and a fine of fifty livres.

VI. The masters shall be answerable in their names, for the total of the sums taken up by the seamen with their consent, except they exceed one half of their wages, and that notwithstanding the loss or taking of the ship.

VII. The ship, her rigging and tackle, munitions and provisions, and even the freight, shall be by privilege affected for the payment of the principal and interest of money given upon the body and keel of the ship, for the necessities of the voyage, and the lading.⁴³

VIII. Such as give money upon bottomry to a master without the consent of the owners, if they live in the place, shall have no security nor privilege upon the ship, any further than the part that the master may have in the ship and freight, though the money was borrowed for rigging the ship, or for buying provisions.⁴⁴

IX. However, the parts of such of the owners as refuse to furnish their proportions for fitting out the vessel, shall be affected for the money lent to the master for the equipment and provisions of the ship.⁴⁵

X. Creditors for money formerly due for such things, shall not come in competition with those that have actually lent for the last voyage.⁴⁶

XI. All contracts of bottomry shall become void by the entire loss of the effects upon which the money was lent, if that happens by casualty, and within the times and places therein expressed.

XII. Nothing shall be reputed a casualty that is occasioned by the defects of the things themselves, or by the fault of the owners, master or merchants, except it be otherwise provided by the contract.

XIII. If the time of the risk be not regulated by the contract, it shall last as to the ship, her rigging, tackle and provisions, from the day she sets sail till she arrives at her intended port, and is moored at the quay; and as to the goods, it shall last from the moment they are laded on board the ship or lighter to be carried thither, till they be unladed and ashore.⁴⁷

XIV. A person loading goods and taking up money upon them on bottomry, shall not be acquitted by the loss of the ship and lading, unless he makes it appear that he had there, upon his own account, effects to the value of the sum so borrowed.

XV. However, if the person that has taken money upon bottomry, makes it appear that he could not load goods to the value of the sum so borrowed, the contract, in case of loss, shall be diminished in proportion to the value of the effects loaded, and shall only subsist for the overplus; of which the borrower shall pay the interest, according to the current price of the place where the contract is made, till the actual

⁴¹ Valin, Com. tom. 1, p. 749.

⁴² Valin, Com. tom. 2, p. 1.

⁴³ Laws of Wisbuy, art. 45.

⁴⁴ Laws of the Hanse Towns, art. 58.

⁴⁵ Laws of the Hanse Towns, arts. 11, 59.

⁴⁶ La Guidon de la Mer, c. 19, arts. 2, 3.

⁴⁷ Cleirac, p. 381.

payment of the principal: and if the ship arrives in safety, there shall be due only the interest, and not the maritime profit of the overplus of the effects put aboard.

XVI. Lenders of money on bottomry, shall contribute towards gross averages, such as redemptions, compositions, ejections, masts and ropes, cut for the common safety of ship and goods; but not for the simple averages, or particular damages that may happen, except there intervene some agreement to the contrary.

XVII. However, in case of shipwreck, the contracts of bottomry shall be reduced to the value of the effects that are saved.

XVIII. If there be a contract of bottomry, and insurance upon the same loading, the lender shall be preferred to the insurers upon the effects preserved from shipwreck, for his capital, and no further.⁴⁸

TITLE SIXTH.

Of Insurances.

I. We allow all our subjects, as well as strangers, to insure, and cause to be insured, within the extent of our dominions, the ships, goods and effects, which shall be transported by sea or by navigable rivers; and we allow the insurers to stipulate a price, for which they will take the peril upon them.

II. The contract called "Policy of Insurance," shall be reduced into writing, and may be done under private signature.

III. The policy shall contain the name and dwelling place of the insured, his quality, whether of owner or factor, the effects upon which insurance is made, the name of the ship and master, that of the place where the goods are loaded, and from whence the ship departs, and that whither the ship is bound, and where the goods are to be unloaded; and also the names of all the places where the ship is to touch, the time that the risk is to begin and end, the sums insured, the premium or cost of the insurance, the submission of the parties to arbitrators in case of contestation; and generally all other conditions which they shall stipulate between them.

IV. Goods loaded in Europe for the ports of the Levant, the coasts of Africa, and other parts of the world, may be insured upon any ship whatsoever, without naming either the master or the ship, provided the name of the person to whom they are consigned be expressed in the policy.

V. If the policy does not regulate the time of the risk, they shall be regulated as are the contracts of bottomry, by the thirteenth article of title fifth.⁴⁹

VI. The premium, or cost of the insurance, shall be entirely paid at the signing of the policy; but if the insurance be made upon goods both out and home, and the vessel having arrived at the intended port do not return, the insurers shall restore one third of the premium, except there be a stipulation to the contrary.

VII. Insurances may be made upon the body and keel of the ship, empty or laded, before or during the voyage; upon the provisions and upon the goods, jointly or separately laded on board of any ship, armed or unarmed, alone or in company, for the going out or coming home, for a whole voyage, or a time limited.

VIII. If the insurance be made upon the body and keel of the ship, her rigging, tackle, munitions and provisions, or upon any portion thereof, the estimation shall be made in the policy; allowing the insurer, in case of fraud, to oblige the concerned to proceed to a new estimation.

IX. All navigators, passengers, and others, may insure the liberty of their persons; and in that case the policies shall contain the name, country, residence, age and quality of the person that insures himself; the name of the ship, of the port from whence she sails, and that of her last departure; the sum to be paid in case of being taken, as well for the ransom as the charges of returning; to whom the money shall be paid, and under what penalty.

X. We forbid all insurances upon the lives of any person.

XI. However, such as redeem captives may insure the lives of those they redeem, and the price of the redemption; which the insurers shall be obliged to pay, if the person redeemed is taken again, or killed, or drowned in his return, or if he perish by any other means but by a natural death.

XII. Women, may lawfully engage themselves, and alienate their patrimonial estates, for the redemption of their husbands.

XIII. Any person, who, upon the wife's refusal, and by the authority of justice, lends money for the ransom of the husband shall be preferred to the wife upon the husband's estate, except for the restitution of her patrimony.

XIV. Minors may, likewise, with the advice of their relations, contract such obligations for ransoming their fathers from captivity, without any possibility of revocation.

XV. The owners nor masters of ships shall not insure beforehand the freight of their ships; the merchants, the profit they expect by their goods; nor the seamen, their wages.

XVI. We forbid all persons borrowing money upon bottomry to insure it, under pain of the insurance being void, and corporal punishment.

XVII. We likewise forbid, under the same penalty, the lenders upon bottomry to insure the profit of the sums lent.

XVIII. The insured shall still run the hazard of the tenth part of the effects they lade, except there be a positive clause in the policy, declaring that they mean to insure the whole.

XIX. And if the insured be in the ship, or if they be the owners, they shall nevertheless less run the risk of one tenth, though they declare that they mean to insure the whole.

⁴⁸ See Valin, Com. tom. 2, p. 20.

⁴⁹ See ante, p. 1210.

XX. The insurers may re-insure with others the effects they may have insured, and the insured may likewise cause to be insured the premium of the insurance, and the solvency of the insurers.

XXI. The premiums of the re-insurance may be smaller or greater than those of the insurance.

XXII. We forbid to cause to be insured, or re-insured, any effects beyond their value, by one or several policies, under pain of nullity of the insurance and confiscation of the goods.

XXIII. However, if there happens to be made without fraud, a policy exceeding the value of the effects laded, it shall subsist for the value of the goods: and in case of loss, the insurers shall be bound, every one for the sum by him insured, and likewise to restore the overplus of the premium, retaining only a half per cent.

XXIV. And if there happen to be several policies likewise made without fraud, and the first contains the value of the goods laded, it shall subsist alone, and the other insurers shall not be bound in the insurance, but shall render the premium, retaining only a half per cent.

XXV. In case the first policy does not amount to the value of the effects laded, the insurers of the second shall be answerable for the overplus; and if there be effects laded to the value of the insurance, in case of the loss of some part of them, it shall be paid by the insurers there mentioned at so much per ⁵⁰ livre of the sums they are concerned in.

XXVI. All losses and damages happening at sea by tempest, shipwreck, running aground or aboard of other ships, changing of course of the voyage or course of the ship, ejection, fire, taking, rifting, detention by princes' declarations of war, reprisals, and generally by all other maritime accidents, shall be at the risk of the insurers.

XXVII. However, if the changing of the course, voyage or ship, happens by the order of the insured, without the consent of the insurers, they shall be discharged from the risk; which shall likewise take place in all other losses and damages happening by the fault of the insured; nor shall the insurers be obliged to restore the premium, if the time of their bearing the risk be begun.

XXVIII. Nor shall the insurers be obliged to bear the losses and damages happening to ships and goods by the fault of the master and mariners, except that by the policy they be engaged for the barratry of the master.

XXIX. The wastes, diminutions, and losses, happening by the proper defects of the goods, shall not fall upon the insurers.

XXX. Nor shall they be concerned in the pilotage, lodemanage, duties of passports, searchings, declarations, anchorage, or in any others imposed upon ships or goods.

XXXI. The goods subject to leakage shall be expressed in the policy; if not, the insurers shall not be answerable for damages befalling them by tempest, except the insurance be made upon returns from foreign countries.

XXXII. If the insurance on goods be made separately by several ships mentioned, and the whole loading be put in one, the insurer shall only run the risk of the sum insured upon the ship in which the goods are loaded, even though all the ships together should perish; and he shall restore the premium of the overplus, retaining only a half per cent.

XXXIII. When the masters and patrons have liberty to touch at several ports, the insurers shall not run the hazard of the effects which shall be ashore, though they be intended for the loading they have insured, and the ship be in the port to take them aboard; except there be an express clause for it in the policy.

XXXIV. If the insurance be made for a limited time, without expressing the voyage, the insurer shall be discharged after the expiration of the time, and the insured may cause the goods to be insured again.

XXXV. But if the voyage be expressed in the policy, the insurer shall run the hazard of the whole voyage; upon condition however, that if it exceeds the limited time, the premium shall be augmented in proportion: nor shall the insurer be obliged to restore any thing, if the voyage be sooner ended.

XXXVI. The insurers shall be discharged from the risk, without losing the premium, if the insured, without their consent, send the ship to a place farther distant than that mentioned in the policy, though in the same course: but the insurance shall have its full effect, if the voyage be only shortened.

XXXVII. If the voyage be entirely broke before the departure of the ship, though by the fault of the insured, the insurance shall remain null; and the insurers shall restore the premium, all but a half per cent.

XXXVIII. We declare void all insurances made after the loss or arrival of the effects insured, if the insured knew, or could know of the loss, or the insurer of the arrival, before the signing of the policy.

XXXIX. The insured shall be presumed to have known of the loss, and the insurer of the arrival of the effects insured, if it be found that the news might have been brought from the place of the loss or arrival of the ship, to that of the signing of the policy, after either of these happened, and before the signing; allowing a league and a half per hour, without the prejudice of such other proofs as may be brought.

XL. However, if the insurance be made upon good or bad news, it shall subsist; except it be made appear, by other proofs than that of the league and half per hour, that the insured knew of the loss, or the insurer of the arrival of the ship, before the signing of the insurance.

⁵⁰ The French, in making computations, reckon so much per livre, as we do per cent.

XXI. In case of proof against the insured, he shall be obliged to restore to the insurer what he has received, and pay him double the premium; and if there be proof against the insurer, he shall be likewise condemned to the restitution of the premium, and to pay the double to the insured.

XXII. When the insured receives advice of the loss of the ships or goods insured, of the detention thereof by any prince, and other accidents in which the insurers are concerned; he shall be obliged to cause it forthwith to be signified unto them, or to the person that has signed the policy for them, with protestation to make his abandonment in time of place.

XXIII. However, the insured, instead of protestation, may at the same time make his abandonment, and summons the insurers to pay the sums insured, within the time specified in the policy.

XXIV. If the time of payment be not specified in the policy, the insurers shall be obliged to pay the insurance within three months after the signification.

XXV. In case of shipwreck, or running aground, the insured may endeavour to recover the shipwrecked effects, without prejudice of the abandonment, which he may make in time and place; and of the reimbursement of his charges, as to which his affirmation shall be believed, to the value of the effects preserved.

XXVI. An abandonment shall not be made but in case of being taken, wrecked, run aground, stopped by a prince, or the entire loss of the goods insured; and all other damages shall only be reputed average, and shall be regulated between the insurers and insured, in proportion to their concerns.

XXVII. No person can make an abandonment of one part, retaining the other; nor any demand for average, except it exceed one per cent.

XXVIII. Abandonments, and all demands for the execution of a policy, shall be made to the insurers within six weeks after the news of losses happened upon the coasts of the same province where the insurance is made; and for those that happen in another province of our kingdom, within three months; upon the coasts of England, Flanders and Holland, four months; upon those of Spain, Italy, Portugal, Barbary, Muscovy and Norway, one year; and upon the coasts of America, Brazil, Guinea, and other remote countries, two years; and that time being expired, the insurers shall not be heard in their demands.

XXIX. In case of a ship's being detained by any prince, the abandonment shall not be made until six months afterwards, if the ship be stopped in Europe or Barbary; and a year in remoter countries; reckoning from the day that that was signified to the insurers: and in that case, the exception against the insurers mentioned in the precedent article, shall only commence from the day that they may have begun to act therein.

L. However, if the goods so stopped be perishable, the abandonment may be made after six weeks, if they be stopped in Europe or Barbary; and after three months, if in a remoter country; counting from the day that the stoppage was signified to the insurers.

LI. The insured shall be obliged during these delays to use their utmost endeavours to get the arrest taken off the effects that are detained; and the insurers may do it themselves, if they please.

LII. If a vessel be detained by our order, in any port of our kingdom, before the voyage be begun; the insured may not, because of that arrest, abandon his effects to the insurer.

LIII. The insured shall be obliged, in making his abandonment, to declare all the insurances that he has caused to be made, and the money taken on bottomry upon the effects insured; under pain of being deprived of the benefit of the insurances.

LIV. If the insured conceals any insurances or contracts of bottomry, which, with these he declares, exceed the value of the effects insured, he shall be deprived of the benefit of the insurances, and obliged to pay the sums borrowed, notwithstanding the loss or taking of the vessel.

LV. And if he sues for payment of the sums insured beyond the value of his effects, he shall further be punished exemplarily.

LVI. The insurers of the loading shall not be obliged to pay the sums by them insured, beyond the value of the effects of which the insured proves the loading and the loss.

LVII. The evidences⁵¹ of the loading, and loss of the effects insured, shall be signified to the insurers immediately after the abandonment, and before they be sued for payment of the sums insured.

LVIII. However if the insured receives no news of his ship, he may, after the expiration of one year (reckoning from the day of departure) for the ordinary voyages, and after two years for long voyages, make his abandonment to the insurers; and demand payment, without any necessity of an attestation for certifying the loss.

LIX. Voyages from France into Muscovy, Greenland, Canada, Newfoundland, and other coasts and islands of America, to the Green Cape and coasts of Guinea, and all other places beyond the tropic, shall be reputed long voyages.

LX. After the abandonment is declared, the effects insured shall belong to the insurer; who must not, under pretence of the returning of the vessel, delay to pay the sums insured.

LXI. The insurer may bring what proofs he can against the validity of the attestations; but shall nevertheless be condemned by provisions to pay the sums insured; security being given him by those to whom he pays them.

⁵¹ By those are meant bills of loading, and other necessary certificates, papers and writings.

LXII. A master causing goods loaded on board his own ship for his own account to be insured, shall be obliged, in case of the loss thereof, to prove the buying of them, and to produce a bill of loading signed by the clerk and the pilot.

LXIII. All mariners and others, who shall bring goods from foreign countries upon which they have caused insurance to be made in France, shall be obliged to leave a bill of lading in the hands of the French consul or his chancellor, if there be any in the place where the goods are loaded; and if otherwise, in the hands of some eminent merchant of the French nation.

LXIV. The value of the goods shall be proved by books or invoices; if otherwise, the estimation thereof shall be made according to the current price at the place and time that they were loaded: included all duties and charges in getting them abroad; except the value be expressed in the policy.

LXV. If insurance be made upon returns from a country where traders only carry on by barter, the returns shall be made according to the value of the goods given in exchange for them, including the charges of their transportation.

LXVI. In case of capture the insured may redeem their effects without the order of the insurers, if they cannot give them advice thereof; but they must afterwards inform them by writing of the composition they have made.

LXVII. The insurers may take the composition for their benefit, in proportion to their concerns; and in that case they shall be obliged forthwith to make their declaration, to contribute actually towards the payment of the ransom, and to run the hazard of the return; or otherwise to pay the sums by them insured, without having any pretensions upon the ransomed effects.

LXVIII. We forbid all makers of policies, clerks of the chambers of insurance, notaries, brokers and others, to cause to be signed any policies where any blank is left, under pain of all damages and charges; and likewise to draw up any in which they themselves are concerned directly or indirectly by themselves, or by persons interposed; or to take any cession of right from the insured, under pain of five hundred livres for the first time, and deprivation of their employments in case of a relapse; which penalties shall not be in any manner moderated.

LXIX. We likewise enjoin them under the like penalties, to have a register quoted and flourished on every leaf by the lieutenant of the admiralty, and therein to record the policies they draw up.

LXX. When the policy contains a submission to arbitration, and one of the parties desire to go before the arbitrators before any contest happens, the other party shall be obliged to consent; or if otherwise, the judge shall name for the refuser.

LXXI. Within eight days after the nomination of the arbitrators, the parties shall deliver the deeds and writing into their hands; and within the eight days following, they shall pronounce sentence thereupon.

LXXII. The decisions of arbitrators shall be confirmed in the court of admiralty, within the jurisdiction of which they are pronounced: and we forbid the judge, under that pretence, to take any knowledge of the cause, under pain of nullity, and all the charges, costs and damages of the parties.

LXXIII. Appeals from decisions by arbitrators' sentences and confirmations, shall be carried before our courts of parliament, and shall not be received until the penalty expressed in the clause of submission be paid.

LXXIV. The sentences of arbitrators may be executed, notwithstanding the appeals; security being given before the judges who confirm them.

TITLE SEVENTH.

Of Averages.⁵²

I. All extraordinary charges for the ships and their lading jointly or separately, and all damages which shall befall them from the time of their loading and departure, till their arrival and unloading, shall be reputed average.

II. The extraordinary charges for the ship alone, or for the goods alone, and the damage befalling either in particular, shall be simple and particular averages, and the extraordinary charges paid, and damages suffered for the common good and safety of ship and goods, shall be gross and common averages.

III. The simple averages shall be borne and paid by the owner of the thing that suffers the damages, or occasions the charge; but the gross or common averages shall fall upon the ship and goods at so much per livre, in proportion to their value.

IV. The loss of cables, anchors, sails, masts, and ropes, occasioned by tempest or any maritime accident, and damage, happening to the ship by the fault of the master or company, by neglecting to shut close the hatches, moor the ship, providing good tackle and ropes, or otherwise are simple averages, and shall be borne by the master, ship and freight.⁵³

V. Damages happening to goods by their own defects, tempest, being taken, shipwrecked, or run aground; the charges paid for preserving them, and the duties, impositions, and customs, are likewise simple averages, at the cost of their owners.

VI. Things given by composition to pirates, for ransom of the ship and loading; those that are cast into the sea, masts or cables broke or cut, anchors and other effects abandone for the common safety, damage done to goods remaining in the ship by throwing over others; the dressing and treating seamen wounded in the defence of the ship, and the charges of lightening to enter into a port or river, or to get a ship afloat, shall be gross or common averages.

⁵² Valin, Com. tom. 2, p. 158.

⁵³ Laws of Wisbuy, art. 12.

VII. The maintenance and hire of the seamen of a ship detained by a sovereign prince's order, shall likewise be reputed gross averages, if the ship be hired by the month; but if by the voyage, they shall be borne by the ship only, as simple averages.

VIII. The lodemanage, towage, and pilotage for entering into, or going out of a river are petty averages, one third to be paid by the ship, and the other two by the goods.⁵⁴

IX. The dues for the passport, search, declaration, anchorage, buoys, and sea marks, shall not be reputed averages, but shall be paid by the master.

X. In case of ships running aboard each other, the damage shall be equally sustained by those that have suffered and done it, whether during the course, in a road, or in a harbour.⁵⁵

XI. But if the damage be occasioned by either of the masters, it shall be repaired by him.⁵⁶

TITLE EIGHTH.

Of Ejections and Contributions.

I. If by tempest, or being chased by enemies or pirates, the master believes himself obliged to throw overboard part of his lading, to cut or force his masts, or leave his anchors; he must take the advice of the merchants, and principal men of the ship's company.⁵⁷

II. If they differ in their opinions, that of the master and ship's company shall prevail.

III. The utensils of the ship, and other things that are least necessary, heaviest, and of least value, shall be thrown overboard first, and afterwards the goods between decks: however, all must be done by the order of the captain, with the advice of the ship's company.

IV. The clerk, or such other person as performs his function, shall insert the deliberation in his book, as soon as possible; and shall cause it to be signed by those that voted, or otherwise shall mention the reason why they did not sign; and shall take as exact an account as he can of the goods thrown overboard or damnified.

V. At the first port where the ship touches, the master shall declare before the judge of the admiralty, if any be; and if none, before the ordinary judge, the reason of the ejection, or the cutting or forcing of his masts, or leaving of his anchors. and if it is in a foreign country he arrives, he shall make that declaration before the French consul.

VI. The master shall take care to make the account of the losses and damages, at the place where the ship is unloaded; and the goods cast away, and those that are preserved, shall be esteemed according to the current price thereof, at the said place.⁵⁸

VII. The reparation for the payment of losses and damages, shall be made upon the goods lost and preserved, and upon the half of the ship and freight, at so much per livre, according to their value.⁵⁹

VIII. The better to judge of the quality of effects thrown overboard, the bills of loading and invoices, if there be any, shall be produced.

IX. If the quality of goods be misrepresented by bills of loading, and they be found to be of greater value than they were said to be by the merchant that laded them, they shall contribute, if saved, in proportion to their real value; but if lost, shall only be paid according to the bills of loading.

X. And if on the other hand, the goods are found to be of a meaner quality, and be preserved; they shall notwithstanding contribute according to the declaration: and if they be cast away or damnified, they shall only be paid according to their value.

XI. The munitions and provisions, and seamen's clothes and wages, shall not contribute towards the ejection; but such things as are cast away shall be paid by contribution, out of the other effects.

XII. Effects for which there is no bill of loading, shall not be paid, though thrown overboard; but if they are saved, they shall nevertheless contribute.⁶⁰

XIII. There shall no contribution be demanded for payments of such effects as were upon the deck, if they be thrown overboard, or damnified by the ejection; allowing the owner his recourse against the master: however, if they are preserved they shall contribute.

XIV. Nor shall any contribution be made, for damage befallen the ship, except it be done of purpose to facilitate the ejection.

XV. If the ejection does not save the ship, there shall be no contribution; and the goods that are saved from shipwreck, shall not be in any measure liable to pay the loss or damage of those that have been thrown away or spoiled.

XVI. But if the ship being once preserved by the ejection, continuing her course, comes afterwards to be lost, the effects that are preserved, shall contribute towards the ejection, according to their value, in the condi-

⁵⁴ Laws of Wisbuy, arts. 44, 56, 59, 60.

⁵⁵ Laws of Oleron, art. 14; Laws of Wisbuy, arts. 26, 50, 67, 70.

⁵⁶ Laws of Wisbuy, arts. 28, 51; Laws of Oleron, art. 15; Valin, Com. tom. 1, p. 188.

⁵⁷ Laws of Oleron, arts. 8, 9; Laws of Wisbuy, arts. 20, 21, 38.

⁵⁸ Laws of Oleron, art. 8; Laws of Wisbuy, art. 39.

⁵⁹ By the eighth article of the Laws of Oleron, the master may contribute for his ship or for his freight, as he pleases.

⁶⁰ Laws of Oleron, art. 8; Laws of Wisbuy, art. 43.

tion they shall be in, charges being first deducted.

XVII. The effects cast away shall not contribute in any case, towards the payment of damages, happening after the ejection, to the goods that are preserved; nor the goods to the payment of the ship, if lost or broken.

XVIII. However, if the ship be opened by the determination of the chief men of the company, and of the merchant, if any be, to take out the goods; they shall in that case contribute for the reparation of the damage done to the ship, to take them out.

XIX. In case of the loss of goods put aboard of any bark for lightening of a ship entering into any river, reparation shall be made by the whole ship and loading.

XX. But if the vessel perish, with the rest of its loading, no reparation shall be made by goods put out into barges, though they arrive safe at their port.

XXI. If the owners of any goods that ought to contribute, refuse to pay their proportion, the master may, for the security of the contribution, retain, or by the authority of justice, may sell goods, to the value of their said proportions.⁶¹

XXII. If after the reparation, the effects thrown overboard be recovered by the owners, they shall be obliged to restore to the master, and the others concerned, what they have received of the contribution, deducting for the damage caused to their goods by the ejection, and for the charges of recovering them.

⁶¹ Laws of Oleron, art. 9.

TABLE OF LAND CLAIMS

PRESENTED TO THE COMMISSION PURSUANT TO THE PROVISIONS OF THE ACT OF CONGRESS OF MARCH 3, 1851, ENTITLED "AN ACT TO ASCER-TAIN AND SETTLE THE PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA."

[Reprinted from 1 Hoff. Land Cas. Append. 1.]

NOTE. The first number is that of the Commission; the second is the number of the District Court. N. D. and S. D. stand for Northern or Southern District. Where there is a third or other numbers they correspond to the Jimeno Index, from No. 1 to No. 433, and to Hartnell's Index, a continuation of Jimeno's Index, from No. 434 to No. 579.

1, 1, N. D., 352. John C. Fremont, claimant for Las Mariposas, 10 square leagues, in Mariposa county, granted February 29th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Juan Bautista Alvarado; claim filed January 21st, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 27th, 1852, by the district court June 27th, 1854, and by the U. S. supreme court in 17 Howard [58 U. S.] 542; containing 44,386.83 acres. Patented.

2, 54, N. D. Maria de la Soledad, Ortega de Arguello et als., claimants for Las Pulgas, 4 square leagues, in San Mateo county, granted December 10th, 1835, to Luis Arguello; claim filed January 21st, 1852, confirmed by the commission October 2d, 1853, by the district court January 26th, 1855, and by the U. S. supreme court in 18 Howard [59 U. S.] 539; containing 35,240.47 acres. Patented.

3, 2, N. D., 266. Archibald Ritchie, claimant for Suisun, 4 square leagues, in Sonoma county, granted January 28th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to Francisco Solano; claim filed January 21st, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 3d, 1852, by the district court November 8th, 1853, and by the U. S. supreme court in 17 Howard [58 U. S.] 525; containing 17,754.73 acres.

4, 100, N. D. Domingo and Vicente Peralta, claimants for San Antonio, in Alameda county, granted August 16th, 1820, by Don Pablo Vicente de Sola to Luis Peralta; claim filed January 21st, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 7th, 1854, by the district court January 26th, 1855, and by the U. S. supreme court in 19 Howard [60 U. S.] 343; containing 19,143.86 acres.

5, 297, N. D. Thomas Jefferson Smith, claimant for 200 varas, Mission Dolores, in San Francisco county, granted July 26th, 1843, by Juan B. Alvarado to Domingo Feliz; claim filed January 21st, 1852, rejected by the commission March 20th, 1855, and for failure of prosecution appeal dismissed April 21st, 1856.

6, 416, N. D., 250. Roland Gelston, claimant for New Helvetia, 11 square leagues, in Yuba and Sutter counties, granted June 18th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to John A. Sutter; claim filed January 21st, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 26th, 1856, and by the district court November 25th, 1859. See No. 92.

7, 174, N. D., 286. Bernard Murphy, claimant for Las Uvas, 3 square leagues, in Santa Clara county, granted June 14th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to Lorenzo Pineda; claim filed January 22d, 1852, confirmed by the commission September 19th, 1854, and by the district court January 14th, 1856; containing 11,079.93 acres.

8, 77, N. D., 353. Robert F. Stockton, claimant for Potrero de Santa Clara, 1 square league, in Santa Clara county, granted February 29th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to James Alexander Forbes; claim filed January 24th, 1852, confirmed by the commission November 15th, 1853, and by the district court October 29th, 1855; containing 1,939.03 acres.

9, 13, S. D., 25. William G. Dana, claimant for Nipoma, 15 square leagues, in Santa Barbara county, granted April 6th, 1837, by Juan B. Alvarado to Guillermo Dana; claim filed January 26th, 1852, confirmed by the commission March 1st, 1853, and dismissed December 20th, 1856; containing 32,728.62 acres.

10, 214, N. D. Emilius Voss, claimant for Las Mariposas, 11 square leagues in Mariposa county, granted September 19th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to Manuel Castañares; claim filed January 26th, 1852, rejected by the commission November 21st, 1854, and for failure of prosecution appeal dismissed April 21st, 1856.

11, 299, N. D. Joel S. Polack, claimant for Island of Yerba Buena, in Bay of San Francisco, granted November 8th, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Juan José Castro; claim filed January 27th, 1852, confirmed by the commission May 22d, 1855, and rejected by the district court March 17th, 1858.

12, 13, N. D., 462. Archibald A. Ritchie, claimant for Guenoc, 6 square leagues, in Sonoma county, granted May 8th, 1845, by Pio Pico to George Rock; claim filed January 27th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 18th, 1852, and appeal dismissed December 15th, 1856; containing 21,220.03 acres.

13, 10, S. D., 147. José de la Guerra y Noriega, claimant for San Julian, 6 square leagues, in Santa Barbara county, granted April 7th, 1837, by Juan B. Alvarado to George Rock; claim filed January 28th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 21st, 1853, by the district court December 17th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1859; containing 48,221.68 acres.

14, 31, N. D., 35. Elam Brown, claimant for Acalanes, 1 square league, in Contra Costa county, granted August 1st, 1834, by José Figueroa to Candelario Valencia; claim filed February 2d, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 14th, 1853, and appeal dismissed November 26th, 1856; containing 3,328.95 acres. Patented.

15, 15, S. D., 171. Joaquin and José A. Carrillo, claimants for Lompoc, in Santa Barbara county, granted April 15th, 1837, by Juan B. Alvarado to Joaquin and José A. Carrillo; claim filed February 2d, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 11th, 1853, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 38,335.78 acres.

16, 52, N. D., 254, 411. Josefa Carrillo Fitch et al., claimants for Sotoyomé, 8 square leagues, in Sonoma and Mendocino counties, granted September 28th, 1841, by Manuel Micheltorena to Henry D. Fitch; claim filed February 2d, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 18th, 1853, and appeal dismissed November 17th, 1857; containing 48,836.51 acres.

17, 6, N. D., 494. José de Jesus Noé, claimant for San Miguel, 1 square league, in San Francisco county, granted December 23d, 1845, by Pio Pico to José de Jesus Noé; claim filed February 2d, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 18th, 1852, and appeal dismissed October 23d, 1856; containing 4,443.38 acres.

18, 208, N. D. Antonio Maria Osio, claimant for Island of Los Angeles, in San Francisco county, granted June 11th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Antonio Maria Osio; claim filed February 2d, 1852, confirmed by the commission October 24th, 1854, by the district court September 10th, 1855, and decree reversed by the U. S. supreme court and cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the petition, 23 Howard [64 U. S.] 273.

19, 44, N. D. Antonio Cazares, claimant for Cañada de Pogolomé, 2 square leagues, in Marin county, granted February 12th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Antonio Cazares; claim filed February 3d, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 11th, 1853, by the district court March 24th, 1856, and appeal dismissed December 8th, 1856; containing 8,780.81 acres. Patented.

20, 102, S. D., 82. Juan Miguel Anzar, claimant for Los Aromitas y Agua Caliente, 3 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted October 12th, 1835, by José Castro to Juan Miguel Anzar; claim filed February 3d, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 10th, 1853, by the district court December 10th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 21st, 1857; containing 8,659.69 acres.

21, 75, N. D., 220. Maria Luisa Greer et al., claimants for Cañada de Raymundo, two and a half by three-quarter leagues, in San Mateo county, granted August 3d, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to John Coppinger; claim filed February 3d, 1852, confirmed by the commission November 29th, 1853, by the district court January 14th, 1856, and appeal dismissed November 11th, 1856; containing 12,545.01 acres. Patented.

22, 258, S. D., 127. Juan Miguel Anzar and Manuel Larios, claimants for Santa Ana, 1 square league, and Quien Sabe, 6 square leagues, in Santa Clara county, granted April 9th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Manuel Larios and Juan Anzar; claim filed February 6th, 1852, confirmed by the commission November 7th, 1854, by the district court December 11th, 1856, and appeal dismissed June 4th, 1857; 48,822.60 acres. Patented.

23, 35, N. D., 308. Stephen Smith and Manuela T. Curtis, claimants for Bodega, 8 square leagues, in Sonoma county, granted September 14th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Stephen Smith; claim filed February 9th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 21st, 1853, by the district court July 5th, 1855, and appeal dismissed April 2d, 1857; containing 35,487.53 acres. Patented.

24, 224, N. D., 280. Stephen Smith, claimant for Blucher, 6 square leagues, in Sonoma county, granted October 14th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Juan Vioget; claim filed February 9th, 1852, confirmed by the commission October 31st, 1854, by the district court January 26th, 1857, and appeal dismissed April 2d, 1857; containing 26,759.42 acres. Patented.

25, 147, N. D., 19. Daniel and Bernard Murphy and James and Martin Murphy, claimants for San Francisco de Las Llagas, 6 square leagues, in Santa Clara county, granted February 3d, 1834, by José Figueroa to Carlos Castro; claim filed February 9th, 1852, confirmed by the commission August 22d, 1854, by the district court October 22d, 1855, and appeal dismissed November 24th, 1856; containing 22,979.66 acres.

26, 162, N. D. Dolores Riesgo Armijo et al., heirs of José F. Armijo, claimants for Las Tolenas, 3 square leagues, in Solano county, granted March 10th, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to José Francisco Armijo; claim filed February 9th, 1852, rejected by the commission August 8th, 1854, and appeal dismissed November 24th, 1856; containing 13,315.93 acres.

27, 18, N. D., 243. José Rafael Gonzalez and Mariana Gonzalez, claimants for San Miguelito de Trinidad, 5 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted July 24th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to José Rafael Gonzalez; claim filed February 9th, 1852, confirmed by the commission March 1st, 1853, by the district court September 24th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 17th, 1857; containing 22,135.89 acres.

28, 4, N. D. Pearson B. Reading, claimant for San Buenaventura, 6 square leagues, in Sacramento county, granted December 4th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to P. B. Reading; claim filed February 9th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 18th, 1852, by the district court October 31st, 1853, and by the U. S. supreme court in 18 Howard [59 U. S.] 1; containing 26,632.09 acres. Patented.

29, 391, N. D. Thomas Dorland, claimant for 200 square yards, in San Francisco county, (Mission Dolores) granted by Mariano Castro to Toribio Fanfaran; claim filed February 9th, 1852, rejected by the commission September 25th, 1855, and for failure of prosecution appeal dismissed March 30th, 1857.

30, 5, N. D., 177. Carmen Sibirian de Bernal and José Cornelio Bernal, claimants for Rincon de las Salinas y Potrero Nuevo, 1 square league, in San Francisco county, granted October 10th, 1839, by Manuel Jimeno to José Cornelio de Bernal; claim filed February 9th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 18th, 1852, by the district court August 20th, 1855, and appeal dismissed December 8th, 1856; containing 4,446.40 acres. Patented.

31, 177, S. D., 14, 145. Isabel Yorba, claimant for Guadaluasca, in Santa Barbara county, granted May 6th, 1846, by Mariano Chico to Isabel Yorba; claim filed February 9th, 1852, rejected by the commission April 25th, 1854, confirmed by the district court March 3d, 1856, and appeal dismissed. December 8th, 1856; containing 30,593.85 acres.

32, 94, N. D., 109. Juan Wilson, claimant for Guillicos, 4 square leagues, in Sonoma county, granted November 20th, 1847, by Juan B. Alvarado to John Wilson; claim filed February 10th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 27th, 1853, by the district court March 3d, 1856, and appeal dismissed December 8th, 1856; containing 18,833.86 acres.

33, 353, N. D. Eustaquio and José Ramon Valencia, claimants for 200 varas square, Mission Dolores, in San Francisco county, granted July 18th, 1845, by Mariano Castro to Eustaquio and José Ramon Valencia; claim filed February 17th, 1852, and rejected by the commission July 3d, 1855.

34, 389, N. D. Candelario Valencia, claimant for 50 varas square, Mission Dolores, in San Francisco county, granted November 18th, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado; claim filed February 11th, 1852, confirmed by the commission August 14th, 1855, by the district court December 28th, 1857, and appeal dismissed December 28th, 1857.

Candelario Valencia, claimant for 100 varas square, Mission Dolores, in San Francisco county, granted May 18th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado.

35, 57, N. D., 347. Sebastian Nunez, claimant for Orestimba, 6 square leagues, in Tuolumne county, granted February 21st, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Sebastian Nunez; claim filed February 12th, 1852, rejected by the commission October 25th, 1853, confirmed by the district court May 4th, 1857, and appeal dismissed September 3d, 1858; containing 26,641.17 acres.

36, 36, N. D., 6. Maximo Martinez, claimant for El Corte de Madera, 2 square leagues, in Santa Clara county, granted May 1st, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Maximo Martinez; claim filed February 12th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 28th, 1853, by the district court September 10th, 1855, and appeal dismissed April 2d, 1857; containing 13,316.05 acres. Patented.

37, 62, N. D., 315. Juan Perez Pacheco, claimant for San Luis Gonzaga, in Mariposa county, granted December 3d, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to Francisco Rivera; claim filed February 12th, 1852, rejected by the commission October 18th, 1853, confirmed by the district court April 21st, 1856, and appeal dismissed September 3d, 1858; containing 48,821.43 acres.

38, 103, S. D., 271. José de la Guerra y Noriega, claimant for San José de Gracia or Simi, in Santa Barbara county, granted 1795, by Borica to Patricio Javier y Miguel Pico, and revalidated by J. B. Alvarado April 25th, 1842; claim filed February 12th, 1852, confirmed by the commission March 14th, 1854, and appeal dismissed December 20th, 1856; containing 92,341.38 acres.

39, 11, S. D. Victor Linares, claimant for 1,000 varas square, in San Luis Obispo county, granted September 18th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to Victor Linares; claim filed February 12th, 1852, confirmed by the commission March 14th, 1853, by the district court January 14th, 1857, and appeal dismissed June 3d, 1859; containing 165.76 acres.

40, 14, N. D., 383. Arch. A. Ritchie and Paul S. Forbes, claimants for Callayomi, 3 square leagues, in Sonoma county, granted January 17th, 1845, by Manuel Micheltorena to Robert F. Ridley; claim filed February 12th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 22d, 1852, and appeal dismissed December 8th, 1856; containing 8,241.74 acres.

41, 14, S. D., 144. Ramona Carrillo de Wilson, claimant for 5 square leagues, granted April 6th, 1837, by Juan B. Alvarado to Ramona Carrillo; claim filed February 12th, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 11th, 1853, and by the district court January 8th, 1857.

42, 345, N. D. James and Squire Williams, claimants for 1 square league, granted June 12th, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to Gil Sanchez; claim filed February 17th, 1852, confirmed by the commission July 10th, 1855, and appeal dismissed December 24th, 1856.

43, 95, N. D., 488. Manuel Torres, claimant for Muniz, 4 square leagues, in Mendocino county, granted December 4th, 1845, by Pio Pico to Manuel Torres; claim filed February 17th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 27th, 1853, by the district court October 17th, 1855, and appeal dismissed May 7th, 1857; containing 17,760.75 acres. Patented.

44, 61, N. D., 483. Bartolomé Bojorquez, claimant for Laguna de San Antonio, 6 square leagues, in Marin county, granted November 5th, 1845, by Pio Pico to B. Bojorquez; claim filed February 17th, 1852, confirmed by the commission October 12th, 1853, by the district court September 10th, 1855, and appeal dismissed November 24th, 1856; containing 24,903.42 acres.

45, 397. Thomas B. Valentine, claimant for Arroyo de San Antonio, 3 square leagues, in Marin county, granted October 8th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Juan Miranda; claim filed February 17th, 1852, and discontinued February 6th, 1855.

46. Thomas Jefferson Smith, claimant for 200 varas, Mission Dolores, in San Francisco county, granted August 20th, 1842, to Domingo Feliz; claim filed February 17th, 1852; included in No. 5.

47, 211, S. D. Francisco Perez Pacheco, claimant for San Justo, 4 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted April 15th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to José Castro; claim filed February 17th, 1852, confirmed by the commission September 26th, 1854, by the district court June 3d, 1857, and appeal dismissed June 8th, 1857; containing 33,689.99 acres.

48, 24, S. D. Francisco Branch, claimant for Santa Manuela, in San Luis Obispo county, granted April 6th, 1837, by Juan B. Alvarado to Francisco Branch; claim filed February 17th, 1852, confirmed by the commission March 1st, 1853, by the district court October 16th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 16,954.83 acres.

49, 32, S. D., 100. Carlos Antonio Carrillo, claimant for Sespé, 6 square leagues, in Santa Barbara county, granted November 9th, 1833, by José Figueroa to C. A. Carrillo; claim filed February 17th, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 18th, 1853, and by the district court February 19th, 1856.

50, 261, S. D. John Wilson, claimant for Huerta de Romaldo, one-tenth square league, in San Luis Obispo county, granted 1842 by J. B. Alvarado, and July 10th, 1846, by Pio Pico, to Romaldo; claim filed February 17th, 1852, rejected by the commission December 12th, 1854, and confirmed by the district court February 9th, 1857.

51, 53, S. D., 553. Fernando Tico, claimant for 400 varas, Mission of San Buenaventura, in Santa Barbara county, granted March 24th, 1845, by Pio Pico to F. Tico; claim filed February 17th, 1852, confirmed by the commission November 23d, 1853, by the district court January 7th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1857; containing 28.90 acres.

52, 159, N. D. Bernard Murphy, claimant for La Polka, 1 square league, in Santa Clara county, granted January 19th, 1833, by José Figueroa to Ysabel Ortega; claim filed February 17th, 1852, confirmed by the commission August 15th, 1854, by the district court January 14th, 1856, and appeal dismissed January 18th, 1856; containing 4,166.78 acres.

- 53, 148, N. D., 361. Domingo Feliz, claimant for Feliz Rancho, 1 square league, in San Mateo county, granted May 1st, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to D. Feliz; claim filed February 17th, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 27th, 1854, by the district court October 29th, 1855, and appeal dismissed November 18th, 1856; containing 4,448.27 acres.
- 54, 4, S. D., 94. David S. Spence, claimant for Encinal y Buena Esperanza, 2 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted November 29th, 1834, by José Figueroa to D. S. Spence; 1 square league additional, in Monterey county, granted April 15th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado; claims filed February 19th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 14th, 1853, by the district court December 19th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 23d, 1857; containing 13,351.64 acres.
- 55, 370, S. D. Francisco Castillo Negrete, claimant for Quien Sabe, 6 square leagues, in San Joaquin county, granted April 16th, 1836, by Nicolas Gutierrez to F. C. Negrete; claim filed February 20th, 1852, and rejected by the commission September 11th, 1855.
- 56, 178, S. D., 156. Cruz Cervantes, claimant for San Joaquin or Rosas Morada, 2 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted April 1st, 1836, by Nicolas Gutierrez to C. Cervantes; claim filed February 20th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 18th, 1852, by the district court September 21st, 1855, and judgment affirmed by the U. S. supreme court in 18 Howard [59 U. S.] 553.
- 57, 74, N. D., 465. Juan Manuel Vaca and Juan Felipe Peña, claimants for Los Putos, 10 square leagues, in Solano county, granted January 27th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltoarena to J. M. Vaca and J. F. Peña; claim filed February 20th, 1852, rejected by the commission November 15th, 1853, confirmed by the district court July 5th, 1855, and decree affirmed by the U. S. supreme court in 18 Howard [59 U. S.] 556; containing 44,383.78 acres. Patented.
- 58, 161, N. D. José de los Santos Berreyesa, claimant for Señor de Mallacomés or Moristal y Plan de Agua Caliente, 4 square leagues, in Sonoma county, granted October 14th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltoarena to J. de los Santos Berreyesa; claim filed February 20th, 1852, confirmed by the commission June 27th, 1854, by the district court December 24th, 1856, and appeal dismissed November 24th, 1856; containing 12,540.22 acres.
- 59, 150, N. D. Lovett P. Rockwell and Thomas P. Knight, claimants for portion of Mallacomés or Moristal, No. 58, 2 square leagues, in Sonoma county, granted October 14th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltoarena to José de los Santos Berreyesa; claim filed February 20th, 1852, confirmed by the commission August 29th, 1854, and appeal dismissed November 24th, 1856; containing 8,328.85 acres.
- 60, 155, N. D., 128. José Dolores Pacheco, claimant for Santa Rita, in Alameda county, granted April 10th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to J. D. Pacheco; claim filed February 21st, 1852, rejected by the commission April 25th, 1854, confirmed by the district court August 13th, 1855, and decree affirmed by the U. S. supreme court in 23 Howard [64 U. S.] 495; containing 8,855.67 acres.
- 61, S. D., 290. Rafael Vilavicencio, claimant for San Geronimo, 2 square leagues, in San Luis Obispo county, granted July 24th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to R. Vilavicencio; claim filed February 21st, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 14th, 1853, and by the district court October 14th, 1859.
- 62, 9, N. D., 143. Antonio and Faustin German, claimants for Juristac, 1 square league, in Santa Clara county, granted October 22d, 1835, to A. and F. German; claim filed February 21st, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 18th, 1852, by the district court June 7th, 1855, and appeal dismissed April 28th, 1857; containing 4,482.41 acres.
- 63, 79, S. D., 149. Francisco Perez Pacheco, claimant for 2 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted November 26th, 1833, by José Figueroa to F. P. Pacheco; by another grant, claimant for Ausaymas, 2 square leagues, in Tuolumne county, granted February 6th, 1836, by Nicolas Gutierrez; claims filed February 24th, 1852, confirmed by the commission July 5th, 1853, and by the district court October 10th, 1855; containing 35,504.34 acres. Patented.
- 64, 78, S. D. Francisco Perez Pacheco, claimant for San Felipe, 3 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted April 1st, 1836, by Nicolas Gutierrez to F. D. Pacheco; claim filed February 24th, 1852, confirmed by the commission July 5th, 1853, and by the district court October 11th, 1855. Surveyed with No. 63 and patented.
- 65, 77, S. D., 212. Francisco Perez Pacheco, claimant for Bolsa de San Felipe, 2 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted October 14th, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to F. D. Pacheco; claim filed February 14th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 29th, 1852, by the district court February 19th, 1857, and January 11th, 1861, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858.
- 66, 39, S. D., 122. Diego Olivera and Teodoro Arellanes, claimants for Guadalupe, described by boundaries, in San Luis Obispo county, granted March 21st, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to D. Olivera and T. Arellanes; claim filed February 24th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 6th, 1853, by the district court September 25th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1857; containing 32,408.03 acres.
- 67, 365, S. D., 523. Maria Antonio de la Guerra and Lataillade, claimants for Cuyama, 5 square leagues, in Santa Barbara county, granted April 24th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltoarena to José Maria Rojo; claim filed February 24th, 1852, confirmed by the commission July 17th, 1855, by the district court January 20th, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858; containing 22,198.74 acres.
- 68, 223, N. D., 188. Assignee of Bezer Simmons, claimant for Novato, 2 square leagues, in Marin county, granted April 16th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Fernando Feliz; claim filed February 24th, 1852, confirmed by the commission November 7th, 1854, and appeal dismissed December 16th, 1856; containing 8,870.62 acres.
- 69, 30, N. D., 484. David Wright, claimant for Roblar de la Miseria, 4 square leagues, in Sonoma county, granted November 21st, 1845, by Pio Pico to Juan Nepomaseno Padillo; claim filed February 24th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 14th, 1853, by the district court September 10th, 1855, and appeal dismissed December 8th, 1856; containing 16,887.45 acres. Patented.
- 70, 411, N. D. Edmund L. Brown et al., claimants for Laguna de Santos Calle, 11 square leagues, in Yolo county, granted December 29th, 1845, by Pio Pico to Victor Prudon and Marcos Baca; claim filed February 24th, 1852, rejected by the commission January 15th, 1856, and by the district court September 18th, 1860.
- 71, 10, N. D., 320. Camilo Ynitia, claimant for Olompali, 2 square leagues, in Marin county, granted October 22d, 1843, by Manuel Micheltoarena to C. Ynitia; claim filed February 26th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 18th, 1852, by the district court February 23d, 1857, and appeal dismissed July 31st, 1857; containing 8,877.43 acres.

72, 16, N. D., 346. Timoteo Murphy, claimant for San Pedro, Santa Margarita and Las Gallinas, 5 square leagues, in Marin county, granted February 14th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to T. Murphy; claim filed February 26th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 22d, 1852, and appeal dismissed November 18th, 1856; containing 21,678.69 acres.

73, 202, N. D. Julian and Fernando, sons of Santos, a neophite, claimants for Rincon del Alisal, 600 varas, in Santa Clara county, granted December 28th, 1844, by José Maria del Ray (priest) to Santos and Sons; claim filed February 27th, 1852, rejected by the commission November 21st, 1854, and for failure of prosecution appeal dismissed by the district court April 21st, 1856.

74, 421, N. D. Jacob Leese and Salvador Valledo, claimants for 200 by 100 varas, in city of San Francisco, granted May 21st, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Jacob Leese and S. Valledo; claim filed February 27th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 5th, 1856, and appeal dismissed April 6th, 1857; containing 3.38 acres. Patented.

75, 7, N. D., 364. José Agustin Narvaez, claimant for San Juan Bautista, 2 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted March 30th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to J. A. Narvaez; claim filed February 27th, 1852, rejected by the commission November 15th, 1853, confirmed by the district court July 15th, 1855, and appeal dismissed July 5th, 1855; containing 8,877.60 acres.

76, 20, N. D., 64. Salvio Pacheco, claimant, for Monte del Diablo, in Contra Costa county, granted March 30th, 1844, by José Figueroa to S. Pacheco; claim filed February 27th, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 5th, 1853, by the district court January 14th, 1856, and appeal dismissed November 24th, 1856; containing 17,921.54 acres. Patented.

77, 135, N. D., 129. José Noriega and Roberto Livermore, claimants for Las Positas, 2 square leagues, in Alameda county, granted April 10th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvio Pacheco; claim filed February 27th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 14th, 1854, and by the district court February 18th, 1859.

78, 133, N. D., 125. Fulgencio Higuera, claimant for Agua Caliente, 2 square leagues, in Alameda county, granted October 13th, 1836, by Nicolas Gutierrez, and April 4th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado, to F. Higuera; claim filed February 27th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 14th, 1854, and appeal dismissed November 24th, 1856; containing 9,563.87 acres. Patented.

79, 386, N. D., 431. Robert Livermore, claimant for Cañada de los Vaqueros, in Contra Costa county, granted February 29th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Francisco Alvisu et al.; claim filed February 27th, 1852, confirmed by the commission September 4th, 1855, by the district court December 28th, 1857, and appeal dismissed December 28th, 1857.

80, 210, N. D. Timothy Murphy, in behalf of the San Rafael tribe of Indians, claimant for Tinicasia, 1 square league, in Marin county, granted in 1841, by M. G. Vallejo to San Rafael tribe of Indians; claim filed February 28th, 1852, rejected by the commission November 21st, 1854, and for failure of prosecution appeal dismissed April 21st, 1856.

81, 338, N. D. James R. Bolton, claimant for Mission Dolores, 3 square leagues, in San Francisco county, granted February 10th, 1846, by Pio Pico to José Prudencio Santillan; claim filed March 1st, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 5th, 1855, pro forma by the district court April 7th, 1857, and decrees reversed by the U. S. supreme court and cause remanded, with direction to dismiss the claim, 23 Howard [64 U. S.] 341.

82, 60, N. D., 318. José de Jesus Vallejo, claimant for Arroyo del Alameda, 4 square leagues, in Alameda county, granted August 30th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to J. de Jesus Vallejo; claim filed March 2d, 1852, confirmed by the commission October 18th, 1853, by the district court March 2d, 1857, and appeal dismissed July 28th, 1857; containing 17,705.38 acres. Patented.

83, 59, N. D., 216, 318. José de Jesus Vallejo, claimant for Arroyo del Alameda, 1,000 varas square, in Santa Clara county, granted December 30th, 1840, by Manuel Jimeno to J. de Jesus Vallejo; claim filed March 2d, 1852, and rejected by the commission October 18th, 1853.

84, 65, N. D., 167. Domingo Sais, claimant for Cañada de Herrera, one-half square league, in Marin county, granted August 10th, 1830, by Manuel Jimeno to D. Sais; claim filed March 2d, 1852, confirmed by the commission October 21st, 1853, by the district court May 25th, 1853, and appeal dismissed May 25th, 1853; containing 6,653.35 acres.

85, 35, S. D. José de Jesus Vallejo, claimant for Bolsa de San Cayetano, 2 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted October 25th, 1824, by Arguello, and October 13th, 1834, by José Figueroa, to Ignacio Vallejo; claim filed March 2d, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 6th, 1853, by the district court February 1st, 1856, and appeal dismissed January 9th, 1857; containing 8,866.43 acres.

86, 48, N. D., 501. Jasper O'Farrell, claimant for Cañada de la Jonive, 2 square leagues, in Sonoma county, granted February 5th, 1845, by Pio Pico to James Black; claim filed March 2d, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 18th, 1853, by the district court July 16th, 1855, and appeal dismissed December 22d, 1856; containing 10,786.51 acres. Patented.

87, 196, S. D., 282, 506. Francis Branch, claimant for Huerhuero or Huerfano, 1 square league, in San Luis Obispo county, granted May 9th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado, and March 28th, 1846, by Pio Pico, to Mariano Bonilla; claim filed March 2d, 1852, confirmed by the commission September 12th, 1854, by the district court December 31st, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 15,684.95 acres.

88, 64, S. D., 451. Antonio Maria Villa, claimant for Tequepis, 2 square leagues, in Santa Barbara county, granted May 24th, 1845, by Pio Pico to Joaquin Villa; claim filed March 2d, 1852, rejected by the commission November 13th, 1853, confirmed by the district court January 14th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1857; containing 8,919 acres.

89, 166, N. D., 550. James G. Morehead, claimant for Carmel, 10 square leagues, granted May 4th, 1846, by Pio Pico to William Knight; claim filed March 2d, 1852, rejected by the commission February 21st, 1854, confirmed by the district court September 29th, 1859, and appeal dismissed October 26th, 1859.

90, 84, N. D.; 265. Martin Murphy, claimant for Pastoria de las Borregas, 3,207 $\frac{1}{4}$ acres, in Santa Clara county, granted January 15th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to Francisco Estrada; claim filed March 3d, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 24th, 1854, by the district court October 17th, 1856, and appeal dismissed November 18th, 1856; containing 4,894.35 acres.

91, 397, N. D. William Johnson, claimant for Johnson's Rancho, 5 square leagues, in Yuba county, granted December 22d, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena and J. A. Sutter to Pablo Gutierrez; claim filed March 3d, 1852, confirmed by the commission August 7th, 1855, and appeal dismissed November 18th, 1856; containing 22,197.31 acres. Patented.

92, 319, N. D., 250. John A. Sutter, claimant for New Helvetia, 11 square leagues, and a surplus of 22 square leagues, in Yuba and Sutter counties, granted June 18th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado, and February 25th, 1845, by Manuel Micheltorena, to J. A. Sutter; claim filed March 8th, 1852, confirmed by the commission May 15th, 1855, by the district court January 14th, 1857, grant of June 18th, 1841, confirmed by the U. S. supreme court, and that of February 5th, 1845, rejected, 21 Howard [62 U. S.] 170; containing 48,827.90 acres.

93, 213, N. D., 92. Antonio Chaboya, claimant for Yerba Buena or Socayre, in Santa Clara county, granted November 5th, 1833, by José Figueroa to A. Chaboya; claim filed March 8th, 1852, confirmed by the commission October 17th, 1854, by the district court January 21st, 1858, and appeal dismissed October 8th, 1858; containing 24,342.64 acres. Patented.

94, 262, N. D., 552. Abel Stearns, claimant for 600 varas square, in San Francisco county, granted May 6th, 1846, by Pio Pico to José Andrada; claim filed March 9th, 1852, and rejected by the commission January 25th, 1855.

95, 379, N. D.; 19 S. D., (transcript sent to N. D.) 29. Bernard Murphy, claimant for Ojo de Agua de la Coché, 2 square leagues, in Santa Clara county, granted August 4th, 1835, by José Figueroa to Juan Maria Hernandez; claim filed March 9th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 21st, 1853, by the district court January 18th, 1856, and appeal dismissed November 18th, 1856; containing 8,927.10 acres.

96, 403, N. D. Juan José Castro, claimant for El Sobrante, 11 square leagues, in Alameda county, granted April 23d, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to J. J. Castro; claim filed March 9th, 1852, confirmed by the commission July 3d, 1855, and appeal dismissed April 6th, 1857.

97, 101, N. D., 20. José de la Cruz Sanchez et al., claimant for Buri-Buri, in San Mateo county, granted September 18th, 1835, by José Castro to José Sanchez; claim filed March 9th, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 31st, 1854, by the district court October 16th, 1855, and appeal dismissed May 11th, 1858; containing 15,739.14 acres.

98, 71, S. D., 342. Ellen E. White, claimant for Cholam, 6 square leagues, in San Luis Obispo county, granted February 7th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Mauricio Gonzalez; claim filed March 12th, 1852, rejected by the commission January 17th, 1854, confirmed by the district court March 4th, 1858, and appeal dismissed December 31st, 1860; containing 26,627.16 acres.

99, 375, S. D. Ellen E. White and John Carney, claimants for San Justo el Viejo and San Bernabé, 6 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted February 18th, 1836, by Nicolas Gutierrez to Rafael Gonzalez; claim filed March 12th, 1852, rejected by the commission August 28th, 1855, and for failure of prosecution appeal dismissed December 22d, 1856.

100, 219, N. D. Francisco Rufino, claimant for preemption claim, 50 by 180 feet, Mission Dolores, in San Francisco county; claim filed March 13th, 1852, rejected by the commission November 21st, 1854, and for failure of prosecution appeal dismissed April 21st, 1856.

101, 381, N. D., 360. Josefa de Haro et al., claimants for Potrero de San Francisco, one-half square league, in San Francisco county, granted April 30th, 1844, and May 1st, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Ramon Francisco de Haro; claim filed March 16th, 1852, and confirmed by the commission November 6th, 1855.

102, 380, N. D., 10. Josefa de Haro et al., claimants for Laguna de la Merced, 1 by one-half league, in San Mateo county, granted September 27th, 1835, by José Castro to José Antonio Galindo; claim filed March 16th, 1852, confirmed by the commission July 24th, 1855, by the district court January 13th, 1858, and appeal dismissed March 19th, 1858; containing 2,220.16 acres.

103, 408, N. D. Guillermo Antonio Richardson, claimant for 10 by 2 leagues, in Mendocino county, granted October 30th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to José Antonio Galindo; claim filed March 16th, 1852, and confirmed by the commission November 6th, 1855.

104, 83, N. D., 111. Guillermo Antonio Richardson, claimant for Saucelito, 3 square leagues, in Marin county, granted February 11th, 1835, by Juan B. Alvarado, to José Antonio Galindo; claim filed March 16th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 27th, 1853, by the district court February 11th, 1856, and appeal dismissed September 2d, 1857; containing 19,571.92 acres.

105, 281, N. D. Timoteo Murphy, claimant for 100 by 30 varas, in Marin county, granted December 16th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to T. Murphy; claim filed March 16th, 1852, and rejected by the commission August 22d, 1854, and March 27th, 1855.

106, 91, N. D., 405. Alberto J. Toomes, claimant for El Rio de los Molinos, 5 square leagues, in Tehama county, granted December 20th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to A. J. Toomes; claim filed March 18th, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 17th, 1854, by the district court March 3d, 1856, and appeal dismissed November 6th, 1856; containing 22,172.46 acres. Patented.

107, 85, N. D., 404. Robert H. Thomes, claimant for Los Sancos, 5 square leagues, in Tehama county, granted December 20th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to R. H. Thomes; claim filed March 18th, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 17th, 1854, by the district court February 4th, 1856, and appeal dismissed November 6th, 1856; containing 22,212.21 acres.

108, 323, N. D. Jacob D. Hoppe, claimant for Ulistac, one-half square league, in Santa Clara county, granted May 19th, 1845, by Pio Pico to Marcelo Pio and Cristoval; claim filed March 19th, 1852, confirmed by the commission May 8th, 1855, by the district court March 2d, 1857, and appeal dismissed April 16th, 1857; containing 2,401.32 acres.

109, 377, N. D. Dionisio Z. Fernandez et al., claimants for 4 square leagues, in Butte county, granted June 12th, 1846, by Pio Pico to Dionisio and Maximo Fernandez; claim filed March 19th, 1852, confirmed by the commission July 17th, 1855, by the district court March 2d, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 9th, 1857; containing 17,805.84 acres.

110, 407, N. D. Andres Pico et al., claimants for Mission San José, 30,000 acres, in Alameda county, granted May 5th, 1846, by Pio Pico to Andres Pico and Juan B. Alvarado; claim filed March 22d, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 18th, 1855, and rejected by the district court June 30th, 1859.

111, 310, S. D., 442. James B. Huie, claimant for Sisquoc, in Santa Barbara county, granted June 3d, 1833, by Pio Pico to Maria Antonio Caballero; claim filed March 22d, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 24th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 21st, 1857; containing 35,485.90 acres.

112, 216, N. D.; 197, S. D., (transcript sent to N. D.) Quintin Ortega et al., claimants for San Isidro, 1 square league, in Santa Clara county, granted June 3d, 1833, by José Figueroa to Quintin Ortega et al.; claim filed March 23d, 1852, confirmed by the commission September 19th, 1854, and by the district court June 3d, 1856; containing 4,438.70 acres.

113, 96, N. D. Rafael Garcia, claimant for 9 square leagues, in Mendocino county, granted November 15th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Rafael Garcia; claim filed March 23d, 1852, rejected by the commission January 17th, 1854, confirmed by the district court, decree reversed, petition dismissed by the U. S. supreme court, and cause remanded for that purpose in 22 Howard [63 U. S.] 274.

114, 68, N. D., 124. Rafael Garcia, claimant for Tomales and Baulinas, 2 square leagues, in Marin county, granted March 19th, 1836, by Nicolas Gutierrez to Rafael Garcia; claim filed March 23d, 1852, confirmed by the commission November 22d, 1853, and appeal dismissed October 19th, 1858; containing 8,863.25 acres.

115, 233, S. D., 319. José Antonio Estudillo, claimant for San Jacinto, 4 square leagues, in San Diego county, granted December 21st, 1842, by Manuel Jimeno to J. A. Estudillo; claim filed March 23d, 1852, confirmed by the commission November 21st, 1854, and by the district court March 5th, 1858.

116, 80, S. D., 512. José Antonio Aguirre, in right of his wife, claimant for Sobrante of Jacinto Viejo y Nuevo, 5 square leagues, in San Diego county, granted May 9th, 1846, by Pio Pico to Maria del Rosario Estudillo de Aguirre; claim filed March 23d, 1852, rejected by the commission January 17th, 1854, and confirmed by the district court December 24th, 1855.

117, 56, S. D., 313. Manuela Carrillo de Jones, claimant for Santa Rosa Island, described by boundaries, in Santa Barbara county, granted October 4th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltoarena to José Antonio and Carlos Carrillo; claim filed March 23d, 1852, rejected by the commission November 15th, 1853, confirmed by the district court January 18th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1857.

118, 81, S. D., 304. Joaquina Alvarado, claimant for Cañada Larga o Verde, one-half square league, in Santa Barbara county, granted June 30th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to J. Alvarado; claim filed March 23d, 1852, rejected by the commission December 20th, 1853, and confirmed by the district court January 20th, 1857.

119, 130, N. D. Juana Briones, claimant for La Purisima Concepcion, 1 square league, in Santa Clara county, granted June 30th, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to José Gorgonio and José Ramon; claim filed March 23d, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 11th, 1854, by the district court April 17th, 1856, and appeal dismissed December 24th, 1856; containing 4,436.74 acres.

120, 104, S. D., 569. Maria Antonia de la Guerra y Lataillade, claimant for Cuyama, 11 square leagues, in Santa Barbara county, granted June 9th, 1846, by Pio Pico to Cesario Lataillade; claim filed March 23d, 1852, and rejected by the commission February 28th, 1854.

121, 188, S. D., 410. Luis Arellanes and Emilio Miguel Ortega, claimants for La Punta de la Laguna, 6 square leagues, in San Luis Obispo county, granted December 26th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to L. Arellanes and E. M. Ortega; claim filed March 23d, 1852, confirmed by the commission May 2d, 1854, by the district court January 7th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1857; containing 26,648.42 acres.

122, 12, N. D., 414. Francisco Dye, claimant for El Primer Cañon or Río de los Berendos, 6 square leagues, in Tehama county, granted May 22d, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to F. Dye; claim filed March 23d, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 18th, 1852, by the district court July 23d, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 10th, 1857; containing 26,637.11 acres.

123, 41, S. D., 192. Vicente Cané, claimant for San Bernardo, 1 square league, in San Luis Obispo county, granted February 11th, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to Vicente Cané; claim filed March 23d, 1852, confirmed by the commission November 22d, 1853, by the district court September 25th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1856; containing 4,379.42 acres.

124, 1, S. D., 34. John B. R. Cooper, claimant for El Sur, 2 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted September 30th, 1834, by José Figueroa to Juan B. Alvarado; claim filed March 23d, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 18th, 1852, by the district court September 21st, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1857; containing 8,949.06 acres.

125, 410, N. D., 422. Robert Walkinshaw, claimant for Posolomi, including El Posito de las Animas, 3,042 acres, in Santa Clara county, granted February 15th, 1844, by Juan B. Alvarado and Manuel Micheltoarena to Lope Inigo; claim filed March 23d, 1852, confirmed by the commission November 20th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 16th, 1857; containing 3,391.90 acres.

126, 45, N. D., 262. Cayetano Juarez, claimant for Tulucay, 2 square leagues, in Napa county, granted October 26th, 1841, by Manuel Jimeno to C. Juarez; claim filed March 23d, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 11th, 1853, by the district court February 25th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 23d, 1857; containing 8,865.33 acres. Patented.

127, 87, N. D., 344. Joseph Swanson, administrator of the estate of William Welch, claimant for Las Juntas, 3 square leagues, in Contra Costa county, granted February 9th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to William Welch; claim filed March 23d, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 20th, 1853, and appeal dismissed November 3d, 1857; containing 13,324.29 acres.

128, 144, N. D., 80. José Maria Amador, claimant for San Ramon, 4 square leagues and 1,800 varas, in Alameda county, granted August 17th, 1835, by José Figueroa to J. M. Amador; claim filed March 23d, 1852, confirmed by the commission August 1st, 1854, by the district court January 14th, 1856, and appeal dismissed January 10th, 1857; containing 16,516.95 acres.

129, 358, N. D. Thomas O. Larkin, claimant for Flugge Ranch or Boga, 5 square leagues, in Butte and Sutter counties, granted February 21st, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Charles William Flugge; claim filed March 24th, 1852, confirmed by the commission July 17th, 1854, and appeal dismissed February 9th, 1857; containing 22,150.71 acres.

130, 115, N. D., 417. Francis Larkin et al., claimants for Larkin's Rancho, 10 square leagues, in Colusi county, granted December 15th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to F. Larkin et al.; claim filed March 24th, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 25th, 1854, by the district court January 14th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 10th, 1857; containing 44,364.22 acres. Patented.

131, 23, N. D., 413. Thomas O. Larkin et al., claimants for Jimeno Rancho, 11 square leagues, in Colusi and Yuba counties, granted November 4th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Manuel Jimeno; claim filed March 24th, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 10th, 1853, by the district court July 5th, 1855, and by the U. S. supreme court in 18 Howard [59 U. S.] 557; containing 48,854.26 acres.

132, 105, S. D., 291. Vicente Sanchez et al., heirs of José Maria Sanchez, claimants for Lomerias Muertas, $1\frac{1}{2}$ square leagues, in Monterey county, granted August 16th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to José Antonio Castro; claim filed March 30th, 1852, confirmed by the commission March 14th, 1854, by the district court February 1st, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 6,651.91 acres.

133, 106, S. D., 49. José Maria Sanchez, claimant for Llano del Tequisquita, one-half square league, in Monterey county, granted October 12th, 1835, by José Castro to J. M. Sanchez; claim filed March 30th, 1852, confirmed by the commission March 14th, 1854, by the district court February 1st, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 16,016.30 acres.

134, 92, N. D., M. G. Vallejo, claimant for lot 150 by 130 varas, in Sonoma city, granted July 5th, 1835, by José Figueroa to M. G. Vallejo; claim filed March 30th, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 17th, 1854, by the district court February 18th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 23d, 1857; containing 3.81 acres.

135, 107, S. D., 139. José de la Guerra y Noriega, claimant for Conejo, described by boundaries, in Santa Barbara county, granted October 12th, 1822, by Pablo V. de Sola to José de la G. y Noriega; claim filed March 30th, 1852, confirmed by the commission March 14th, 1854, by the district court February 16th, 1857, and appeal dismissed February 21st, 1859; containing 48,671.56 acres.

136, 41, N. D., 172. Jasper O'Farrell, claimant for Estero Americano, 2 square leagues, in Sonoma county, granted September 4th, 1839, by Manuel Jimeno to Ed. Manuel McIntosh; claim filed March 30th, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 11th, 1853, and appeal dismissed February 2d, 1857; containing 8,849.13 acres. Patented.

137, 26, S. D., 251. Guadalupe Cantua, claimant for San Luisito, described by boundaries, in San Luis Obispo county, granted August 6th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to G. Cantua; claim filed March 30th, 1852, confirmed by the commission October 25th, 1853, by the district court September 25th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1856; containing 4,389.13 acres. Patented.

138, 7, S. D., John B. R. Cooper, claimant for Bolsas del Potrero y Moro Cojo or La Sagrada Familia, 2 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted June 22d, 1822, P. V. de Sola to José Joaquin de la Torre; claim filed March 30th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 21st, 1853, by the district court January 10th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1857; containing 6,915.77 acres. Patented.

139, 168, S. D., 142. Fernando Tico, claimant for Ojaj, described by boundaries, in Santa Barbara county, granted April 6th, 1837, by Juan B. Alvarado to F. Tico; claim filed March 30th, 1852, confirmed by the commission May 16th, 1854, by the district court October 2d, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1857; containing 17,792.70 acres.

140, 73, S. D., 218. Julian Estrada, claimant for Santa Rosa, 3 square leagues, in San Luis Obispo county, granted June 18th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to J. Estrada; claim filed March 30th, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 17th, 1854, by the district court September 26th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1857; containing 13,183.62 acres.

141, 37, N. D. José Maria Alviso, claimant for Milpitas, 1 square league, in Santa Clara county, granted September 23d, 1835, by José Castro to J. M. Alviso; claim filed March 30th, 1852, confirmed by the commission March 14th, 1853, by the district court March 3d, 1856, and appeal dismissed December 5th, 1856; containing 4,807 acres.

142, 237, N. D. Robert S. Eaton, claimant for part of Cañada de Guadalupe Visitation y Rodeo Viejo, 700 acres of 2 square leagues, in San Francisco and San Mateo counties, (No. 745) granted July 31st, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to Jacob P. Leese; claim filed March 30th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 19th, 1854, by the district court October 18th, 1858, and appeal dismissed October 18th, 1858; containing 766.35 acres.

143, 33, N. D., 392. John Bidwell, claimant for Arroyo Chico, described by boundaries, in Butte county, granted November 18th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to William Dickey; claim filed March 30th, 1852, confirmed by the commission March 14th, 1853, by the district court July 16th, 1855, and by the U. S. supreme court; containing 22,214.47 acres. Patented.

144, 28, N. D., 473. Charles D. Semple, claimant for Rancho de Colus, 2 square leagues, in Colusi county, granted October 4th, 1845, by Pio Pico to John Bidwell; claim filed March 31st, 1852, rejected by the commission October 25th, 1853, confirmed by the district court July 5th, 1855, and by the U. S. supreme court; containing 8,876.02 acres.

145, 5, S. D., 70, 88. Concepcion Munras et al., heirs of Stephen Munras, claimants for San Vincente, 2 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted December 16th, 1835, by José Castro, September 20th, 1836, by Nicolas Gutierrez, and $2\frac{1}{2}$ square leagues November 11th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to Francisco Soto and Stephen Munras; claim filed April 1st, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 14th, 1853, by the district court February 20th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1859; containing 19,979.01 acres.

146, 53, N. D., 403. Samuel Norris, claimant for Rancho del Paso, 10 square leagues, in Sacramento and Placer counties, granted December 20th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Eliab Grimes; claim filed April 1st, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 18th, 1853, by the district court August 13th, 1855, and appeal dismissed December 22d, 1856; containing 44,371.42 acres.

147, 301, N. D. Charles Covillaud et al., administrators of the estate of John Thompson et al., claimants for Honcut, 7 square leagues, in Yuba county, granted December 22d, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena and J. A. Sutter to Teodora Cordua; claim filed April 1st, 1852, confirmed by the commission March 27th, 1855, by the district court February 23d, 1857, and appeal dismissed August 21st, 1857; containing 31,069.33 acres.

148, 228, N. D. Antonia Higuera et al., heirs of José Higuera, claimants for Los Tularcitos, described by boundaries, in Santa Clara and Alameda counties, granted October 4th, 1821, by P. V. de Sola to José Higuera; claim filed April 1st, 1852, confirmed by the commission November 28th, 1854, and appeal dismissed December 12th, 1856; containing 4,394.35 acres.

149, 203, N. D. Antonia Higuera et al., claimants for Llano del Abrevadero, described by boundaries, in Santa Clara county, granted January 1st, 1822, by P. V. de Sola to José Higuera; claim filed April 1st, 1852, rejected by the commission December 19th, 1854, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1853.

150, 25, N. D., 418. Guillermo Chard, claimant for Rancho de las Flores, 3 square leagues, in Tehama county, granted December 24th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to G. Chard; claim filed April 2d, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 7th, 1853, by the district court July 16th, 1855, and appeal dismissed January 13th, 1857; containing 13,315.58 acres. Patented.

151, 108, S. D., 169. Mariano Malarin, executor of the estate of Juan Malarin, claimant for Zanjones, 1½ square leagues, in Monterey county, granted August 20th, 1839, by Manuel Jimeno to Gabriel de la Torre; claim filed April 2d, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 21st, 1854, by the district court January 11th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1857; containing 6,714.49 acres.

152, 109, S. D., 21. Mariano Malarin, executor of the estate of Juan Malarin, claimant for Guadalupe Llanito de los Correos, 2 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted May 22d, 1833, by José Figueroa to Juan Malarin; claim filed April 2d, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 21st, 1854, by the district court January 11th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1857; containing 8,558.44 acres.

153, 204, S. D. Mariano Malarin, attorney for José Santiago Estrada and brothers, claimants for Buenavista, 2 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted May 28th, 1822, by L. A. Arguello to José Santiago Estrada and brothers; claim filed April 2d, 1852, confirmed by the commission September 26th, 1854, and appeal dismissed January 14th, 1857; containing 7,725.56 acres.

154, 110, S. D., 46, 176. Mariano Malarin, executor of the estate of Juan Malarin, claimant for Chualar, 2 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted September 7th, 1839, by Manuel Jimeno to Juan Malarin; claim filed April 2d, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 21st, 1854, by the district court January 11th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1857; containing 8,889.68 acres.

155, 16, S. D., 77. Catalina Manzaneli de Munras, claimant for Laguna Seca, 1 league by ½, in Monterey county, granted June 22d, 1834, by José Figueroa to C. M. de Munras; claim filed April 2d, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 11th, 1853, by the district court February 20th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 2,179.50 acres.

156, 56, N. D. 421. William H. McKee, claimant for Jacinto, 8 square leagues, in Colusi county, granted September 2d, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Jacinto Rodriguez; claim filed April 2d, 1852, rejected by the commission October 18th, 1853, confirmed by the district court January 15th, 1857, and appeal dismissed August 5th, 1857; containing 35,487.52 acres. Patented.

157, 42, N. D. 412. Josefa Soto, claimant for Capay, 10 square leagues, in Colusi and Tehama counties, granted December 21st, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Josefa Soto; claim filed April 5th, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 11th, 1853, by the district court July 16th, 1855, and appeal dismissed November 25th, 1855; containing 44,388.17 acres. Patented.

158, 351, N. D. Alpheus Basilio Thompson, claimant for 8 square leagues, in San Joaquin and Stanislaus counties, granted June 1st, 1846, by Pio Pico to A. B. Thompson; claim filed April 5th, 1852, confirmed by the commission June 19th, 1855, by the district court September 12th, 1856, and appeal dismissed December 24th, 1856; containing 35,532.80 acres. Patented.

159, 51, N. D. Henrique Huber, claimant for Honcut, 8 square leagues, in Butte county, granted February 11th, 1845, by Manuel Micheltoarena to E. Huber; claim filed April 5th, 1852, and rejected by the commission October 12th, 1853.

160, 34, N. D., 310. George C. Yount, claimant for La Jota, 1 square league, in Napa county, granted October 23d, 1843, by Manuel Micheltoarena to G. C. Yount; claim filed April 5th, 1852, rejected by the commission October 21st, 1853, confirmed by the district court July 6th, 1854, and appeal dismissed April 2d, 1857; containing 4,453.84 acres. Patented.

161, 136, N. D. José Maria Sanchez, claimant for Las Animas or Sitio de la Brea, in Santa Clara county, granted August 17th, 1802, by Marquinas to Mariano Castro, and August 7th, 1835, by José Figueroa to Josefa Romero, widow of M. Castro; claim filed April 5th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 14th, 1854, by the district court May 17th, 1856, and appeal dismissed January 26th, 1857; containing 24,066.24 acres.

162, 75, S. D., 273. Francisco Branch, claimant for Arroyo Grande or San Ramon, described by boundaries, in San Luis Obispo county, granted April 25th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to Zeferino Carlon; claim filed April 6th, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 17th, 1854, by the district court October 20th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 4,437.58 acres.

163, 59, S. D., 152. Teodoro Arellanes, claimant for El Rincon, 1 square league, in Santa Barbara county, granted June 22d, 1835, by José Figueroa to T. Arellanes; claim filed April 6th, 1852, rejected by the commission November 22d, 1853, confirmed by the district court October 18th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 4,459.63 acres.

164, 49, N. D., 180. Josefa Haro de Guerrero et al., heirs of Francisco Guerrero Palomares, claimants for El Corral de Tierra, 1 square league, in San Francisco county, granted October 16th, 1839, by Manuel Jimeno, and May 1st, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena, to F. G. Palomares; claim filed April 6th, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 18th, 1853, by the district court March 24th, 1856, and appeal dismissed December 24th, 1856; containing 7,766.35 acres.

165, 50, N. D., 246; 430. Jacob P. Leese, claimant for Huichicha, 2 square leagues, in Sonoma county, granted October 26th, 1841, by Manuel Jimeno, and July 6th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena, to J. P. Leese; claim filed April 6th, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 18th, 1853, by the district court April 22d, 1856, and appeal dismissed December 24th, 1856; containing 18,704.04 acres. Patented.

166, 47, N. D., 225. Marico Ygnacio del Bale et al., widow and heirs of Ed. A. Bale, claimants for Carne Humana, 4 square leagues, in Napa county, granted March 14th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to Edouardo A. Bale; claim filed April 6th, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 18th, 1853, by the district court March 24th, 1856, and appeal dismissed December 24th, 1856.

167, 289, N. D., 210, 354. Antonio Suñol et al., claimants for part of Los Coches, one-half square league, in Santa Clara county, granted March 12th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Roberto; claim filed April 6th, 1852, confirmed by the commission March 20th, 1855, by the district court April 1st, 1856, and appeal dismissed December 24th, 1856; containing 2,219.34 acres. Patented.

168, 46, N. D., 36. Heirs of Juan Sanchez de Pacheco, claimants for Arroyo de las Nueces y Bolbones, 2 square leagues, in Contra Costa county, granted July 11th, 1834, by José Figueroa to J. S. de Pacheco; claim filed April 6th, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 11th, 1853, by the district court December 22d, 1856, decision of the U. S. supreme court as to the right of appeal in 20 Howard, 261 [61 U. S.] and decree of the district court affirmed by the U. S. supreme court in 22 Howard [63 U. S.] 225; containing 17,734.52 acres.

169, 111, S. D. James Stokes, claimant for Rancho de las Vergeles, formerly called Rancho de la Cañada de Enmedio and Cañada de Cebada, 2 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted August 28th, 1835, by José Figueroa, and September 4th, 1835, by José Castro, to José Joaquín Gomez; claim filed April 7th, 1852, rejected by the commission February 21st, 1854, confirmed by the district court September 28th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 8,759.82 acres.

170, 359, S. D., 15. Henry D. McCobb, claimant for Corral de Tierra, described by boundaries, in Monterey county, granted April 15th, 1836, by Nicolás Gutierrez to Guadalupe Figueroa; claim filed April 7th, 1852, confirmed by the commission July 3d, 1855, and by the district court June 17th, 1859.

171, 200, N. D. John Frederick Schultess, claimant for 37 50-vara lots, Mission Dolores, in San Francisco county, granted February 10th, 1846, by Pio Pico to Prudencio Santillan; claim filed April 8th, 1852, rejected by the commission December 19th, 1854, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1856.

172, 201, N. D. John Frederick Schultess et al., claimants for 47 50-vara lots, Mission Dolores, in San Francisco county; claim filed April 8th, 1852, rejected by the commission December 19th, 1854, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1856.

173, 182, N. D., 328, 423. Catherine Sheldon, administratrix, and Gabriel W. Gunn, administrator of the estate of Jared Sheldon, claimant for Omochumne, 5 square leagues, in Sacramento county, granted January 8th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Joaquin Sheldon; claim filed April 10th, 1852, confirmed by the commission October 10th, 1854, by the district court December 3d, 1856, and appeal dismissed August 6th, 1857.

174, 175, S. D., 367. José Amesti, claimant for Los Corralitos, 4 square leagues, in Santa Cruz county, granted April 1st, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to José Amesti; claim filed April 13th, 1852, confirmed by the commission May 2d, 1854, and appeal dismissed January 28th, 1857; containing 15,440.02 acres. Patented.

175, 347, S. D. Santiago Arguello, claimant for Mission San Diego, in San Diego county, granted June 8th, 1846, by Pio Pico; claim filed April 13th, 1852, confirmed by the commission June 26th, 1855, and by the district court June, 1858.

176, 340, S. D., 187. Andres Castillero, claimant for Island of Santa Cruz, described by boundaries, in Santa Barbara county, granted May 22d, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Andres Castillero; claim filed April 13th, 1852, confirmed by the commission July 3d, 1855, by the district court January 14th, 1857, and decree affirmed by the U. S. supreme court in 23 Howard [64 U. S.] 464.

177, 72, S. D., 406. José Mariano Bonilla, claimant for 100 varas by 50, in San Luis Obispo county, granted September 30th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to J. M. Bonilla; claim filed April 13th, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 24th, 1854, by the district court September 27th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1857.

178, 61, S. D., 481. Joaquin Carrillo and José Antonio Carrillo, claimants for Mission Vieja de la Purisima, 1 square league, in Santa Barbara county, granted November 20th, 1845, by Pio Pico; claim filed April 13th, 1852, confirmed by the commission November 15th, 1853, and appeal dismissed June 8th, 1857; containing 4,443.43 acres.

179, 73, N. D. Rafaela Soto de Pacheco et al., claimants for San Ramon, 2 square leagues, in Contra Costa county, granted June 10th, 1833, by José Figueroa; claim filed April 13th, 1852, rejected by the commission November 22d, 1853, and confirmed by the district court February 8th, 1858.

180, 382, N. D., 511. Jasper O'Farrell, claimant for Cañada de Capay, 9 square leagues, in Yolo county, granted May 2d, 1846, by Pio Pico to Santiago Nemesis and Francisco Berreyesa; claim filed April 13th, 1852, confirmed by the commission August 14th, 1855, by the district court March 2d, 1857, and appeal dismissed April 2d, 1857; containing 40,078.58 acres.

181, 324, N. D., 416. Hiram Grimes, claimant for San Juan, 4½ square leagues, in Placer and Sacramento counties, granted December 24th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Joel P. Dedmond; claim filed April 13th, 1852, confirmed by the commission May 8th, 1855, by the district court June 3d, 1856, and appeal dismissed August 11th, 1857; containing 19,982.70 acres. Patented.

182, 367, N. D. Peter Lassen, claimant for Bosquejo, 5 square leagues, in Tehama county, granted December 26th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to P. Lassen; claim filed April 14th, 1852, confirmed by the commission July 24th, 1855, by the district court March 2d, 1857, and appeal dismissed July 29th, 1857; containing 16,208.65 acres.

183, 179, N. D. Samuel Neal, claimant for Esquon, 5 square leagues in Butte county, granted December 22d, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena and J. A. Sutter to S. Neal; claim filed April 16th, 1852, rejected by the commission January 23d, 1855, confirmed by the district court March 2d, 1857, and appeal dismissed July 30th, 1857; containing 22,193.78 acres. Patented.

184, 295, N. D., 31. Martina Castro, claimant for Shoquel, 3 miles by one-half league, in Santa Cruz county, granted November 23d, 1833, by José Figueroa to M. Castro; claim filed April 16th, 1852, confirmed by the commission June 23d, 1854, and appeal dismissed January 22d, 1857; containing 1,668.03 acres. Patented.

185, 371, N. D., 415. William B. Ide, claimant for Baranca Colorada, 4 square leagues, in Tehama county, granted December 4th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Josiah Belden; claim filed April 19th, 1852, confirmed by the commission July 24th, 1855, and appeal dismissed January 13th, 1857; containing 17,707.49 acres. Patented.

186, 40, S. D., 302. Joaquin de la Torre, claimant for Arroyo Seco, 4 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted December 30th, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to J. de la Torre; claim filed April 20th, 1852, rejected by the commission November 22d, 1853, confirmed by the district court March 3d, 1856, and appeal dismissed January 9th, 1857; containing 16,523.35 acres. Patented.

187, 289, S. D. Sebastian Rodriguez, claimant for Bolsa del Pajaro, 2 square leagues, in Santa Cruz county, granted September 30th, 1837, by Juan B. Alvarado to S. Rodriguez; claim filed April 20th, 1852, confirmed by the commission March 27th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 21st, 1857; containing 5,496.51 acres. Patented.

188, 257, S. D., 554. Frederick Billings et al., assignees of Bezer Simmons, claimants for an island, 2 square leagues, in San Diego county, granted May 15th, 1846, by Pio Pico to Pedro C. Carrillo; claim filed April 20th, 1852, rejected by the commission October 31st, 1853, and confirmed by the district court January 9th, 1857.

189, 49, S. D., 479. Maria Antonia de la Guerra y Lataillade, claimant for Corral de Cuati, 3 square leagues, in Santa Barbara county, granted November 14th, 1845, by Pio Pico to Agustín Davila; claim filed April 20th, 1852, confirmed by the commission November 22d, 1853, by the district court September 16th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1857; containing 13,300.24 acres.

190, 45, S. D., 237. José Maria Villavicencia, claimant for Corral de Piedra, 2 square leagues, in San Luis Obispo county, granted May 14th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado, with an extension of 5, granted May 28th, 1846, by Pio Pico, to J. M. Villavicencia; claim filed April 20th, 1852, confirmed by the commission November 15th, 1853, by the district court December 3d, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 30,911.20 acres.

191, 112, S. D., 7. Charles Walters, claimant for El Toro, $1\frac{1}{2}$ square leagues, in Monterey county, granted April 17th, 1835, to José Ramón Estrada; claim filed April 20th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 22d, 1852, by the district court October 5th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 5,668.41 acres.

192, 229, N. D., 202. Sebastian Rodriguez, claimant for Rincon de la Ballena, 1 square league, in Santa Cruz county, granted April 15th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to José Cornelio Bernal; claim filed April 20th, 1852, and rejected by the commission November 14th, 1854.

193, 227, N. D., 264. John B. R. Cooper, claimant for El Molino or Rio Ayoska, $10\frac{1}{2}$ square leagues, in Sonoma county, granted December 31st, 1833, by José Figueroa, and February 24th, 1836, by Nicolas Gutierrez to J. B. R. Cooper; claim filed April 20th, 1852, confirmed by the commission November 14th, 1854, by the district court March 24th, 1856, and appeal dismissed December 15th, 1856; containing 17,892.42 acres. Patented.

194, 39, N. D., 226. Salvador Vallejo, claimant for Lajome, $1\frac{1}{2}$ square leagues, in Napa county, granted March 16th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to Tomaso A. Rodriguez; claim filed April 20th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 21st, 1853, and appeal dismissed February 9th, 1857; containing 6,652.58 acres.

195, 3, S. D., 95. Josefa Antonia Gomez de Walters et al., widow and heirs of Rafael Gomez, claimants for Los Tularcitos, 6 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted December 18th, 1834, by José Figueroa to Rafael Gomez; claim filed April 20th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 22d, 1852, by the district court September 24th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1857; containing 26,581.34 acres.

196, 302, N. D. Charles Chana, claimant for Nemshas, 4 square leagues, granted July 26th, 1844, by Manuel Michelorena to Teodoro Sicard; claim filed April 22d, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 23d, 1855, by the district court October 16th, 1856, judgment of district court reversed by the U. S. supreme court and petition dismissed in 24 Howard [65 U. S.] 151.

197, 74, N. D., 400. José B. Chiles, claimant for Catacula, 2 square leagues, in Napa county, granted November 4th, 1844, by Manuel Michelorena to J. B. Chiles; claim filed April 21st, 1852, confirmed by the commission November 4th, 1853, by the district court August 13th, 1855, and appeal dismissed April 2d, 1857; containing 8,545.72 acres.

198, 40, N. D., 207. Ygnacio Pacheco, claimant for San José, $1\frac{1}{2}$ square leagues, in Marin county, granted October 3d, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to Y. Pacheco; claim filed April 23d, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 11th, 1853, by the district court March 24th, 1857, and appeal dismissed July 31st, 1857; containing 6,659.25 acres. Patented.

199, 15, N. D., 507. Charles Mayer et al., claimants for German, 5 square leagues, in Mendocino county, granted April 8th, 1846, by Pio Pico to Ernest Rufus; claim filed April 27th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 22d, 1852, by the district court September 10th, 1855, and by the U. S. supreme court; containing 17,580.01 acres.

200, 81, N. D., 230. Teodoro Robles and Secundino Robles, claimants for Rincon de San Francisquito, in Santa Clara county, granted March 29th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to José Peña; claim filed April 27th, 1852, confirmed by the commission November 29th, 1853, by the district court October 29th, 1855, and by the U. S. supreme court.

201, 33, N. D. Samuel J. Hensley, claimant for Aguas Nieves, 6 square leagues, in Butte county, granted December 22d, 1844, by Manuel Michelorena to Samuel J. Hensley; claim filed April 27th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 14th, 1853, by the district court July 5th, 1855, decision of the U. S. supreme court as to the right of appeal in 20 Howard [61 U. S.] 261.

202, 43, N. D., 549. William Gordon and Nathan Coombs, claimants for Chimiles, 4 square leagues, in Napa county, granted May 2d, 1846, by Pio Pico to José Ygnacio Berreyesa; claim filed April 28th, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 11th, 1853, and appeal dismissed July 27th, 1857; containing 17,762.44 acres. Patented.

203, 26, N. D. William Gordon, claimant for Quesesosi or Guesesosi, 2 square leagues, in Yolo county, granted January 27th, 1843, by Manuel Michelorena to William Gordon; claim filed April 28th, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 10th, 1853, by the district court March 2d, 1857, and appeal dismissed June 2d, 1857; containing 8,894.49 acres. Patented.

204, 308, N. D. Teodora Soto, claimant for Cañada del Hambre and Las Bolsas del Hambre, 2 square leagues, in Contra Costa county, granted May 18th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to Teodora Soto; claim filed April 29th, 1852, confirmed by the commission May 15th, 1855, by the district court April 16th, 1857, and appeal dismissed August 11th, 1857; containing 13,312.70 acres.

205, 121, N. D., 571. James D. Galbraith, claimant for Bolsa de Tomales, 5 square leagues, in Marin county, granted June 12th, 1845, by Pio Pico to Juan N. Padilla; claim filed April 29th, 1852, confirmed by commission April 11th, 1854, by the district court December 1st, 1854, decree reversed by the U. S. supreme court and cause remanded in 22 Howard [63 U. S.] 87. Confirmed by the district court February 7th, 1861.

206, 336, S. D., 110. Antonia Maria Cota et al., heirs of Tomas Olivera, claimants for Tepusquet, 2 square leagues, in Santa Barbara county, granted April 7th, 1837, by Juan B. Alvarado to Thomas Olivera; claim filed April 30th, 1852, confirmed by the commission July 3d, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 21st, 1857; containing 8,900.75 acres.

207, 246, N. D.; 236 S. D., (returned to N. D. September 21st, 1855.) Joseph L. Majors, in behalf of his wife, Maria de los Angeles Castro, claimant for Rancho del Refugio, one-third of Rancho, in Santa Cruz county, granted April 8th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Maria Candida, Maria Jacinta and Maria de los Angeles Castro; claim filed April 30th, 1852, rejected by the commission January 15th, 1855, and for failure of prosecution appeal dismissed December 18th, 1856.

208, 180, N. D., 233. J. L. Majors, claimant for San Agustin, 1 square league, in Santa Cruz county, granted April 21st 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to Juan José Crisostomo Mayor; claim filed April 30th, 1852, confirmed by the commission September 26th, 1854, by the district court December 23d, 1857, and appeal dismissed December 23d, 1857; containing 4,436.78 acres.

209, 250, N. D., 324. Ramon Rodriguez and Francisco Alviso, claimants for Agua Puerca and Las Trancas, 1 square league, in Santa Cruz county, granted November 2d, 1843, by Manuel Micheltoarena to R. Rodriguez and F. Alviso; claim filed April 30th, 1852, and rejected by the commission January 30th, 1855.

210, 255, N. D. William Bocle, claimant for La Carbonera, one-half square league, in Santa Cruz county, granted February 3d, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to William Bocle; claim filed April 30th, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 23d, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 13th, 1857; containing 1,062.14 acres.

211, 113, S. D. Henry Haight, claimant for Atascadero, 1 square league, in San Luis Obispo county, granted May 6th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to Trifon Garcia; claim filed May 3d, 1852, confirmed by the commission March 6th, 1855, and appeal dismissed January 19th, 1857; containing 4,348.23 acres. Patented.

212, 288, N. D. Pearson Barton Reading, claimant for part of Capay, (see No. 157) 5 square leagues, in Tehama county, granted October 13th, 1835, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Josefa Soto; claim filed May 3d, 1852, and rejected by the commission March 6th, 1855.

213, 107, N. D., 30. John Marsh, claimant for Los Mejanos, 4 leagues by 3, in Contra Costa county, granted October 13th, 1835, by José Castro to José Noriega; claim filed May 3d, 1852, rejected by the commission March 14th, 1854, confirmed by the district court April 9th, 1858, and by the U. S. supreme court.

214, 275, S. D., 131. Francisco and Juan Bolcoff, claimants for Refugio, 3 leagues by 2, in Santa Cruz county, granted April 7th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to José Bolcoff; claim filed May 5th, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 30th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 21st, 1857; containing 12,147.12 acres. Patented.

215, 37, S. D., 130. Miguel Abila, claimant for San Miguelito, 2 square leagues, in San Luis Obispo county, granted May 10th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to M. Abila; claim filed May 5th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 6th, 1853, by the district court January 25th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 23d, 1857.

216, 38, S. D., 503. Miguel Abila, claimant for addition to San Miguelito, (see No. 215) 500 varas, in San Luis Obispo county, granted March 17th, 1846, by Pio Pico to Miguel Abila; claim filed May 6th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 6th, 1853, by the district court January 25th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 25th, 1857.

217, 21, S. D., 355, 478. Octaviano Gutierrez, claimant for La Laguna, in Santa Barbara county, granted November 13th, 1845, by Pio Pico to Miguel Abila; claim filed May 7th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 21st, 1853, by the district court December 3d, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 23d, 1857; containing 18,212.48 acres.

218, 28, S. D., 268, 317, 470, 524. John Wilson, claimant for Cañada de los Osos Pecho y Islay, in San Luis Obispo county, granted December 1st, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to Victor Linares, April 27th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Francisco Vadillo, and September 24th, 1845, by Pio Pico to James Scott and John Wilson; claim filed May 7th, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 18th, 1853, and appeal dismissed January 8th, 1859; containing 32,430.70 acres.

219, 200, S. D., 272. Guillermo Domingo Foxon, claimant for Tinaquaic, 2 square leagues, in Santa Barbara county, granted May 6th, 1837, by Juan B. Alvarado to Victor Linares; claim filed May 7th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 7th, 1853, by the district court October 5th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1857; containing 8,874.60 acres.

220, 25, S. D., 474. John Wilson, claimant for Cañada del Chorro, 1 square league, in San Luis Obispo county, granted October 10th, 1845, by Pio Pico to Diego Scott and Juan Wilson; claim filed May 7th, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 18th, 1853, by the district court October 20th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1857; containing 3,166.99 acres. Patented.

221, 184, S. D., 534, 575. Thomas M. Robbins and Manuela Carrillo de Jones, claimants for La Calera or Las Positas, described by boundaries, in Santa Barbara county, granted May 16th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Narciso Fabrigat, and one-half square league additional, July 1st, 1846, by Pio Pico to Thomas M. Robbins; claim filed May 8th, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 11th, 1854, and appeal dismissed February 21st, 1857; containing 3,281.70 acres.

222, 2, S. D., 372. John Keyes, claimant for Cañada de Salsipuedes, 1½ square leagues, in Santa Barbara county, granted May 18th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Pedro Cordero; claim filed May 8th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 18th, 1852, by the district court October 12th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 6,653.38 acres.

223, 134, N. D., 182. Juan Martin, claimant for Corte de Madera de Novato, 2 square leagues, in Marin county, granted October 16th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to J. Martin; claim filed May 8th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 14th, 1854, by the district court October 29th, 1855, and appeal dismissed September 8th, 1857; containing 8,878.82 acres.

224, 366, S. D. John Wilson, claimant for part of the buildings of the Mission San Luis Obispo, in San Luis Obispo county, granted December 6th, 1845, by Pio Pico to Scott, Wilson and McKinley; claim filed May 10th, 1852, confirmed by the commission July 17th, 1855, and by the district court June 8th, 1858.

225, 231, S. D. Valentin Cota et al., claimants for Rio de Santa Clara, in Santa Clara county, granted May 22d, 1837, by Juan B. Alvarado to Valentin Cota et al.; claim filed May 10th, 1852, rejected by the commission October 31st, 1854, and confirmed by the district court June 4th, 1857.

226, 268, N. D. Michael C. Nye, claimant for Willy, 4 square leagues, granted December 22d, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena and J. A. Sutter to Michael C. Nye; claim filed May 10th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 8th, 1855, by the district court February 16th, 1857, and rejected by the U. S. supreme court in 21 Howard [62 U. S.] 408.

227, 370, N. D., 396. Andrew Randall and Samuel Todd, claimants for Aguas Frias, 6 square leagues, in Butte county, granted November 10th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Salvador Osio; claim filed May 12th, 1852, confirmed by the commission July 17th, 1853, by the district court May 7th, 1857, and appeal dismissed May 7th, 1857; containing 26,761.40 acres. Patented.

228, 362, N. D., 252, 419, and 357, S. D. Guillermo Eduardo Hartnell, claimant for Todos Santos y San Antonio, 5 square leagues, in Santa Barbara county, granted August 28th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado, and Cosumes, 11 square leagues, in Sacramento county, November 3d, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Salvador Osio; claim filed May 12th, 1852, confirmed for six leagues on the Cosumnes river by the commission August 7th, 1855, by the district court May 14th, 1857, and decree affirmed by the U. S. supreme court in 22 Howard [63 U. S.] 286.

229, 131, N. D. Josefa Palomares et al., heirs of Francisco Guerrero, claimants for 400 varas square, Mission Dolores, in San Francisco county, granted November 30th, 1836; claim filed May 15th, 1852, confirmed by the commission March 14th, 1854, by the district court March 24th, 1856, and appeal dismissed April 2d, 1857; containing 28.41 acres.

230, 232, N. D., 281. William Wolfskill, claimant for Rio de los Putos, 4 square leagues, in Yolo and Solano counties, granted May 24th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to Francisco Guerrero; claim filed May 15th, 1852, confirmed by the commission November 7th, 1854, and appeal dismissed March 14th, 1857; containing 17,754.73 acres. Patented.

231, 102, N. D., 126. Antonio Suñol et al., claimants for El Valle de San José, described by boundaries, in Alameda county, granted April 10th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Antonio Maria Pico et al.; claim filed May 18th, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 31st, 1854, by the district court January 14th, 1856, and decision of the U. S. supreme court as to the right of appeal in 20 Howard [61 U. S.] 261; containing 51,572.26 acres.

232, 103, N. D., 548. Juan Roland, claimant for 11 square leagues, at the junction of the San Joaquin and Stanislaus rivers, granted May 2d, 1846, by Pio Pico to Juan Roland; claim filed May 18th, 1852, and rejected by the commission January 31st, 1854.

233, 329, N. D., 365. Joshua S. Brackett, claimant for Soulaajule, 3 square leagues, in Marin county, granted March 29th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Ramon Mesa; claim filed May 20th, 1852, rejected by the commission April 17th, 1855, confirmed by the district court March 3d, 1856, and appeal dismissed August 7th, 1857; containing 2,492.19 acres.

234, 328, N. D. George N. Cornwell, claimant for Soulaajule, 1¾ square miles, in Marin county, granted March 29th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Ramon Mesa; claim filed May 20th, 1852, rejected by the commission April 17th, 1855, confirmed by the district court February 23d, 1857, and appeal dismissed August 7th, 1857; containing 919.18 acres.

235, 348, N. D. Emanuel Pratt, claimant for Socayac, 3 square leagues, granted December 22d, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to John Chamberlain; claim filed May 21st, 1852, confirmed by the commission July 10th, 1855, by the district court March 16th, 1857, and decree reversed by the U. S. supreme court, with direction to dismiss the petition, in 23 Howard [64 U. S.] 476.

236, 175, N. D., 433. Maria Anastasia Higuera de Berreyesa, claimant for Las Putas, 8 square leagues, in Solano county, granted November 3d, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to José de Jesus y Sisto Berreyesa; claim filed May 21st, 1852, confirmed by the commission September 5th, 1854, by the district court August 13th, 1855, and appeal dismissed April 2d, 1857; containing 35,515.82 acres.

237, 423, N. D. Mayor and common council of Sonoma, claimants for Pueblo of Sonoma, 4 square leagues, granted June 24th, 1835, by M. G. Vallejo to Pueblo of Sonoma; claim filed May 21st, 1852, and confirmed by the commission January 22d, 1856.

238, 129, N. D., 221. Maria Antonia Mesa, widow of Rafael Soto, claimant for Rinconada del Arroyo de San Francisquito, one-half square league, in Santa Clara county, granted February 16th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to M. A. Mesa; claim filed May 25th, 1852, rejected by the commission March 21st, 1854, confirmed by the district court November 23th, 1855, and appeal dismissed April 16th, 1857; containing 2,229.84 acres.

239, 191, S. D., 391. José Joaquin Ortega and Edouardo Stokes, claimants for Santa Ysabel, 4 square leagues, in San Diego county, granted November 9th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to José Joaquin Ortega and Edouardo Stokes; claim filed May 25th, 1852, rejected by the commission September 19th, 1854, and confirmed by the district court February 8th, 1858.

240, 327, S. D., 327. José Antonio Aguirre and Ignacio del Valle, claimants for Tejon, 22 square leagues, in Los Angeles and Buena Vista counties, granted November 24th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to J. A. Aguirre and Ignacio del Valle; claim filed May 25th, 1852, confirmed by the commission May 8th, 1855, and by the district court March 15th, 1858.

241, 351, S. D., 375. Petronillo Rios, claimant for Paso de Robles, 6 square leagues, in San Luis Obispo county, granted May 12th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Pedro Narvaez; claim filed May 25th, 1852, confirmed by the commission July 3d, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 21st, 1857; containing 25,993.18 acres.

242, 57, S. D., 504. Juana Tico de Rodriguez et al., heirs of Ramon Rodriguez, claimants for Cañada de San Miguelito and Cañada del Diablo, 2 square leagues, in Santa Barbara county, granted March 21st, 1846, by Pio Pico to Ramon Rodriguez; claim filed May 26th, 1852, rejected by the commission December 13th, 1853, confirmed by the district court January 7th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1856; containing 8,877.04 acres.

243, 32, N. D., 154. George C. Yount, claimant for Caymus, 2 square leagues, in Napa county, granted February 23d, 1836, by Nicolas Gutierrez to Geo. C. Yount; claim filed May 26th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 8th, 1853, by the district court July 17th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 23d, 1857; containing 11,886.63 acres.

244, 211, N. D. Liberata Ceseña Bull et al., heirs of William Fisher, claimants for La Laguna Seca, 4 square leagues, in Santa Clara county, granted July 23d, 1834, by José Figueroa to Juan Alvarez; claim filed May 27th, 1852, confirmed by the commission September 26th, 1853, by the district court July 17th, 1855, and appeal dismissed January 14th, 1857; containing 19,972.92 acres.

245, 331, N. D. Pedro J. Vasquez, claimant for part of Soulaajule, 12 square leagues, in Marin county, granted March 29th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Ramon Mesa; claim filed May 27th, 1852, rejected by the commission April 17th, 1855, confirmed by the district court March 3d, 1856, and appeal dismissed August 7th, 1857; containing 4,473.71 acres.

246, 352, N. D. Luis D. Watkins, claimant for part of Soulaajule, 2¾ square leagues, in Marin county, granted March 29th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Ramon Mesa; claim filed May 27th, 1852, rejected by the commission April 17th, 1855, confirmed by the district court March 3d, 1856, and appeal dismissed August 7th, 1857; containing 919.18 acres.

247, 334, N. D. Martin F. Gormley, claimant for part of Soulaajule, one-half square league, in Marin county, granted March 29th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Ramon Mesa; claim filed May 27th, 1852, rejected by the commission April 17th, 1855, confirmed by the district court March 3d, 1856, and appeal dismissed March 7th, 1857; containing 2,266.25 acres.

248, 331, N. D. Charles Covillaud, claimant for New Helvetia, part of 11 leagues first granted, in Yuba and Sutter counties, granted July 18th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado, and 1845, by Manuel Micheltorena, to John A. Sutter; claim filed May 31st, 1852, confirmed by the commission May 22d, 1855, and by the district court April 10th, 1858.

249, 140, N. D. Mariano Guadalupe Vallejo, claimant for Yulupa, 3 square leagues, in Sonoma county, granted November 23d, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Miguel Alvarado; claim filed May 31st, 1852, rejected by the commission May 10th, 1854, confirmed by the district court January 21st, 1857, decree reversed by the U. S. supreme court and cause remanded for further evidence, in 22 Howard [63 U. S.] 416.

250, 321, N. D., 306. Mariano Guadalupe Vallejo, claimant for Petaluma, 10 square leagues, in Sonoma county, granted October 22d, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to M. G. Vallejo, (grant) and 5 square leagues, June 22d, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to M. G. Vallejo (sale by the government); claim filed May 31st, 1852, confirmed by the commission May 22d, 1855, by the district court March 16th, 1857, and appeal dismissed July 3d, 1857; containing 66,622.17 acres.

251, 326, N. D. Guadalupe Vasquez de West et al., claimants for San Miguel, 6 square leagues, in Sonoma county, granted November 2d, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado, and October 14th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena, to Marcus West; claim filed May 31st, 1852, rejected by the commission April 24th, 1855, confirmed by the district court June 2d, 1857, and decree confirmed by the U. S. supreme court for one league and a half, in 22 Howard [63 U. S.] 315.

252, 58, N. D., 362. Joaquin Carrillo, claimant for Llano de Santa Rosa, 3 square leagues, in Sonoma county, granted March 29th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Marcus West; claim filed May 31st, 1852, confirmed by the commission October 21st, 1853, by the district court March 24th, 1856, and appeal dismissed January 13th, 1857; containing 13,336.55 acres.

253, 358, S. D., 579. J. J. Warner, claimant for Camajal y El Palomar, 4 square leagues, in San Diego county, granted August, 1846, by Pio Pico to Juan J. Warner; claim filed May 31st, 1852, rejected by the commission July 17th, 1855, and by the district court September 14th, 1860.

254, 219, S. D., 228, 407. J. J. Warner, claimant for Agua Caliente or Valle de San José, 6 square leagues, in San Diego county, granted January 8th, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to José Antonio Pico, and November 28th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Juan J. Warner; claim filed May 31st, 1852, confirmed by the commission October 10th, 1854, by the district court February 6th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 26,629.88 acres.

255, 298, N. D., 340. Charles M. Weber, claimant for Campo de los Franceses, 11 square leagues, in San Joaquin county, granted June 13th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Guillermo Gulnack; claim filed May 31st, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 17th, 1855, by the district court May 1st, 1857, and by the U. S. supreme court; containing 48,747.03 acres. Patented.

256, 234, N. D., 300. José Joaquin Estudillo, claimant for San Leandro, 1 square league, in Alameda county, granted October 16th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to Joaquin Estudillo; claim filed May 31st, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 9th, 1855, by the district court May 7th, 1857, and by the U. S. supreme court; containing 7,010.84 acres.

257, 97, N. D. Mariano Castro, claimant for Rancho del Refugio or Pastoria de las Borregas, 2 square leagues, in Santa Clara county, granted June 15th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to Francisco Estrada; claim filed May 31st, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 23d, 1854, by the district court November 23d, 1859, and by the U. S. supreme court.

258, 119, N. D., 358. Tomas Pacheco and Agustin Alviso, claimants for Potrero de los Ceritos, 3 square leagues, in Alameda county, granted March 23d, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to T. Pacheco and A. Alviso; claim filed May 31st, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 14th, 1854, by the district court October 29th, 1855, and by the U. S. supreme court; containing 10,610.26 acres.

259. William Reynolds and Daniel Frink, claimants for part of Nicasia, 2½ square leagues, in Marin county, granted August 1st, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Pablo de la Guerra and Juan Cooper; claim filed June 2d, 1852 (see No. 270).

260, 342, N. D., 234. Isaac Graham et al., claimants for Zayanta, 1 league by one-half, in Santa Cruz county, granted April 22d, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to Juan José Crisostomo Mayor; claim filed June 4th, 1852, confirmed by the commission June 26th, 1855, and appeal dismissed; containing 2,514.64 acres.

261, 360, N. D., 311. James M. Harbin et al., claimants for Río de Jesus Maria, 6 square leagues, in Yolo county, granted October 23d, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to Tomas Hardy; claim filed June 8th, 1852, confirmed by the commission June 26th, 1855, by the district court March 23d, 1857, and appeal dismissed May 8th, 1857; containing 26,637.42 acres. Patented.

262, 114, S. D., 467. T. W. Sutherland, guardian of the minor children of Miguel Pedrorena, claimants for El Cajon, 11 square leagues, in San Diego county, granted September 23d, 1845, by Pio Pico to Maria Antonia Estudillo de Pedrorena; claim filed June 10th, 1852, confirmed by the commission March 14th, 1854, by the district court September 28th, 1855, and by the U. S. supreme court in 19 Howard [60 U. S.] 363; containing 48,794.03 acres.

263, 82, S. D., 495. T. W. Sutherland, guardian of the minor children of Miguel Pedrorena, claimants for San Jacinto Nuevo and Potrero, in San Diego county, granted January 14th, 1846, by Pio Pico to Miguel Pedrorena; claim filed June 10th, 1852, rejected by the commission December 27th, 1853, confirmed by the district court December 24th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 23d, 1857.

264, 254, S. D. W. E. P. Hartnell, claimant for part of the Alizal, two-thirds square league, in Monterey county, granted January 26th, 1834, by José Migueroa to Guillermo Eduardo Hartnell; claim filed June 10th, 1852, confirmed by the commission October 31st, 1854, by the district court October 3d, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1857; containing 2,971.26 acres.

265, 241, S. D. Maria Antonia de la Guerra y Lataillade, claimant for La Zaca, in Santa Barbara county, granted, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Antonio; claim filed June 10th, 1852, confirmed by the commission November 14th, 1854, by the district court January 25th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1857; containing 4,480 acres.

266, 115, S. D., 409. Agustin Yansens, claimant for Lomas de la Purificacion, 3 square leagues, in Santa Barbara county, granted December 27th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to A. Yansens; claim filed June 10th, 1852, confirmed by the commission November 14th, 1854, by the district court October 3d, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1857; containing 13,341.49 acres.

267, 170, N. D., 370. Antonio Maria Pico and Henry M. Naglee, claimants for El Pescadero, 8 square leagues, in San Joaquin county, granted November 28th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to Antonio Maria Pico; claim filed June 10th, 1852, rejected by the commission September 19th, 1854, confirmed by the district court

September 2d, 1856, and by the U. S. supreme court; containing 35,546.39 acres.

268, 218, N. D., 578. Josefa Carrillo de Fitch et al., heirs of Henry D. Fitch, claimants for Paraje del Arroyo, one-half square league, at Presidio San Francisco, granted July 24th, 1846, by Pio Pico to Henry D. Fitch and Francisco Guerrero; claim filed June 10th, 1852, rejected by the commission November 7th, 1854, and by the district court December 10th, 1857.

269, 275, N. D., 136. Encarnacion Mesa et al., claimants for San Antonio, 1 square league, in Santa Clara county, granted March 24th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Prado Mesa; claim filed June 11th, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 30th, 1855, by the district court March 10th, 1856, and appeal dismissed March 13th, 1857; containing 898.41 acres.

270, 392, N. D., 420. Henry W. Halleck and James Black, claimants for Nicasia, 10 square leagues, in Marin county, granted August 18th, 1844, by Manuel Michelorena to Pablo de la Guerra and Juan Cooper; claim filed June 14th, 1852, confirmed by the commission September 25th, 1855, by the district court March 9th, 1857, and appeal dismissed April 30th, 1857; containing 56,621.04 acres.

271, 333, S. D. Joaquin Gutierrez, claimant for El Potrero de San Carlos, 1 square league, in Monterey county, granted October 28th, 1837, by Juan B. Alvarado to Fructuoso; claim filed June 14th, 1852, confirmed by the commission June 5th, 1855, and appeal dismissed June 8th, 1857; containing 4,306.98 acres.

272, 116, S. D., 211. Maria Merced Lugo de Foster et al., claimants for San Pascual, 3 square leagues in Los Angeles county, granted September 24th, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to Enrique Sepulveda and José Perez; claim filed June 14th, 1852, rejected by the commission February 14th, 1854, and dismissed for want of prosecution March 7th, 1860.

273, 98, N. D., 345. Antonio Maria Peralta, claimant for part of San Antonio, 2 square leagues, in Alameda county, granted August 16th, 1820, by Pablo V. de Sola to Luis Peralta; claim filed June 18th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 7th, 1854, by the district court December 4th, 1855, and appeal dismissed October 20th, 1857; containing 16,067.76 acres.

274, 99, N. D. Ygnacio Peralta, claimant for part of San Antonio, 2 square leagues, in Alameda county, granted August 16th, 1820, by Pablo V. de Sola to Luis Peralta; claim filed June 18th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 7th, 1854, by the district court January 13th, 1857, and appeal dismissed April 20th, 1857; containing 9,416.66 acres. Patented.

275, 315, S. D. Josefa Morales del Castillo Negrete, claimant for Santa Ana y Santa Anita, 6 square leagues, in San Joaquin county, granted April 15th, 1836, by Nicolas Gutierrez to Luis del Castillo Negrete; claim filed June 24th, 1852, rejected by the commission March 6th, 1855, and for failure of prosecution appeal dismissed December 17th, 1856.

276, 226, N. D., 227. Manuel Alvisu, claimant for Quito, 3 square leagues, in Santa Clara county, granted March 16th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to José Z. Fernandez and José Noriega; claim filed June 28th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 5th, 1853, by the district court January 20th, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 9th, 1857; containing 13,309.85 acres.

277, 239, N. D. Francisco Berreyesa et al., heirs of G. Berreyesa, claimants for part of the Rincon de los Esteros, described by boundaries, in Santa Clara county, granted February 10th, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Ygnacio Alvisu; claim filed June 28th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 26th, 1854, by the district court December 28th, 1857, and appeal dismissed February 18th, 1858.

278, 204, N. D., 114. Rafael Alvisu et al., claimants for part of the Rincon de los Esteros, described by boundaries, in Santa Clara county, granted February 10th, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Ygnacio Alvisu; claim filed June 28th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 26th, 1854, by the district court December 24th, 1857, and appeal dismissed February 20th, 1858; containing 2,200.19 acres.

279, 245, S. D. Juan Miguel Anzar, claimant for Vega del Rio del Pajaro, 8,000 acres, in Monterey county, granted April 17th, 1820, by Pablo V. de Sola to Antonio Maria Castro; claim filed June 28th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 5th, 1854, by the district court December 12th, 1856, and appeal dismissed June 4th, 1857; containing 4,310.29 acres.

280, 427, N. D. City of San Francisco, claimant for 4 square leagues, granted in 1833 to the pueblo of San Francisco; claim filed July 2d, 1852, confirmed by the commission October 3d, 1854, and appeal dismissed March 30th, 1857.

281, 207, N. D. The executors and heirs of Agustin Iturbide, claimants for 400 square leagues, granted April 18th, 1835, to Agustin Iturbide; claim filed July 6th, 1852, rejected by the commission December 19th, 1854, dismissed by the district court January 8th, 1858, for want of jurisdiction, and decree affirmed by the U. S. supreme court in 22 Howard [63 U. S.] 290.

282, 221, N. D., 550. John Roland and J.L. Hornsby, claimants for Los Huecos, 9 square leagues, in Santa Clara county, granted May 6th, 1846, by Pio Pico to Luis Arenas and John Roland; claim filed July 6th, 1852, and rejected by the commission November 7th, 1854.

283, 90, N. D., 508. Pedro Sainsevain, claimant for La Cañada del Rincon, 2 square leagues, in Santa Cruz county, granted July 10th, 1843, by Pio Pico to Pedro Sainsevain; claim filed July 6th, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 17th, 1854, and appeal dismissed September 20th, 1854; containing 5,826.86 acres. Patented.

284, 205, N. D., 278. Maria Antonia Martinez de Richardson et al., claimants for Pinole, 4 square leagues, in Contra Costa county, granted June 1st, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to Ygnacio Martinez; claim filed July 8th, 1852, confirmed by the commission October 24th, 1854, and appeal dismissed March 10th, 1857; containing 17,786.49 acres.

285, 29, N. D., 223, 309. Guillermo Castro, claimant for part of San Lorenzo, 600 varas square, in Alameda county, granted February 23d, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to G. Castro; and for San Lorenzo, 6 square leagues, in Alameda county, granted October 24th, 1843, by Manuel Michelorena to G. Castro; claim filed July 8th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 14th, 1853, by the district court, July 6th, 1855, and appeal dismissed January 16th, 1858; containing 26,717.43 acres.

286, 419, N. D. The mayor and common council of San José, claimants for land, described by boundaries, granted July 22d, 1778, by Felipe de Neve to pueblo of San José; claim filed July 14th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 5th, 1856, and by the district court November 26th, 1859.

287, 426, N. D. Charles White and Isaac Brenham, trustees for C. White et al., claimants for land granted by Felipe de Neve to the mayor and common council of the city of San José; claim filed July 14th, 1852, and rejected by the commission February 5th, 1856.

288, 280, N. D. Joseph M. Miller, claimant for part of Llano de Santa Rosa, 1 square league, in Sonoma county, granted March 29th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Joaquin Carrillo; claim filed July 15th, 1852, rejected by the commission March 6th, 1858, and appeal dismissed April 21st, 1856.

289, 398, N. D., 472. Charles J. Brenham et al., claimants for Llano Seco, 4 square leagues, in Butte county, granted provisionally, July 26th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena, and October 2d, 1845, by Pio Pico, to Sebastian Keyser; claim filed July 17th, 1852, rejected by the commission September 25th, 1855, confirmed by the district court May 26th, 1857, and appeal dismissed June 3d, 1859; containing 17,767.17 acres. Patented.

290, 70, S. D., 166. Vicente Cantua, claimant for Rancho Nacional, 2 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted April 4th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Vicente Cantua; claim filed July 17th, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 24th, 1854, by the district court January 26th, 1855, and appeal dismissed January 28th, 1857; containing 6,633.19 acres.

291, 318, N. D. M. G. Vallejo, claimant for Suscol, in Solano county, granted March 15th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to M. G. Vallejo; claim filed July 17th, 1852, confirmed by the commission May 22d, 1855, and by the district court March 22d, 1860.

292, 238, N. D. Ellen E. White, claimant for part of the Rincon de los Esteros, 2,000 acres, in Santa Clara county, granted February 10th, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Ygnacio Alvisu; claim filed July 19th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 19th, 1853, by the district court December 28th, 1857, and appeal dismissed February 9th, 1858; containing 2,308.17 acres.

293, 137, N. D., 371. Hiram Grimes et al., claimants for El Pescadero, 8 square leagues, in San Joaquin county, granted November 28th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to Valentin Higuera and Rafael Feliz; claim filed July 22d, 1852, rejected by the commission February 14th, 1854, confirmed by the district court April 11th, 1856, and appeal dismissed December 22d, 1856; containing 35,446.06 acres. Patented.

294, 270, N. D. James Noe, claimant for Island of Sacramento, 5 square leagues, granted March 15th, 1845, by Juan B. Alvarado to Roberto Ellwell; claim filed July 24th, 1852, rejected by the commission February 8th, 1855, confirmed by the district court November 15th, 1856, decree reversed by the U. S. supreme court, cause remanded and petition to be dismissed, in 23 Howard [64 U. S.] 312.

295, 390, N. D. Edward A. Breed et al., claimants for Mission of San Rafael, 16 square leagues, in Marin county, granted June 8th, 1846, by Pio Pico to Antonio Suiñol and Antonio Maria Pico; claim filed July 26th, 1852, and rejected by the commission September 11th, 1855.

296, 117, S. D., 11. José de la Guerra y Noriega, claimant for Las Posas, 6 square leagues, in Santa Barbara county, granted May 15th, 1834, by José Figueroa to José Carrillo; claim filed July 27th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 28th, 1854, by the district court December 18th, 1856, and appeal dismissed January 21st, 1858; containing 26,623.26 acres.

297, 325, S. D. Manuel Larios, claimant for 1 square league, in Monterey county, granted May 4th, 1839, by José Castro to M. Larios; claim filed August 5th, 1852, confirmed by the commission June 19th, 1855, and by the district court December 23d, 1858.

298, 374, N. D., 312. J. Jesus Peña et al., heirs of J. G. Peña, claimants for Tzabaco, 4 square leagues, in Sonoma county, granted October 14th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to José German Peña; claim filed August 5th, 1852, confirmed by the commission June 26th, 1855, by the district court March 9th, 1857, and appeal dismissed April 2d, 1857; containing 15,439.32 acres. Patented.

299, 364, S. D. Nicolas A. Den et al., claimants for San Marcos, 8 square leagues, in Santa Barbara county, granted June 8th, 1846, by Pio Pico to N. A. Den; claim filed August 11th, 1852, confirmed by the commission July 17th, 1855, and appeal dismissed June 8th, 1857; containing 35,573.10 acres.

300, 22, N. D., 408. Fernando Feliz, claimant for Sanel, 4 square leagues, in Mendocino county, granted November 9th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to F. Feliz; claim filed August 14th, 1852, rejected by the commission October 18th, 1853, confirmed by the district court January 14th, 1856, and appeal dismissed March 20th, 1857; containing 17,754.38 acres. Patented.

301, 322, N. D., 50. Domingo Peralta, claimant for half of San Ramon or Las Juntas, described by boundaries, in Contra Costa county, granted in 1833, by José Figueroa to Bartolo Pacheco and Mariano Castro; claim filed August 14th, 1852, confirmed by the commission May 15th, 1855, by the district court March 2d, 1857, and appeal dismissed January 5th, 1858.

302, 43, S. D., 189. José de Jesus Pico, claimant for Piedra Blanca, described by boundaries, in San Luis Obispo county, granted January 18th, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to José de Jesus Pico; claim filed August 14th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 13th, 1853, by the district court September 25th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 4th, 1857.

303, 376, N. D. James Murphy, claimant for Cazadores, 4 square leagues, in Sacramento county, granted December 22d, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Ernesto Rufus; claim filed August 14th, 1852, confirmed by the commission July 17th, 1855, by the district court September 22d, 1856, decree reversed by the U. S. supreme court and cause remanded, with direction to dismiss the petition, 23 Howard [64 U. S.] 476.

304, 260, S. D., 577. Tomas Herrera and Geronimo Quintana, claimants for San Juan Capistrano del Camote, 10 sitios of 4,428 acres each, in San Luis Obispo county, granted July 11th, 1846, by Pio Pico to T. Herrera and G. Quintana; claim filed August 14th, 1852, rejected by the commission December 26th, 1854, and dismissed for failure of prosecution August 8th, 1860.

305, 44, S. D. Ygnacio Pastor, claimant for Las Milpitas, in Monterey county, granted May 5th, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Y. Pastor; claim filed August 14th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 5th, 1853, and by the district court August 28th, 1860.

306, 395, N. D., 366. Domingo Peralta, claimant for Cañada del Corte de Madera, in Santa Clara county, granted in 1833, by José Figueroa to D. Peralta and Maximo Martinez; claim filed August 14th, 1852, rejected by the commission October 2d, 1855, and confirmed by the district court April 6th, 1858.

307, 311, N. D. G. W. P. Bissell and William H. Aspinwall, claimants for Isla de la Yegua, or Mare Island, described by boundaries, in Sonoma county, granted October 31st, 1840, by Manuel Jimeno, and May 20th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado, to Victor Castro; claim filed August 30th, 1852, confirmed by the commission May 8th, 1855, and by the district court March 2d, 1857.

308, 9, S. D. Antonio Maria Lugo, claimant for San Antonio, in Los Angeles county, granted in 1810, by José Dario de Arguello, confirmed by Don Luis Arguello April 1st, 1823, extension granted by José M. Elcheandia April 23d, 1827, and finally granted by Juan B. Alvarado, September 27th, 1838, to A. M. Lugo; claim filed August 30th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 21st, 1853, by the district court December 3d, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 29,514.13 acres.

309, 212, S. D. Maria Antonia de la Guerra y Lataillade, claimant for El Alamo Pintado, 1 square league, in Santa Barbara county, granted August 16th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Marcelino; claim filed August 30th, 1852, rejected by the commission September 26th, 1854, and by the district court June 3d, 1857.

310, 401, N. D. Juana Briones de Miranda et al., heirs of Apolinario Miranda, claimants for Ojo de Agua de Figueroa, 100 varas square, in San Francisco county, granted November 16th, 1833, by José Sanchez to Apolinario Miranda; claim filed August 30th, 1852, rejected by the commission October 23d, 1855, and confirmed by the district court November 25th, 1858.

311, 188, N. D. Manuel Diaz, claimant for Sacramento, 11 square leagues, in Colusi county, granted May 18th, 1846, by Pio Pico to M. Diaz; claim filed August 30th, 1852, rejected by the commission October 31st, 1854, and by the district court March 15th, 1858.

312, 36, S. D., 513. Lewis T. Burton, claimant for Bolsa de Chemisal, in San Luis Obispo county, granted May 11th, 1837, by Juan B. Alvarado to Francisco Quijada; claim filed August 30th, 1852, rejected by the commission December 5th, 1853, confirmed by the district court December 21st, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 14,335 acres.

313, 347, N. D. Juan C. Galindo, claimant for Mission of Santa Clara, in Santa Clara county, granted June 10th, 1846, by José Maria del Ray (priest); claim filed August 30th, 1852, rejected by the commission June 12th, 1855, and confirmed by the district court October 21st, 1857.

314, 74, S. D., 130. Miguel Abila, claimant for San Miguelito, 2 square leagues, in San Luis Obispo county, granted April 29th, 1846, by Pio Pico to M. Abila; claim filed August 31st, 1852, and rejected by the commission December 13th, 1853.

315, 70, N. D.; 199, S. D., (sent to N. D.) 298. Maria Antonio Pico et al., heirs of Simeon Castro, claimants for Punta del Año Nuevo, 4 square leagues, in Santa Cruz county, granted May 27th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to Simeon Castro; claim filed August 31st, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 13th, 1853, by the district court December 4th, 1856, and appeal dismissed April 2d, 1856; containing 17,763.15 acres. Patented.

316, 12, S. D., 233. José del Carmen Lugo et al., claimants for San Bernardino, 8 square leagues, in San Bernardino county, granted June 21st, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to José del Carmen Lugo, José Maria Lugo, Vicente Lugo and Diego Sepulveda; claim filed August 31st, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 21st, 1853, by the district court December 7th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 18th, 1857; containing 35,509.41 acres.

317, 316, S. D., 528. Jonathan R. Scott and Benjamin Hays, claimant for La Cañada, 2 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted May 12th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Ygnacio Coronel; claim filed September 1st, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 3d, 1855, by the district court February 16th, 1857, and appeal dismissed June 4th, 1856; containing 5,832.10 acres.

318, 305, S. D., 71. Jacoba Feliz, claimant for San Francisco, in Santa Barbara and Los Angeles counties, granted January 22d, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Antonio del Valle; claim filed September 2d, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 2d, 1855, and appeal dismissed June 8th, 1857; containing 48,813.58 acres.

319, 86, N. D., 387. John Bidwell, claimant for Los Ulpinos, 4 square leagues, in Solano county, granted November 20th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to J. Bidwell; claim filed September 3d, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 2d, 1855, by the district court October 29th, 1855, and appeal dismissed March 21st, 1857; containing 17,726.44 acres.

320, 331, S. D. Robert B. Neligh, claimant for 6 square leagues, granted April 4th, 1846, by Pio Pico to José Castro; claim filed September 3d, 1852, confirmed by the commission May 8th, 1855, by the district court October 5th, 1859.

321, 359, N. D., 389. Joseph L. Folsom and Anna Maria Sparks, claimants for Rio de los Americanos, 8 square leagues, in Sacramento county, granted October 8th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Guillermo A. Leidesdorff; claim filed September 4th, 1852, confirmed by the commission June 12th, 1855, by the district court February 23d, 1857, and further appeal dismissed April 30th, 1857; containing 35,521.36 acres.

322, 207, S. D. Maria Antonia de la Guerra y Lataillade, claimant for Las Huertas, 1,300 varas square, in Santa Barbara county, granted July 26th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Francisco, Luis and Raymundo; claim filed September 4th, 1852, rejected by the commission September 26th, 1844, and by the district court June 3d, 1857.

323, 177, N. D. Julius Martin, claimant for part of Entre Napa or Rinconda de los Carne-ro, 1 mile square, in Solano county, granted May 9th, 1836, by Mariano Chico to Nicolas Higuera; claim filed September 4th, 1852, rejected by the commission September 19th, 1854, confirmed by the district court September 7th, 1856, and appeal dismissed May 15th, 1857; containing 2,557.68 acres. Patented.

324, 83, S. D. José Antonio de la Guerra y Carrillo, claimant for Los Alamos, in Santa Barbara county, granted March 9th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to J. A. de la Guerra y Carrillo; claim filed September 7th, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 17th, 1854, by the district court January 7th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 3d, 1857; containing 48,803.38 acres.

325, 84, S. D., 468. George W. Hamley, claimant for Guejito y Cañada de Palomia, 3 square leagues, in San Diego county, granted September 20th, 1845, by Pio Pico to José Maria Orosio; claim filed September 7th, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 24th, 1854, by the district court September 26th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1857.

326, 186, N. D., 363. William Forbes, claimant for La Laguna de los Gentiles or Caslamayome, 8 square leagues, in Sonoma county, granted March 20th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Eugenio Montenegro; claim filed September 7th, 1852, and rejected by the commission September 26th, 1854.

327, 118, S. D., 58. Anastasio Carrillo, claimant for Punta de la Concepcion, in Santa Barbara county, granted May 10th, 1837, by Juan B. Alvarado to A. Carrillo; claim filed September 7th, 1852, rejected by the commission February 14th, 1854, confirmed by the district court October 20th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1857; containing 24,992.04 acres.

328, 20, S. D., 475. Anastasio Carrillo, claimant for Cieneguita, 400 varas square, in Santa Barbara county, granted October 10th, 1845, by Pio Pico to A. Carrillo; claim filed September 7th, 1852, confirmed by the commission March 14th, 1853, and by the district court January 12th, 1857.

329, 85, S. D., 222. Gil Ybarra, claimant for Rincon de la Brea. 1 square league, in Los Angeles county, granted February 23d, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to G. Ybarra; claim filed September 9th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 20th, 1852, by the district court October 11th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 4,452.59 acres.

330, 226, S. D. Victoria Dominguez et al., heirs of José Antonio Estudillo, claimants for Otay, 1 square league, in San Diego county, granted March 24th, 1829, by José M. Echeandía to J. A. Estudillo; claim filed September 9th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 19th, 1854, and appeal dismissed June 8th, 1857.

331, 22, S. D., 453. Henry Dalton, claimant for San Francisco, 2 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted May 26th, 1845, by Pio Pico to H. Dalton; claim filed September 10th, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 11th, 1853, rejected by the district court December 3d, 1855, decree reversed by the U. S. supreme court, and claim confirmed, in 22 Howard [63 U. S.] 436.

332, 195, S. D., 325. José Joaquin Ortega et al., claimants for Valle de Pamo, 4 square leagues, in San Diego county, granted November 25th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to J. J. Ortega and Eduardo Stokes; claim filed September 10th, 1852, rejected by the commission September 19th, 1854, and confirmed by the district court February 8th, 1858.

333, 332, S. D., 168. Charles M. Weber, claimant for Cañada de San Felipe y Las Animas, 2 square leagues, in Santa Clara county, granted August 17th, 1839, by Manuel Jimeno to Tomas Boun; claim filed September 11th, 1852, confirmed by the commission May 8th, 1855, by the district court January 21st, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858; containing 8,787.80 acres.

334, 80, N. D. Joseph P. Thompson, claimant for part of Entre Napa, 1 square league, in Napa county, granted May 9th, 1836, by Mariano Chico to Nicolas Higuera; claim filed September 11th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 13th, 1853, by the district court January 14th, 1856, and appeal dismissed September 2d, 1857.

335, 217, N. D., 452. Cayetano Jaures, claimant for Yokaya, 8 square leagues, in Mendocino county, granted May 24th, 1845, by Pio Pico to C. Juarez; claim filed September 11th, 1852, and rejected by the commission November 7th, 1854.

336, 104, N. D., 23. Juan José Gonzales, claimant for San Antonio or El Pescadero, three-fourths square league, in Santa Cruz county, granted December 24th, 1833, by José Figueroa to J. J. Gonzales; claim filed September 11th, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 31st, 1854, by the district court October 29th, 1855, and decree affirmed by the U. S. supreme court in 22 Howard [63 U. S.] 161; containing 3,282.22 acres.

337, 152, N. D. Mariano G. Vallejo, claimant for part of Entre Napa, 300 varas square, in Napa county, granted May 9th, 1836, by Mariano Chico to Nicolas Higuera; claim filed September 11th, 1852, rejected by the commission January 27th, 1854, and for failure of prosecution appeal dismissed April 21st, 1856.

338, 30, S. D., 426. David W. Alexander and Francis Mellus, claimants for Providencia, 1 square league, in Los Angeles county, granted March 23d, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to Vicente de la Osa; claim filed September 11th, 1852, and confirmed by the commission October 18th, 1853.

339, 194, S. D., 335. Samuel Carpenter, claimant for Santa Bertrudes, 5 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted May 22d, 1834, by José Figueroa to Josefa Cota de Nieto; claim filed September 11th, 1852, confirmed by the commission September 12th, 1854, by the district court January 21st, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858.

340, 132, N. D., 294. Charles Fossat, claimant for Los Capitancillos, three-fourths square league, in Santa Clara county, granted September 1st, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to Justo Larios; claim filed September 13th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 28th, 1854, by the district court August 17th, 1857, decree reversed by the U. S. supreme court and cause remanded, 20 Howard [61 U. S.] 413, and decision of the U. S. supreme court on the survey, 21 Howard [62 U. S.] 445; containing 3,360.48 acres.

341, 203, S. D., 390, 545. Luis Vignes, claimant for Pauba, 6 square leagues, in San Diego county, granted November 9th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to V. Morago, and February 4th, 1846, by Pio Pico, to Vicente Moraga and Luis Arenas; claim filed September 13th, 1852, confirmed by the commission May 2d, 1854, by the district court February 7th, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 1st, 1858; containing 26,597.96 acres. Patented.

342, 6, S. D., 398. Luis Vignes, claimant for Temecula, 6 square leagues, in San Diego county, granted December 14th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Feliz Valdez; claim filed September 13th, 1852, rejected by the commission March 14th, 1854, confirmed by the district court September 21st, 1855, and appeal dismissed October 18th, 1855; containing 26,608.94 acres. Patented.

343, 86, S. D., 240, 436. Henry Dalton, claimant for Santa Anita, 3 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted provisionally April 16th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado, and March 31st, 1845, finally by Pio Pico, to Perfecto Hugo Reid; claim filed September 14th, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 17th, 1854, by the district court October 24th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 23d, 1857; containing 13,319.06 acres.

344, 265, S. D., 1, 91. Maria Antonio Machado, claimant for Los Virgenes, 2 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted April 6th, 1837, by Juan B. Alvarado to José Maria Dominguez; claim filed September 15th, 1852, confirmed by the commission November 7th, 1854, by the district court February 23d, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858.

345, 173, S. D., 157. Manuel Garfias, claimant for San Pascual, 3½ square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted November 28th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to M. Garfias; claim filed September 16th, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 25th, 1854, by the district court March 6th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 23d, 1857; containing 13,693.93 acres.

346, 161, S. D., 425. Abel Stearns, claimant for La Laguna, 3 square leagues, in San Diego county, granted June 7th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Julian Manriquez; claim filed September 18th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 14th, 1854, by the district court February 14th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857.

347, 217, S. D., 386. F. P. F. Temple and Juan Matias Sanchez, claimants for La Merced, 1 square league, in Los Angeles county, granted October 8th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Casilda Soto; claim filed September 18th, 1852, confirmed by the commission October 14th, 1854, by the district court December 29th, 1856, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858; containing 2,363.75 acres.

348, 339, S. D. William Cary Jones, claimant for San Luis Rey and Pala, 12 square leagues, in San Diego county, granted May 18th, 1846, by Pio Pico to Antonio José Scott and José Antonio Pico; claim filed September 20th, 1852, confirmed by the commission June 12th, 1855, and by the district court April 1st, 1861.

349, 287, N. D. Leo Norris, claimant for part of San Ramon, 1 square league, in Contra Costa county, granted August 1st, 1834, by José Figueroa to José Maria Amador; claim filed September 20th, 1852, confirmed by the commission August 1st, 1854, and by the district court September 10th, 1857; containing 4,450.94 acres.

350, 156, N. D., 432. Thomas S. Page, claimant for Cotate, 4 square leagues, in Sonoma county, granted July 7th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Juan Castañeda; claim filed September 21st, 1852, confirmed by the commission August 27th, 1854, by the district court January 14th, 1856, and appeal dismissed March 21st, 1857; containing 17,238.60 acres. Patented.

351, 17, S. D. Juan Temple, claimant for Los Cerritos, 5 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted May 22d, 1834, by José Figueroa to Manuela Nieto; claim filed September 21st, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 11th, 1853, by the district court February 28th, 1857, and appeal dismissed January 12th, 1857.

352, 82, N. D. Francisco Sanchez, claimant for San Pedro, 2 square leagues, in San Mateo county, granted January 26th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to F. Sanchez; claim filed September 22d, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 13th, 1853, and appeal dismissed March 20th, 1857; containing 8,926.46 acres.

353, 169, S. D., 37, 402. Jacob P. Leese, claimant for Punta de Pinos, described by boundaries, in Monterey county, granted May 24th, 1833, by José Figueroa to José Maria Armenta, and October 4th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to José Abrego; claim filed September 22d, 1852, confirmed by the commission June 13th, 1854, and February 8th, 1855.

354, 269, N. D., 217. Candelario Miramontes, claimant for Arroyo de los Pilarcitos, 1 square league, in Santa Clara county, granted January 2d, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to C. Miramontes; claim filed September 22d, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 6th, 1855, by the district court February 16th, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 21st, 1857; containing 4,424.12 acres.

355, 67, S. D. Salvador Espinoza, claimant for Bolsa de las Escorpinas, 2 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted October 7th, 1837, by Juan B. Alvarado to S. Espinoza; claim filed September 22d, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 28th, 1853, by the district court September 24th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 6,415.96 acres.

356, 42, S. D., 376. Francisco Arce, claimant for Santa Ysabel, 4 square leagues, in San Luis Obispo county, granted May 12th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to F. Arce; claim filed September 22d, 1852, rejected by the commission December 13th, 1853, and confirmed by the district court January 12th, 1857.

357, 184, N. D. Andres Pico, claimant for Moquelamo, 11 square leagues, in Calaveras county, granted June 6th, 1846, by Pio Pico to A. Pico; claim filed September 22d, 1852, rejected by the commission September 26th, 1854, confirmed by the district court April 24th, 1857, decree reversed by the U. S. supreme court and cause remanded for further evidence, in 22 Howard [63 U. S.] 406.

358, 89, N. D., 259. Salvador Castro, claimant for part of San Gregorio, 1 square league, in Santa Cruz county, granted April 6th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Antonio Buelna; claim filed September 22d, 1852, rejected by the commission December 27th, 1853, confirmed by the district court January 14th, 1856, and appeal dismissed July 23d, 1857; containing 4,439.31 acres. Patented.

359, 350, N. D. José Antonio Alvisu, claimant for Cañada de Verde y Arroyo de la Purísima, 2 square leagues, in Santa Cruz county, granted April 25th, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to José Maria Alvisu; claim filed September 22d, 1852, confirmed by the commission July 10th, 1855, by the district court March 9th, 1857, decision of the U. S. supreme court as to the right of appeal, 20 Howard [61 U. S.] 261, and decree of confirmation affirmed by the U. S. supreme court, 23 Howard [64 U. S.] 318; containing 8,905.58 acres.

360, 23, S. D., 380. José Maria Aguila, claimant for Cañada de los Nogales, one-half square league, in Los Angeles county, granted August 30th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to J. M. Aguila; claim filed September 25th, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 11th, 1853, by the district court January 21st, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 21st, 1857.

361, 213, S. D., 196, 203. Juan Bandini, claimant for Jurupa, 7 square leagues, in San Bernardino county, granted September 28th, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to J. Bandini; claim filed September 25th, 1852, confirmed by the commission October 17th, 1854, and by the district court April 5th, 1861.

362, 120, S. D., 214. Isaac J. Sparks, claimant for Pismo, 2 square leagues, in San Luis Obispo county, granted November 18th, 1840, by Manuel Jimeno to José Ortega; claim filed September 29th, 1852, confirmed by the commission March 21st, 1854, by the district court December 24th, 1856, and appeal dismissed March 1st, 1858; containing 8,838.89 acres.

363, 69, S. D., 321. Isaac J. Sparks, claimant for Huasna, 5 square leagues, in San Luis Obispo county, granted December 8th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltoarena to I. J. Sparks; claim filed September 29th, 1852, confirmed by the commission March 21st, 1854, by the district court January 8th, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 1st, 1858; containing 21,422.08 acres.

364, 121, S. D. Henry Dalton, claimant for Azusa, 3 square leagues, in San Bernardino county, 2 leagues granted by Juan B. Alvarado, one under the name of San José to Ignacio Palomares and Ricardo Vejar April 15th, 1837, with another to same grantees by Luis Arenas under the name of Azusa March 14th, 1840, and a third one by Manuel Jimeno to Luis Arenas November 8th, 1841; claim filed September 29th, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 21st, 1854, by the district court March 6th, 1855, and appeal dismissed June 4th, 1857; containing 27,151.327 acres.

365, 122, S. D. Ygnacio Palomares, claimant for part of San José, 2 square leagues, in San Bernardino county, granted April 15th, 1837, by Juan B. Alvarado to Y. Palomares; claim filed September 29th, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 31st, 1854, by the district court February 4th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 23d, 1857.

366, 420, N. D. Andres Castellero, claimant for the quicksilver mine New Almaden, formerly called Santa Clara, discovered by him in 1845, in Santa Clara county, with two leagues of land granted to him by the president of Mexico, May 23d, 1846. Possession of the mine was given by the alcalde, Antonio Maria Pico, December 13th, 1845, with 3,000 varas of land in all directions from the mouth of the mine. Claim filed September 30th, 1852. The commission, on the eighth of January, 1856, confirmed the grant of 3,000 varas, and rejected all other claims. On the ground of fraud, the United States, on the twenty-ninth of October, 1858, obtained an injunction from the United States circuit court to stop the working of the mine. On the eighth of January, 1861, the district court, rejecting all claims to land, confirmed the mining rights, with seven pertinencias for mining purposes; and all shadow of fraud having been dispelled, the injunction was dissolved, on the twenty-sixth of January, 1861. [The pertinencia varies from 112½ to 200 varas square, according to the inclination of the vein.]

367, 157, N. D. Gervesio Arguello, executor of the heirs of José Darío Arguello, claimants for Las Pulgas, described by boundaries, in San Mateo county, granted in 1795, by Diego Borica to José Darío Arguello; claim filed September 30th, 1852, rejected by the commission August 1st, 1854, and for failure of prosecution appeal dismissed April 21st, 1856.

368, 305, S. D., 519. Benj. D. Wilson et als., claimants for San José de Buenos Ayres, 1 square league, in Los Angeles county, granted February 24th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to Maximo Alanis; claim filed October 2d, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 20th, 1855, by the district court February 18th, 1857, and appeal dismissed June 4th, 1857; containing 4,438.69 acres.

369, 123, S. D., 184. Agustin Machado et al., claimants for Ballona, 1 square league, in Los Angeles county, granted November 27th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Agustin Machado et al.; claim filed October 2d, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 14th, 1854, by the district court December 19th, 1855, and appeal dismissed January 28th, 1857; containing 13,919.90 acres.

370, 214, S. D. Leon Victor Prudhomme, administrator, claimant for Cucamonga 3 square leagues, in San Bernardino county, granted April 16th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Tiburcio Tapia; claim filed October 2d, 1852, rejected by the commission October 17th, 1854, and confirmed by the district court December 31st, 1856.

371, 309, S. D. Anacleto Lestrade, claimant for Rosa de Castillo, described by boundaries, in Los Angeles county, granted June 25th, 1831, by Manuel Vittoria to Juan Ballestero; claim filed October 2d, 1852, rejected by the commission April 3d, 1855, and for failure of prosecution appeal dismissed December 17th, 1856.

372, 353, S. D. Januario Abila, claimant for Las Cienegas, 1 square league, in Los Angeles county, granted in 1823, by José de la Guerra y Noriega and Manuel Micheltorena to Francisco Abila; claim filed October 4th, 1852, confirmed by the commission June 26th, 1855, and appeal dismissed June 8th, 1857; containing 4,439.05 acres.

373, 87, S. D., 61. Pio Pico et al., claimants for Paso de Bartolo Viejo, 2 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted June 12th, 1835, by José Figueroa to Juan Crispin Perez; claim filed October 4th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 27th, 1853, by the district court February 4th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857.

374, 46, S. D., 236. Andres Duarte, claimant for Azusa, 1½ square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted May 10th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to A. Duarte; claim filed October 6th, 1852, confirmed by the commission November 4th, 1853, by the district court September 19th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 23d, 1857; containing 6,595.62 acres.

375, 124, S. D., 464. Agustin Olvera, claimant for Cuyamaca, 11 square leagues, in San Diego county, granted August 11th, 1845, by Pio Pico to A. Olvera; claim filed October 6th, 1852, rejected by the commission April 4th, 1854, and confirmed by the district court March 15th, 1858.

376, 235, S. D., 257. Daniel Sexton, claimant for 1,000 varas square, in Los Angeles county, granted November 5th, 1841, by Manuel Jimeno to José Maria Ramirez; claim filed October 6th, 1852, confirmed by the commission October 10th, 1854, by the district court December 28th, 1856, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858.

377, 259, S. D. Daniel Sexton, claimant for 500 varas square, in Los Angeles county, granted May 19th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to Vicente de la Osa; claim filed October 6th, 1852, confirmed by the commission November 14th, 1854, by the district court February 27th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857.

378, 343, S. D. Eulogio de Celis, claimant for Mission of San Fernando, 14 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted June 17th, 1846, by Pio Pico to E. de Celis; claim filed October 7th, 1852, confirmed by the commission July 3d, 1855, and appeal dismissed March 15th, 1858; containing 121,619.24 acres.

379, 292, N. D.; 392 S. D., (sent to the Southern district February 23d, 1857) 458. Vicente de la Osa et al., claimants for Encino, 1 square league, in Los Angeles county, granted July 8th, 1845, by Pio Pico to Ramon, Francisco and Roque; claim filed October 8th, 1852, and confirmed by the commission March 20th, 1855.

380, 378, S. D. Juan Bandini, claimant for Cajon de Muscupiabe, described by boundaries, in Los Angeles county, granted December 18th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to J. Bandini; claim filed October 8th, 1852, rejected by the commission January 8th, 1856, and for failure of prosecution appeal dismissed December 22d, 1856.

381, 125, S. D., 382, 394. Bruno Abila, claimant for Aguage del Centinela, one-half square league, in Los Angeles county, granted September 14th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Ygnacio Machado; claim filed October 8th, 1852, confirmed by the commission March 21st, 1854, and by the district court February 21st, 1856.

382, 126, S. D. Bernardo Yorba, claimant for La Sierra, 4 square leagues, in San Bernardino county, granted June 15th, 1846, by Pio Pico to B. Yorba; claim filed October 9th, 1852, rejected by the commission February 14th, 1854, and confirmed by the district court January 22d, 1857.

383, 88, S. D., 195. Maria de Jesus Garcia et al., claimant for Los Nogales, 1 square league, in San Bernardino county, granted March 13th, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to José de la Cruz Linares; claim filed October 9th, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 17th, 1854, by the district court January 16th, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858; containing 464.72 acres.

384, 297, S. D. Bernardo Yorba, claimant for El Rincon, 1 square league, in San Bernardino county, granted April 8th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Juan Bandini; claim filed October 9th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 13th, 1855, and by the district court February 11th, 1857; containing 4,431.47 acres.

385, 127, S. D., 270, 544. John Roland and Julian Workman, claimants for La Puente, described by boundaries, in Los Angeles and San Bernardino counties, granted July 22d, 1845, by Pio Pico to J. Roland and Julian Workman; claim filed October 9th, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 4th, 1854, and by the district court February 24th, 1857; containing 48,790.55 acres.

386, 164, N. D. Sebastian Peralta and José Hernandez, claimants for Rinconada de los Gatos, 1½ square leagues, in Santa Clara county, granted May 21st, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to S. Peralta and J. Hernandez; claim filed October 9th, 1852, confirmed by the commission August 8th, 1854, by the district court March 10th, 1856, and appeal dismissed March 13th, 1856; containing 6,631.44 acres. Patented.

387, 89, S. D., 24. Bernardo Yorba, claimant for Cañada de Santa Ana, 3 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted August 1st, 1834, by José Figueroa to B. Yorba; claim filed October 9th, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 24th, 1854, by the district court October 9th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 23d, 1857; containing 13,328.53 acres.

388, 128, S. D., 141. Ricardo Vejar, claimant for part of San José, described by boundaries, in San Bernardino county, granted April 15th, 1837, and March 14th, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to R. Vejar, Ignacio Palomares and Luis Arenas; claim filed October 9th, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 31st, 1854, by the district court February 4th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 21st, 1857; containing 22,720.28 acres.

389, 90, S. D., 140. Juan Sanchez, claimant for Santa Clara or El Norte, described by boundaries, in Santa Barbara county, granted May 6th, 1837, by Juan B. Alvarado to J. Sanchez; claim filed October 9th, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 24th, 1854, by the district court January 19th, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858; containing 15,988.91 acres.

390, 320, N. D., 18. Joaquin Ysidro Castro, administrator, claimant for San Pablo, 4 square leagues, in Contra Costa county, 3 leagues granted by José Figueroa, June 12th, 1834, to Francisco Castro, deceased, and to his heirs, and on the 13th the surplus lands to Joaquin Ysidro Castro and the heirs of Francisco Castro; claim filed October 9th, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 17th, 1855, by the district court February 24th, 1858, and appeal dismissed March 10th, 1858; containing 19,394.40 acres.

391, 167, S. D. Enrique Abila, claimant for Tajauta, 1 square league, in Los Angeles county, granted July 5th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Anastasio Abila; claim filed October 11th, 1852, confirmed by the commission August 22d, 1854, by the district court May 10th, 1856, and by the U. S. supreme court; containing 3,559.86 acres.

392, 129, S. D., 461. Urbano Odon and Manuel et al., claimants for El Escorpion, 1½ square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted August 7th, 1845, by Pio Pico to U. Odon and Manuel; claim filed October 11th, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 25th, 1854, by the district court May 6th, 1859.

393, 406, N. D., 329. Angel and Maria Chabolla, heirs of Anastasio Chabolla, claimants for Sanjon de los Moquelumnes, 8 square leagues, in Sacramento and San Joaquin counties, granted January 24th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to A. Chabolla; claim filed October 16th, 1852, rejected by the commission January 24th, 1854, and September 4th, 1855, confirmed by the district court May 10th, 1857, and by the U. S. supreme court; containing 35,509.97 acres.

394, 337, S. D., 438. Juan Foster, claimant for Potreros de San Juan Capistrano, in Los Angeles and San Bernardino counties, granted April 5th, 1845, by Pio Pico to J. Foster; claim filed October 16th, 1852, confirmed by the commission

June 26th, 1855, by the district court February 21st, 1857, and appeal dismissed June 4th, 1857; containing 1,167.74 acres.

395, 228, S. D., 288, 541. Andres Ybarra, claimant for Los Encinitos, 1 square league, in San Diego county, granted July 3d, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to A. Ybarra; claim filed October 16th, 1852, confirmed by the commission October 31st, 1854, by the district court October 16th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 4,431.03 acres.

396, 250, S. D., 437. Juan Foster, claimant for Mission Vieja or La Paz, in Los Angeles county, granted April 4th, 1845, by Pio Pico to Agustin Olvera; claim filed October 16th, 1852, confirmed by the commission October 31st, 1854, by the district court February 21st, 1857, and appeal dismissed June 4th, 1857; containing 46,432.65 acres.

397, 243, S. D., 439. Juan Matias Sanchez, claimant for Potrero Grande, 1 square league, in Los Angeles county, granted April 8th, 1845, by Pio Pico to Manuel Antonio; claim filed October 18th, 1852, confirmed by the commission October 24th, 1854, by the district court December 29th, 1856, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858; containing 4,431.96 acres. Patented.

398, 273, S. D. Manuel Dominguez et al., claimants for San Pedro, 10 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted December 31st, 1822, to Juan José Dominguez; claim filed October 19th, 1852, confirmed by the commission October 17th, 1854, by the district court December 20th, 1856, and appeal dismissed June 1st, 1857; containing 43,119.13 acres. Patented.

399, 130, S. D., 285. Juan Abila et al., claimants for El Niguel, 3 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted June 21st, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to J. Abila et al.; claim filed October 19th, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 25th, 1854, by the district court February 25th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857.

400, 372, S. D. Andres Pico et al., claimants for Los Coyotes, 10 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted in 1784, by Pedro Fajes to Manuel Nieto, and May 22d, 1834, by José Figueroa to Juan José Nieto, heir of Manuel Nieto; claim filed October 20th, 1852, confirmed by the commission September 25th, 1855, and by the district court February 18th, 1857; containing 56,979.72 acres.

401, 355, S. D., 181. Andres Pico et al., claimants for La Habra, 1½ square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted October 22d, 1839, by Manuel Jimeno to Mariano R. Roldan; claim filed October 20th, 1852, confirmed by the commission July 3d, 1855, by the district court February 18th, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858; containing 6,698.57 acres.

402, 208, S. D. Ramon Yorba et al., claimants for one-half of Las Bolsas, described by boundaries, in Los Angeles county, granted in 1784 by Pedro Fajes to Manuel Nieto, and May 22d, 1834, by José Figueroa to Catarina Ruiz, widow of M. Nieto; claim filed October 20th, 1852, confirmed by the commission September 26th, 1854, by the district court February 17th, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858; containing 34,486.13 acres. (See No. 459.)

403, 381, S. D. Julio Berdugo et al., claimants for San Rafael, 8 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted October 20th, 1784, by Pedro Fajes, and confirmed by Borica January 12th, 1798, to José Maria Berdugo; claim filed October 21st, 1852, confirmed by the commission September 11th, 1855, and appeal dismissed June 4th, 1857.

404, 290, S. D. Abel Stearns, claimant for Alamitos, 6 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted in 1784, by Pedro Fajes to Manuel Nieto, and May 22d, 1834, by José Figueroa to Juan José Nieto, heir of M. Nieto; claim filed October 21st, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 13th, 1855, by the district court February 23d, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1857; containing 17,789.79 acres.

405, 205, S. D., 244. Joaquin Ruiz, claimant for La Bolsa Chica, 2 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted July 1st, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to J. Ruiz; claim filed October 21st, 1852, confirmed by the commission September 26th, 1854, by the district court February 13th, 1857, and appeal dismissed June 4th, 1857; containing 8,107.46 acres.

406, 185, S. D., 279. José Sepulveda, claimant for San Joaquin, 11 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, being La Cienega de las Ranas, granted April 15th, 1837, and an augmentation granted May 13th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to J. Sepulveda; claim filed October 22d, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 25th, 1854, by the district court December 11th, 1856, and appeal dismissed January 21st, 1858; containing 48,803.16 acres.

407, 367, S. D., 493. Pio Pico, claimant for Janual, 2 square leagues, in San Diego county, granted April 20th, 1831, by Manuel Victoria to Pio Pico; claim filed October 22d, 1852, rejected by the commission April 25th, 1855, and by the district court March 5th, 1858.

408, 62, S. D. Antonio Valenzuela and Juan Alvitre, claimants for Potrero de la Mission Vieja de San Gabriel, 1,000 varas by 500, in Los Angeles county, granted November 9th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to J. Alvitre and A. Valenzuela; claim filed October 23d, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 13th, 1853, by the district court January 25th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857.

409, 131, S. D. Francisco Higuera et al., claimants for Rincon de los Bueyes, three-fifths square league, in Los Angeles county, granted December 7th, 1821, by José de la Guerra y Noriega, and July 10th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena, to Bernardo Higuera; claim filed October 23d, 1852, rejected by the commission February 28th, 1854, and confirmed by the district court April 16th, 1861.

410, 363, S. D. Juan Foster, claimant for Mission of San Juan Capistrano, in Los Angeles county, granted December 6th, 1845, by Pio Pico to J. Foster; claim filed October 23d, 1852, confirmed by the commission July 17th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 1st, 1858.

411, 238, S. D., 295. Juan Maria Marron, claimant for Agua Hedionda, 3 square leagues, in San Diego county, granted August 10th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to J. M. Marron; claim filed October 23d, 1852, confirmed by the commission October 24th, 1854, by the district court October 6th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1859; containing 13,311.01 acres. ⁹

412, 216, S. D., 247. Juan Foster, claimant for Trabuco, 5 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, 2 leagues provisionally granted February 16th, 1841, and finally July 31st, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to Santiago Arguello et al., and 3 leagues granted to Juan Foster by Pio Pico April 21st, 1846; claim filed October 23d, 1852, confirmed by the commission September 26th, 1854, by the district court February 21st, 1857, and appeal dismissed February 11th, 1858; containing 22,184.47 acres.

413, 229, S. D. William Workman, claimant for Cajon de los Negros, 3 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted June 15th, 1846, by Pio Pico to Ygnacio Coronel; claim filed October 23d, 1852, and rejected by the commission December 12th, 1854.

414, 374, S. D. Josefa Montalva et al., claimants for Temascal, described by boundaries, in San Bernardino county, granted by José Maria Echeandia to Leandro Serano; claim filed October 26th, 1852, and rejected by the commission September 18th, 1855.

415, 132, S. D. Michael White, claimant for San Gabriel, 500 varas square, in Los Angeles county, granted March 27th, 1845, by Pio Pico to M. White; claim filed October 26th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 28th, 1854, by the district court December 21st, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857.

416, 133, S. D., 350. Maria Ignacio Berdugo, claimant for De los Felis, 1½ square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted March 22d, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to M. I. Berdugo; claim filed October 26th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 28th, 1854, by the district court January 13th, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858.

417, 134, S. D. Lugardo Aguilar and Pascuala Garcia, his wife, claimants for 500 varas by 250, near San Gabriel, in Los Angeles county, granted May 15th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to Manuel Dolivera; claim filed October 26th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 28th, 1854, by the district court March 3d, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857.

418, 135, S. D. Rafael Valenzuela et al., claimants for 466 varas by 264, near San Gabriel, in Los Angeles county, granted May 16th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to Prospero Valenzuela; claim filed October 26th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 28th, 1854, and appeal dismissed February 1st, 1858.

419, 136, S. D., 476. Juan Silvas, claimant for 500 varas by 250, near San Gabriel, in Los Angeles county, granted May 15th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to Manuel Dolivera; claim filed October 26th, 1852, confirmed by the commission March 14th, 1854, by the district court February 24th, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858.

420, 137, S. D. Santiago Rios or Riva, claimant for 300 varas square, near San Juan Capistrano, in Los Angeles county, granted July 5th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to S. Rios; claim filed October 26th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 28th, 1854, by the district court March 4th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 23d, 1857.

421, 186, S. D. Teodocio Yorba, claimant for Lomas de Santiago, 4 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted May 26th, 1846, by Pio Pico to Teodocio Yorba; claim filed October 26th, 1852, confirmed by the commission August 15th, 1854, by the district court December 11th, 1856, and appeal dismissed January 21st, 1858.

422, 386, S. D. City of Los Angeles, claimant for 16 square leagues, granted May 26th, 1781, to Pueblo de los Angeles; claim filed October 26th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 5th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 1st, 1858; containing 17,172.37 acres.

423, 193, S. D. Concepcion Nieto et al., claimants for Santa Gertrudes, 5 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted in 1784, by Pedro Fajes to Manuel Nieto, and May 22d, 1834, by José Figueroa to Josefa Cota, widow of A. M. Nieto, heir of M. Nieto; claim filed October 28th, 1852, and rejected by the commission September 12th, 1854.

424, 138, S. D., 530. Michael White, claimant for 200 varas square, near San Gabriel, in Los Angeles county, granted May 15th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to Emilio Joaquin; claim filed October 28th, 1852, rejected by the commission February 28th, 1854, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution January 7th, 1860.

425, 139, S. D., 434. Andrew J. Courtney and Wife, claimants for 700 varas by 400, near San Gabriel, in Los Angeles county, granted March 15th, 1845, by Pio Pico to Ramon Valencia et al.; claim filed October 28th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 28th, 1853, by the district court December 17th, 1855, and appeal dismissed January 24th, 1857; containing 49.29 acres.

426, 162, S. D., 496. Domingo Yorba, claimant for Cañada de San Vicente, 3 square leagues, in San Diego county, granted January 25th, 1846, by Pio Pico to Juan Lopez; claim filed October 29th, 1852, confirmed by the commission May 21st, 1854, and appeal dismissed February 1st, 1858.

427, 376, S. D., 532. Tomas Sanchez et al., claimants for La Cienega or Paso de la Tigera, six-sevenths of 1 square league, in Los Angeles county, granted May 16th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Vicente Sanchez; claim filed October 29th, 1852, confirmed by the commission July 10th, 1855, by the district court January 27th, 1857, and appeal dismissed January 21st, 1858.

428, 183, S. D., 560. Agustin Olvera, claimant for Los A'amos y Agua Caliente, 6 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted May 27th, 1846, by Pio Pico to Francisco Lopez et al.; claim filed October 29th, 1852, rejected by the commission August 15th, 1854, and confirmed by the district court December 13th, 1856.

429, 170, S. D., 547. José Maria Flores, claimant for La Liebre, 11 square leagues, in Santa Barbara county, granted April 21st, 1846, by Pio Pico to J. M. Flores; claim filed October 30th, 1852, rejected by the commission May 2d, 1854, and confirmed by the district court February 11th, 1857.

430, 60, S. D., 148. Gabriel Ruiz et al., claimants for Calleguas, described by boundaries, in Santa Barbara county, granted May 10th, 1847, by Juan B. Alvarado to José Pedro Ruiz; claim filed November 1st, 1852, confirmed by the commission November 4th, 1853, by the district court December 3d, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 23d, 1857; containing 9,998.29 acres.

431, 31, S. D., 274, 558. José Serano, claimant for Cañada de los Alisos, 2 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, part granted May 3d, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado, and May 27th, 1846, additional extent by Pio Pico, to J. Serano; claim filed November 1st, 1852, confirmed by the commission October 21st, 1853, by the district court December 6th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 23d, 1857; containing 10,668.81 acres.

432, 33, S. D., 444. Jorge Morillo et al., claimants for Potrero de Felipe Lugo, described by boundaries, in Los Angeles county, granted April 18th, 1845, by Pio Pico to Teodoro Romero et al.; claim filed November 1st, 1852, confirmed by the commission October 18th, 1853, by the district court September 19th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 23d, 1857; containing 2,042.81 acres.

433, 182, S. D., 231. Isaac Williams, claimant for Santa Ana del Chino, 5 square leagues, in San Bernardino county, granted March 26th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to Antonio Maria Lugo; claim filed November 1st, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 23d, 1854, by the district court January 13th, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858.

434, 335, S. D., 522. Isaac Williams, claimant for addition to Santa Ana del Chino, 3 square leagues, in San Bernardino county, granted April 1st, 1843, by Manuel Micheltoarena to I. Williams; claim filed November 1st, 1852, confirmed by the commission May 8th, 1855, by the district court January 13th, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858.

435, 55, S. D. Pablo Apis, claimant for Temecula, one by one-half league, granted May 7th, 1845, by Pio Pico to P. Apis; claim filed November 1st, 1852, rejected by the commission November 15th, 1853, and confirmed by the district court February 21st, 1857.

436, 91, S. D., 60. Santiago E. Arguello, claimant for Melyo, in San Diego county and Lower California, granted November 25th, 1833, by José Figueroa to S. E. Arguello; claim filed November 1st, 1852, rejected by the commission December 20th, 1853, and by the district court September 20th, 1855.

437, 66, S. D. Magdalena Estudillo, claimant for Otay, 2 square leagues, in San Diego county, granted May 4th, 1846, by Pio Pico to M. Estudillo; claim filed November 1st, 1852, confirmed by the commission November 4th, 1853, by the district court February 11th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 6,657.98 acres.

438, 163, S. D., 572. Antonio Coronel, claimant for Sierra de los Verdugos, described by boundaries, in Los Angeles county, granted June 15th, 1846, by Pio Pico to A. Coronel; claim filed November 1st, 1852, rejected by the commission January 27th, 1854, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution October 24th, 1855.

439, 189, S. D., 393. José A. Serano et al., claimants for Pauma, 3 square leagues, granted November 9th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to J. A. Serano et al.; claim filed November 1st, 1852, confirmed by the commission May 16th, 1854, and appeal dismissed February 1st, 1858.

440, 140, S. D. Juan P. Ontiveros, claimant for San Juan Cajon de Santa Ana, granted May 13th, 1837, by Juan B. Alvarado to J. P. Ontiveros; claim filed November 1st, 1852, rejected by the commission April 11th, 1854, and confirmed by the district court December 4th, 1855.

441, 92, S. D., 72, 463, 529. Juliana Lopez Osuna, claimant for San Dieguito, 2 square leagues, 1 granted in 1840 or 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado, and the other August 11th, 1845, by Pio Pico to Juan Maria Osuna; claim filed November 1st, 1852, rejected by the commission January 24th, 1854, and confirmed by the district court March 4th, 1858.

442, 48, S. D., 17. Apolinaria Lorenzana, claimant for Jamacho, 2 square leagues, in San Diego county, granted April 27th, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to A. Lorenzana; claim filed November 1st, 1852, confirmed by the commission November 4th, 1853, by the district court February 4th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 23d, 1857; containing 3,881.16 acres.

443, 269, S. D., 521. Louis Roubideau, claimant for San Jacinto and San Gregorio, granted March 22d, 1843, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Santiago Johnson; claim filed November 1st, 1852, rejected by the commission January 2d, 1855, and confirmed by the district court February 29th, 1860.

444, 199, N. D. Andres Pico, claimant for Arroyo Seco, 11 square leagues, in Sacramento, Amador and San Joaquin counties, granted May 8th, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to Teodocio Yorba; claim filed November 1st, 1852, rejected by the commission February 27th, 1855, confirmed by the district court April 21st, 1856, and by the U. S. supreme court; containing 48,857.52 acres.

445, 141, S. D., 330. Isidor Reyes et al., claimants for Voca de Santa Monica, 1½ square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted June 19th, 1839, by Manuel Jimeno to Francisco Marques et al.; claim filed November 1st, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 4th, 1854, by the district court December 10th, 1856, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858.

446, 93, S. D., 565. José Loreto Sepulveda et al., claimants for Los Palos Verdes, in Los Angeles county, granted June 3d, 1846, by Pio

Pico to J. L. Sepulveda et al.; claim filed November 1st, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 20th, 1853, by the district court December 10th, 1856, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858; containing 31,629.13 acres.

447, 63, S. D., 443. José Ledesma, claimant for 400 by 200 varas, near San Gabriel, in Los Angeles county, granted June 3d, 1846, by Pio Pico to José Ledesma; claim filed November 1st, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 6th, 1853, by the district court February 11th, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858.

448, 94, S. D. Francisco Sales, claimant for 50 by 250 varas, near San Gabriel, in Los Angeles county, granted April 18th, 1845, by Pio Pico to F. Sales; claim filed November 1st, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 17th, 1854, by the district court February 20th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857.

449, 95, S. D., 563. Simeon, (Indian) claimant for 500 by 200 varas, near San Gabriel, in Los Angeles county, granted June 1st, 1846, by Pio Pico to Simeon; claim filed November 1st, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 13th, 1853, by the district court February 18th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857.

450, 51, S. D. Andres Duarte et al., claimants for 25 by 40 varas, near San Gabriel, in Los Angeles county, granted April 25th, 1846, by Pio Pico to A. Duarte et al.; claim filed November 1st, 1852, rejected by the commission December 6th, 1853, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution October 25th, 1855. °

451, 192, S. D., 205. Lorenzo Soto, claimant for Los Vallecitos, 2 square leagues, in San Diego county, granted April 22d, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to José Maria Alvarado; claim filed November 4th, 1852, rejected by the commission September 5th, 1854, confirmed by the district court February 11th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857.

452, 142, S. D. Francisco Maria Alvarado, claimant for Los Peñasquitos, 2 square leagues, in San Diego county, granted June 15th, 1823, by Luis Antonio Arguello to Francisco Maria Ruiz; claim filed November 4th, 1852, rejected by the commission February 21st, 1854, and confirmed by the district court March 4th, 1858.

453, 362, S. D. Vicenta Sepulveda, claimant for La Sierra, 4 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted June 15th, 1846, by Pio Pico to V. Sepulveda; claim filed November 4th, 1852, confirmed by the commission July 10th, 1855, by the district court February 19th, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858.

454, 341, S. D., 267. Maria Antonia Snook, claimant for San Bernardo, 4 square leagues, in San Diego county, 2 leagues granted February 16th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado, and 2 leagues May 26th, 1845, by Pio Pico, to José Francisco Snook; claim filed November 5th, 1852, confirmed by the commission June 5th, 1855, by the district court January 6th, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858; containing 17,763.07 acres.

455, 171, S. D. Victoria Reid, claimant for Huerta de Quati or Quati, in Los Angeles county, granted October 12th, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to V. Reid; claim filed November 5th, 1852, rejected by the commission August 1st, 1854, confirmed by the district court October 4th, 1855, and appeal dismissed January 3d, 1857; containing 128.26 acres. Patented.

456, 354, S. D., 87, 337. Antonio Ygnacio Abila, claimant for Sansal Redondo, 5 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted May 20th, 1837, by Juan B. Alvarado to A. Y. Abila; claim filed November 5th, 1852, confirmed by the commission June 19th, 1855, by the district court January 28th, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858.

457, 143, S. D., 186. Francisco Sepulveda, claimant for San Vicente and Santa Monica, 4 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted December 20th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to F. Sepulveda; claim filed November 5th, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 25th, 1854, by the district court February 23d, 1857, and appeal dismissed January 21st, 1858.

458, 360, S. D. Casildo Aguilar et al., claimants for La Cienega or Paso de la Tigera, 1 square league, in Los Angeles county, granted May 16th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Vicente Sanchez; claim filed November 6th, 1852, confirmed by the commission July 10th, 1855, by the district court January 27th, 1857, and appeal dismissed June 4th, 1857.

459, 302, S. D. José Justo Morillo et al., claimants for Las Bolsas, 7 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted in 1784, by Pedro Fajes to Manuel Nieto, and May 22d, 1834, by José Figueroa to Catarina Ruiz, widow of Manuel Nieto; claim filed November 6th, 1852, rejected by the commission February 13th, 1855, and confirmed by the district court February 17th, 1857. (See No. 402.)

460, 246, S. D., 491. Juan Foster, claimant for Rancho de la Nacion, 6 square leagues, in San Diego county, granted December 11th, 1845, by Pio Pico to J. Foster; claim filed November 6th, 1852, confirmed by the commission October 24th, 1854, by the district court February 21st, 1857, and appeal dismissed June 4th, 1857; containing 26,631.94 acres.

461, 329, S. D., 562. Juan Foster, claimant for Valle de San Felipe, 3 square leagues, in San Diego county, granted May 30th, 1846, by Pio Pico to Felipe Castillo; claim filed November 6th, 1852, confirmed by the commission May 22d, 1855, by the district court February 21st, 1857, and appeal dismissed June 4th, 1857; containing 9,972.08 acres.

462, 312, S. D., 536. Heirs of Juan B. Alvarado, claimants for Rincon del Diablo, 3 square leagues, in San Diego county, granted May 18th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltoarena to J. B. Alvarado; claim filed November 8th, 1852, confirmed by the commission May 22d, 1855, by the district court January 6th, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858; containing 12,653.77 acres.

463, 263, S. D. Louis Roubideau, claimant for Jurupa, 7 square leagues, in San Bernardino county, granted September 28th, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Juan Bandini; claim filed November 8th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 19th, 1854, and appeal dismissed June 8th, 1857.

464, 52, S. D., 215. David W. Alexander et al., claimants for Tujunga, 1½ square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted December 5th, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to Pedro Lopez et al.; claim filed November 8th, 1852, rejected by the commission November 4th, 1853, confirmed by the district court February 28th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 23d, 1857; containing 6,660.71 acres.

465, 50, S. D. David W. Alexander, claimant for Cahuenga, one-fourth square league, in Los Angeles county, granted May 5th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltoarena to José Miguel Trunfo; claim filed November 8th, 1852, rejected by the commission November 15th, 1853, by the district court December 13th, 1856, and appeal dismissed by stipulation February, 1857.

466, 54, S. D. Manuel Sales Tasion, claimant for 400 by 200 varas, near San Gabriel, in Los Angeles county, granted April 18th, 1845, by Pio Pico to M. S. Tasion; claim filed November 8th, 1852, rejected by the commission November 15th, 1853, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution October 24th, 1855.

- 467, 58, S. D., 446. José Domingo, claimant for 350 by 250 varas, near San Gabriel, in Los Angeles county, granted April, 1845, by Pio Pico to Felipe; claim filed November 8th, 1852, and confirmed by the commission November 22d, 1853.
- 468, 47, S. D., 486. Victoria Reid, claimant for 200 varas square, near San Gabriel, in Los Angeles county, granted May 15th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to Serafin de Jesus; claim filed November 8th, 1852, rejected by the commission November 29th, 1853, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution October 24th, 1855.
- 469, 144, S. D., 155. Silvestre de la Portilla, claimant for Valle de San José, 4 square leagues, in San Diego county, granted April 16th, 1836, by Gutierrez to S. de la Portilla; claim filed November 8th, 1852, rejected by the commission February 21st, 1854, and confirmed by the district court February 23d, 1857.
- 470, 346, S. D., 559. Bernardo Yorba et al., heirs of Antonio Yorba, claimants for Santiago de Santa Ana, 11 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted July 1st, 1810, by José Figueroa to Antonio Yorba; claim filed November 9th, 1852, confirmed by the commission July 10th, 1855, and appeal dismissed June 8th, 1857; containing 62,516.57 acres.
- 471, 251, S. D., 449. Maria Juana de los Angeles, claimant for Cuca, one-half square league, in San Diego county, granted May 7th, 1845, by Pio Pico to M. J. de los Angeles; claim filed November 9th, 1852, confirmed by the commission October 10th, 1854, and by the district court December 24th, 1856.
- 472, 65, S. D., 241. Raimundo Olivas et al., claimants for San Miguel, 1½ square leagues, in Santa Barbara county, granted July 6th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to R. Olivas et al.; claim filed November 9th, 1852, confirmed by the commission November 22d, 1853, by the district court February 27th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 23d, 1857; containing 4,693.91 acres.
- 473, 219, S. D., 542. José Ramon Malo, claimant for Santa Rita, 3 square leagues, in Santa Barbara county, granted April 12th, 1845, by Pio Pico to J. R. Malo; claim filed November 9th, 1852, confirmed by the commission October 17th, 1854, and by the district court December 24th, 1856.
- 474, 294, S. D., 160. Maria Jesus Olivera de Cota et al., claimants for Santa Rosa, 3½ square leagues, in Santa Barbara county, 1½ leagues granted July 30th, 1839, by Manuel Jimeno, and 2 leagues November 19th, 1845, by Pio Pico, to Francisco Cota; claim filed November 9th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 27th, 1855, and by the district court December 24th, 1856.
- 475, 272, S. D. Tomas Sanchez Colima, claimant for Santa Gertrudes, in Santa Barbara county, granted by Pio Pico to Antonio Maria Nieto; claim filed November 9th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 12th, 1854, and appeal dismissed June 8th, 1857.
- 476, 389, S. D. José Ramon Malo, claimant for La Purisima, in Santa Barbara county, granted December 6th, 1845, by Pio Pico to J. R. Malo; claim filed November 10th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 31st, 1855, and appeal dismissed June 8th, 1857; containing 14,927.62 acres.
- 477, 248, S. D. Juan Gallardo, claimant for 2,000 varas square, in Los Angeles county, granted July 17th, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to J. Gallardo; claim filed November 11th, 1852, rejected by the commission November 14th, 1854, and confirmed by the district court January 20th, 1860.
- 478, 371, S. D. Maria Rita Baldez, claimant for San Antonio, 1 square league, in Los Angeles county, granted in 1831, by Juan B. Alvarado to M. R. Baldez et al.; claim filed November 11th, 1852, confirmed by the commission September 25th, 1855, and appeal dismissed June 8th, 1857.
- 479, 318, S. D. Manuel Antonio Rodriguez de Poli, claimant for Mission of San Buenaventura, 12 square leagues, in Santa Barbara county, granted June 8th, 1846, by Pio Pico to José Arnas; claim filed November 11th, 1852, confirmed by the commission May 15th, 1855, and by the district court April 1st, 1861.
- 480, 313, S. D. Nasario Dominguez, claimant for one-sixth of San Pedro, in Los Angeles county, granted in 1822, by P. V. de Sola to Cristobal Dominguez; claim filed November 12th, 1852, rejected by the commission January 2d, 1855, and appeal dismissed in district court by claimant December 21st, 1857.
- 481, 145, S. D., 459. Andres et al., claimants for Guajome, 1 square league, in San Diego county, granted July 19th, 1843, by Pio Pico to Andres and José Manuel; claim filed November 12th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 7th, 1854, by the district court December 17th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 2,219.41 acres.
- 482, 146, S. D. Emigdio Vejar, claimant for Boca de la Playa, 1½ square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted May 7th, 1846, by Pio Pico to E. Vejar; claim filed November 12th, 1852, confirmed by the commission March 14th, 1854, and appeal dismissed February 1st, 1858.
- 483, 147, S. D. Leon V. Prudhomme, claimant for Topanga Malibu, 3 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted in 1804, by José Joaquin de Arrellaga to José Bartolomé Tapia; claim filed November 12th, 1852, rejected by the commission March 21st, 1854, and by the district court in 1860.
- 484, 249, S. D. William Williams et al., claimants for Valle de las Viejas, 4 square leagues, in San Diego county, granted May 1st, 1846, by Pio Pico to Ramon Asuna et al.; claim filed November 13th, 1852, rejected by the commission December 26th, 1854, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution February 11th, 1856.
- 485, 264, S. D. Cave J. Coutts, claimant for La Soledad, 1 square league, in San Diego county, granted April 13th, 1838, by Carlos Antonio Carrillo, styling himself provisional governor, to Francisco Maria Alvarado; claim filed November 13th, 1852, rejected by the commission January 23d, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution February 11th, 1856.
- 486, 148, S. D., 499. Juan Moreno, claimant for Santa Rosa, 3 square leagues, in San Diego county, granted January 30th, 1846, by Pio Pico to J. Moreno; claim filed November 13th, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 4th, 1854, and by the district court January 15th, 1856.
- 487, 287, S. D. Antonio José Rocha et al., claimants for La Brea, 1 square league, in Los Angeles county, granted January 6th, 1828, by José Antonio Carrillo to A. J. Rocha et al.; claim filed November 15th, 1852, rejected by the commission March 6th, 1855, and by the district court August 8th, 1860.
- 488, 266, S. D., 531. Anacleto Lestrade, claimant for Cañada de los Coches, 400 varas square, granted August 16th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to Apolinaria Lorenzana; claim filed December 13th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 26th, 1854, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution February 1st, 1858.
- 489, 96, S. D., 537. Arno Maube, claimant for 200 varas square, near San Gabriel, in Los Angeles county, granted May 20th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to A. Maube; claim filed December 13th, 1852, rejected by the commission

January 17th, 1854, and dismissed for failure of prosecution March 7th, 1860.

490, 138, N. D., 284. Maria Manuel Valencia, claimant for Boca de Cañada del Pinole, 3 square leagues, in Contra Costa county, granted June 21st, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to M. M. Valencia; claim filed December 13th, 1852, rejected by the commission August 10th, 1854, confirmed by the district court November 26th, 1854, and by the U. S. supreme court; containing 13,353.38 acres.

491, 239, S. D., 314. Pedro C. Carrillo, claimant for Camulos, 4 square leagues, in Santa Barbara county, granted October 2d, 1843, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Pedro C. Carrillo; claim filed December 13th, 1852, rejected by the commission November 7th, 1854, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution August 10th, 1860.

492, 29, S. D., 395. Raimundo Carrillo, claimant for Nojoqui, 3 square leagues, in Santa Barbara county, granted April 27th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltoarena to R. Carrillo; claim filed December 13th, 1852, confirmed by the commission October 12th, 1853, by the district court October 3d, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 13,284.50 acres.

493, 185, N. D., 441. Hilario Sanchez, claimant for Temalpais or Tamalnais, 2 square leagues, in Marin county, granted November 28th, 1845, by Pio Pico to H. Sanchez; claim filed December 13th, 1852, and rejected by the commission September 26th, 1854.

494, 97, S. D., 55, 163. Crisogono Ayala et al., claimants for Santa Ana, in Santa Barbara county, granted April 14th, 1837, by Juan B. Alvarado to Crisogono Ayala et al.; claim filed December 20th, 1852, confirmed by the commission January 24th, 1854, by the district court October 9th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 3d, 1857; containing 21,522.04 acres.

495, 67, N. D., 200. Joseph P. Thompson, claimant for part of Napa, 640 acres, in Napa county, granted September 30th, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvador Vallejo; claim filed December 21st, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 13th, 1853, by the district court February 13th, 1857, and appeal dismissed April 2d, 1857.

496, 209, N. D. José Maria Fuentes, claimant for Potrero, 11 square leagues, in Santa Clara county, granted June 12th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltoarena to J. M. Fuentes; claim filed December 21st, 1852, rejected by the commission November 21st, 1854, by the district court August 24th, 1857, and decree affirmed by the U. S. supreme court in 22 Howard [63 U. S.] 443.

497, 183, N. D., 27. Heirs of Juan Reid, claimants for Corte de Madera del Presidio, 1 square league, in Marin county, granted October 2d, 1834, by José Figueroa to Juan Reid; claim filed December 23d, 1852, confirmed by the commission June 13th, 1854, by the district court January 14th, 1856, and appeal dismissed April 2d, 1857; containing 4,460.24 acres.

498, 236, S. D., 307. Pedro C. Carrillo, claimant for Los Alamos y Agua Caliente, in Los Angeles county, granted October 2d, 1843, by Manuel Micheltoarena to P. C. Carrillo; claim filed December 24th, 1852, rejected by the commission November 7th, 1854, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution August 10th, 1860.

499, 253, N. D. John Hendley et al., claimants for Llano de Santa Rosa, 1 square league, in Sonoma county, granted March 20th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Joaquin Carrillo; claim filed December 24th, 1852, rejected by the commission January 23d, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1856.

500, 78, N. D., 200. Lilburn W. Boggs, claimant for part of Napa, 630 acres, in Napa county, granted September 21st, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvador Vallejo; claim filed December 28th, 1852, confirmed by the commission December 13th, 1853, by the district court April 14th, 1856, and appeal dismissed April 2d, 1857.

501, 149, S. D., 253. Joaquin Estrada, claimant for Santa Margarita, 4 square leagues, in San Luis Obispo county, granted September 23th, 1841, by Manuel Jimeno to J. Estrada; claim filed December 28th, 1852, confirmed by the commission April 4th, 1854, by the district court October 3d, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1857; containing 17,734.94 acres. Patented.

502, 101, S. D. Teodoro Gonzales, claimant for Rincon de la Puenta del Monte, 7 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted September 20th, 1836, by Gutierrez to T. Gonzales; claim filed December 28th, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 7th, 1854, by the district court September 21st, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 15,218.62 acres.

503, 363, N. D., 293. Maria L. B. Berreyesa et al., claimants for San Vincente, 1 square league, in Santa Clara county, granted August 20th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to José R. Berreyesa; claim filed December 30th, 1852, confirmed by the commission July 3d, 1855, by the district court March 13th, 1857, and decree affirmed by the U. S. supreme court in 23 Howard [64 U. S.] 499; containing 4,438.36 acres.

504, 320, S. D. José Miguel Gomez, claimant for San Simeon, 1 square league, in San Luis Obispo county, granted December 1st, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to José Ramon Estrada; claim filed December 31st, 1852, confirmed by the commission May 8th, 1855, by the district court January 12th, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858; containing 4,463.81 acres.

505, 27, S. D., 248. Felician Soberanes, claimant for San Lorenzo, 5 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted August 9th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to F. Soberanes; claim filed December 31st, 1852, rejected by the commission October 25th, 1853, confirmed by the district court September 24th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 21,884.38 acres.

506, 181, N. D. Agustin Bernal, claimant for Santa Teresa, 1 square league, in Santa Clara county, granted July 11th, 1834, by José Figueroa to Joaquin Bernal; claim filed January 3d, 1853, confirmed by the commission September 5th, 1854, by the district court August 11th, 1856, and appeal dismissed November 2d, 1858; containing 4,460.03 acres.

507, 8, N. D. H. F. Teschemacher, claimant for Lup Yomi, 14 square leagues, in Napa county, granted September 5th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Salvador Vallejo et al.; claim filed January 5th, 1853, rejected by the commission December 13th, 1853, confirmed by the district court June 27th, 1855, decree reversed by the U. S. supreme court and case remanded for further evidence, 22 Howard [63 U. S.] 392.

508, 256, S. D., 54. Heirs of Domingo Carrillo, claimant for one-half of Las Virgenes, 4 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted October 1st, 1834, by José Figueroa to D. Carrillo et al.; claim filed January 6th, 1853, rejected by the commission November 7th, 1854, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution May 7th, 1860.

509, 330, N. D., 341. Samuel G. Reed et al., claimants for Rancho del Puerto, 3 square leagues, in Stanislaus county, granted January 20th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Mariano Hernandez et al; claim filed January 7th, 1853, confirmed by the commission May 22d, 1855, by the district court May 6th, 1856, and appeal dismissed March 27th, 1857; containing 13,340.39 acres.

510, 168, N. D., 200. Uladislao Vallejo, claimant for part of Napa, 600 yards square, in Napa county, granted September 21st, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvador Vallejo; claim filed January 11th, 1853, rejected by the commission August 22d, 1854, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 1st, 1856.

511, 349, N. D. Henry Cambuston, claimant for 11 square leagues, in Butte county, granted May 23d, 1846, by Pio Pico to H. Cambuston; claim filed January 14th, 1853, confirmed by the commission July 10th, 1855, by the district court March 3d, 1856, decree reversed by the U. S. supreme court and case remanded for further hearing, 20 Howard [61 U. S.] 59. Claim rejected by the district court November 9th, 1859.

512, 227, S. D. Guadalupe Ortega de Chapman et al., claimants for San Pedro, 1 square league, in Santa Barbara county, granted in 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to José Chapman; claim filed January 15th, 1853, rejected by the commission November 21st, 1854, and confirmed by the district court April 11th, 1861.

513, 292, S. D. Francisco Estevan Quintana, claimant for La Vena, 1 square league, in San Luis Obispo county, granted January 14th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to F. E. Quintana; claim filed January 15th, 1853, rejected by the commission February 27th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution December 18th, 1856.

514, 143, N. D. James Enright claimant for 2,000 varas square, in Santa Clara county, granted January 6th, 1845, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Francisco Garcia; claim filed January 17th, 1853, confirmed by the commission August 8th, 1854, by the district court April 26th, 1858, and by the U. S. supreme court; containing 710.14 acres.

515, 394, N. D. Joseph C. Palmer et al., claimants for Punta de Lobos, 2 square leagues, in San Francisco county, granted June 25th, 1846, by Pio Pico to Benito Diaz; claim filed January 17th, 1853, rejected by the commission August 14th, 1855, by the district court December 5th, 1857, and judgment affirmed by the U. S. supreme court with costs, 24 Howard [65 U. S.] 125.

516, 220, N. D., 454. Barcelona Bernal, claimant for Embarcadero de Santa Clara, 1,000 varas square, in Santa Clara county, granted June 18th, 1845, by Pio Pico to B. Bernal; claim filed January 17th, 1853, confirmed by the commission December 12th, 1854, and by the district court February 23d, 1857.

517, 150, S. D., 301. Nicholas A. Den, claimant for Dos Pueblos, 3 square leagues, in Santa Barbara county, granted April 18th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to N. A. Den; claim filed January 18th, 1853, confirmed by the commission March 14th, 1854, by the district court December 28th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 15,535.33 acres.

518, 151, S. D. David Spence, claimant for Llano de Buenavista, 2 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted in 1823, by Luis Antonio Arguello to José Mariano Estrada; claim filed January 18th, 1853, confirmed by the commission March 14th, 1854, by the district court January 7th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 23d, 1857; containing 8,446.23 acres. Patented.

519, 152, S. D., 261. José Dolores Ortega, claimant for Cañada del Corral, 2 square leagues, in Santa Barbara county, granted November 5th, 1841, by Manuel Jimeno to J. D. Ortega; claim filed January 19th, 1853, confirmed by the commission February 21st, 1854, by the district court February 1st, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 23d, 1857; containing 8,875.76 acres.

520, 252, S. D., 570. Daniel Hill, claimant for La Goleta, 1 square league, in Santa Barbara county, granted June 10th, 1846, by Pio Pico to D. Hill; claim filed January 19th, 1853, confirmed by the commission December 26th, 1854, by the district court February 8th, 1858, and appeal dismissed May 15th, 1861.

521, 153, S. D., 520. Manuel Arguisola, claimant for Temascal, 3 square leagues, in Santa Barbara county, granted March 17th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Francisco Lopez et al.; claim filed January 19th, 1853, rejected by the commission April 4th, 1853, and confirmed by the district court February 20th, 1857.

522, 154, S. D., 9. Antonio Maria Ortega et al., claimants for Nuestra Señora del Refugio, 6 square leagues, in Santa Barbara county, granted August 1st, 1834, by José Figueroa to A. M. Ortega et al.; claim filed January 19th, 1853, confirmed by the commission March 14th, 1854, by the district court December 29th, 1856, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858; containing 26,529.30 acres.

523, 240, N. D. Hicks and Martin, claimants for Rancho de los Cosumnes, 1 square league, in Sacramento county, granted December 22d, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Heleno; claim filed January 21st, 1853, and rejected by the commission January 23d, 1855.

524, 300, N. D., 299. Barbara Soto et al., claimants for San Lorenzo, 1½ square leagues, in Alameda county, granted October 10th, 1842, by Manuel Micheltoarena, and January 20th, 1844, by Juan B. Alvarado, to Francisco Soto; claim filed January 22d, 1853, confirmed by the commission April 24th, 1855, by the district court April 23d, 1857, and appeal dismissed April 29th, 1857; containing 6,686.33 acres.

525, 418, N. D. Bethuel Phelps, claimant for Punta Reyes, 8 square leagues, in Marin county, granted March 17th, 1836, by Nicolas Gutierrez to James Richard Berry; claim filed January 22d, 1853, confirmed by the commission August 7th, 1855, by the district court December 22d, 1857, and appeal dismissed December 22d, 1857.

526, 348, S. D. Feliciano Soberanes, claimant for Mission de la Soledad, 2 square miles, in Monterey county, granted January 4th, 1846, by Pio Pico to F. Soberanes; claim filed January 22d, 1853, confirmed by the commission July 17th, 1855, and appeal dismissed June 8th, 1857; containing 8,899.82 acres.

527, 201, S. D. James Blair et al., claimants for Salsipuedes, 8 square leagues, in Santa Cruz county, 2 square leagues granted with conditions November 4th, 1834, by José Figueroa, and final title to 8 square leagues March 1st, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado, to Manuel Jimeno Casarin; claim filed January 27th, 1853, confirmed by the commission May 2d, 1854, and appeal dismissed October 8th, 1857; containing 27,662.57 acres. Patented.

528, 268, S. D., 150. Luis T. Burton et al., claimants for two-thirds of Jesus Maria, in Santa Barbara county, granted April 8th, 1837, by Juan B. Alvarado to Lucas Olivera et al.; claim filed January 27th, 1853, confirmed by the commission December 19th, 1854, and appeal dismissed February 1st, 1858; containing 42,184.93 acres.

529, 155, S. D., 260. James McKinlay, claimant for Moro y Cayucos, 2 square leagues, in San Luis Obispo county, 1 square league granted April 27th, 1842, to Martin Olivera, and the other by Juan B. Alvarado to Vicente Feliz; claim filed January 28th, 1853, confirmed by the commission April 4th, 1854, by the district court December 24th, 1856, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858; containing 8,845.49 acres.

530, 34, S. D., 384. James McKinlay, claimant for San Lucas, 2 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted May 9th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to Rafael Estrada; claim filed January 28th, 1853, rejected by the commission December 13th, 1853, confirmed by the district court February 21st, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 3,590.25 acres.

531, 270, S. D. Fermina Espinoza de Perez and Domingo Perez, claimants for Los Gatos or Santa Rita, 1 square league, in Monterey county, granted in 1820, and September 3d, 1837, by Juan B. Alvarado to José Trinidad Espinoza; claim filed January 29th, 1853, confirmed by the commission January 23d, 1855, by the district court January 23d, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858; containing 4,424.46 acres.

532, 244, S. D., 191. Eusebio Boronda, claimant for Rinconada del Sanjon, 1½ square leagues, in Monterey county, granted February 1st, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to E. Boronda; claim filed January 29th, 1853, confirmed by the commission October 31st, 1854, by the district court October 16th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1857; containing 2,229.70 acres. Patented.

533, 240, S. D., 175. José Manuel Boronda et al., claimants for Los Laureles 1½ square leagues, in Monterey county, granted September 20th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to José M. Boronda and Vicente Blas Martinez; claim filed January 29th, 1853, confirmed by the commission October 31st, 1854, by the district court January 7th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1857; containing 6,624.99 acres.

534, 156, S. D. Joaquin Carrillo et al., claimants for San Carlos de Jonata, 6 square leagues, in Santa Barbara county, granted September 24th, 1845, by Pio Pico to J. Carrillo et al.; claim filed January 29th, 1853, confirmed by the commission January 31st, 1854, and by the district court February 7th, 1857; containing 26,631.31 acres.

535, 215, S. D., 16. Rafael Estrada, claimant for Rincon de las Salinas, one-half square league, in Monterey county, granted December 2d, 1833, by José Figueroa to Cristina Delgado; claim filed January 29th, 1853, confirmed by the commission September 26th, 1854, by the district court January 7th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1857; containing 2,220.02 acres. Patented.

536, 349, S. D., 326. José Maria Covarrubias, claimant for Castac, 5 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted November 22d, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to J. M. Covarrubias; claim filed January 29th, 1853, confirmed by the commission July 10th, 1855, by the district court January 21st, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 6th, 1858.

537, 230, S. D., 75. Juana Briones de Lugo et al., claimants for Paraje de Sanchez, 1½ square leagues, in Monterey county, granted June 8th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Francisco Lugo; claim filed January 29th, 1853, confirmed by the commission November 7th, 1854, by the district court October 16th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1857; containing 6,584.32 acres.

538, 369, S. D. José Maria Covarrubias et al., claimants for Mission of Santa Inez, in Santa Barbara county, granted June 15th, 1846, by Pio Pico to J. M. Covarrubias et al.; claim filed January 29th, 1853, and rejected by the commission September 11th, 1855.

539, 234, S. D., 135. Maria del Espiritu Santo Carrillo, claimant for Loma del Espiritu Santo, described by boundaries, in Monterey county, granted April 15th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Maria del Espiritu Santo Carrillo; claim filed January 29th, 1853, rejected by the commission November 14th, 1854, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution February 11th, 1856.

540, 222, S. D., 121. Heirs of Felipe Vasquez, claimants for Chamisal, 1 square league, in Monterey county, granted November 17th, 1835, by José Castro to F. Vasquez; claim filed January 31st, 1853, and rejected by the commission October 24th, 1854.

541, 189, N. D.; 174, S. D., (sent to Northern District). Gregorio Briones, claimant for Las Baulines, 2 square leagues, in Marin county, granted February 11th, 1846, by Pio Pico to G. Briones; claim filed January 31st, 1853, confirmed by the commission May 15th, 1854, by the district court January 19th, 1857, and appeal dismissed April 2d, 1857; containing 8,911.34 acres.

542, 88, N. D. Encarnacion Buelna and heirs of Maria Concepcion V. de Rodriguez, claimants for part of San Gregorio, 3 square leagues, in Santa Cruz county granted May 2d, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Antonino Buelna; claim filed February 1st, 1853, rejected by the commission December 27th, 1853, confirmed by the district court October 29th, 1855, and appeal dismissed July 24th, 1857; containing 13,344.15 acres. Patented.

543, 242, S. D. Mayor and common council of Santa Barbara, claimants for 8¼ square leagues, granted, in 1782, to the Pueblo of Santa Barbara; claim filed February 1st, 1853, rejected by the commission August 1st, 1854, and confirmed by the district court March 6th, 1861.

544, 221, S. D., 275. Mariano Soberanes, claimant for Los Ojitos, 2 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted April 5th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to M. Soberanes; claim filed February 1st, 1853, confirmed by the commission September 26th, 1854, by the district court January 7th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1857; containing 8,900.17 acres.

545, 181, S. D., 348. Julian Ursua, claimant for La Panocha de San Juan, 5 square leagues, in San Joaquin county, granted February 17th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to J. Ursua; claim filed February 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission May 2d, 1854, and by the district court December 17th, 1856.

546, 373, S. D., 198. José Castro, claimant for San José y Sur Chiquita, 2 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted April 16th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Marcelino Escobar; claim filed February 2d, 1853, and rejected by the commission August 28th, 1855.

547, 368, S. D. José Maria Covarrubias, claimant for Isla de Santa Catalina, described by boundaries, in Los Angeles county, granted July 4th, 1846, by Pio Pico to Tomas M. Hobbins; claim filed February 3d, 1853, confirmed by the commission September 25th, 1855, and by the district court March 1st, 1858.

548, 424, N. D. José Y. Limantour, claimant for 4 square leagues, in San Francisco county, part of the city, supposed to extend south of California street, granted February 27th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to J. Y. Limantour; claim filed February 3d, 1853, confirmed by the commission January 22d, 1856, and rejected by the district court October 19th, 1858.

549, 429, N. D. José Y. Limantour, claimant for the islands of Farrallones, Alcatraz and Yerba Buena, and a tract of 1 square league in Marin county, opposite the island of Los Angeles, known as Punta del Tiburon, granted December 16th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to J. Y. Limantour; claim filed February 3d, 1853, confirmed by the commission February 12th, 1856, and rejected by the district court November 19th, 1858.

550, 328, S. D., 204. John P. Davison, claimant for Santa Paula y Saticoy, 4 square leagues, in Santa Barbara county, granted April 1st, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to Manuel Jimeno Casarin; claim filed February 3d, 1853, confirmed by the commission May 22d, 1855, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858; containing 17,733.33 acres.

551, 223, S. D., 238. Mariano Soberanes et al., claimants for San Bernardo, 3 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted June 16th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to M. Soberanes et al.; claim filed February 5th, 1853, confirmed by the commission November 7th, 1854, by the district court January 14th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 5th, 1857; containing 13,345.65 acres.

552, 210, S. D., 292. Heirs of Joaquin Soto, claimants for El Piojo, 3 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted August 20th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to Joaquin Soto; claim filed February 5th, 1853, confirmed by the commission September 26th, 1854, by the district court January 19th, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858; containing 13,329.23 acres.

553, 284, S. D., 209. Antonio Olivera, claimant for Casmalia, 2 square leagues, in Santa Barbara county, granted September 12th, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to A. Olivera; claim filed February 5th, 1853, confirmed by the commission March 6th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 1st, 1858; containing 8,841.21 acres.

554, 356, S. D. Andrew Randall and Fletcher M. Haight, claimants for Cañada de la Segunda, 1 square league, in Monterey county, granted April 4th, 1839, by José Castro to Lazaro Soto; claim filed February 5th, 1853, confirmed by the commission August 14th, 1855, by the district court February 5th, 1858, and appeal dismissed February 8th, 1858; containing 4,366.80 acres. Patented.

555, 253, S. D., 316. Andrew Randall, claimant for San Lorenzo, 5 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted November 16th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to Francisco Rico; claim filed February 5th, 1853, confirmed by the commission December 12th, 1854, by the district court January 12th, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858; containing 22,264.47 acres.

556, 344, S. D., 289. Francisco Dominguez et al., claimants for San Emidio, 4 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted July 14th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to José Antonio Dominguez; claim filed February 5th, 1853, confirmed by the commission December 26th, 1854, and appeal dismissed June 8th, 1857; containing 17,709.79 acres.

557, 190, S. D. Jacob P. Leese, claimant for Rancho de Sausal, 2 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted August 2d, 1834, and August 10th, 1845, by José Figueroa to José Tiburcio Castro; claim filed February 5th, 1853, confirmed by the commission August 15th, 1854, by the district court December 18th, 1856, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858; containing 10,241.88 acres. Patented.

558, 346, N. D. Charles White, claimant for Arroyo de San Antonio, in Sonoma county, granted August 10th, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to Antonio Ortega; claim filed February 7th, 1853, confirmed by the commission June 26th, 1855, by the district court August 17th, 1857, decree reversed by the U. S. supreme court, and record remitted for further proceedings, 23 Howard [64 U. S.] 249.

559, 409, N. D. W. D. M. Howard, claimant for San Mateo, 2 square leagues, in San Mateo county, granted May 5th or 6th, 1846, by Pio Pico to Cayetano Arenas; claim filed February 7th, 1853, confirmed by the commission September 18th, 1855, and appeal dismissed April 6th, 1857; containing 6,438.80 acres. Patented.

560, 352, S. D. Patrick Breen, claimant for 1,500 varas square, in Monterey county, granted April 13th, 1846, by Pio Pico to José Castro; claim filed February 7th, 1853, confirmed by the commission June 26th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 1st, 1858; containing 401.25 acres.

561, 281, S. D., 525. Michael White, claimant for Muscupiabe, 1 square league, in Los Angeles county, granted April 29th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to M. White; claim filed February 8th, 1853, confirmed by the commission March 6th, 1855, and appeal dismissed June 8th, 1857.

562, 68, S. D., 276. James Watson, claimant for San Benito, 1½ square leagues, in Monterey county, granted April 5th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to Francisco Garcia; claim filed February 9th, 1853, confirmed by the commission January 17th, 1854, by the district court February 23d, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1857; containing 6,671.08 acres.

563, 380, S. D. L. E. Pogue et al., claimants for Point Pinos, 2 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted May 24th, 1833, by José Figueroa to José Maria Armenta; claim filed February 9th, 1853, and rejected by the commission September 11th, 1855.

564, 157, S. D., 151. John C. Gore, claimant for Pescadero, 1 square league, in Monterey county, granted March 3d, 1836, by Nicolas Gutierrez to Fabian Barreto; claim filed February 9th, 1853, rejected by the commission February 28th, 1854, and confirmed by the district court January 18th, 1856; containing 1,695.04 acres.

565, 361, S. D. Ramona Butron et al., claimants for Natividad, 2 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted November 16th, 1837, by Juan B. Alvarado to M. Butron and N. Alviso; claim filed February 9th, 1853, confirmed by the commission July 10th, 1855, by the district court February 23d, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858; containing 8,642.21 acres.

566, 100, S. D., 133. Guadalupe Castro, claimant for San Andres, 2 square leagues, in Santa Cruz county, granted November 27th, 1833, by José Figueroa to Joaquin Castro; claim filed February 9th, 1853, confirmed by the commission February 7th, 1854, by the district court February 21st, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858; containing 8,911.53 acres.

567, 288, S. D., 457. W. S. Johnson et al., claimants for Pleyto, 3 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted July 18th, 1845, by Pio Pico to Antonio Chaves; claim filed February 9th, 1853, rejected by the commission March 6th, 1855, and confirmed by the district court February 7th, 1857.

568, 332, N. D., 514. Antonio Rodriguez, claimant for San Vicente, 2 square leagues, in Santa Cruz county, granted April 16th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to A. Rodriguez; claim filed February 9th, 1853, rejected by the commission May 8th, 1855, appeal dismissed and cause stricken from the docket February 23d, 1857.

569, 278, N. D., 393, S. D. (sent to the Southern district March 9th, 1837). Vicente Gomez, claimant for Panoche Grande, 4 square leagues, in San Joaquin county, granted in 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to V. Gomez; claim filed February 9th, 1853, rejected by the commission March 6th, 1855, confirmed by the Southern district court June 5th, 1859. In this case, motion was made to review the decree. Pending the motion, the case was taken up on appeal to the U. S. supreme court, where the cause was docketed and dismissed. In 23 Howard [64 U. S.] 326, the order of the supreme court docketing and dismissing cause was vacated and the mandate recalled. Case reopened in district court March 21st, 1861, and is at issue.

570, 158, S. D., 13. Heirs of Gabriel Espinoza et al., claimants for Salinas, 1 square league, granted April 15th, 1836, by Nicolas Gutierrez to G. Espinoza; claim filed February 9th, 1853, rejected by the commission April 4th, 1854, and confirmed by the district court February 7th, 1857.

571, 306, S. D., 224. Henry Cocks, claimant for San Bernabé, 3 square leagues, in Monterey county, 1 square league granted March 10th, 1841, to Jesus Molina, and 2 square leagues granted January 8th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to Petronillo Rios; claim filed February 9th, 1853, confirmed by the commission March 20th, 1855, and appeal dismissed June 8th, 1857; containing 13,296.98 acres.

572, 298, S. D. Henry Cocks, claimant for one-fourth square league, in Monterey county, granted July 30th, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to Esteben Espinoza; claim filed February 9th, 1853, confirmed by the commission March 20th, 1855, and appeal dismissed June 8th, 1857; containing 1,106.03 acres.

573, 159, S. D., 193. James Meadows, claimant for land in Monterey county, granted January 27th, 1840 by Juan B. Alvarado to Antonio Romero; claim filed February 10th, 1853, confirmed by the commission March 14th, 1854, by the district court December 30th, 1856, and appeal dismissed January 21st, 1858; containing 4,591.71 acres.

574, 342, S. D. Julian Workman et al., claimants for Mission of San Gabriel, in Los Angeles county, granted June 8th, 1846, by Pio Pico to J. Workman and P. Hugo Reid; claim filed February 11th, 1853, rejected by the commission June 26th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution December 20th, 1856.

575, 176, S. D. John F. Jones et al., claimants for Rio de las Animas, 6 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted May 12th, 1846, by Pio Pico to Leonardo Cota and Julian Chaves; claim filed February 11th, 1853, rejected by the commission August 1st, 1854, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution October 24th, 1855.

576, 165, S. D., 546. Agustin Olvera, claimant for La Cienega, 20 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted April 21st, 1846, by Pio Pico to A. Olvera and Narciso Botello; claim filed February 11th, 1853, rejected by the commission August 1st, 1854, and by the district court January 26th, 1860.

577, 249, N. D. B. McCombs, claimant for part of Salvador's Rancho, 140 acres, in Napa county, granted January 1st, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvador Vallejo; claim filed February 11th, 1853, confirmed by the commission December 26th, 1854, and by the district court February 23d, 1857.

578, 231, N. D. Joel P. Walker, claimant for part of Entre Napa, 60 acres, in Napa county, granted May 9th, 1836, by Mariano Chico to Nicolas Higuera; claim filed February 11th, 1853, confirmed by the commission December 26th, 1854, by the district court December 23d, 1857, and appeal dismissed December 23d, 1857.

579, 212, N. D. Johnson Horrel, claimant for part of Salvador's Rancho, 240 acres in Napa county, granted January 1st, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvador Vallejo; claim filed February 11th, 1853, confirmed by the commission October 17th, 1854, by the district court March 2d, 1857, and appeal dismissed June 13th, 1857.

580, 171, N. D. Peter D. Bailey, claimant for part of Entre Napa, in Napa county, granted May 9th, 1836, by Mariano Chico to Nicolas Higuera; claim filed February 11th, 1853, confirmed by the commission September 5th, 1854, by the district court December 23d, 1855, and appeal dismissed December 23d, 1855.

581, 176, N. D. Joseph Mount et al., claimants for part of Entre Napa, in Napa county, granted May 9th, 1836, by Mariano Chico to Nicolas Higuera; claim filed February 11th, 1853, confirmed by the commission September 5th, 1854, and by the district court February 13th, 1857.

582, 241, N. D. John Love, claimant for part of Salvador's Rancho, 100 acres, in Napa county, granted January 1st, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvador Vallejo; claim filed February 11th, 1853, confirmed by the commission December 26th, 1854, and by the district court February 23d, 1857.

583, 261, N. D. William Keely, claimant for part of Salvador's Rancho, 40 acres, in Napa county, granted January 1st, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvador Vallejo; claim filed February 11th, 1853, confirmed by the commission January 9th, 1855, and by the district court February 23d, 1857.

584, 222, N. D., 510. Johnson Horrel et al., claimants for Rincon de Musulacon, 2 square leagues, in Mendocino and Sonoma counties, granted May 2d, 1846, by Pio Pico to Francisco Berreyesa; claim filed February 11th, 1853, confirmed by the commission December 12th, 1854, by the district court January 14th, 1856, and appeal dismissed April 2d, 1857; containing 8,866.88 acres.

585, 172, N. D. Joseph Green, claimant for part of Entre Napa, in Napa county, granted May 9th, 1836, by Mariano Chico to Nicolas Higuera; claim filed February 11th, 1853, confirmed by the commission September 19th, 1854, and by the district court February 13th, 1857.

586, 242, N. D. John Patchell, claimant for part of Entre Napa, in Napa county, granted May 9th, 1836, by Mariano Chico to Nicolas Higuera; claim filed February 11th, 1853, confirmed by the commission January 9th, 1855, and by the district court February 23d, 1857.

587, 244, N. D. Marta Frias de Higuera, claimant for part of Entre Napa, in Napa county, granted May 8th, 1836, by Mariano Chico to Nicolas Higuera; claim filed February 11th, 1853, confirmed by the commission January 9th, 1855, and by the district court June 10th, 1858.

588, 76, S. D., 455. Pedro Estrada, claimant for La Asuncion, in San Luis Obispo county, granted June 19th, 1845, by Pio Pico to P. Estrada; claim filed February 12th, 1853, confirmed by the commission January 24th, 1854, by the district court January 25th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 39,224.81 acres.

589, 390, S. D. President and trustees of the city of San Diego, claimants for land granted, in 1769, to the Pueblo of San Diego; claim filed February 14th, 1853, confirmed by the commission January 27th, 1856, and appeal dismissed June 8th, 1857; containing 48,556.69 acres.

590, 276, N. D., 249. Joaquin Moraga, claimant for Laguna de los Palos Colorados, 3 square leagues, in Contra Costa county, granted August 10th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to J. Moraga and Juan Bernal; claim filed February 15th, 1853, confirmed by the commission January 23d, 1855, by the district court March 24th, 1856, and appeal dismissed April 8th, 1856; containing 13,318.13 acres.

591, 285, S. D., 357. Nicolas Dodero, claimant for Tres Ojos de Agua, 1,300 varas square, in Santa Cruz county, granted March 18th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to N. Dodero; claim filed February 15th, 1853, confirmed by the commission February 20th, 1855, by the district court January 18th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 176 acres.

592, 307, S. D., 105. Juan Hames et al., claimants for Arroyo del Rodeo, one by one-fourth square leagues, in Santa Cruz county, granted August 2d, 1834, by José Figueroa to Francisco Rodriguez; claim filed February 15th, 1853, confirmed by the commission March 27th, 1855, by the district court March 5th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 1,473.07 acres.

593, 343, N. D. Martina Castro, claimant for Shoquel, 1 square league, in Santa Cruz county, granted May 17th, 1834, by José Figueroa, and surplus lands, known as Palo de la Yesca, described by boundaries, granted January 7th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena, to M. Castro; claim filed February 16th, 1853, confirmed by the commission June 26th, 1855, and appeal dismissed March 20th, 1857; containing 32,702.41 acres. Patented.

594, 167, N. D., 179. Tiburcio Vasquez, claimant for Corral de Tierra, 1 square league, in San Mateo county, granted October 5th, 1839, by Manuel Jimeno to T. Vasquez; claim filed February 17th, 1853, confirmed by the commission August 15th, 1854, by the district court April 18th, 1859, and appeal dismissed June 29th, 1859; containing 4,436.18 acres.

595, 247, S. D., 69. José Abrego, claimant for San Francisquito, 2 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted November 9th, 1835, by José Castro to Catalina Manzanelli de Munnas; claim filed February 17th, 1853, confirmed by the commission October 17th, 1854, by the district court December 19th, 1856, and appeal dismissed January 21st, 1858; containing 8,813.50 acres.

596, 220, S. D., 296. Angel Castro et al., claimants for Los Paicines or Cienega de los Paicines, 2 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted October 5th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to Angel Castro; claim filed February 17th, 1853, confirmed by the commission October 17th, 1854, by the district court January 28th, 1857, and appeal dismissed June 4th, 1857; containing 8,917.52 acres.

597, 323, S. D., 5. Gregorio Tapia, claimant for Aguajito, one-half square league, in Monterey county, granted August 13th, 1835, by José Figueroa to G. Tapia; claim filed February 17th, 1853, rejected by the commission May 8th, 1855, and confirmed by the district court February 8th, 1858.

598, 270, S. D. Maria Antonia Cruz, claimant for Cañada de los Piñacates, one-fourth square league, in Los Angeles county, granted November 20th, 1835, by José Castro to José Cruz and José Maria Cruz; claim filed February 17th, 1853, rejected by the commission January 23d, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution February 11th, 1856.

599, 202, S. D., 239. Maria Josefa Soberanes, claimant for Los Coches, $2\frac{1}{4}$ square leagues, in Monterey county, granted June 14th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to M. J. Soberanes; claim filed February 18th, 1853, rejected by the commission September 26th, 1854, confirmed by the district court September 24th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 8,794.09 acres.

600, 255, S. D. Manuel Castro, claimant for Laguna de Tache, 9 square leagues in Monterey county, granted January 10th, 1846, by Pio Pico to M. Castro; claim filed February 18th, 1853, rejected by the commission October 17th, 1854, and confirmed by the district court February 9th, 1858.

601, 267, S. D. Jeremiah Clark, claimant for part of Rancho Laguna de Tache, 2 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted January 10th, 1846, by Pio Pico to Manuel Castro; claim filed February 18th, 1853, rejected by the commission October 17th, 1854, confirmed by the district court February 9th, 1858. On claimant's motion, case dismissed February 10th, 1858.

602, 399, N. D. Francisco Pico, claimant for Las Calaveras, 8 square leagues, granted July 20th, 1846, by Pio Pico to F. Pico; claim filed February 18th, 1853, rejected by the commission October 16th, 1855, confirmed by the district court January 9th, 1858, decree reversed by the U. S. supreme court and petition to be dismissed, 23 Howard [64 U. S.] 321.

603, 145, N. D. Elizabeth de Zaldo, claimant for 50 varas square, at the Mission Dolores, granted October 12th, 1842, by Francisco Sanchez to Carlos Moreno; claim filed February 18th, 1853, rejected by the commission August 9th, 1854, and confirmed by the district court March 24th, 1856.

604, 284, N. D. Stephen Smith, claimant for two 50-vara lots, in San Francisco, granted December 4th, 1845, by Pio Pico to S. Smith; claim filed February 19th, 1853, and rejected by the commission March 27th, 1855.

605, 312, N. D. John Rose et al., claimants for 6 square leagues, in Yuba county, granted in 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to John Smith; claim filed February 19th, 1853, confirmed by the commission May 22d, 1855, by the district court May 4th, 1857, and decree reversed by the U. S. supreme court with direction to dismiss the petition, 23 Howard [64 U. S.] 262.

606, 98, S. D., 164. Maria Antonia Pico de Castro et al., claimants for Bolsa Nueva y Moro Cojo, 8 square leagues, in Monterey county—Moro Coyo, 2 square leagues, granted February 14th, 1825, by Luis Arguello, and Bolsa Nueva, 1 square league, granted by Mariano Chico, May 14th, 1836; lands between the two above tracts, granted November 20th, 1837, by Juan B. Alvarado, to Simeon Castro; regrant of the whole property, being 8 square leagues, to the widow and representatives of S. Castro, September 26th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena; claim filed February 19th, 1853, confirmed by the commission February 7th, 1854, by the district court January 8th, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 1st, 1858; containing 28,827.78 acres.

607, 350, S. D. Rufina Castro, claimant for one lot 100 by 200 and another 400 varas square, in Monterey county, granted May 19th, 1839, by José Castro to Mariano Castro; claim filed February 19th, 1853, and confirmed by the commission July 3d, 1855.

608, 280, S. D. Blas A. Escarilla, claimant for San Vicente, in Santa Cruz county, granted June 16th, 1846, by Pio Pico to B. A. Escarilla; claim filed February 19th, 1853, confirmed by the commission January 23d, 1855, by the district court February 7th, 1857, and appeal dismissed January 7th, 1858.

609, 425, N. D., and 388, S. D. Archbishop Joseph Sadoc Alemany, claimant for the following missions and land; claim filed February 19th, 1853, confirmed by the commission December 18th, 1855, appeal dismissed in Northern district March 16th, 1857, and in Southern district March 15th, 1858. [The dates of the foundation of the missions were furnished by the Reverend Father José Maria de Jesus Gonzalez, of the Mission of Santa Barbara.]

Mission San Diego, in San Diego county, founded under Carlos III., July 16th, 1769; containing 22.24 acres.

Mission San Luis Rey, in San Diego county, founded under Carlos IV., June 13th, 1798; containing 53.39 acres.

Mission San Juan Capistrano, in Los Angeles county, founded under Carlos III., November 10th, 1776; containing 44.40 acres.

Mission San Gabriel Arcangel, in Los Angeles county, founded under Carlos III., September 8th, 1771; containing 190.69 acres. Patented.

Mission San Buenaventura, in Santa Barbara county, founded under Carlos III., March 31st, 1782; containing 36.27 acres.

Mission San Fernando, in Los Angeles county, founded under Carlos IV., September 8th, 1797; containing 76.94 acres.

Mission Santa Barbara, in Santa Barbara county, founded under Carlos III., December 4th, 1786; containing 37.83 acres.

Mission Santa Inez, in Santa Barbara county, founded under Carlos IV., September 17th, 1804; containing 17.35 acres.

Mission La Purisima Concepcion, in Santa Barbara county, founded under Carlos III., December 8th, 1787.

Mission San Luis Obispo, in San Luis Obispo county, founded under Carlos III., September 1st, 1772; containing 52.72 acres. Patented.

Mission San Miguel Arcangel, in San Luis Obispo county, founded under Carlos IV., July 25th, 1797; containing 33.97 acres. Patented.

Mission San Antonio de Padua, in San Luis Obispo county, founded under Carlos III., July 14th, 1771; containing 33.19 acres. Patented.

Mission La Soledad, in Monterey county, founded under Carlos IV., October 9th, 1791; containing 34.47 acres. Patented.

Mission El Carme or San Carlos de Monterey, in Monterey county, founded under Carlos III., June 3d, 1770; containing 9 acres. Patented.

Mission San Juan Bautista, in Monterey county, founded under Carlos IV., June 24th, 1797; containing 55.23 acres. Patented.

Mission Santa Cruz, in Santa Cruz county, founded under Carlos IV., August 28th, 1791; containing 16.94 acres. Patented.

Mission Santa Clara, in Santa Clara county, founded under Carlos III., January 18th, 1777; containing 13.13 acres. Patented.

Mission San José, in Alameda county, founded under Carlos IV., June 11th, 1797; containing 28.33 acres. Patented.

Mission Dolores or San Francisco de Assis, in San Francisco county, founded under Carlos III., October 9th, 1776; two lots, one containing 4.3 acres and the other 4.51 acres. Patented.

Mission San Rafael Arcangel, in Marin county, founded under Fernando VII., December 18th, 1817; containing 6.48 acres. Patented.

Mission San Francisco Solano, in Sonoma county, founded under Fernando VII., August 25th, 1813; containing 14.20 acres.

Cañada de los Pinos or College Rancho, 6 square leagues, in Santa Barbara county; containing 35,499.37 acres. Patented.

La Laguna, 1 square league, in San Luis Obispo county; containing 4,157.02 acres. Patented.

Two Gardens, in San Luis Obispo county.

610, 187, S. D., 356. Leander Ransom, claimant for Los Laureles, 2,000 varas square, in Monterey county, granted March 13th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to José Agricia; claim filed February 21st, 1853, rejected by the commission August 29th, 1854, and confirmed by the district court June 2d, 1857.

611, 230, N. D. Jacob P. Leese, claimant for Lac, 1,000 varas square, in Sonoma county, granted July 25th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Damoso Rodriguez; claim filed February 21st, 1853, confirmed by the commission December 12th, 1854, and by the district court December 28th, 1857, and appeal dismissed December 28th, 1857.

612, 195, N. D. Andres Pico, claimant for 400 varas square, Mission Dolores, granted February 10th, 1846, by Pico to José Prudencio Santillan; claim filed February 21st, 1853, and rejected by the commission January 23d, 1855.

613. William Cary Jones et al., claimants for Potrero de San Francisco, one-half square league, in San Francisco county, granted May 1st, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Ramon de Haro and Francisco de Haro; claim filed February 23d, 1853, and discontinued November 27th, 1855.

614, 99, S. D., 51. John Wilson et al., claimants for Saucito, one by one-half league, in Monterey county, granted May 22d, 1833, by José Figueroa to Craciano Manjares; claim filed February 23d, 1853, confirmed by the commission February 7th, 1854, by the district court December 29th, 1856, and appeal dismissed January 21st, 1858; containing 2,211.65 acres.

615, 160, S. D. Maria Antonia Pico de Castro et al., claimants for Corral de Padilla, 2,000 varas square, granted March 7th, 1836, by Nicolas Gutierrez to Baldomero; claim filed February 23d, 1853, rejected by the commission March 14th, 1854, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution October 24th, 1855.

616, 364, N. D. Jonathan D. Stevenson et al., claimants for Medanos, 2 square leagues, in Contra Costa county, granted November 26th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to José Antonio Mesa et al.; claim filed February 24th, 1853, confirmed by the commission June 19th, 1855, by the district court October 16th, 1856, and appeal dismissed April 2d, 1857; containing 8,890.26 acres.

617, 373, N. D. José de Jesus Bernal et al., claimants for Cañada de Pala, 8,000 by 1,200 varas, in Santa Clara county, granted August 9th, 1839, by José Castro to J. de Jesus Bernal; claim filed February 24th, 1853, confirmed by the commission June 26th, 1855, and appeal dismissed May 7th, 1857; containing 15,714.10 acres.

618, 166, S. D., 456. Jesus Machado, claimant for Buenavista, one-half square league, in San Diego county, granted July 8th, 1845, by Pio Pico to Felipe; claim filed February 24th, 1853, confirmed by the commission May 16th, 1854, by the district court February 1st, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857.

619, 355, N. D. José Noriega, claimant for 4 suertes, in Santa Clara county, granted December 5th, 1845, by Mariano Castro to J. Noriega; claim filed February 24th, 1853, rejected by the commission July 3d, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution February 23d, 1857.

620, 172, S. D., 79. Rafael Castro, claimant for Aptos, 1 square league, in Santa Cruz county, granted November 16th, 1833, by José Figueroa to R. Castro; claim filed February 24th, 1853, confirmed by the commission May 16th, 1854, by the district court October 11th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 23d, 1857; containing 6,685.91 acres. Patented.

621, 338, S. D. Richard S. Den, claimant for Mission of Santa Barbara, in Santa Barbara county, granted June 10th, 1846, by Pio Pico to R. S. Den; claim filed February 24th, 1853, and confirmed by the commission June 12th, 1855.

622, 326, S. D. Petronillo Rios, claimant for Mission of San Miguel, in San Luis Obispo county, granted July 4th, 1846, by Pio Pico to William Reed, Petronillo Rios and Miguel Garcia; claim filed February 24th, 1853, rejected by the commission May 15th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution December 17th, 1856.

623, 271, S. D., 277. Maria Antonio Ortega, claimant for Atascadero, in San Luis Obispo county, granted May 6th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to Trifon Garcia; claim filed February 24th, 1853, rejected by the commission January 2d, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution February 11th, 1857.

624, 209, S. D., 201. Carlos C. Espinoza, claimant for Posa de los Ositos, 4 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted May 7th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to C. C. Espinoza; claim filed February 24th, 1853, rejected by the commission September 26th, 1854, confirmed by the district court September 26th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 16,933.98 acres. Patented.

625, 224, S. D. Ysidro Maria Alvarado, claimant for Monserrate, 3 square leagues, in San Diego county, granted May 4th, 1846, by Pio Pico to Y. M. Alvarado; claim filed February 24th, 1853, rejected by the commission November 14th, 1854, and confirmed by the district court February 16th, 1857.

626, 194, N. D. William Bennitz, claimant for Briesgau, 5 square leagues, in Shasta county, granted July 26th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Wm. Bennitz; claim filed February 24th, 1853, rejected by the commission September 26th, 1854, confirmed by the district court April 7th, 1856, decree reversed and cause remanded by the U. S. supreme court with direction to dismiss the petition, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 255.

627, 271, N. D., 385. Manuel Rodriguez, claimant for Butano, 1 square league, in Santa Cruz county, informal grant February 19th, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado, and ratified November 13th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Romana Sanchez; claim filed February 24th, 1853, confirmed by the commission February 8th, 1855, by the district court November 19th, 1856, and appeal dismissed June 12th, 1857; containing 3-025.65 acres.

628, 262, S. D., 369. Maria Antonia Castro de Anzar et al., claimants for Real de las Aguilas, 7 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted January 17th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Francisco Arias and Saturnino Cariaga; claim filed February 24th, 1853, rejected by the commission December 12th, 1854, and confirmed by the district court February 9th, 1857.

629, 387, N. D., 190. Ferdinand Vassault, claimant for Camaritos, 300 varas square, in San Francisco county, granted January 21st, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to José de Jesus Noé; claim filed February 24th, 1853, confirmed by the commission September 4th, 1855, by the district court March 9th, 1857, and by the U. S. supreme court.

630, 163, N. D. Quentin Ortega, claimant for San Ysidro, 1 square league, in Santa Clara county, granted June 4th, 1833, by José Figueroa to Q. Ortega; claim filed February 25th, 1853, confirmed by the commission August 15th, 1854, by the district court March 22d, 1858, and appeal dismissed March 23d, 1858; containing 4,437.67 acres.

631, 232, S. D., 381. Thomas Blanco's heirs, claimants for 400 by 600 varas, one suerte, in Monterey county, granted August 27th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Thomas Blanco; claim filed February 25th, 1853, confirmed by the commission December 26th, 1854, and appeal dismissed June 8th, 1857.

632, 245, N. D. James L. Ord, claimant for 2 square leagues, in Tuolumne county, granted in 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Solomon Pico; claim filed February 25th, 1853, and rejected by the commission January 23d, 1855.

633, 274, N. D. Sacramento City, claimant for land granted June 18th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to John A. Sutter; claim filed February 25th, 1853, rejected by the commission March 6th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1856.

634, 283, S. D., 108. John H. Watson and D. S. Gregory, claimants for Bolsa de Pajaro, in Santa Cruz county, granted October 1st, 1836, to A. Rodriguez and S. Rodriguez; claim filed February 25th, 1853, and rejected by the commission March 27th, 1855.

635, 291, S. D. José Manuel Borgas, claimant for El Pajaro, six suertes, in Monterey county, granted March 18th, 1843, by José R. Estrada to J. M. Borgas; claim filed February 25th, 1853, rejected by the commission March

27th, 1855, and appeal dismissed December 18th, 1856.

636, 304, S. D., 303. Maria Concepcion Boronda, claimant for Potrero de San Luis Obispo, 1 square league, in San Luis Obispo county, granted November 8th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to M. C. Boronda; claim filed February 26th, 1853, confirmed by the commission February 6th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 3d, 1858; containing 3,506.33 acres.

637, 257, N. D. Peter H. Burnett, claimant for lot in Sacramento City, granted June 18th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to John A. Sutter; claim filed February 26th, 1853, rejected by the commission January 23d, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1856.

638, 233, N. D. Ellen White et al., widow and heirs of Charles White, claimants for Pala, 1 square league, in Santa Clara county, granted November 5th, 1835, by José Castro to José Higuera; claim filed February 26th, 1853, confirmed by the commission December 19th, 1854, by the district court February 23d, 1857, and appeal dismissed February 9th, 1858; containing 4,454-08 acres.

639, 243, N. D. City of Sonora, claimant for 1 square mile; claim filed February 26th, 1853, rejected by the commission January 23d, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1856.

640. Rufus Rowe et al., claimants for part of Las Pulgas, 1½ square leagues, in San Mateo county, granted in 1820, by Pablo V. de Sola and José Castro to Luis Argello; claim filed February 28th, 1853, and discontinued by claimant March 13th, 1855. (See No. 2.)

641, 265, N. D. Antonio Maria Osio, claimant for land in Santa Clara county, near the Mission, granted June 23d, 1846, by José Castro to A. M. Osio; claim filed February 28th, 1853, rejected by the commission February 6th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1856.

642, 206, N. D. Maria Concepcion Valencia de Rodriguez et al., claimants for San Francisco, 8 suertes of 200 varas square each, in Santa Clara county, granted May 1st, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Antonio Buelna; claim filed February 28th, 1853, confirmed by the commission November 28th, 1854, by the district court February 4th, 1856, and appeal dismissed April 2d, 1857; containing 2,250.98 acres.

643, 124, N. D., 255. Julio Carrillo, claimant for part of Cabeza de Santa Rosa, in Sonoma county, granted September 30th, 1841, by Manuel Jimeno to Maria Ygnacia Lopez; claim filed February 28th, 1853, confirmed by the commission April 4th, 1854, by the district court March 2d, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 27th, 1857; containing 4,500.42 acres.

644, 128, N. D., 255. Jacob R. Mayer et al., claimants for part of Cabeza de Santa Rosa, in Sonoma county, granted September 30th, 1841, by Manuel Jimeno to Maria Ygnacia Lopez; claim filed February 28th, 1853, confirmed by the commission April 4th, 1854, by the district court March 2d, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 27th, 1857; containing 1,484.82 acres.

645, 126, N. D., 255. James Eldridge, claimant for part of Cabeza de Santa Rosa, in Sonoma county, granted September 30th, 1841, by Manuel Jimeno to Maria Ygnacia Lopez; claim filed February 28th, 1853, confirmed by the commission April 4th, 1854, by the district court March 2d, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 27th, 1857; containing 1,667.68 acres.

646, 127, N. D., 255. Felicidad Carrillo, claimant for part of Cabeza de Santa Rosa, in Sonoma county, granted September 30th, 1841, by Manuel Jimeno to Maria Ygnacia Lopez; claim filed February 28th, 1853, confirmed by the commission April 4th, 1854, and by the district court March 2d, 1857.

647, 125, N. D., 255. Juana de Jesus Malag, claimant for part of Cabeza de Santa Rosa, in Sonoma county, granted September 30th, 1841, by Manuel Jimeno to Maria Ygnacia Lopez; claim filed February 28th, 1853, confirmed by the commission April 4th, 1854, by the district court March 2d, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 27th, 1857; containing 256.16 acres.

648, 314, N. D. Maria Teodora Peralta, claimant for Buacocho, 2½ square leagues, in Marin county, granted February 18th, 1846, by Pio Pico to M. T. Peralta; claim filed February 28th, 1853, and rejected by the commission April 3d, 1855.

649, 149, N. D., 200. Otto H. Frank et al., claimants for part of Napa, 6,156 acres, in Napa county, granted by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvador Vallejo; claim filed February 28th, 1853, confirmed by the commission August 22d, 1854, by the district court June 12th, 1858, and appeal dismissed June 12th, 1858.

650, 198, S. D., 4. Joaquin Soto, claimant for Cañada de la Carpenteria, one-half square league, in Monterey county, granted September 25th, 1845, by José Castro to J. Soto; claim filed February 28th, 1853, confirmed by the commission August 15th, 1854, by the district court October 12th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 2,236.13 acres.

651, 384, N. D., 359. James Williams, Maria Louisa Carson and John S. Williams, widow and son of John S. Williams, the heirs and legal representatives of Edward A. Farwell, and the heirs of John Potter, claimants for Rancho de Farwell, called Arroyo Chico in Jimeno's Index, 5 square leagues, in Butte county, granted March 29th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Edward A. Farwell; claim filed February 28th, 1853, confirmed to claimants, except the heirs of J. Potter, by the commission August 28th, 1855, by the district court nunc pro tunc June 15th, 1858, and appeal dismissed March 21st, 1857; containing 22,193.93 acres.

652, 305, N. D. Benjamin S. Lippincott, claimant for 11 square leagues, in San Joaquin county, granted April 4th, 1846, by Pio Pico to José Castro; claim filed February 28th, 1853, rejected by the commission May 8th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 28th, 1856.

653. Frederick E. Whiting, claimant for Las Animas, in Santa Clara county, granted in 1802, by José Figueroa to Mariano Castro; claim filed February 28th, 1853.

654, 304, N. D. Inocencio Romero et al., claimants for land in Contra Costa county, granted February 4th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to I. Romero et al.; claim filed February 28th, 1853, rejected by the commission April 17th, 1855, and by the district court September 16th, 1857.

655, 272, N. D. George Swat, claimant for Nueva Flandria, 3 square leagues, granted in 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to G. Swat; claim filed February 28th, 1853, rejected by the commission March 27th, 1855, and by the district court October 5th, 1857.

656, 415, N. D. John A. Sutter, for Moquelumne Indians, claimant for 4 square leagues, in Sacramento county, granted December 22d, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Moquelumne Indians; claim filed February 28th, 1853, and confirmed by the commission November 20th, 1855.

657, 375, N. D., 305. Martin E. Cook et al., claimants for part of Malacomes or Moristal, 2 miles square, in Sonoma county, granted October 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to José de los Santos Berreyesa; claim filed February 28th, 1853, confirmed by the commission August 7th, 1855, and appeal dismissed April 16th, 1857; containing 2,559.94 acres. Patented.

658, 286, N. D. Nathaniel Bassett, claimant for Los Coluses, 4 square leagues, in Colusa county, granted in 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Juan Daubenbiss; claim filed February 28th, 1853, confirmed by the commission March 20th, 1855, by the district court April 17th, 1856, decree reversed by the U. S. supreme court and cause remanded with direction to dismiss the petition, 21 Howard [62 U. S.] 412.

659, 235, N. D., 255. John Hendley, claimant for part of Cabeza de Santa Rosa, 1 mile square, in Sonoma county, granted September 30th, 1841, by Manuel Jimeno to Maria Ygnacia Lopez; claim filed February 28th, 1853, confirmed by the commission December 19th, 1854, by the district court March 2d, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 27th, 1857; containing 640.19 acres.

660, 396, N. D., 266. J. H. Fine, claimant for part of Suisun, in Solano county, granted January 28th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to Francisco Solano; claim filed February 28th, 1853, confirmed by the commission December 4th, 1855, and appeal dismissed August 20th, 1857.

661, 252, N. D. E. R. Carpentier, claimant for 10 square leagues, in Contra Costa county, a portion granted by P. V. de Sola, another portion granted in 1841 to Juan José and Victor Castro by Juan B. Alvarado, and another portion granted by José Figueroa to Francisco Castro, and regranted in 1844 by Manuel Micheltorena to Luis Peralta; claim filed February 28th, 1853, rejected by the commission January 30th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1856.

662. H. W. Carpentier, claimant for 225 acres, in Contra Costa county, granted by P. V. de Sola and Manuel Micheltorena to Luis Peralta; claim filed February 28th, 1853, and discontinued by claimant January 23d, 1855.

663, 422, N. D., and 387, S. D. Joseph Sadoc Alemany, claimant, in behalf of the Christianized Indians formerly connected with the missions of Upper California: 1st. In behalf of the Indians of Santa Clara, under a grant by Manuel Micheltorena, June 10th, 1844, for all the vacant lands of Santa Clara ungranted before that time. 2d. In behalf of the Indians for lands known as Las Gallinas, El Nacimiento and La Estrella, in San Luis Obispo county, under a grant of Manuel Micheltorena, July 16th, 1844. 3d. In behalf of sixteen neophytes, for small tracts of land, from 100 to 300 acres each, in the vicinity of the Mission of Santa Ynes, Santa Barbara county. 4th. And in behalf of the Indians generally, one square league in each of the 21 missions (see No. 609). Claim filed February 28th, 1853, rejected by the commission December 31st, 1855, appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution in the Northern district February 23d, 1857, and in the Southern district December 22d, 1857.

664, 259, N. D., 349. L. Hoover, administrator, claimant for 5 square leagues, called Rio de las Plumas in Jimeno's Index, in Butte county, granted February 21st, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Charles W. Flugge; claim filed March 1st, 1853, rejected by the commission January 23d, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1856.

665, 322, S. D., 81. Heirs of David Littlejohn, claimants for Los Carneros, 1 square league, in Monterey county, granted June 28th, 1834, by José Figueroa to David Littlejohn; claim filed March 1st, 1853, confirmed by the commission May 22d, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 1st, 1858; containing 4,482.38 acres.

666, 236, N. D., 322. A. Randall, claimant for Punta de los Reyes, 11 square leagues, in Marin county, granted November 30th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to Antonio M. Osio; claim filed March 1st, 1853, confirmed by the commission January 9th, 1855, by the district court December 28th, 1858, and appeal dismissed May 24th, 1858; containing 43,189.34 acres. Patented.

667, 283, N. D., 343. José M. Revere, claimant for San Geronimo, 2 square leagues, in Marin county, granted February 12th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Rafael Cacho; claim filed March 1st, 1853, confirmed by the commission February 13th, 1855, by the district court June 26th, 1858, and appeal dismissed June 26th, 1858; containing 8,701 acres. Patented.

668, 279, S. D. Bruno Bernal, claimant for El Alisal, $1\frac{1}{2}$ square leagues, in Monterey county, granted June 26th, 1834, by José Figueroa to Feliciano Soberanes et al.; claim filed March 1st, 1853, confirmed by the commission January 23d, 1855, by the district court January 13th, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858; containing 5,941.12 acres.

669, 335, N. D., 566. Francisco Arce, claimant for 50 by 60 varas, in Santa Clara county, granted June 3d, 1846, by Pio Pico to F. Arce; claim filed March 1st, 1853, confirmed by the commission June 12th, 1855, and by the district court March 9th, 1857.

670, 151, N. D. Presentación de Ridley et al., claimants for Cañada de Guadalupe, 2 square leagues, granted July 31st, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to Jacob P. Leese; claim filed March 1st, 1853, rejected by the commission August 1st, 1854, and by the district court December 28th, 1857.

671, 165, N. D. C. S. de Bernal et al., claimants for 200 varas square, Mission Dolores, granted in 1834, by José Figueroa to José C. Bernal; claim filed March 1st, 1853, confirmed by the commission August 8th, 1854, by the district court March 24th, 1856, and appeal dismissed April 1st, 1857; containing 6.32 acres.

672, 178, N. D. José de la Cruz Sanchez, claimant for San Mateo, 2 square leagues, in San Mateo county, petitioned for by J. de la Cruz Sanchez in December, 1836, and April, 1844; claim filed March 1st, 1853, and rejected by the commission September 19th, 1854.

673, 206, S. D. Francisco Soberanes, claimant for Sanjon de Santa Rita, 11 square leagues, in Merced and Fresno counties, granted September 7th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to F. Soberanes; claim filed March 1st, 1853, rejected by the commission September 19th, 1854, confirmed by the district court February 9th, 1858, and appeal dismissed November 1st, 1860; containing 48,823.84 acres.

674, 277, S. D. Rafael Sanchez, claimant for San Lorenzo, 11 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted July 27th, 1846, by Pio Pico to R. Sanchez; claim filed March 1st, 1853, rejected by the commission January 13th, 1855, confirmed by the district court March 6th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 24th, 1857; containing 43,235.95 acres.

675, 225, S. D. Nicolas Morchon, claimant for Cahuenga, 4 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted July 29th, 1846, by José Castro to Luis Arenas; claim filed March 1st, 1853, rejected by the commission October 24th, 1854, and by the district court September 13th, 1859.

676. John B. Frisbie, claimant for Matzultaquea, 4 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted in 1845, by Pio Pico to Ramon Carrillo; claim filed March 1st, 1853, and discontinued.

677, 215, N. D., 45. Joaquin Higuera, claimant for Pala, 1 square league, in Santa Clara county, granted November 5th, 1835, by José Castro to José Higuera; claim filed March 1st, 1853, rejected by the commission December 26th, 1854, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1856.

678, 282, S. D., 113. Miguel Villagran, claimant for Aguajito, 500 varas square, in Santa Cruz county, granted November 20th, 1837, by Juan B. Alvarado to M. Villagran; claim filed March 1st, 1853, and confirmed by the commission February 20th, 1855.

679, 300, S. D. Vicente Gomez et al., claimants for El Tucho, 1,500 varas square, in Monterey county, granted December 4th, 1843, by José R. Estrada to José Joaquin Gomez; claim filed March 1st, 1853, and rejected by the commission March 27th, 1855.

680, 384, S. D., 297. Maria Antonia Castro de Anzar et al., claimants for Los Carneros, 1 square league, in Monterey county, granted October 7th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to Maria Antonia Linares; claim filed March 1st, 1853, confirmed by the commission August 28th, 1855, by the district court December 9th, 1856, and appeal dismissed March 4th, 1858; containing 1,628.70 acres.

681, 330, S. D., 159. Ermenegildo Vasquez, claimant for 500 by 400 varas, in Monterey county, granted November 6th, 1835, by José Castro to E. Vasquez; claim filed March 1st, 1853, rejected by the commission March 27th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution December 28th, 1856.

682. C. S. de Bernal, claimant for 200 varas square, in San Francisco county, granted in 1833, by José Figueroa to José C. Bernal; claim filed March 1st, 1853, and discontinued January 23d, 1855. (See No. 671.)

683, 417, N. D. Hiram Grimes, claimant for part of New Helvetia, in Yuba and Sutter counties, granted June 18th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to John A. Sutter; claim filed March 1st, 1853, rejected by the commission January 15th, 1856, and confirmed by the district court March 6th, 1857.

684, 404, N. D. Juan B. Alvarado, claimant for Nicasio, 20 square leagues, in Marin county, granted March 13th, 1835, by José Figueroa to Teodocio Quilajuequi et al., Indians; claim filed March 1st, 1853, rejected by the commission September 25th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution February 4th, 1858.

685, 290, N. D. Henry C. Smith, claimant for one-fourth league, in Santa Clara county, granted November 2d, 1844, by Miguel Muro (priest) to Buenaventura et al., (neophytes); claim filed March 1st, 1853, rejected by the commission March 27th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1856.

686, 277, N. D. William C. Jones et al., claimants for San Pablo, 3 square leagues, in Contra Costa county, granted June 12th, 1834, by José Figueroa to Francisco Maria Castro; claim filed March 1st, 1853, rejected by the commission March 27th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1856.

687, 196, N. D. José de Arnas, claimant for 5 square leagues of Santa Clara mission lands, granted August 1st, 1846, by José Castro to J. de Arnas; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission April 24th, 1855, and by the district court February 11th, 1856.

688, 324, S. D. Juan Temple and David W. Alexander, claimants for 100 varas square, in Los Angeles county, granted March 11th, 1834, by José Figueroa to José A. Carrillo and Abel Stearns; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission May 22d, 1855, and confirmed by the district court April 3d, 1861.

689, 278, S. D. Maria Antonio Pico et al., claimants for Bolsa de San Cayetano, in Monterey county, granted by Don Pablo de Sola, and October 18th, 1824, by Luis Arguello, to José Dolores Pico and Ignacia Vallejo; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission January 30th, 1853, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution March 7th, 1860.

690, 405, N. D., 26. Rufina Castro et al., claimants for Solis, in Santa Clara county, granted by José Figueroa to Mariano Castro; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission December 4th, 1855, confirmed by the district court May 1st, 1856, and appeal dismissed March 24th, 1857; containing 8,875.46 acres. Patented.

691, 291, N. D., 185. James Enright et al., claimants for Medano, (see No. 616) 2 square leagues, in Contra Costa county, granted November 26th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to José Antonio and José Maria Meza; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission March 27th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1856.

692, 337, N. D. Guillermo Castro, claimant for land in Alameda county, granted January 14th, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to G. Castro; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission May 15th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution March 9th, 1857.

693, 344, N. D. José Castro et al., claimants for 11 square leagues, on the San Joaquin river, (see Nos. 320 and 652) granted April 4th, 1846, by Pio Pico to José Castro; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission May 8th, 1855, by the district court November 4th, 1858, and judgment of the circuit court reversed by the U. S. supreme court with direction to dismiss the petition, 24 Howard [65 U. S.] 346.

694, 141, N. D., 200. Ann McDonald et al., claimants for part of Napa, in Napa county, granted September 21st, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvador Vallejo; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission April 25th, 1854, by the district court February 18th, 1857, and appeal dismissed April 1st, 1857.

695. Thomas Shaddon, claimant for 5 square leagues, in Yolo county, granted December 22d, 1844, by Manuel Michelorena to T. Shaddon; claim filed March 2d, 1853. Discontinued.

696, 264, N. D. William Blackburn, claimant for Arastradero, 1 square league, in Santa Cruz county, granted November 17th, 1844, by Manuel Rodriguez to Alberto F. Morris; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission January 23d, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1856.

697, 345, S. D. Julian Workman et al., claimants for Mission of San Gabriel, in Los Angeles county, granted June 8th, 1846, by Pio Pico to J. Workman and Hugo Reid; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission June 26th, 1855, and by the district court April 1st, 1861.

698, 301, S. D. R. S. Den, claimant for San Antonio, 4,000 yards square, in Los Angeles county, granted April 29th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to Nicholas A. Den; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission March 27th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution December 19th, 1856.

699, 400, N. D. Narciso Bennett, claimant for 140 varas square, one solar, in Santa Clara county, granted November 28th, 1845, by Pio Pico to N. Bennett; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission October 23d, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution February 23d, 1857.

700, 317, S. D., 235. Pio Pico et al., claimants for Santa Margarita and Las Flores, in San Diego county, granted May 10th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to Pio Pico and Andres Pico; claim filed March 2d, 1853, and confirmed by the commission April 24th, 1855.

701, 192, N. D. Pedro Chaboya, claimant for 2 square leagues, in Santa Clara county, granted to P. Chaboya; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission October 24th, 1854, and by the district court for failure of prosecution August 29th, 1861.

702, 237, S. D. José and Jaime de Puig Monmany, claimants for Noche Buena, a little less than 1 square league, in Monterey county, granted September 15th, 1835, by José Castro to Juan Antonio Muñoz; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission October 24th, 1854, by the district court February 14th, 1857, and appeal dismissed January 27th, 1858; containing 4,411.56 acres.

703, 191, N. D.; 179 S. D. Modesta Castro, claimant for Cañada de los Osos, 11 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted October 20th, 1844, by Manuel Michelorena to M. Castro; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission August 29th, 1854, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution October 24th, 1855.

704, 173, N. D. Heirs of Francisco de Haro, claimants for 100 varas square, in Mission Dolores, granted June 28th, 1841, by Francisco Guerrero, justice of the peace, to Francisco de Haro; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission September 19th, 1854, and confirmed by the district court February 1st, 1858.

705, 166, N. D. Heirs of Francisco de Haro, claimants for 50 varas square, in Mission Dolores, granted August 16th, 1843, under a marginal decree by Juan B. Alvarado to Francisco de Haro; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission August 29th, 1854, confirmed by the district court August 24th, 1857, and by the U. S. supreme court, 22 Howard [63 U. S.] 293.

706, 383, N. D. William A. Dana et al., claimants for part of San Antonio, 6,102 acres, in Santa Clara county, granted March 24th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Juan Prado Mesa; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission July 10th, 1855, confirmed by the district court March 3d, 1856, and appeal dismissed March 20th, 1857; containing 3,541.89 acres. Patented.

707, 366, N. D. William A. Dana et al., claimants for part of San Antonio, 2,551 acres, in Santa Clara county, granted March 24th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Juan Prado Mesa; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission July 10th, 1855, and by the district court March 23d, 1857.

708, 368, N. D. James W. Weeks, claimant for part of San Antonio, 3,051 acres, in Santa Clara county, granted March 24th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Juan Prado Mesa; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission July 10th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution February 23d, 1857.

709, 354, N. D. Henry C. Curtis, claimant for part of San Antonio, 500 acres, in Santa Clara county, granted March 24th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Juan Prado Mesa; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission July 10th, 1855, and by the district court March 16th, 1857.

710, 378, N. D. William W. White, claimant for part of San Antonio, 100 acres, in Santa Clara county, granted March 24th, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Juan Prado Mesa; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission July 10th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution February 23d, 1857.

711, 193, N. D. Victor Prudon, claimant for Island of Sacramento, 3½ by 1 league, in the Sacramento river, granted July 6th, 1844, by Manuel Michelorena to Victor Prudon; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission October 24th, 1854, and by the district court February 7th, 1858.

712, 357, N. D. Roland Gelston, claimant for 200 by 50 varas, in San Francisco county, granted December 1st, 1838, to William Gulnae; claim filed March 2d, 1853, and rejected by the commission September 4th, 1855.

713, 294, N. D., 102. Juan Alvarez et al., claimants for Laguna Seca, 4 square leagues, in Santa Clara county, granted July 22d, 1834, by José Figueroa to Juan Alvarez; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission March 20th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1856.

714, 382, S. D. City of Monterey, claimant for lands previously assigned to the pueblo, dedication approved by the territorial deputation July 24th, 1830; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission January 22d, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 1st, 1858.

715, 315, N. D. José Y. Limantour, claimant for 80 square leagues, 10 leagues on the Pacific Ocean, between latitude 39° 18' and 39° 48' north, running back eight leagues in Mendocino county, south of Cape Mendocino, granted December 20th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to J. Y. Limantour; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission April 24th, 1855, and appeal dismissed April 28th, 1856.

716, 274, S. D., 351. Thomas Coal, claimant for 250 by 150 varas and 100 varas more, part of Tucho, in Monterey county, granted December 8th, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado, and 400 varas square, in Monterey county, granted February 28th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena, to T. Coal; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission January 23d, 1855, and confirmed by the district court June 6th, 1857.

717, 225, N. D., 200. Salvador Vallejo, claimant for part of Napa or Francas and Jalapa, 3,020 acres, in Napa county, granted September 21st, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvador Vallejo; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission November 7th, 1854, by the district court February 23d, 1857, and appeal dismissed May 13th, 1857; containing 3,178.93 acres.

718, 361, N. D., 485. Mary S. Bennett, claimant for two tracts, one 140 varas square and the other 2,000 by 1,000 varas, in Santa Clara county, near the Mission, granted December, 1845, by Pio Pico to Narciso Bennett; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission July 10th, 1855, by the district court February 28th, 1857, and appeal dismissed April 14th, 1857; containing 358.51 acres.

719, 154, N. D., 256. Joseph Pope et al., claimants of Locoallomi, 2 square leagues, in Napa county, granted September 30th, 1841, by Manuel Jimeno to Julian Pope; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission August 1st, 1854, by the district court August 25th, 1856, and appeal dismissed February 9th, 1858; containing 8,872.79 acres.

720, 122, N. D., 200. Horace Inghram, claimant for part of Napa, 74 acres, in Napa county, granted September 21st, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvador Vallejo; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission April 11th, 1854, and by the district court March 2d, 1857.

721, 146, N. D., 200. James M. Harbin, claimant for part of Napa, 688 acres, in Napa county, granted September 21st, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvador Vallejo; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission May 16th, 1854, and by the district court December 23d, 1857.

722, 111, N. D. 200. Hannah McCoombs, claimant for part of Napa, 160 acres, in Napa county, granted September 21st, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvador Vallejo; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission April 11th, 1854, and by the district court March 2d, 1857.

723, 123, N. D., 200. Hart and McGarry, claimants for part of Napa, 500 acres, in Napa county, granted September 21st, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvador Vallejo; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission April 11th, 1854, by the district court March 2d, 1857.

724, 109, N. D., 200. N. Coombs, claimant for part of Napa, in Napa county, granted September 21st, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvador Vallejo; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission April 11th, 1854, and by the district court April 4th, 1861.

725, 116, N. D., 200. A. Farley, claimant for part of Napa, 44 acres, in Napa county, granted September 21st, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvador Vallejo; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission April 11th, 1854, and by the district court March 2d, 1867.

726, 120, N. D., 200. George N. Cornwell, claimant for part of Napa, in Napa county, granted September 21st, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvador Vallejo; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission April 11th, 1854, and by the district court March 2d, 1857.

727, 118, N. D., 200. John Truebody, claimant for part of Napa, 796 acres, in Napa county, granted September 21st, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvador Vallejo; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission April 11th, 1854, and by the district court March 2d, 1857.

728, 113, N. D., 153. R. S. Kilburn, claimant for part of Entre Napa, granted April 9th, 1836, by Mariano Chico to Nicolas Higuera; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission April 11th, 1854, and by the district court March 30th, 1861.

729, 117, N. D., 200. A. L. Boggs, claimant for part of Napa, 320 acres, in Napa county, granted September 21st, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvador Vallejo; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission April 11th, 1854, and by the district court March 2d, 1857.

730, 110, N. D., 200. J. R. McCoombs, claimant for part of Napa, 487 acres, in Napa county, granted September 21st, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvador Vallejo; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission April 11th, 1854, and by the district court April 18th, 1859.

731, 393, N. D., 200. Ogden Wise, claimant for part of Napa, 625.85 acres, in Napa county, granted September 21st, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvador Vallejo; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission December 4th, 1855, and appeal dismissed August 6th, 1857.

732, 71, N. D., 200. Julius K. Rose, claimant for part of Napa, 526 acres, in Napa county, granted September 21st, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvador Vallejo; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission December 13th, 1853, by the district court October 6th, 1858, and appeal dismissed October 8th, 1858; containing 594.83 acres.

733, 79, N. D., 200. William H. Osborn, claimant for part of Napa, 250 acres, in Napa county, granted September 21st, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvador Vallejo; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission December 13th, 1853, by the district court October 6th, 1858, and appeal dismissed October 8th, 1858; containing 259.61 acres.

734, 66, N. D., 200. Lyman Bartlett, claimant for part of Napa, 1 square mile, in Napa county, granted September 21st, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvador Vallejo; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission

December 13th, 1853, by the district court April 21st, 1856, and appeal dismissed April 2d, 1857; containing 679.52 acres.

735, 313, N. D., 200. Eben Knight, claimant for part of Napa, one-half mile square, in Napa county, granted September 21st, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvador Vallejo; claim filed March 2d, 1853, and rejected by the commission March 27th, 1855.

736, 76, N. D., 200. James McNeil, claimant for part of Napa, 450 acres, in Napa county, granted September 21st, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvador Vallejo; claim filed March 2d, 1853, and confirmed by the commission December 13th, 1853.

737, 139, N. D., 200. Archibald A. Ritchie, claimant for part of Napa, 150 acres, in Napa county, granted September 21st, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvador Vallejo; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission April 25th, 1854, and by the district court March 2d, 1857.

738, 164, S. D. City of San Luis Obispo, claimant for 4 square leagues, claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission August 1st, 1854, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution October 24th, 1855.

739, 327, N. D., 229. Joseph Hooker, claimant for part of Agua Caliente, in Sonoma county, granted July 13th, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to Lazaro Piña; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission April 24th, 1855, by the district court March 2d, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 27th, 1857; containing 550.86 acres.

740, 372, N. D., 208. Benjamin R. Bucklew, claimant for Punta de Quentin, 2 square leagues, in Marin county, granted September 24th, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to Juan B. R. Cooper; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission July 10th, 1855, and by the district court March 30th, 1857.

741, 153, N. D. Mariano G. Vallejo, claimant for Agua Caliente, in Sonoma county, granted July 13th, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to Lazaro Piña; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission August 1st, 1854, and confirmed by the district court July 13th, 1859.

742, 412, N. D. J. W. Redman et al., claimants for Orchard of Santa Clara, 10 acres, granted June 30th, 1846, by Pio Pico to Benito Dias, Juan Castañeda and Luis Arenas; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission December 18th, 1855, and by the district court May 21st, 1858.

743. John A. Sutter, claimant for surplus lands of New Helvetia, 22 square leagues, in Yuba and Sutter counties, granted February 5th, 1845, by Manuel Micheltorena to John A. Sutter; claim filed March 2d, 1853. Discontinued.

744, 142, N. D. Guadalupe Mining Company, claimant for part of Cañada de los Capitancillos, described by boundaries, in Santa Clara county, granted September 1st, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to Justo Larios; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission May 2d, 1854, and by the district court August 17th, 1857. (See No. 340.)

745, 285, N. D., 245. Henry R. Payson, claimant for Cañada de Guadalupe and Visitation y Rodeo Viejo, 2 square leagues, in San Mateo county, granted July 31st, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to Jacob P. Leese; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission January 30th, 1855, by the district court June 18th, 1856, and appeal dismissed April 1st, 1857; containing 9,594.90 acres.

746, 293, N. D. Mowry W. Smith, claimant for part of Las Pulgas, 7,000 acres, in San Mateo county, granted in 1835, by P. V. de Sola and José Castro to Luis Arguello; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission February 20th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1856.

747, 383, S. D. Thomas Russell, claimant for 800 varas square, in Santa Cruz county, granted in 1838, by José R. Estrada, Prefect, to José R. Buelna, and Potrero and Rincon de San Pedro, 500 varas from east to west and 600 varas from north to south, granted in 1842 by José Jimeno to José Arana; claim filed March 2d, 1853, grant of 800 varas rejected and grant by Jimeno confirmed by the commission January 30th, 1855, and by the district court June 18th, 1859.

748. Martin Murphy, Sr., claimant for part of Las Animas, one-eighth of 12 square leagues, in Santa Clara county, granted August 17th, 1802, by Marquina, and August 7th, 1835, by José Figueroa, to Mariano Castro; claim filed March 2d, 1853, and discontinued April 3d, 1855. (See No. 161.)

749, 295, S. D. Talbot H. Green, claimant for land under a grant of the ayuntamiento of the town of Monterey of April 23d, 1846; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission March 27th, 1855, and appeal dismissed December 18th, 1856.

750. William Carey Jones et al., claimants for part of Las Pulgas, in San Mateo county, granted in 1835, by P. V. de Sola to Luis Arguello; claim filed March 2d, 1853, and discontinued August 1st, 1854. (See No. 2.)

751, 414, N. D. Clement Panaud et al., claimants for Garden of San Cayetano, 1,000 by 200 varas, in Santa Clara county, granted August 1845, by Pio Pico to Juan B. Alvarado; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission February 8th, 1855, and by the district court October 2d, 1860.

752, 385, S. D. Clement Panaud et al., claimants for Orchard of San Juan Bautista, 400 varas square, in Monterey county, granted May 4th, 1846, by Pio Pico to Oliver Deleisiguez; claim filed March 2d, 1853, and confirmed by the commission December 18th, 1855.

753, 379, S. D. Adolph Canil et al., claimants for Arias Rancho, 1 square league, in Monterey county, granted December 10th, 1839, by José Castro to Francisco Arias; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission February 27th, 1855, and by the district court June 17th, 1859.

754, 402, N. D. Thomas O. Larkin, claimant for Mission Santa Clara Orchard, 15 acres, in Santa Clara county, granted June 30th, 1846, by Pio Pico to Juan Castañeda, Luis Arenas and Benito Dias; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission December 18th, 1855, and by the district court May 21st, 1858.

755. James Stokes, claimant for La Natividad, 850 acres, in Monterey county, granted by Juan B. Alvarado to Nicolas Alviso and Manuel Butron; claim filed March 2d, 1853. Discontinued.

756. Charles Brown et al., claimants for 4 square leagues, in Napa county, granted in 1834, by Hajar, styled Governor, to C. Brown et al.; claim filed March 2d, 1853. Discontinued.

757, 388, N. D. Nicolas Berreyesa, claimant for Las Milpitas, in Santa Clara county, under a decree signed by Pedro Chaboya, first alcalde of the Ayuntamiento of San José of May 6th, 1834, to N. Berreyesa; claim filed March 2d, 1853, and rejected by the commission October 16th, 1855.

758, 377, S. D. James Stokes, claimant for 3 suertes, in Monterey county, granted January 2d, 1843, by José R. Estrada, prefect of the First district, to José C. Boronda; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission October 2d, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution December 22d, 1856.

759, 369, N. D. John A. Sutter, claimant for town of Sutter, in Sacramento county; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission July 17th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution February 23d, 1857.

760, 333, N. D. Thaddeus M. Leavenworth, claimant for part of Agua Caliente, in Sonoma county, granted July 13th, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to Lazaro Piña; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission April 24th, 1855, by the district court March 2d, 1857, and appeal dismissed April 3d, 1857; containing 320.33 acres.

761, 260, N. D. Robert Hopkins claimant for part of Entre Napa, 80 acres, in Napa county, granted May 9th, 1836, by Mariano Chico to Nicolas Higuera; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission January 30th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1856.

762, 258, N. D. 255. Oliver Boulio, claimant for part of Cabeza de Santa Rosa, 640 acres, in Sonoma county, granted September 30th, 1841, by Manuel Jimeno to Maria Ignacia Lopez; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission January 30th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1856.

763, 169, N. D. 200. John E. Brown, claimant for part of Napa, 110 acres, in Napa county, granted September 21st, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvador Vallejo; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission September 5th, 1854, by the district court March 2d, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 21st, 1857.

764. Charles B. Strode, claimant for part of San Antonio, 5,000 acres, in Alameda county, granted by P. V. de Sola and Luis Antonio Arguello to Luis Peralta; claim filed March 2d, 1853. Discontinued.

765. Charles B. Strode, claimant for part of San Antonio, 10,000 acres in Alameda county, granted by P. V. de Sola and Luis Antonio Arguello to Luis Peralta; claim filed March 2d, 1853. Discontinued.

766, 248, N. D., 39. Victoria D. Estudillo et al., claimants for Tecmeca, .6 square leagues, in San Diego county, granted February 11th, 1835, by José Figueroa to José Antonio Estudillo; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission January 30th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1856.

767, 413, N. D. Francisco Rico et al., claimants for Rancharia del Rio Estanislao, 11 square leagues, in San Joaquin and Calaveras counties, granted December 29th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to Francisco Rico and José Antonio Castro; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission October 16th, 1855, by the district court November 10th, 1856, and appeal dismissed April 1st, 1857; containing 48,886.64 acres.

768, 279, N. D. José Jesus Berreyesa, claimant for Yucuy, 8 square leagues, near Clear Lake, granted May 29th, 1846, by José de los Santos Berreyesa to J. J. Berreyesa; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission March 27th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1856.

769, 293, S. D. 118. Charles Morse et al., claimants for La Laguna de las Calabasas, one and one-fourth by one-half league, in Santa Cruz county, granted December 30th, 1833, by José Figueroa to Felipe Hernandez; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission March 27th, 1855, and confirmed by the district court June 17th, 1855.

770. Martin Murphy, claimant for 300 acres, granted by Manuel Micheltorena to Shelton; claim filed March 2d, 1853, and rejected by the commission March 27th, 1855. Discontinued.

771, 309, N. D. 90. Robert Cathcart, administrator, claimant for Sayente, 2 by 1 league, in Santa Cruz county, granted October, 1833, by José Figueroa to Joaquin Buelna; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission April 17th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 28th, 1856.

772, 385, N. D. A. Randall, claimant for 2 square leagues, in Marin county, granted March 17th, 1836, by Juan B. Alvarado to James Richard Berry; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission September 11th, 1855, by the district court December 23th, 1857, and appeal dismissed May 24th, 1858; containing 8,887.68 acres. Patented.

773, 114, N. D., 200. L. D. Brown et al., claimants for part of Napa, 640 acres, in Napa county, granted September 21st, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvador Vallejo; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission April 11th, 1854, and by the district court March 2d, 1857.

774, 263, N. D. Paula Sanchez de Valencia, claimant for Buri Buri, two-tenths of 4 square leagues, in San Mateo county, granted provisionally by Luis Antonio Arguello December 11th, 1827, and by José Castro September 23d, 1835, to José Sanchez; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission January 30th, 1855, (confirmed in No. 97) and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1856.

775, 325, N. D. C. P. Stone, claimant for part of Agua Caliente, 300 acres, in Sonoma county, granted July 13th, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to Lazaro Piña; claim filed March 2d, 1853, confirmed by the commission April 24th, 1855, by the district court March 2d, 1857, and appeal dismissed March 31st, 1857.

776, 306, N. D. Francis J. White, claimant for 300 acres, in Sacramento county, granted by Juan B. Alvarado to John A. Sutter; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission April 17th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 28th, 1856.

777, 254, N. D. Widow and heirs of Anastasio Chabolla, claimants for 3 suertes, in San José, Santa Clara county, granted in 1785 by authority of the king of Spain to Mazario Laez; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission January 30th, 1855, and claim dismissed by the district court for failure of prosecution January 8th, 1858.

778, 220. Barcella Bernal, claimant for Embarcadero de Santa Clara, 1,000 varas square, in Santa Clara county, granted June 18th, 1845, by Pio Pico to B. Bernal; claim filed March 2d, 1853. Discontinued.

779, 198, N. D. Barcella Bernal, claimant for 1 square league, in Santa Clara county, granted in 1845 or 1846 by the governor of California to B. Bernal et al.; claim filed March 2d, 1853, and rejected by the commission March 6th, 1855.

780, 317, N. D. José Y. Limantour, claimant for Lupyomi, 11 square leagues, granted October 20th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to José Y. Limantour; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission April 24th, 1855, and by the district court March 11th, 1857.

781, 311, S. D. José Y. Limantour, claimant for Laguna de Tacha, 11 square leagues, granted December 4th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to José Y. Limantour; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission April 24th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution December 17th, 1856.

782, 314, S. D. José Y. Limantour, claimant for Cienega del Gabilan, 11 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted October 26th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltorena to Antonio Chavis; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission April 24th, 1855, and confirmed by the district court February 4th, 1858.

783, 321, S. D. José Y. Limantour, claimant for Cajuela, 6 square leagues, in Los Angeles county, granted February 7th, 1845, by Manuel Micheltoarena to José Y. Limantour; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission April 24th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution December 17th, 1856.

784, 307, N. D. José Y. Limantour, claimant for Ojo de Agua, 400 varas square, near the mission of San Francisco Solano, granted December 20th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to José Y. Limantour; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission April 24th, 1855, and by the district court March 11th, 1857.

785, 319, S. D. José María Castañares, claimant for Arroyo de los Calsoncillos, 11 square leagues, in Santa Clara county, granted December 28th, 1843, by Manuel Micheltoarena to J. M. Castañares; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission April 24th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution February 12th, 1857.

786, 310, N. D. Victor Prudon, claimant for Bodega, in Sonoma county, granted July 15th, 1841, by M. G. Vallejo to V. Prudon; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission April 24th, 1855, and by the district court March 17th, 1857.

787, W. W. Warner, claimant for part of Nueva Flandria, 3 leagues square, granted in 1845 on an order of Manuel Micheltoarena by J. A. Sutter to Juan de Swat; claim filed March 2d, 1853, and rejected by the commission March 27th, 1855.

788, 340, N. D. Justo Larios et al., claimants for Campo de los Franceses, granted in 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Guillermo Gulnack; claim filed March 2d, 1853, and rejected by the commission April 24th, 1855.

789, 339, N. D. Agustin Juan, claimant for Campo de los Franceses, granted in 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Guillermo Gulnack; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission April 24th, 1855, and dismissed by claimant March 20th, 1857.

790, 296, S. D. Widow and children of Simeon Castro, claimants for Tucho, 800 varas square, in Monterey county, granted June 12th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to Simeon Castro; claim filed March 3d, 1853, confirmed by the commission March 20th, 1855, and appeal dismissed February 1st, 1858.

791, 112, N. D., 200, H. G. Langley, claimant for part of Napa, in Napa county, granted September 21st 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado to Salvador Vallejo; claim filed March 3d, 1853, confirmed by the commission April 11th, 1854, and by the district court with consent of the U. S. district attorney March 2d, 1857.

792, 266, N. D. Cyrus Alexander, claimant for part of Sotoyomi, 2 square leagues, granted September 23th, 1841, by Juan B. Alvarado to Henry D. Fitch; claim filed March 3d, 1853, rejected by the commission February 8th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1856. (See No. 16.)

793, 303, N. D. Sacramento City, claimant for land; claim filed March 3d, 1853, rejected by the commission April 17th, 1855, and appeal dismissed April 21st, 1856.

794, 247, N. D. Salvador Vallejo, claimant for part of Lupyomi, 2 square leagues, granted September 5th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to S. Vallejo and Juan Antonio Vallejo; claim filed March 3d, 1853, rejected by the commission January 30th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1856. (See No. 507.)

795, 356, N. D. Peter Scherreback, claimant for 800 varas square, in San Francisco county, granted December 5th, 1845, by Mariano Castro to P. Scherreback; claim filed March 3d, 1853, rejected by the commission November 6th, 1855, confirmed by the district court December 5th, 1859, and decree vacated June 2d, 1860.

796, 308, S. D. Eulogio de Celis, claimant for 100 varas square, in San Diego county, granted in 1835 by the ayuntamiento of the town of San Diego to Juan Maria Osuna; claim filed March 3d, 1853, rejected by the commission February 8th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution December 19th, 1856.

797, 336, N. D. William M. Fuller, claimant for part of Soula Julie, one and one-sixteenth square miles, in Marin county, granted March 29th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to José Ramon Mesa; claim filed March 3d, 1853, rejected by the commission April 17th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution February 23d, 1857.

798, 316, N. D. Harriet Besse, claimant for part of Lassen's Rancho, in Tehama county, granted December 26th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltoarena to Peter Lassen; claim filed March 3d, 1853, rejected by the commission April 17th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 28th, 1856.

799, 160, N. D. Charles E. Hart, claimant for part of Los Carneros, in Solano county, granted May 9th, 1836, by Mariano Chico to Nicolas Higuera; claim filed March 3d, 1853, confirmed by the commission August 1st, 1854, and by the district court March 2d, 1857.

800, 256, N. D. James H. Watmough, claimant for part of Petaluma grant, one square mile, in Sonoma county, granted October 22d, 1843, by Manuel Micheltoarena to M. G. Vallejo; claim filed March 3d, 1853, rejected by the commission January 30th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1856.

801, 296, N. D. Reuben M. Hill, claimant for part of Los Carneros, 500 yards square, in Napa county, granted May 9th, 1836, by Mariano Chico to Nicolas Higuera; claim filed March 3d, 1853, rejected by the commission February 27th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1856.

802, 282, N. D. Sarah Ann Madie, claimant for part of Los Carneros, in Napa county, granted May 9th, 1836, by Mariano Chico to Nicolas Higuera; claim filed March 3d, 1853, rejected by the commission February 27th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1856.

803, 365, N. D. Edward Wilson, claimant for part of Los Carneros, in Napa county, granted May 9th, 1836, by Mariano Chico to Nicolas Higuera; claim filed March 3d, 1853, confirmed by the commission June 12th, 1855, and appeal dismissed March 20th, 1857.

804, 267, N. D. John Conn, claimant for Locoollome, 2 square leagues, in Napa county, granted in 1845, by José de los Santos Berreyesa, first alcalde of the district of Sonoma, to John Rainsford; claim filed March 2d, 1853, rejected by the commission February 8th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1856.

805, 334, S. D. José Antonio Aguirre, claimant for one-half of Island Santa Cruz, in Santa Barbara county, granted May 22d, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Andres Castellero, under an alleged sale from Castellero, (see No. 176); claim filed March 3d, 1853, rejected by the commission June 5th, 1855, and dismissed by claimant March 4th, 1858.

806, 187, N. D. José Santos Berreyesa, claimant for 200 by 300 varas, in Sonoma county, granted May 30th, 1846, by Joaquin Carrillo to J. S. Berreyesa; claim filed March 3d, 1853, rejected by the commission October 17th, 1854, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1856.

807, 197, N. D. Milton Little, claimant for 5 square leagues, in Monterey county, granted in 1844 or 1845, by Manuel Micheltorena to Josefa Martinez; claim filed March 3d, 1853, rejected by the commission April 17th, 1855, and by the district court June 1st, 1858. Rejected again on rehearing, July 6th, 1858.

808, 180, S. D. John Foster et al., claimants for mission of San Juan Capistrano, in Los Angeles county, granted December 6th, 1845, by Pio Pico to J. Foster and J. McKinley; claim filed March 3d, 1853, rejected by the commission August 1st, 1854, and appeal dismissed by claimant February 8th, 1858.

809, 158, N. D. R. S. Kilburn, claimant for 1,500 acres, granted to Manuel Baca; claim filed March 3d, 1853, rejected by the commission August 1st, 1854, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1856.

810, 108, N. D. N. Coombs, claimant for part of Entre Napa, in Napa county, granted May 9th, 1836, by Mariano Chico to Nicolas Higuera; claim filed March 3d, 1853, confirmed by the commission April 11th, 1854, and by the district court March 30th, 1861.

811, 251, N. D. W. H. Davis et al., claimants for 200 varas square, in San Francisco county, granted in 1835, by José Castro to José Joaquin Estudillo; claim filed March 3d, 1853, rejected by the commission February 6th, 1855, and appeal dismissed for failure of prosecution April 21st, 1856.

812. James A. Shorb et al., claimants for Arroyo de San Antonio, 3 square leagues, granted October 8th, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Juan Miranda; claim filed March 3d, 1853, and discontinued February 6th, 1855.

813, 428, N. D. Juan M. Luco, claimant for Ulpinos, granted December 4th, 1845, by Pio Pico to José de la Rosa; claim filed September 13th, 1854, by virtue of an act of congress of April 17th, 1854, the two years within which claims might be presented having elapsed, rejected by the commission September 25th, 1855, by the district court June 26th, 1858, and judgment affirmed by the U. S. supreme court, 23 Howard [64 U. S.] 615.

By the law of congress of March 3d, 1851, the commission was to act during three years from the passage of the law, and the claims not presented within two years from the date of the act, were to be considered part of the public domain.

By the law of January 18th, 1854, the time within which the commission was to act, was extended one year more from the third of March, 1854, and by the law of the tenth of January, 1855, the time was again extended one year more from the third of March, 1855. Commission adjourned, March 1st, 1856.

JIMENO INDEX.

As to the importance of the registry of a grant in the Jimeno Index, the United States court in the case of the United States v. West's Heirs, in 22 Howard [63 U. S.] 315, say:

"We do not regard the catalogue of grants as authoritative proof of grants enumerated in it, or as a conclusive exclusion of grants not so registered by Jimeno, which may be alleged to have been made whilst California was a part of the Mexican republic, though they may bear date within the time to which that index relates, but in this case it may be referred to as an auxiliary memorandum made by Jimeno himself of his action upon the petition of West."

No grant presented to the commission seems to correspond to the following numbers:

In the Jimeno Index—Nos. 12, 22, 28, 42, 44, 47, 48, 52, 53, 56, 57, 63, 65, 68, 73, 76, 78, 89, 93, 96, 97, 98, 99, 101, 104, 106, 107, 112, 115, 116, 117, 119, 120, 123, 132, 134, 137, 138, 146, 158, 161, 165, 170, 173, 178, 183, 183, 199, 206, 213, 219, 232, 242, 258, 263, 269, 287, 323, 368, 373, 374, 378, 379, 383, 386, 388, 392, 399, 401, 427, 428 and 429.

Grants refused—Nos. 2, 3, 8, 32, 33, 38, 40, 41, 43, 59, 62, 66, 67, 74, 83, 84, 85, 86, 103.

In the Hartnell Index—Nos. 435, 440, 445, 447, 448, 450, 460, 466, 469, 471, 477, 480, 486, 487, 505, 509, 515, 516, 517, 518, 526, 533, 535, 538, 539, 540, 543, 561, 567, 568, 573, 574 and 576.

Grants appearing to be in Lower California—Nos. 482, 489, 490, 492, 497, 498, 500, 502; 555, 556, 557, 564.

The above grants, in Upper California, are supposed not to have been presented to the commission, but by a more diligent search some of the above numbers might be found to correspond to the grants presented.

*

GOVERNORS OF CALIFORNIA.

[Reprinted from 1 Hoff. Land Cás. 453.]

GASPAR DE PORTALÁ, FROM 1767 TO 1771.

It was under Portalá that the Reverend Father Junipero Serra founded the first missions of Upper California.

Father José Miguel Serra was born on the twenty-fourth of November, 1713, on the island of Majorca. At sixteen he entered the Convent of Jesus, in Palma, the capital of the island. On the fifteenth of September, 1731, he was admitted to holy orders under the name of Father Junipero. On the thirteenth of April, 1749, he sailed from the island with his bosom friend and biographer, Father Francisco Palou, for Mexico. They left Cadiz on the twenty-eighth of August, reached Vera Cruz on the sixth of December, and traveling on foot, Father Junipero arrived at Mexico on the first of January, 1750. From thence he was sent on the Sierra Gorda, among the Pima Indians, where he remained nine years; from thence he traveled over Mexico, preaching the gospel, until the middle of 1767.

The decree of Carlos III, expelling the Jesuits from his dominions, was put in force on the twenty-fifth of June, 1767. As to Lower California, the Viceroy, Marquis de Croix, placed its execution in the hands of the Catalonian captain of dragoons, Gaspar de Portalá, appointing him at the same time governor of the Peninsula, and placing under his command fifty well armed men to expel the Jesuits from the missions by force, if necessary.

Portalá embarked in Matchantel with his forces, and fourteen Franciscan monks to succeed the Jesuits. Being prevented by a storm from reaching Loreto, in Lower California, as ordered by the Viceroy, he landed at San Bernabé towards the latter part of 1767. From San Bernabé, Portalá went to Loreto with twenty-five soldiers and the captain of the Peninsula. In his conversation with the captain, he discovered that no force would be required to expel the sixteen Jesuits. When he reached Loreto, he sent for Father Bonito Ducrue, missionary of Guadalupe and superior of the missions. He communicated his decree to Father Ducrue and two other Jesuits. He found that the captain was right, as the Jesuits respectfully submitted to the order, and left California on the third of February, 1768, on the Concepcion, bound for San Blas.

After the expulsion of the Jesuits, the viceroy, with the concurrence of the inspector general of the kingdom, Don José de Galvez, decided to place the missions of Lower California under the care of the college of San Fernando, in Mexico. For that purpose they required twelve priests of the college, and Father Junipero was appointed president of these missionaries. On the fourteenth of July, 1767, they left Mexico for San Blas. On the twenty-first of August they reached Tepic, where four other priests were taken. Whilst they were awaiting there the construction of the vessels which were to carry them, the Concepcion arrived at San Blas with the Jesuits, and they sailed on that vessel on the twelfth of March, 1768. They arrived at Loreto on the first of April; the next day each one went to the mission assigned him, Father Junipero taking care of the mission of Loreto.

Galvez having been invested with powers to visit the missions of Lower California, and having a royal order to send an expedition by sea to settle the port of Monterey, in Upper California, or at least that of San Diego, he sailed from San Blas on the twenty-fourth of May, 1768, and reached the Peninsula on the sixth of June.

In order to better carry out the intentions of his majesty, Galvez made up his mind that, besides the expedition by sea, he would send another by land. He communicated this idea to Father Junipero, who agreed with him. They decided that three vessels should sail to meet the expedition by land at San Diego; that three missionaries should leave on the first two, and another on the vessel to start subsequently. They agreed that three missions should be founded: one at San Diego, another at Monterey, and a third at San Buenaventura, midway between the two first.

On the ninth of January, 1769, the San Carlos left La Paz with the members of the expedition, among whom was Pedro Fajes, who became governor of Upper California, in 1782, and had under his command twenty-five Catalonian volunteers. The San Antonio left San Lucas on the eleventh, and the Señor San José left Loreto on the sixteenth of June of the same year.

Galvez divided the expedition by land in two parts. Portalá was appointed commander-in-chief of the expedition, and Captain Fernando Rivera y Moncada, his second in command, was to take charge of the first division.

The first division arrived at San Diego on the fourteenth of May, 1769, after fifty-two days travel from Loreto. The second division, under the charge of Portalá, with whom was Father Junipero, arrived on the first of July, after forty-six days travel. They found in port the San Antonio, which had arrived on the eleventh of April, and the San Carlos, which reached San Diego twenty days after. The Señor San José not having been heard from, it was presumed that it was wrecked.

On account of the loss of life among the crews of the vessels, it was agreed that the expedition by sea should join the one by land, and the San Antonio was ordered to San Blas for additional crew and more supplies for the two vessels. The San Carlos remained at anchor to await the arrival of the San Antonio, when both were to sail for Monterey.

On the sixteenth of July, 1769, Father Junipero founded the Mission of San Diego, at the port of that name, which in 1603 had been discovered by Admiral Sebastian Vizcaino, who in the same year discovered the port of Monterey.

Portalá, Fajes Moncada, and seventy-three others left San Diego by land on the fourteenth of July, 1769, to seek out the port of Monterey; they, however, returned on the twenty-fourth of January, 1770, after having gone as far north as San Francisco without finding the above named port.

The San Antonio left San Blas direct for Monterey. Fortunately, the loss of her anchor in the neighborhood of Santa Barbara compelled her to put back for San Diego to get an anchor from the San Carlos. This vessel being loaded with supplies and having an additional crew, it was resolved that a new expedition, by land and sea, should start for Monterey. Father Junipero sailed on the San Antonio on the sixteenth of April, 1770, and Portalá started by land the next day. The San Antonio reached Monterey on the thirty-first of May, 1770. The expedition by land had already arrived there on the twenty-fourth. On the third of June, the ceremony of taking possession of the port was performed, and on that day the Mission of San Carlos was founded. The dates of the foundation of the other missions are to be found at No. 609 in the annexed table of land claims presented to the land commission.

Whilst gathering the foregoing facts from the life of Father Junipero by Father Francisco Palou, where they are related with such pious simplicity, we involuntarily feel a desire to pay a just tribute to those holy men whose sole object was to Christianize the Indians of the Californias. It was neither gold nor honors which drew them to encounter the dangers and hardships we find described in those interesting pages, and which breathe the true fervor of the servants of the Lord; but they were true apostles, devoting their evangelical lives in teaching the simple doctrines of their faith, and the trades and occupations of civilized communities.

Father Palou tells us that on the fifteenth of August, 1769, at San Diego, one month after the founding of the mission, Father Junipero and his party were attacked by a large number of Indians, and they were driven away only after the loss of a boy. A few days after the attack, the Indians appearing to be more friendly, Father Junipero attempted to baptize a child for the first time. Whilst completing the ceremony by pouring water on the child out of a shell, the Indians snatched away the child, leaving the confused father with the shell in his hands. It required all his prudence to prevent the soldiers from avenging the insult. The grief experienced by the father was so great that he could not get over it for several days, and he attributed his ill success to his own sins. Many years after, whilst stating this circumstance, his eyes would be filled with tears, but as he could then count 1046 christianized Indians in that mission, he would exclaim: "But let us thank God, that without the least opposition, we have accomplished so much."

On the fourth of November, 1775, the Indians again attacked that mission, reduced it to ashes, cruelly massacred Father Luis Jaime, and killed several other persons. In August, 1781, the Yumas set fire to the two missions on the Colorado river, killed four priests, eight soldiers and Captain Fernando Rivera y Moncada.

These were some of the dangers encountered by these devout men; but nothing can better show the meekness and humility of Father Junipero than the following anecdote told us by Father Palou. After landing, in December, 1749, in Vera Cruz, he traveled on foot to Mexico; the journey caused his feet to swell considerably. One night, in his sleep, he scratched one of them to such an extent, that when he awoke he had made such a severe wound that he never got over it through life. Immediately preceding Galvez's arrival, and to meet him, he had walked nine hundred miles, and as in all his travels he never wore either socks, boots or shoes but simply sandals; one evening when he arrived at San Juan de Dios, in Lower California, on his way to San Diego, his wound became such that he could not go any further. Portalá, seeing his condition, ordered his men to prepare a litter to carry him. Father Junipero was so deeply affected at the idea of giving so much trouble to the men, that placing his faith in God, he called to him Juan Antonio Coronel, the arriero. "My son," said he, "could you not prepare something to relieve my foot and leg?" "Why, father," answered Coronel, "what can I know; am I a doctor? I am only an arriero, and all that I have cured are the wounds of beasts." "Well, my son," said the holy man, "only consider that I am a beast, and that this wound is nothing but a beast's wound, which has caused the swelling of the leg and those pains which even keep me from sleeping, and prepare me the same thing you would apply to a beast." The arriero smiling, with all the assistants, said, "I will do it, father, to please you." He took some tallow and gathered a few herbs; he crushed and mixed them well with two stones, and after stewing the mixture he applied it. With the help of God, as Father Junipero writes to Father Palou when he arrived at San Diego, he slept all that night till morning. He was so relieved that he said his morning prayers as customary, and celebrated mass as if nothing had happened, and the expedition kept on without losing an instant.

In July, 1784, Father Palou, who was then in San Francisco, having received a letter from Father Junipero requesting his presence in Monterey, he reached that place on the eighteenth of August, and found Father Junipero afflicted with the disease which was to terminate his Christian career. On the twenty-eighth, a little before ten in the evening, Father Junipero, in his room, was still able to walk to the boards covered with a blanket, on which he rested; and after reclining on them with the holy cross near by, so softly did his soul depart that his faithful companion thought it was nothing but a quiet slumber. Father Junipero was in his seventy-first year when he died. In the fifteen years of his life in Upper California, five Spanish and nine christianized Indian settlements had been made, and 5,800 Indians had been baptized.

The following particulars are drawn from the Spanish archives of the state of California: On the twelfth of November, 1770, the Viceroy Marquis de Croix writes to Pedro Fajes, commander of the presidio at Monterey, directing him to make a settlement at the port of San Francisco.

FELIPE BARRI, FROM 1771 TO 1774.

The first mention we find of Barri as governor is in a letter he addresses in that capacity from Loreto to Pedro Fajes, commander of the presidio of Monterey, dated the second of June, 1771. On the seventh of September, 1773, Pedro Fajes was succeeded in the command of the presidio of San Diego and Monterey by Fernando Rivera y Moncada, under an order of the Viceroy Bucarely.

FELIPE DE NEVE, FROM 1774 TO 1782.

On the twenty-eighth of December, 1774, Governor Barri is succeeded by F. de Neve. On the twentieth of July, 1776, Governor Neve is ordered by the Viceroy to remove from Loreto to the presidio of Monterey; he arrived there on the third of February, 1777. Moncada is then transferred as lieutenant of Neve at Loreto, or at whatever place the presidial might be located.

NOTES

CONCERNING

THE UNITED STATES CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT COURT REPORTS.

ABBOTT'S ADMIRALTY REPORTS.

[Abb. Adm.]

Reports of cases in admiralty in the district court, S. D. N. Y., before Judge Betts, from 1847 to 1850. By Abbott Bros., counselors at law. Boston: Little, Brown & Co., 1857.

Vol. 1 (so entitled, though no other volume was ever published) contains the following preface:

The present volume contains a full selection of the decisions in admiralty causes rendered in the United States district court for the Southern district of New York, by the Hon. Samuel R. Betts, from the early part of the year 1847 down to the close of 1850. It may be regarded as a continuation of the series of Admiralty Reports commenced by Blatchford & Howland, and continued by Olcott. The present editors have spared no pains in the effort to perform the duty which has devolved upon them; and they have enjoyed every facility which could be desired, both from the eminent judge whose decisions are reported, and from those gentlemen in whose immediate charge are the books and papers of the district court. In the hope that it may be of service, not only to their professional brethren practicing in this district, but also to those who may labor in other fields of professional life, the volume is now submitted to the bar.

ABBOTT'S UNITED STATES REPORTS.

[Abb. U. S.]

Reports of decisions rendered in the circuit and district courts from 1865 to 1871. Selected from all the circuits and districts by Benjamin Vaughan Abbott. Two volumes. New York: Diossy & Co. Vol. 1, 1870; vol. 2, 1871.

The following preface is from vol. 1:

To present the adjudications of the United States circuit and district courts, in a comprehensive and satisfactory manner, is the general purpose of this series. The progress of our national jurisprudence is embodied in the laws passed by congress, the decisions of the supreme court, and those decisions of circuit or district courts which are not reviewed on writ or error or appeal; in addition to which should be mentioned the determinations of the court of claims, as covering one important, though limited, department. Systematic and satisfactory arrangements now exist (relying partly upon government aid) for the prompt publication of the acts of congress, and for regular reports of the adjudications of the supreme court and of the court of claims. If the system of reporting the important decisions of the circuit and district courts can be made comprehensive and reliable, there will then be in operation a complete scheme, presenting the progress of the entire jurisprudence developed under the operation of the national government. To some extent the decisions of the circuit and district courts are now reported. There is, for the first circuit, a special series of circuit court reports, almost unbroken; and for the second, another, nearly, though not quite, as continuous. In some other circuits there are valuable reports covering limited periods. But there remain some circuits which are almost wholly unreported, and, as respects the district courts, there has not been anything like a systematic method of selecting and reporting what is valuable in their decisions. So far as it is practicable for reports within a particular circuit to be maintained, the cases which they may include ought not to be duplicated in these volumes; but the endeavor of this series will be to collect from the circuit and district courts at large, wherever local reports are not supported, those decisions which have general value and importance, and to report them in the best and most satisfactory manner, to the end that the current volumes of the Supreme Court Reports and of this series may give, from time to time, a good view of the course of decision in the national courts. The selection of cases to be reported in these volumes, must be chiefly controlled by the consideration of their value and utility to the practicing lawyer. There is a tendency towards the unnecessary multiplication of reports, to which, it is hoped, this enterprise will not be found to yield. The volumes will be devoted to decisions of general application and value, exhibiting the advance and progress of the national jurisprudence, the construction and application of the United States laws, the procedure of the United States tribunals, and similar subjects; and, as far as practicable, cases of only local application, decisions which only resolve controverted questions of fact peculiar to the particular controversy, or repeat and apply familiar principles of law, together with decisions which there is reason to anticipate will be carried before the supreme court for review, or will be seasonably reported in standard reports to which the bar would naturally turn for them, will be excluded.

BALDWIN'S REPORTS.

[Baldw.]

Reports of cases determined in the circuit court, Third circuit, from 1827 to 1833, by Hon. Henry Baldwin, circuit justice, one of the judges of the court. One volume. Philadelphia: James Kay, Jr., & Bro., 1837.

The following dedication to Judge Hopkinson will be found on page iii:

I should do great injustice to my feelings, in submitting this volume to the profession, without testifying to them my sense of obligation to you, who have contributed so much to make its contents worthy of their approbation, not only by the opinions delivered by yourself, but in others, in which it has been left to me to give the result of our mutual labor and concurring judgment. When we became associated in our judicial duties, we had an arduous task before us, the high character of the bar of the circuit court, and the nature of the causes depending therein, were in themselves just cause for apprehension; but there was still greater reason to be appalled, when we consider the reputation which that court had acquired and sustained for thirty years, under the administration of that eminent and most beloved judge who preceded me. The highest call was made on you, to bring into active requisition all the powers of your acute, discriminating mind, your cogent reasoning and sound judgment, as well as the large fund of legal information, acquired during a long and active course of professional experience, in the development and application of the great principle of federal and state jurisprudence. If a more imperious call could be made on any one, it was on me to exert every faculty in a way more appropriate to your junior in years and practice; by a patient and laborious examination of the adjudged cases, and the analogies of the law, to so apply the test of precedents to principles, that while we followed the former, the latter should not be violated. If this volume does not suffice to show that we have obeyed these calls by the execution of every talent at our command, and the just expectations of the public have been disappointed, we must submit to their opinion; having done our best, we are spared the pain of our self-reproach. But if we have in some degree adjudicated the cases before us as to have given reasonable satisfaction, or measurably preserved the character of the court, it has been by a singleness of object, its steady pursuit, and a happy union of opinion in our several judgment on the points adjudged, as well as in the illustrations and analogies on which our decisions were founded. It has been to me a subject of pride and pleasure, that the cases in which we have been unable to agree in opinion, are fewer in number than the years of our judicial association; that when they have occurred it has been a subject of mutual regret, and each has been desirous of yielding to the other. When we were colleagues in another department of the government, we came in collision with less regret, owing perhaps to one stimulus, which neither of us now feel, or suffer to have any influence on our minds. The pride of victory is a strong incentive in political debate, in which none can engage without feeling its impulse; but however it may have operated on us during a discussion, it ended with it, and we always parted with the same mutual sentiment as we have since done after a judicial conference, when each felt compelled to adhere to his opinion, more diffidence of himself, and respect for the other. While these are the relations between us, others will appreciate the reasons why I dedicate this book to you.

BANNING AND ARDEN'S PATENT CASES.

[Ban. & A.]

Reports of patent causes decided in the circuit courts from Jan. 1, 1874, to 1880, and reprinting many cases from Blatchford's Reports. By Hubert A. Banning and Henry Arden, counselors at law. Five volumes. New York: L. K. Strouse & Co. Vol. 1, 1881; vols. 2, 3, and 4, 1882; vol. 5, 1883.

The following preface is from vol. 1:

These Reports will contain the decisions of the circuit courts of the United States in patent cases, from January 1, 1874, the date to which such decisions are reported in Fisher's Patent Cases. When the cases are reported to date, volumes will thereafter be published, whenever a sufficient number of opinions can be collected and prepared. After careful consideration, and upon the advice of some of the judges, we have omitted, except in a few cases, the insertion of preliminary statements and diagrams. The opinions, in almost all cases, fully explain the nature of the questions and the mechanical features of the inventions involved in the controversies. We are under great obligations to the judges for their assistance and co-operation, without which the undertaking would have been impracticable. We especially acknowledge our indebtedness to Judge Blatchford, who has permitted us to insert those cases, decided in the Second circuit, which appear in Blatchford's Circuit Court Reports, as therein reported by him. Judge Sawyer has accorded us like permission to use the cases decided in the Ninth circuit, which are reported in Sawyer's Reports, and for which we are indebted to him.

BEE'S ADMIRALTY REPORTS.

[Bee.]

Reports of cases in the district court, D. S. C., from 1792 to 1809, by Hon. Thomas Bee, judge of the court. The appendix contains Judge Hopkinson's decisions in the admiralty court of Pennsylvania from 1779 to 1788, and a case from the district court, D. Mass., decided in 1809. The book also contains opinions of Justices Marshall and Johnson in two cases on appeal from Judge Bee's decision, and Marshall's speech in congress in the case of Nash alias Robins, who was extradited by England for murder. One volume. Philadelphia: William P. Farrand & Co., 1810.

The following preface will be found on page iii:

These decisions are published at the suggestion of many members of the Charleston bar, and in the hope that they may afford some aid to the profession in general, and some direction to merchants, captains of ships, and mariners, whose interests constitute the chief subject of them. It is presumed they have been in most instances, satisfactory, for in every case of appeal, except one, they have been confirmed. It was the intention and wish of the judge to revise them before publication; but he was prevented from doing so by a very long and serious illness. The candour of the profession will make due allowance for this very material circumstance. Judge Davis's decree in the district court of Massachusetts is here republished, not only on account of its intrinsic excellence, but because it gives weight to a similar decision by Judge Bee; the circuit court of Pennsylvania having given a different determination, it is desirable that the question should be finally settled by the supreme judicature of the United States.

BENEDICT'S DISTRICT COURT REPORTS.

[Ben.]

Reports of cases in district courts of the Second circuit from 1865 to 1879. Ten volumes. New York: Baker, Voorhis & Co. The volumes appeared at intervals from 1869 until 1882. Vols. 1-6 are by Robert D. Benedict, Esq. Vols. 7-10, by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and B. Lincoln Benedict, Esq.

The following note is from vol. 10, p. iii:

The cases reported in this volume are selected from the many in which opinions were handed down in the district courts of the United States within the Second circuit, between July, 1878, and January, 1880, when the publication of the Federal Reporter began. The field of these Reports is so nearly covered by the Reporter that it seems at present unadvisable to continue them. The author begs to return thanks to the members of the profession generally, and to the admiralty bar in particular, for the favor shown to the work in its previous volumes, and to announce that the present and 10th volume closes the series of Benedict's Reports.

BISSELL'S REPORTS.

[Biss.]

Cases in the circuit and district courts for the Seventh circuit from 1851 to 1883, by Josiah H. Bissell, of the Chicago bar. Eleven volumes. Chicago: Callaghan & Co. Vols. 1 and 2 appeared in 1873, and the others at intervals until 1883, when vol. 11 was published.

The following preface is from vol. 1:

This volume, the work of the early and late hours of a practicing lawyer, is the first of a series which is designed to include the leading decisions of the United States circuit and district courts for the Seventh judicial circuit since the time of McLean's Reports, and to form with them a continuous and harmonious series. The opinions after passing through the reporter's hands have been revised by the respective judges. Not originally designed for publication, and in many cases laid aside as soon as the interest of a nisi prius case had passed away, the difficulties of properly preparing them and the necessary statements of facts have been greater than any one could have expected,—far greater than the reporter imagined when he undertook this task. The reporters of the state courts are furnished with printed records, statements of facts and briefs, and opinions prepared with reference to publication,—an advantage which no one can appreciate until he has collated loose manuscript, slips of newspapers, old law periodicals, resurrected briefs and memoranda, and dusty court files. Where facts and figures have slipped from the memory of court, counsel and litigants, it is extremely difficult to prepare and present the principles in a manner satisfactory to the profession or author; nor is it possible to do full justice to the judges whose opinions are thus presented to the public. That since the death of the late Judge McLean, whose valuable series of reports bears his name, there should have been no regular reports of the decisions in this circuit, comprising three large and rapidly growing states, before whose tribunals are continually arising cases involving important questions and large commercial and landed interests, has long been a surprise and regret to the members of the profession. Encouraged by many of his professional brethren to collect and arrange these decisions, the reporter only hopes that if some of the cases may appear incomplete, they will remember the circumstances under which this series has been undertaken and prepared. A number of cases here reported have been carried to the supreme court, as will appear by the notes added thereto; but the opinions below are published here, either as containing a fuller discussion of the principles involved, or because the case was decided in the upper court on some point of practice, or question not considered below. In some cases where the decision below is affirmed without discussion of principles or authorities, the opinion of the circuit or district judge acquires, so to speak, the authority of a supreme court decision. By no means all the opinions which have come to the hands of the reporter are published in this series. During the period covered by the present volume, many questions of great interest and importance at the time have become dead issues, and the value of many decisions as contributions to the permanent body of judicial decision has passed away. Many able, elaborate, and well reasoned decisions on questions connected with the fugitive slave law, special state statutes, and the varied and exciting questions arising out of the late civil war have been laid aside, even though some of them were both interesting in themselves and by reason of the circumstances under which they were delivered, and formed, perhaps, a legitimate portion of the judicial history of the Northwest. The executors of the late lamented Judge McLean, associate justice of the supreme court of the United States, have kindly furnished to the reporter all his unpublished manuscript, and many of his opinions will be found in this volume. The opinions of the late Judge McDonald, of Indiana, have also been delivered to the reporter to be incorporated into this series, where they naturally belong. They will form a large part of the third volume. After the materials had been collected, and the work of revising and arranging commenced, the whole narrowly escaped destruction in the great Chicago fire, and the entire destruction of all the law libraries, both public and private, necessitated a long delay,—it being indispensable that the numerous authorities cited by court and counsel be verified and compared. The second volume is now in the printer's hands, and the third and fourth will follow as rapidly as is consistent with accuracy. To the respective judges, the clerks of the several courts, to the Honorable S. S. Fisher, late United States patent commissioner, and to many lawyers in this and other cities, the reporter is under obligations for opinions and information. It is hoped that the notes added to many of the cases will be found convenient to the practicing lawyer, and if the series shall meet the approval of his professional brethren, the reporter will feel that his labors of love have been amply rewarded, and that he has discharged some portion of that duty which, according to Lord Bacon, every man owes to his profession.

The following preface is from vol. 4:

Since the commencement of the publication of this series of Reports, a large number of opinions by the different judges within the circuit have come to the reporter's hands after the publication of the volumes to which they respectively belonged. These opinions are of such interest and value that the series would be essentially incomplete were they not to appear, even though their publication necessarily involves a break in the continuity of the series. The reporter has, therefore, after a careful examination of these opinions, selected such as he deemed most valuable, and now presents them in their chronological order, with such notes and references to subsequent decisions as will, he trusts, make them more practically useful to the profession, and present, even in the older cases, the present state of the law applicable to the questions involved. The opinions of the late Hon. David McDonald of Indiana, were furnished by his executors, and revised by him for publication shortly before his decease. Those of the other judges have, in every case, been revised by the respective judges. For the notes, the reporter alone is responsible.

BLATCHFORD'S CIRCUIT COURT REPORTS.

[Blatchf.]

Reports of cases in the circuit courts for the Second circuit from 1845 to 1887, by Samuel Blatchford, Esq. Twenty-four volumes. Vol. 1, Auburn: Derby & Miller, 1852. Vol. 2, New York: John S. Voorhies, 1859. All the other volumes are published by Baker, Voorhies & Co., New York, at intervals from 1868 until 1888. Vols. 1-3 were published before the author's elevation to the bench, vols. 4-13 while United States district judge for the Southern district of New York, vols. 14-18 while United States circuit judge for the Second circuit, and vols. 19-24 while associate justice of the United States supreme court assigned to the Second circuit.

The following preface is from vol. 1:

Since the accession of Mr. Justice Nelson to the bench of the supreme court of the United States in March, 1845, a desire has been very generally expressed by the profession, that his decisions as a judge of the circuit courts within the Second circuit, embracing the two districts of New York and those of Vermont and Connecticut, should be collected in a permanent form. Those decisions comprise cases both at law and in equity, and questions of constitutional, commercial, revenue, and admiralty law, of patents, of copyright, and other important subjects. The high reputation of Judge Nelson, and the fame earned by him during a judicial career, now of twenty-nine years duration, for fourteen of which he occupied a seat upon the bench of the supreme court of New York, and for nine of which he was chief justice of that court, and the fact that in only two reported cases, that of Lawrence v. Allen, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 785, and that of Williamson v. Berry, 8 How. [49 U. S.] 495, have his decisions in the court below failed to secure the approbation of a majority of the supreme court, have been to the reporter a sure guarantee that it required nothing but the presentation in a proper form of the cases contained in this volume to ensure for them the approbation of the profession. In this view, the preparation of the volume was undertaken in the summer of 1850, but its completion has been delayed till now by other engagements. The reporter has in his possession sufficient materials to enable him, with the addition of decisions that will probably be made during the ensuing year, to publish another volume at the expiration of about that time. Whether he will do so or not, will of course depend upon the wishes of his brethren of the profession, whose indulgence is asked for this his first effort as a reporter. It is proper to say that the opinions in this volume were nearly all of them written without any view to their publication, and that the entire manuscript has had the benefit of the revision and approbation of Judge Nelson. The title of Circuit Court Reports is adopted for these Reports, to prevent their being confounded in citation with Blackford's Indiana Reports.

BLATCHFORD'S PRIZE CASES.

[Blatchf. Prize Cas.]

Reports of cases in prize in the circuit and district courts for the Southern district of New York from 1861 to 1865. By Samuel Blatchford. One volume. New York: Baker, Voorhies & Co., 1866.

This volume contains the decisions of Justice Nelson and Judge Betts in prize cases. The following is the preface:

The compilation of the cases contained in this volume was undertaken at the request of the department of state of the United States. The cases reported are all the prize suits decided in the circuit and district courts of the United States for the Southern district of New York during the Rebellion, with, perhaps, the exception of a very few cases in which decrees were entered without any opinion or memorandum of decision having been filed by the court. For the information of those who are not acquainted with the constitution of the courts of the United States, it may be well to say that the district court is held by the district judge, and that the circuit court is, as a general rule, held by the justice of the supreme court of the United States, who is assigned to the circuit embracing the court, and the district judge of the district, sitting jointly, or by either of them sitting alone. But it is provided by law that, in all cases which are removed by appeal or writ of error from a district to a circuit court, judgment shall be rendered in conformity to the opinion of the judge of the supreme court presiding in the circuit court. Practically, therefore, the justice of the supreme court always sits alone in hearing cases removed by appeal or writ of error from the district to the circuit court. Down to the 3d of March, 1863, appeals from decrees made by the district court in prize cases were taken to the circuit court in like manner as appeals to the circuit court from decrees made by the district court in other cases. But by the seventh section of the act of congress approved March 3, 1863, entitled "An act further to regulate proceedings in prize cases, and to amend various acts of congress in relation thereto" (12 Stat. 760), it was provided that appeals from the district courts of the United States in prize cases should be directly to the supreme court. This provision was re-enacted by the thirteenth section of the act of congress approved June 30, 1864, entitled "An act to regulate prize proceedings and the distribution of prize money, and for other purposes" (13 Stat. 310), and is still in force. Therefore after the 3d of March, 1863, no appeals in prize cases were taken from the district to the circuit court.

BLATCHFORD AND HOWLAND'S REPORTS.

[Blatchf. & H.]

Reports of admiralty cases decided by Judge Betts in the district court, S. D. N. Y., from 1827 to 1837. By Samuel Blatchford and Francis Howland, counselors at law. One volume. A second volume was in contemplation, but was never published. New York: Jacob R. Halstead, 1855.

The following preface will be found on page iii:

It has long been a source of regret among the members of the legal profession, that there were no reports of cases, particularly of admiralty cases, adjudged in the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York, other than such as were to be found scattered here and there in legal periodicals. The variety and importance of the cases decided in that court, within whose jurisdiction is found the chief commercial city of the Union, and the long experience and high juridical attainments of the distinguished judge who, for nearly thirty years, has presided there, have seemed to warrant the preparation of formal reports of some of the cases determined in that court. The present volume embraces a selection of cases in admiralty, fifty-three in number, running through a period of nearly ten years. It is intended to publish other volumes containing cases down to the present time. There is an apparent anachronism in citing the laws of the United States from Little & Brown's edition of the United States Statutes at Large. But this has been done, because that edition is a standard publication recognised by act of congress, and has superseded, in most libraries, all earlier editions. In some instances, too, the rules of court referred to are cited by their numbers in the rules now in force, as those in force at the dates of the decisions are entirely out of print, and the same rules differ in their numbers in the two sets of rules.

BOND'S REPORTS.

[Bond.]

Reports of cases in the circuit and district courts for the Southern district of Ohio from 1856 to 1871. By Lewis H. Bond, counselor at law. Two volumes. Cincinnati: Robert Clark & Co., 1872.

The following preface is from vol. 1:

The liberal encouragement proffered by a number of his professional brethren, in advance of the publication of these volumes, and the assurance of the co-operation of the learned judge whose decisions are herein presented, induced the reporter cheerfully to enter upon the labor of preparing them for the press. The six volumes of Judge McLean's Reports include the period dating from his appointment to the bench of the supreme court, in 1829, to the year 1855. Since the last-named year, with the exception of decisions occasionally appearing in law periodicals and newspapers, there have been no reports of cases in the courts for the Southern district of Ohio. It occurred to the reporter that it could not be otherwise than acceptable to the profession to present, in an enduring form, a portion of the numerous cases before Judge Leavitt from 1855 to the spring of 1871, when he retired from the bench, after his long judicial service. And in this view, the reporter is gratified in knowing he had the cordial concurrence of many prominent members of the bar with whom he conferred. After the division of the state of Ohio, in 1855, into two judicial districts, and the establishment of the courts for the Southern district at Cincinnati, there was a rapid increase of business in both tribunals. For a few years prior to the death of Judge McLean, in the spring of 1861, his duties in the supreme court, and his failing health, prevented his regular attendance at the terms of the circuit court. After the appointment of Justice Swayne to the supreme court, in 1862, his necessary attendance at its protracted terms, and his duties in other districts of his extended circuit, rendered it impossible for him to give any considerable portion of his time to the court at Cincinnati. As a result of these causes, the labor and responsibility of presiding in the circuit court were imposed by law on the district judge. In addition to his labors there, it was his duty to hear and decide cases in the district court, and after the adoption of the internal revenue system of the United States they were exceedingly numerous, and frequently involved new and difficult questions. The enactment of the bankrupt act of 1867 greatly increased the previous heavy pressure upon the district judge. This brief reference is made, preliminary to the statement that it was a physical impossibility for the court to prepare extended written opinions in all the cases before it, which are reported in these volumes. It was deemed expedient that these Reports should not exceed two volumes. The cases reported comprise but a small portion of the whole number decided by Judge Leavitt. The reporter has exercised his best judgment in selecting the cases for publication. His aim has been to include only such as might be of some interest to the profession. He has purposely omitted all the cases arising under the fugitive slave act. The abolishment of slavery, and the certainty that it could never again have an existence in this country, rendered the report of such cases altogether superfluous. And for a reason kindred to this, the numerous exciting cases growing out of and connected with the late civil war, with one or two exceptions, do not appear in these volumes. That was an abnormal condition of the country, never, as we may hope, to return again. Some of these cases created at the time a highly excited state of public feeling; but as the exigencies which gave rise to them have passed away, it is deemed expedient not to report them.

With the consent and approval of the Honorable S. S. Fisher, the learned and laborious reporter of four valuable volumes of Patent Cases, the reporter of the present volumes has reproduced the decisions of Judge Leavitt, as reported by Mr. Fisher. If any apology for this were needed, it will be found in the fact that the edition published by him was very limited, and that the work is in the possession of only a small number of the profession.

BROCKENBROUGH'S REPORTS.

[Brock.]

Sometimes cited as MARSHALL'S DECISIONS.

Reports of cases decided by Chief Justice Marshall in the circuit courts for the Fourth circuit from 1802 to 1833. By John W. Brockenbrough, counselor at law. Two volumes. Philadelphia: James Kay, Jr., & Bro.; Pittsburg: John I. Kay & Co., 1837.

The following preface is from vol. 1:

In presenting the following volumes to the members of the bench and bar of the United States, the editor deems it but an act of simple justice to himself, to state that the task of editing them, in a suitable manner, was beset with many and unusual difficulties: so formidable, indeed, were these difficulties deemed by some, whose opinions had every claim to a respectful consideration, that it was confidently predicted that the attempt would finally be abandoned in despair. Where the reporter has the advantage of hearing the arguments of counsel in a cause, it is, comparatively, an easy task to present a report of it exact, full, and, in all respects, satisfactory. The record, containing all the evidence and pleadings in the cause, and from which he is to prepare his statement, is before him: the authorities which bear upon the points, arising in it, are all collected by the researches of counsel: and while the arguments at the bar, and the views of the court are yet fresh in his recollection, he retires to his closet, and with these ample materials before him, he is enabled, with little labour, to prepare a report, which, with entire confidence, he sends forth to the world, to encounter, and to challenge the enlightened and searching criticism of the profession. To the editor, in the present instance, however, all these important aids were denied. By far the greater portion of the opinions, published in these volumes, came to his hands many years after they were delivered from the bench. No notes of the arguments were preserved by the late chief justice, in a single instance; and where the necessity of presenting a full statement of the material facts in a cause, was not dispensed with by its being incorporated in the opinion itself, no alternative remained, but to publish the bare opinion of the court, unaccompanied by the facts, essential to its elucidation, or, by patient and laborious investigation of the papers in the cause, which were, for the most part, extremely voluminous, to extract from them, a narrative of the facts, which constituted the basis of the opinion. To have taken the course first indicated, would have been an act of inexcusable injustice to the character of the eminent individual who had pronounced the opinions, to the profession, and to the editor himself. In such a state of things, it was impossible not to yield to the considerations which so sternly demanded, at the hands of the editor, the dedication of his time and labour, to the important work which he had undertaken: and the course which these considerations required, was adopted, without hesitation, and has been persevered in, without faltering, for years. The editor trusts, that these remarks will not be imputed to an unmanly wish, to exaggerate the labours and the obstacles he has encountered, or with any view to disarm the criticism of the learned profession, to whom they are addressed. The task, such as it was, was voluntarily assumed; and full well he knows, that it would be worse than idle to invoke the indulgence of those, by whose judgment the work now offered must stand or fall, to such of its imperfections as can, in fairness, be ascribed to the remissness, or incompetency of the reporter. But he also feels the strongest assurance, that in pronouncing a candid judgment on the result of his labours, they will not hesitate to attach their due weight, (and he asks nothing more,) to the untoward circumstances which he has detailed. The causes in which the opinions now published were delivered, were, generally speaking, of unusual complexity and difficulty. This remark is especially applicable to the equity decisions, which constitute a very large proportion of the entire work. It was, indeed, the practice of the late chief justice, to commit his opinions to writing, only in cases of real difficulty: and the fact, that all the opinions contained in these volumes, were written by Chief Justice Marshall, with his own hand, and were carefully preserved by him, furnishes an ample guarantee of their intrinsic value and importance. They are, indeed, altogether worthy of the exalted fame of the venerable judge, who, for so many years, adorned the highest judicial station in our country. The earnest desire felt by the editor to render these volumes as extensively useful and convenient to the profession, as possible, suggested to him the propriety of embodying, in the form of notes, copious references to parallel cases decided in the highest courts, both in the United States and in England: and, especially, to such as were of a more recent date, than the opinions to which they should be annexed, respectively. This part of a plan, not originally contemplated, has also been carried into execution; and the editor flatters himself that these notes will be found to constitute a valuable addition to the work, particularly to gentlemen of the profession residing in the country, and who are precluded, by their situation, from having access to extensive and well selected libraries. Two of the following cases are republished from the sixth volume of Mr. Call's Reports. Their republication in these volumes was demanded, not only by their intrinsic value, but by the importance of preserving, as far as it was possible, an unbroken series of the decisions of Chief Justice Marshall, in the circuit court of the United States, during the whole period of his judicial life. Two important cases, decided in the same court since the death of Chief Justice Marshall, are also added.

BROWN'S ADMIRALTY REPORTS.

[Brown, Adm.]

Reports of admiralty and revenue cases in the circuit and district courts for the Western lake and river districts from 1859 to 1875. By the Honorable Henry B. Brown, district judge. One volume. New York: Baker, Voorhies & Co., 1876.

The following preface will be found on page v:

If any apology be needed for adding another volume to the already crowded shelves of our professional libraries, it may perhaps be found in the fact that, in the multitude of reports issued since the adoption of the constitution, only about a dozen volumes of exclusively admiralty decisions are included; of these but one, viz., that of Mr. Newberry (of which the present volume is designed as a continuation) is devoted to cases arising upon the Western lakes and rivers. This volume was published in 1867, and is believed to be the last of the strictly admiralty series, excepting the 3d of Ware. By far the greater number of admiralty decisions are mingled with common law, equity, bankruptcy, and patent cases, and scattered through more than a hundred volumes of reports. Indeed this fact suggests the observation, that the present method of incorporating in the same volume these widely differing classes of cases is expensive, unphilosophical, and unsatisfactory. Few admiralty practitioners are interested in bankruptcy business, and yet to obtain the benefit of fifty admiralty precedents, they are obliged to purchase a volume containing at least an equal number of bankruptcy cases, and in the Circuit Court Reports a still larger proportion of common law and equity cases. The same is true of the patent lawyer, who is not infrequently compelled to purchase an entire volume to obtain the benefit of a single important case. Thus a great many who would gladly buy every book devoted to the branch of the law they particularly affect (and nearly every lawyer is more or less a specialist) are deterred by the expense from purchasing at all.

The reporter ventures to suggest to the profession that cases determined by the federal courts, instead of being reported by districts might more acceptably to the bar, and, in the end, more profitably to the publishers, be reported by classes, viz.: (1) Patent cases. (The most important of these have already been reported by the late Mr. Fisher.) (2) Admiralty cases. (3) Bankruptcy cases. (These are very acceptably collated in the Bankruptcy Register.) (4) Criminal cases and cases peculiar to the jurisdiction and practice of the federal court. No mention is made in this classification of ordinary cases at common law and equity, as they are more satisfactorily, if not better, decided by the supreme courts of the several states, than they can be by a single judge.

The present volume contains the more important admiralty cases determined in the Sixth circuit during the last eighteen years. The accidents of compilation have limited it to cases arising in the two districts of Michigan and the Northern district of Ohio; but subsequent volumes, if published, will probably include cases from other districts. The fact that a large majority of these cases has arisen within the Eastern district of Michigan is due not more to the fortunate location of Detroit for admiralty business, than to the painstaking industry and marked ability of the late Judge Longyear. Without formal dedication to that effect, this volume is intended as a tribute of respect to the memory of that most excellent judge and upright citizen.

In selecting material, the following cases have been, with few exceptions, eliminated: (1) Cases turning solely upon questions of fact. (2) Cases reversed. (3) Cases affirmed by the appellate court and elsewhere reported. (4) Those reannouncing principles of law already well settled. (5) Cases reported in other volumes. Probably some of the cases here reported were hardly worthy the consideration, but it is hoped the volume may prove useful to those interested in this branch of the profession. I beg to acknowledge my indebtedness to my late partner Mr. Newberry, and to the several judges whose opinions are here published. Since the book went to press, the cases of The Free State [Case No. 5,090] and The Colorado [Id. 3,028] have been affirmed, and that of The Sunnyside [Id. 13,620] reversed, by the supreme court.

BRUNNER'S COLLECTED CASES.

[Brunner, Col. Cas.]

Reports of cases in circuit courts prior to 1880. Collected and annotated by Albert Brunner, Esq. One volume. San Francisco: Sumner, Whitney & Co., 1884.

The following preface is from page iii:

The object in preparing this collection of cases has been to place before the profession, in a compact and accessible form, the decisions of the U. S. circuit courts, which are constantly cited in the federal digests, and treatises upon U. S. courts, and which have not been published in the regular series of reports. Frequent inquiries at our law libraries for such cases have shown the necessity for a collection of this nature. It has been the endeavor of the editor to include all the cases (except decisions on bankruptcy and revenue law), which have been decided in circuit courts throughout the United States, and which have been printed in law magazines, periodicals, etc., from the date of the earliest decisions to time of the publication of the Federal Reporter, which latter purports to include all circuit court cases decided since its inception. The bankruptcy cases in these courts are extremely voluminous, of little or no value at present, and most of these cases will be found in the Bankrupt Register. The decisions relative to revenue law are of special interest only to a very few, and are to be found collected in the Internal Revenue Record. The cases comprising this collection, containing many valuable decisions on federal law, have been taken from the law periodicals, magazines, and states reports, current at the time when the decisions were rendered, many of which volumes are now out of print, and rarely found even in the most complete public libraries. The result of such a collection is in effect to complete the series of Circuit Court Reports, and to present in connection with the already published volumes of circuit court cases, easy access to any decision rendered by the circuit courts (with the exception above stated), which may be cited or referred to. There have been added to the cases, notes and references showing the citations thereto, and the effect of such cases in subsequent decisions.

CHASE'S DECISIONS.

[Chase.]

Sometimes cited as JOENSON'S REPORTS.

Cases decided by Chief Justice Chase in the circuit courts for the Fourth circuit from 1865 to 1869. An appendix contains the constitution of the Confederate States, and the conscription, impressment, and sequestration acts of that government. Reported by Bradley T. Johnson, of the Virginia bar. One volume. New York: Diossy & Co., 1876.

The following is the preface:

The decision of the chief justice in the case of Shortridge v. Macon [Case No. 12,812], at the June term, 1867, of the circuit court for the Eastern district of North Carolina, made a profound impression on the bar of the late Confederate States. It was the first indication of the view which the federal judiciary would probably take on the legal questions arising out of the late status of war, questions which affected every interest, all property, and lay at the very base of social organization. If the issue of force, which had just been tried and decided in favor of the federal Union, was to be regarded by the courts of the successful side as nothing but rebellion, civil tumult, and insurrection, then it was clear that no legal consequence could flow from it, nor could any acts of any agents, created by such rebellion, be acknowledged as having any legal and permanent consequences whatever. Acknowledgments of deeds, protest of notes, records of courts, judicial proceedings, contracts based on the existing state of things would, on that theory, all be void, and inextricable confusion and injury to society would be the consequence. If, on the contrary, the supreme court adopted the theory which the Southern bar believed the true one, warranted and required by every principle of public law, by the precedents of English history, and necessary to the restoration of peace and order in the South—if that august tribunal determined that the late war was war, to be judged by all the rules applicable to a war inter gentes, then the result would flow necessarily and certainly that all the acts of all the officers, agents, and employees, as well as of the people of each one of the late Confederate States, would be recognized as valid by the federal tribunals, provided those acts were not in aid of the war against the federal government. On such a sure basis we could look forward to a rapid recrystallization of society and reorganization of social order. When, therefore, the chief justice first sat in Richmond, his decisions attracted universal attention over all that country so vitally interested in the conclusions to which his mind would ultimately come.

It soon became manifest that he was rapidly comprehending the prodigious consequences that would flow from his decisions, and the discussion in Keppel v. Petersburg R. Co. [Case No. 7,722] was the first outgiving from him of the change that was going on in his mind since the case of Shortridge v. Macon [supra]. It then became clear that a body of decisions, discussing the fundamental principles of all law, must result from the questions that would be submitted to him by the bar of Virginia and the Carolinas, and that these decisions would be of great value in settling all doubtful questions in the South growing out of the war.

I, therefore, proposed to the chief justice that, if agreeable to him, I would undertake the work of collecting his circuit court decisions for publication. He assented to the suggestion with gratification, and subsequently furnished me with copies of his decisions as fast as they were made on circuit. In the winter of 1872-73 it became apparent that his work was done. The decisions on the questions growing out of the war, made by him on this circuit and in the supreme court, had settled the principles on which the new constitution of the United States was to be administered under the new conditions of society, and his wise and statesmanlike views, impressed by him on the supreme court, had prevailed in nearly all courts, and peace and order were thereby largely restored. The manuscript of this volume was then submitted to him for revision, and he went over the whole of it with the reporter, making such corrections as he deemed necessary. They were generally merely verbal, and in the main consisted of softening the language or expressions used in alluding to the war. He struck out the words "rebellion," "rebels," "insurrection," and "insurgents," and substituted the words "civil war," "belligerents," etc., wherever the sense of the text would permit, and instructed me to do so wherever he had overlooked it. I had an appointment with him in Washington the very day he left there for New York, and he postponed it until after his return, when it was proposed to see if there would be room in the volume for his decisions in the Legal-Tender Cases [110 U. S. 421, 4 Sup. Ct. 122], and in the case of Texas v. Chiles [21 Wall. (88 U. S.) 488]. But he never returned, and I have left the book just as it came from his revision.

I hope thereby to contribute to the reputation of a judge whose large intellect, strong will, and clear perception of great principles have done much toward quieting discussion and settling differences of opinion on all legal questions growing out of the war, and has thus greatly contributed to the peaceful reorganization of society in the South. I have added the constitution of the Confederate States and the acts of the Confederate congress for the conscription of all arms-bearing citizens, the impressment act, and the sequestration act, by virtue of which exercise of power the Confederate government assumed and exercised control over all of its citizens, and over all property within its jurisdiction. I have done this in order that it may be seen what force, vigor, and vitality that government had, and to place on record our claims to have been treated as a government. Whether a government de facto or a government of paramount force, or a regent government, exercising the occupatio bellica, or a government de jure, overthrown by foreign conquest, the future historian will decide: we are not competent judges.

[Here follow proceedings upon the death of Chief Justice Chase, which will be found in the Biographical Notes, under Salmon Portland Chase.—Ed.]

CLIFFORD'S REPORTS.

[Cliff.]

Reports of cases in the circuit court for the First circuit, from 1858 to 1873, being the decisions of the Honorable Nathan Clifford, associate justice of the supreme court. Reported by William Henry Clifford, counselor at law. Four volumes. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. The volumes appeared at intervals from 1869 until 1880.

CRABBE'S REPORTS.

[Crabbe.]

Reports of cases in the district court for the Eastern district of Pennsylvania, from 1836 to 1846. By William H. Crabbe. One volume. Philadelphia: T. & J. W. Johnson, 1853.

The following is the preface:

This volume takes up the decisions of the district court of the United States, for the Eastern district of Pennsylvania, from the period at which Gilpin's Reports terminate, and ends with the appointment of his honor, Judge Kane, now on the bench. I have, after considerable hesitation, included eleven bankruptcy cases in the following pages. The case of the Estate of Robert Morris, under the bankrupt law of 1800, was, perhaps, the least objectionable; the great amount of learning expended in the arguments and decisions in that case, and the knowledge that considerable landed interests, in this and another state, depended thereon, easily led to its introduction. The ten cases decided under the law of 1841 were selected, as involving points of the most general interest, from a very large number of manuscript opinions by Judge Randall on the subject, which I was not willing wholly to pass by. I feel bound to express my obligation and thanks for the kindness with which the notes of counsel have, in numerous instances, been placed at my disposal while preparing this volume for the press. There were many obstacles in the way of an intelligible report of cases so long since decided which these notes greatly assisted to remove, while, at the same time, they afforded the fullest and most reliable materials for an abstract of the arguments at the bar.

CRANCH'S CIRCUIT COURT REPORTS.

[Cranch, G. C.]

Reports of cases in the circuit court for the District of Columbia, from 1801 to 1841. By William Cranch, chief judge of the court. Six volumes. Vol. 6 contains only an index and table of cases. Boston: Little, Brown & Co.; Washington: William M. Morrison & Co., 1852.

The following preface is from vol. 1:

By the act of congress of the 13th of February, 1801, the congress of the United States passed an act entitled "An act to provide for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States." By that act the United States were divided into twenty-two districts, and these subdivided into six circuits, in each of which, except the Sixth, there were to be "three judges of the United States, to be called 'circuit judges,' one of whom was to be commissioned as chief judge"; and they were to hold circuit courts in their respective circuits. Afterward in the same session, congress passed the act of the 27th of February, 1801, entitled "An act concerning the District of Columbia," and by the third section thereof, erected, upon the same model, a circuit court for the District of Columbia, "to consist of one chief judge and two assistant judges"; and conferred upon "the said court and the judges thereof" "all the powers by law vested in the circuit courts and the judges of the circuit courts of the United States"; evidently referring to the act of the 13th of February, 1801, which they had previously passed at the same session; for, before that act, there had been no judges of the circuit courts of the United States, no nominees—the circuit courts being then held by one justice of the supreme court of the United States and the judge of the district court of the district in which the circuit court was, for the time being sitting. Among the powers thus conferred upon the circuit court of the District of Columbia, were the power to hold special sessions for the trial of criminal causes,—the power to appoint a clerk in each of the two counties in the said District; namely, the counties of Washington and Alexandria.

By the fifth section of the act of February 27, 1801, it is enacted that the said court "shall have cognizance of all crimes and offences committed within said District; and of all cases in law and equity between parties both or either of which shall be resident, or shall be found within said District; and also of all actions and suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity, in which the United States shall be plaintiffs or complainants; and of all seizures on land or water; and all penalties and forfeitures made, arising or accruing under the laws of the United States." By the first section of the act, it is enacted, "that the laws of the state of Virginia as they now exist, shall be and continue in force in that part of the District of Columbia, which was ceded by the said state to the United States, and by them accepted for the permanent seat of government; and that the laws of the state of Maryland, as they now exist, shall be and continue in force in that part of the said District which was ceded by that state to the United States and by them accepted as aforesaid." And by the second section it is enacted, "that the said District of Columbia shall be formed into two counties; one county shall contain all that part of the said District which lies on the east side of the river Potomac, together with the islands therein and shall be called the 'County of Washington'; the other county shall contain all that part of said District which lies on the west side of said river, and shall be called the 'County of Alexandria'; and the said river in its whole course through said District shall be taken and deemed, to all intents and purposes, to be within both of said counties." By the seventh section of the act a marshal, and, by the ninth section an attorney of the United States for the District are to be appointed, and by the eleventh section as many justices of the peace as the president of the United States shall from time to time, think expedient; to hold their office for five years, and, in whatever relates to the conservation of the peace, to have all the powers vested in, and to perform all the duties required of, justices of the peace as individual magistrates by the laws of Virginia and Maryland respectively continued in force in the District by the first section of the act; and to have cognizance of personal demands, not exceeding the value of twenty dollars, extended to fifty dollars by the act of March 1, 1823. By the eighth section of the act of 27th of February, 1801, an appeal or writ of error to the supreme court of the United States is given, from any final judgment, order or decree of the circuit court of the District of Columbia where the matter in dispute exceeds the value of one hundred dollars, afterward extended by the act of April 2, 1816, c. 39, to one thousand dollars. But where the value is more than one hundred dollars, and less than one thousand dollars, an appeal or writ of error may be allowed by a judge of the supreme court, "if he shall be of opinion that the errors involve questions of law of such extensive interest and operation as to render the final decision of them by the supreme court desirable." By the twelfth section of the act of 27th of February, 1801, a register of wills and a judge of the orphans' court in each county are to be appointed, to have the like powers and to perform the like duties, as were then exercised and performed by the like officers in Maryland; and an appeal from the orphans' court to the circuit court is given. By the act of the 29th of April, 1802, a district court of the United States for the District of Columbia, having the same powers and jurisdiction which were by law vested in the other district courts of the United States is directed to be holden twice a year, by the chief judge of the District of Columbia, from whose judgment or decree a writ of error or appeal lies to the circuit court of the District, and from that to the supreme court of the United States. The act of the 13th of February, 1801, was repealed at the following session of congress, but that repeal did not deprive the circuit court of the District of Columbia of any of the powers which were, by the act of the 27th of February, given to it by reference to the act of the 13th of February. The circuit court of the District of Columbia is a court of the United States; and having jurisdiction over such a variety of cases, the reports of its decisions cannot but be interesting; and the facility with which its errors may be corrected by the supreme court gives great weight to such of its decisions as have been acquiesced in.

The cases here reported were cases arising under the constitution and laws of the United States, and the constitutions and laws of Virginia and Maryland, including the common law as adopted by those states; and including also causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and seizures on land or water for breaches of the laws relating to the revenue and the laws of trade and navigation; appeals from the district court of the United States for the District of Columbia; from the orphans' court in relation to guardians and the administration of the estates of deceased persons; and from the judgments of justices of the peace in civil causes within their cognizance. In general, the cases which were carried up to the supreme court, by writ of error or appeal, and affirmed, are not here reported;—having been already reported among the cases decided by that court; some few cases, however, which were reversed, will be found here reported as they appeared in the court below. As the circuit court for the District of Columbia is the tribunal to which is intrusted, either originally or by appeal, the execution of those laws which protect the personal liberty and property, not only of the citizens of the District, but of all the officers of the government, from the highest to the lowest, residing therein, and of the members of both houses of congress; and of all the citizens of the United States visiting this neutral ground, the common domain of all the states, it seems to be peculiarly important that the decisions of that tribunal be publicly known. It is with this view that these Reports are now published.

CURTIS'S CIRCUIT COURT REPORTS.

[Curt.]

Reports of cases in the circuit courts for the First circuit from 1851 to 1856. By the Honorable Benjamin Robbins Curtis, associate justice of the supreme court, allotted to that circuit. Two volumes. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. Vol. 1 was published in 1854; vol. 2 in 1857.

The following preface is from vol. 1:

This volume includes a part of the cases tried in the First circuit since the autumn of 1851. In making the selection, I have endeavored to insert only those which might be useful to the profession. A few of those which turned wholly on the local law of a particular state, I have inserted in accordance with the wishes of gentlemen of the bar of those states.

DAVEIS' REPORTS.

[Daveis.]

See "Ware."

DEADY'S REPORTS.

[Deady.]

Reports of cases in the circuit and district courts of Oregon and California from 1859 to 1869. By the Honorable Matthew P. Deady, district judge. One volume. San Francisco: A. L. Bancroft & Co., 1872.

The following is the preface:

In submitting this volume of Reports to the profession, a word of explanation in regard to the organization of the courts, in which the cases were decided, is deemed proper. The district court, in Oregon, was organized in September 1, 1859, under the act of March 3, of that year (11 Stat. 437), and had circuit court powers and jurisdiction until the creation of a separate circuit court for the district, by act of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. 794). The cases entitled in the circuit court for the district of California, were decided while I held that court during portions of the years 1867-8-9, in pursuance of the designation of Justices Chase and Field of the supreme court.

DILLON'S CIRCUIT COURT REPORTS.

[Dill.]

Cases in the circuit courts for the Eighth circuit from 1870 to 1879. Reported by the Honorable John F. Dillon, circuit judge Eighth circuit. Five volumes. San Francisco: Sumner, Whitney & Co., 1885 (2d edition). The first edition was published by Egbert, Fidler & Chambers, Davenport, Iowa, the last volume appearing in 1880.

The following preface is from vol. 1:

This is the first volume of a proposed regular series of reports for the Eighth circuit. No judicial tribunal in England or America has conferred upon it powers so comprehensive and various as those of the circuit courts of the United States. Their jurisdiction is original and appellate, civil and criminal. They are constantly adjudicating cases which are elsewhere intrusted to distinct tribunals. Nearly every question of a nature to come before the queen's bench, the common pleas, the chancery, the exchequer, the admiralty, or the bankruptcy courts of Great Britain, may, in an original or appellate form, come before the circuit courts of the United States. Besides, in a great variety of cases, arising under the constitution and laws of the general government, they have original jurisdiction, exclusive of all other courts. The reports of cases determined by tribunals to which are confided powers so diversified and important, possess a character, and ought to have a value, distinctively their own.

In Mr. Woolworth's Reports, recently published, are collected the hitherto scattered decisions of Mr. Justice Miller, since he was assigned to this circuit, down to the date of the re-organization of the courts by the act of congress of April 10, 1869, which provided for the appointment, in each of the existing circuits, of a circuit judge, to whom, within the circuit, is given the same powers and jurisdiction which are possessed by the justice of the supreme court allotted to it. I cannot refrain from here expressing my sense of the value of Mr. Woolworth's admirable volume. The cases are nearly all new or important, and the learning and industry of the reporter are only less marked than the ability and intellectual vigor of the judge. Regularly there will be included in these Reports only such of the current cases as are believed to be important in principle, or useful to the practitioner in the federal courts. Most of the states aid the publication of their law reports; and to some extent this is done by congress, in respect to the decisions of the supreme court of the United States. But the reports of the circuits must stand on their unassisted merits, and since their publication is attended with much labor and little reward, no temptation exists to multiply them too rapidly by reporting useless cases. There is to some extent a distinctive character in the litigation of the different circuits. This is manifestly true of the Eighth, comprising six large, populous, and growing states: Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, Arkansas, Kansas, and Nebraska. Within this circuit are large commercial centres, giving rise to characteristic controversies. Bounded as the circuit is, for nearly two thousand miles on the Mississippi, and traversed by the Missouri and other great water-courses, there originates on this vast inland navigation a large amount of admiralty business, of a character somewhat different from that in circuits bordering on the great lakes or the high seas. This circuit, too, it should be added, extends to Lake Superior, whose growing commerce is already furnishing the federal courts with admiralty causes. Four districts in the circuit stretch so far westward that they embrace various Indian tribes, sustaining different treaty relations to the general government, and peculiar relations to the states, within whose boundaries they remain; from whence we have here litigation of an anomalous, yet most interesting nature. The circuit embraces also a large amount of the public domain, some of which has been granted to railway companies, and to different states, for specified objects; but much of which is yet subject to the various land laws of the United States, including the beneficent and salutary pre-emption and homestead acts. These circumstances, too, leave their impress upon controversies that find their way into the national courts within the circuit. Besides which, it has its share of cases in bankruptcy, and those relating to railway, insurance, revenue, commercial and corporation law. A field so vast, and one so rich in the variety and character of the materials which, with proper attention, it can be made to contribute to the building up of a symmetrical system of national jurisprudence, ought, surely, not to be neglected. Considerations like these, which the reporter has persuaded himself will meet with the approving judgment of an enlightened profession, have moved him to attempt to do his part in this useful work; and to preserve, in an authentic form, for the use of others, the results of some of the labors of his co-workers and himself. The chief requirements of a law report—a clear but not prolix or redundant statement, perspicuous head-notes, and a full but not diffuse index—the reporter has endeavored to meet in the preparation of this volume. What appears in the head-notes, is intended to be the statement of a point, or principle, involved in the case and actually decided, unless the contrary be therein indicated. A few cases, involving the construction of state statutes, have been included in the volume; but for this a reason existed, either in the fact that they were upon important subjects, or because the local statute had not been settled by state adjudication. To some of the cases notes have been added by the reporter, who trusts that they will be regarded as worth the brief space they occupy.

FISHER'S PATENT CASES.

[Fish. Pat. Cas.]

Reports of cases arising under letters patent for inventions in the circuit courts from 1848 to 1873. By Samuel S. Fisher, counselor at law. Six volumes. Vol. 6 was completed after Mr. Fisher's death, by John E. Hatch and Robert H. Parkinson. Cincinnati: Robert Clarke & Co., 1870-1874.

The following preface is from vol. 1:

When the publication of these Reports was determined upon, it was supposed that they might be included in a single volume; but, before the first pages were printed, so many cases had been received, that it was apparent that two volumes would scarcely contain them. This, together with the great difficulty of reporting a patent case intelligibly, in the absence of drawings or models, without much prolixity of statement, and the fact that a recital of facts, amply sufficient to enable the practitioner to comprehend the case, is embodied in nearly every opinion, led the reporter to omit the arguments of counsel entirely, and to limit himself to such brief statement as seemed to be needed for a full understanding of the language of the court. Without a rigid adherence to this plan, the number of volumes would have been doubled, without, it is believed, materially enhancing the value of the Reports. As some of the earlier cases were decided nearly twenty years ago, and many of the judges, whose opinions are reported, are no longer living, it was not easy to procure any accurate information in regard to them. Nevertheless, it is believed that no decision or charge is reported in this volume, that is not given in the words of the judge who delivered it, or in language adopted by him after revision; and, to avoid all possible risk of misstatement, or misapprehension as to the point decided, or as to dicta believed to be valuable, the language of the court, as far as possible, is used in preparing the syllabus of each case. The principal sources from which these Reports have been supplied, have been manuscripts furnished by the judges themselves; certified copies of opinions, from the originals on file in the various clerks' offices; pamphlet opinions revised by the judges and furnished by reliable counsel, and publications in law magazines and other accredited legal journals. Many thanks are due to the judges, clerks and counsel who have assisted in furnishing opinions, charges, briefs and memoranda, without which the publication of such a work would have been impossible.

The following preface is from vol. 2:

This volume brings the reports of cases down to the close of the year 1865. The reporter confesses to some disappointment at being unable to include at least another year, but it was impossible to do so within the compass of a volume of reasonable size. It is true that some of the cases reported relate mainly to questions of fact, and do not involve any legal point of special interest; but, since patent suits are now almost universally brought on the equity side of the court, every practitioner in this specialty will realize the importance of a knowledge of the manner in which the judges of the several circuits deal with questions of fact. As a volume of reports in a single department of the law must necessarily have a limited circulation, and would present very few attractions to publishers, it seemed as if the profession must depend for such a book upon individual enterprise. A limited edition, at a somewhat advanced price, which could be speedily disposed of, was the only manner in which the labor of publishing and distributing such a work could be reconciled with more legitimate professional engagements. Every page has been carefully read not less than three times, and yet a few typographical inaccuracies have escaped notice. It was a less excusable error that led, in the first volume, to a mistake in the name of the late learned judge of the Eastern district of Pennsylvania, and to the affixing of a star to the name of one, who, though no longer on the bench of the court for the district of Massachusetts, which he so long graced by his industry, learning, and marked ability, still lives, to enjoy, in the respect of his fellow-citizens and of the profession who are so much his debtors, the reward of a long, laborious, and successful career in the impartial administration of private right and public justice.

The following preface is from vol. 6:

This volume was commenced by Hon. Samuel S. Fisher, under an arrangement by which the undersigned [John E. Hatch and Robert H. Parkinson] were to assist him in its preparation. The cases to be reported were selected by him, and a little less than one-third of the volume had been prepared for the press under his supervision, when his death devolved upon them the responsibility of carrying on and completing it. This has been done, so far as possible, in conformity to the original plan. The more legitimate engagements of the profession, rendered unusually pressing by Mr. Fisher's sudden withdrawal, have been made to yield to the purpose of completing the volume with such accuracy, fullness, and thoroughness, that it might not prove an unworthy companion of its predecessors. This brings the series of Reports down to the beginning of the present year.

FISHER'S PATENT REPORTS.

[Fish. Pat. R.]

Reports of cases relating to letters patent for inventions determined in the supreme and circuit courts from 1821 to 1851. By William Hubbell Fisher. One volume. Cincinnati: Robert Clarke & Co., 1873.

The following is the preface:

These Reports, of which the present is the first volume, embrace all the patent cases of the United States supreme and circuit courts not included in Robb's Patent Cases and Fisher's Patent Cases. The syllabus of each case has been newly prepared, and the statement of each case carefully revised with special reference to the exigencies of patent suits. All material portions of the specifications of the patents involved in controversy have been inserted. Numerous engravings illustrating the mechanical devices involved in controversy have been added. Heretofore, the majority of the adjudications in patent cases upon the mechanism in litigation were wholly useless, because mechanism cannot be well understood from mere written description. The engravings render the decisions on the mechanism in dispute at once intelligible and capable of being effectively cited in deciding analogous mechanical questions involved in pending cases. The author here takes occasion to say he is under many obligations to the learned reporters of the various Reports for those portions of their admirable statements of cases which he has incorporated into this work. He also expresses his obligations to the Honorable Samuel S. Fisher for many valuable suggestions as to the preparation of the work. With the hope that this work may contribute something to the advancement of the practice and litigation under the patent laws of the United States, the author submits his work to the public.

FISHER'S PRIZE CASES.

[Fish. Pr. Cas.]

Cases decided in the district and circuit courts for the Pennsylvania district from 1812 to 1813, with one case from the district court for Massachusetts. Reported and published by Redwood Fisher. Philadelphia, 1813. The volume was reprinted without change in 1871.

The following is the preface:

The restricted state of our commerce consequent to the impolitic system adopted by the government of the United States, and its further diminution by the disastrous war with England, have left us no means for the export of the products of the United States but by the employment of licenses or passports. The decisions of such of the courts of the United States, as have been called on to determine upon the legality of these passports are therefore deemed peculiarly interesting to the public. The national legislature having refused to enact laws, prohibiting the use of such safe-guards, by the few American ships which navigate the ocean; unless the judiciary shall consider their employment unauthorised by law; the merchant, may still enjoy a small portion of that commerce, which under a wiser administration and better auspices, would know no limits.

FLIPPIN'S REPORTS.

[Flip.]

Reports of cases in the circuit and district courts for the Sixth circuit from 1859 to 1881. By William Searcy Flippin, Esq. Two volumes. Chicago: Callaghan & Co., 1882.

The following preface is from vol. 1:

The reporter hopes that this volume will meet with a fair reception at the hands of the profession. When his mind was made up to the task of preparing a series of reports for this circuit, he at once set himself to the work of collecting all available and valuable material, and succeeded in getting into his possession a large number of cases decided within the last twenty years. Some of these, however, related to questions growing out of the war and its incidents, and were not thought to be of sufficient interest or importance for publication at this day. The bankrupt act being repealed, it was deemed best to omit all cases growing out of the same, except where other questions of permanent value were discussed. Of the cases found herein, it will be seen that twelve were decided by Halmer H. Emmons, all bearing unmistakable marks of his high abilities. As his judgments (he was often so pleased to term opinions,) shall be better known to his surviving brethren his fame will grow wider and brighter—just as they begin to duly appreciate the truth that a great master has left them forever. The case of Tait v. New York Life Ins. Co. [Case No. 13,726], a most important one, is reported in full, as also Talcott v. Pine Grove [Id. 13,735], Memphis v. Brown [Id. 9,415], and Sharpleigh v. Surdam [Id. 12,711]. The merits of the opinions in these cases need no other reference. A number of Judge Brown's opinions are reported in the volume, as well as decisions by Judges Withey, Welker, Swing, H. V. Willson, Sherman, Ballard and Trigg. Judges McLean, Swayne and Miller wrote others. Questions in almost all branches of the law have been fully and elaborately discussed. Some difficulty was found in ascertaining the respective times at which certain of the opinions were delivered, as also the names of counsel representing the different parties, but the hope is entertained that no good ground of complaint will be found to exist because of a failure in this regard. In the next volume, perhaps, the task will be easier. In this connection, thanks are tendered to that distinguished veteran in the profession, Hon. Rufus P. Ranney, of Cleveland, for copies of opinions of Judge H. V. Willson and to his firm, and to Messrs. Willey, Sherman and Hoyt of the same city, for other courtesies. Upon consultation, Judges Swayne, Baxter and Hammond gave the reporter a written consent and approval of what he is now doing. They were of opinion that they had no power to appoint an official reporter, but were willing to confer upon the undersigned all the authority which they felt they possessed, and that was their consent and approval of his undertaking, adding their best wishes for his success. This was the mode adopted by reporters and judges under the old English system. To some of the cases notes have been added, which it is hoped may prove of some service. The one on page 513, through mistake, crept into the body of the opinion.

The following preface is from vol. 2:

One of the district judges having suggested that he experienced considerable difficulty in finding federal decisions on points of criminal law, it was deemed advisable to insert a few cases of that character in this volume. An effort was made to bring the decisions down to July 1, 1882, but the publishers found that this would make the book too large, and wholly out of proportion to the first volume.

GALLISON'S REPORTS.

[Gall.]

Reports of cases in the circuit court for the First circuit, from 1812 to 1815. By John Gallison, Esq. The first edition was published in 1815-1817; second edition in 1845. Boston: Charles C. Little and James Brown.

The following advertisement is from vol. 1:

All the cases, which appear in this volume, were decided before the subscriber assumed the office of reporter. It is much to be regretted, that the gentleman [John Stickney, Esq.], who preceded him, was compelled by his literary and professional pursuits, not only to relinquish the office, but to decline the labor of preparing the Reports for publication. The task would no doubt have been executed by him in a manner far more satisfactory, than was possible for one, who, to say nothing of other causes, was not present at the arguments, and was, therefore, but ill qualified to fill up the outline of the minutes taken in court. In many of the cases of the fall circuit, 1812, a slight sketch of the argument has been attempted, and the editor feels it his duty to apologize to the counsel for the very imperfect manner, in which it has been done. A consciousness of this imperfection, combined with the discovery, as the work progressed, that it would exceed the proposed number of pages, induced him, in the succeeding cases, to confine the report to the bare statement of facts, and the opinion of the court, which fortunately has been uniformly in writing. In general, however, a very full account of the points raised will be found in the opinion. The subscriber hopes shortly to offer to the public more full reports of the many important cases, which were decided in the year 1814. This, however, will in some degree depend on the encouragement, the present volume may receive. When the proposals for this work were issued, it was supposed, that five hundred pages would easily contain all the cases intended to be published. Though they have, in fact, extended to six hundred and fifty pages, it has been thought best to bring down the Reports to the year 1814, omitting only such cases as appeared to involve no important legal principles. It is presumed, that this course will be most satisfactory to subscribers. It has however rendered necessary the addition of one dollar to the price, in order to secure the reimbursement of the expense of publication.

The following advertisement is from vol. 2:

Most of the questions, which are agitated in the courts of the United States, are remote from any of the ordinary subjects of discussion in other tribunals. They form a new and distinct branch of law, connected with some of our most important rights and interests. The construction of the federal and state constitutions, of treaties, and of the laws regulating our foreign commerce; the fixing of the boundary, which marks the division of power between the whole confederacy, and its several members; the limits of the jurisdiction of the national courts, as courts of common law, chancery, admiralty and prize; in what cases this jurisdiction is exclusive, and in what concurrent with the courts of the several states; all these are topics, which must long continue to supply cases of great legal doubt, the decisions upon which will form a body of public law of the United States. The revenue laws afford another class of questions of great interest, not only to the citizen, who may often be compelled to resort to the treasury for relief from penalties incurred through mistake or ignorance; but to the numerous officers, who are appointed to watch over the execution of these laws, and to whom an accurate knowledge of the extent of their powers and duties is in the highest degree important. If to these are added the many admiralty and maritime causes, which affect the interests of navigation and commerce; the large class of contracts and civil injuries, as well as crimes and offences, which belong to this branch of the jurisdiction of the federal courts; it will be sufficiently apparent, that their decrees ought not to be confined within the walls, where they are pronounced. Nor is it enough to publish the decisions of the supreme court only. Those of the circuit courts are final in by far the greater part of the cases, that are brought before them. In revising, on writs of error, the judgments of the district courts, they must in all cases decide in the last resort, with the single exception provided by the sixth section of the act of 1802, c. 31. Numberless questions will necessarily arise and receive their determination in these courts, especially in commercial districts and in cases relating to the revenue laws, which will never reach the supreme court. Of this fact abundant proof will be found in the ensuing volume. These considerations will, it is hoped, be sufficient to excuse the addition of another to those numerous volumes of Reports, to which at their present rate of increase, the "mille plaustrorum onus" of Heinæccius [preface to Vinnius] may, soon, without a very extravagant hyperbole, be applied. If any thing may be anticipated from the favorable reception of the former volume, that now offered, containing cases not less important in principle or useful in practice, will not be unacceptable to the profession. (Mr. Hoffman, in his "Course of Legal Study" (2d Ed.) p. 460, recommends the following cases as leading cases: The Alligator [Case No. 248]; The Rapid [Id. 11,576]; The Grotius [Id. 5,844]; The Julia [Id. 7,575]; The Invincible [Id. 7,054]; Maisonnaire v. Keating [Id. 8,978]; The Jerusalem [Id. 7,294].)

In stating the arguments of counsel, the reporter has aspired to no other merit, than that of being brief, accurate and perspicuous. He alone must, in general, be responsible for the language employed. Where the case appeared to possess a more than ordinary degree of importance, the arguments have been reported in a more extended form. All the authorities cited have, it is believed, been retained, and the references, both in the arguments and opinions, have been carefully compared with the books referred to. Particular care has been taken to notice and preserve such points of practice, as arose incidentally, and were not of sufficient importance to call for a written opinion. But, whatever care and diligence may have been used, the reporter is conscious of many defects, for which he must claim the indulgence of the profession. At the period, which closes the present volume, he found his other engagements incompatible with a further attention to the duties of reporting. The work will be continued by a gentleman, whose qualifications ensure the successful performance of his undertaking.

GILPIN'S REPORTS.

[Gilp.]

Reports of cases in the district court for the Eastern district of Pennsylvania, from 1828 to 1836. By Henry D. Gilpin. Philadelphia: P. H. Nicklin and P. Johnson, 1837.

The following note, addressed to Judge Hopkinson, district judge, E. D. Pennsylvania, will be found on page iii:

This volume of reports, deriving its chief value from his genius and learning, is respectfully inscribed, as some acknowledgment of his uniform kindness and courtesy, throughout a constant official intercourse of several years.

HASKELL'S REPORTS.

[Hask.]

Reports of judgments of Hon. Edward Fox, district judge from the district of Maine, from 1866 to 1881. By Thomas Hawes Haskell, Esq. Two volumes. Portland, Me.: Loring, Short & Harmon, 1887-1888.

The following preface is from vol. 1:

Soon after the death of Judge Fox his executor placed in my hands the MSS. of his judicial opinions to be edited. Having devoted to this work such time as was free from more imperative duties, I now present the result in two volumes of reports. I have endeavored to verify all citations and quotations and to guard against all errors of the press, and I only desire that my work may be charitably received and prove valuable to my professional brethren.

HAYWARD AND HAZLETON'S CIRCUIT COURT REPORTS.

[Hayw. & H.]

Reports of cases, civil and criminal, in the circuit court for the District of Columbia, Washington county, from 1840 to 1850. By John H. Hayward, Esq., and George C. Hazleton, Esq. Washington: William H. Lowdermilk & Co., 1892.

This is the first volume of a series designed as a continuation of Cranch's Circuit Court Reports, and may be cited as 1 Hayw. & H. D. C., or as 6 U. S. Cir. Ct. Rep. D. C. 6 Cranch is merely an index and table of cases for vols. 1-5. These should not be confused with the Reports of the supreme court of the District, the first of which is sometimes cited as 6 D. C., etc. .

The following preface is from vol. 1:

This is the first of a series of Reports which when completed will cover a period of time from 1840 to 1863. These Reports will complete the link in the chain of records of the courts of the District of Columbia for that period, and be of great value and importance to the profession. In producing the same, all sources which could furnish any information upon the subject have been carefully explored, the records thoroughly examined, so that the work when done could be as authoritative and correct as possible. Heretofore there have been no accessible reports of the proceedings in this jurisdiction since the Reports of Judge Cranch, which left off at the November term of 1840. These Reports commence at the March term of 1841, and will complete the interval from 1840 to 1863, when the courts of the District of Columbia were reorganized. The cases are arranged in terms, and can easily be found and verified from the court records, and where found in cotemporary works they are given from them in full, with the necessary corrections and additions. There is not another jurisdiction in the United States in which the cases are so varied. As Chief Judge Cranch said: "It is the tribunal to which is intrusted, either originally or by appeal, the execution of those laws which protect the personal liberty and property, not only of the citizens of the District, but of all the officers of the government, from the highest to the lowest residing therein, and of all the members of both houses of congress and of all the citizens of the United States, visiting this neutral ground, the common domain of all the states, it seems to be peculiarly important that the decisions of that tribunal be publicly known." Here can be found cases of admiralty from the district court, of mandamus against the officers of the government, habeas corpus against arbitrary arrest by congress, writs of error from the criminal court, appeals from the orphans' court, justices of the peace, and the commissioners of patents. In addition to this it had a general jurisdiction in law and equity in cases in which either of the parties reside without the District. The five volumes of Cranch, with this volume and either one or two others which are to follow, we have thought it better to number consecutively, as they are reports of the United States circuit court. It is therefore proper, as this is a continuation of the valuable work of Judge Cranch, to style it "6th United States Circuit Reports of the District of Columbia and also 1st Hayward and Hazleton's Reports of the United States Circuit Court of the District of Columbia." That the work is necessarily imperfect must be expected, considering the meager sources from which the cases are compiled. The dust and files of the old circuit court have been uncovered in obtaining the material necessary to make this volume as complete as it is.

Mr. Hayward had completed four numbers of this volume, embracing the first two hundred and twenty pages thereof, which can now be found in some of the private and public libraries of the city, and which is known as "Hayward's Reports of the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia." In the preparation of the remaining portion of this volume, he has associated with him, and has had the co-operation and assistance of, Mr. Hazleton, which he takes pleasure in saying has enabled him not only to present this volume to the public much earlier than he otherwise could have done, but which has added materially to the efficiency and value of the work itself.

The following preface is from vol. 2:

The original design of Hayward and Hazleton to publish, in convenient form, the decisions of the old circuit court for the District of Columbia, made during that period of its history which dates from the issue of the last volume of Cranch, in 1840, to the abolition of the court by the act of congress, approved March 3, 1863, is complete and is concluded in this volume, to be designated "7th U. S. Circuit Court Reports for the District of Columbia and 2d Hayward and Hazleton's Reports of the United States Circuit Court for the District of Columbia." These two volumes of reported cases have been compiled and printed from manuscripts of the original records of the cases themselves, as found on file in the court archives in the city hall, and are, therefore, commended to the public, and to the profession, for their accuracy. As will be seen by their perusal, we have prefaced each case with a carefully prepared syllabus intended to present an accurate synopsis of the material points therein passed upon by the court. Some of these decisions, such as involve important constitutional questions and proceedings in mandamus, may serve the profession and the courts as precedents in future adjudications. The organization of this court consisting of one chief judge and two assistant judges, followed very closely upon the organization of the government itself. Congress conferred upon it, by the act which created it, a broad and well defined jurisdiction. They gave it rank and legal power co-equal with the circuit courts of the United States. They expressly conferred upon it, "cognizance of all crimes and offences committed within said district, and all cases in law and equity between parties, both, or either of which shall be resident, or be found within said District, and also of all actions or suits of civil nature at common law or in equity, in which the United States shall be plaintiffs or complainants, and of all seizures on land or water, and all penalties or forfeitures made, arising or accruing under the laws of the United States." The territorial jurisdiction of the court originally embraced the counties of Washington and Alexandria, and the waters of the Potomac coursing between them, and forming the District of Columbia. The latter has now within its limits the county of Washington; the county of Alexandria having been receded back by congress to the state of Virginia. The court was created by an act of congress, approved by President Adams, as early as February 27, 1801, at a period when the judicial power of the government was in its infancy, and exercised the jurisdiction conferred upon it by law, and administered justice upon the rights and property of men for more than a half century of its history. Its judges ranked well as jurists, while some still merit and receive distinguished consideration for the skill they evinced, and the contributions they made to American jurisprudence. It will be found that lawyers of great learning and ability took part in these proceedings, in some instances distinguished talent in the profession from the states. This work has not been one of profit, and we shall scarcely realize enough out of the sale of the entire edition issued to pay the expenses incurred in its publication, but this is immaterial, as we shall find our compensation largely in the pleasure afforded us in thus rescuing from practical oblivion decisions of merit and value, as we believe, to the profession and to the community.

HEMPSTEAD'S CIRCUIT COURT REPORTS.

[Hempst.]

Reports of cases in the superior court of Arkansas territory, from 1820 to 1836, and in the district and circuit courts for the district of Arkansas, from 1836 to 1856. By Samuel H. Hempstead, Esq. One volume. Boston: Little, Brown & Co., 1856.

The following is the preface:

This volume of Reports is presented to the profession to preserve the decisions of the federal courts of Arkansas in a more enduring form than in tradition. Adjudged cases become precedents, and it is therefore important that they should be known. In fact, if we have to appeal to recollection, or neglected records, justice safely administered can hardly be expected. Those practising in these courts have felt the inconvenience arising from the want of a published report of their decisions. If this volume shall wholly or partially remove the evil, my labor will not have been lost. It can never be a source of profit to me, and certainly distinction is not won by performing the duties of reporter. It forms a sort of judicial history of Arkansas from its commencement as a territory down to this time, and in that point of view will possess some interest there, if not elsewhere. The decisions of the superior court are embraced, because it is conceded on all hands that the court was always an able one; and although this book, no doubt, contains many cases of little or no value, yet in that respect it is not different from other Reports. Whilst tautology has been omitted in the opinions, the substance, and generally the exact language of the court, has been preserved. Cases sustaining a principle decided have been added; and if time had permitted, I should have made full notes to the cases. The late Benjamin Johnson, of Arkansas, who sat in those courts for nearly thirty years, and was their pride and ornament, generally wrote out his opinions, and before his death placed such as had been preserved in my hands. [Here follows a eulogy of Judge Johnson, which will be found in the Biographical Notes.]

HOFFMAN'S LAND CASES.

[Hoff. Land Cas.]

Reports of land cases in the district court for the Northern district of California, from 1853 to 1858, decided by the Honorable Ogden Hoffman, district judge. One volume. Reported and published by Numa Hubert. San Francisco, 1862.

The following is the preface:

The accompanying volume contains all the opinions delivered by the judge of the United States district court for the Northern district of California, in land cases, during the time over which the Reports extend. They were obtained by the reporter, with the judge's permission, from the files, and are published as originally prepared and delivered. There has also been added a list of the governors of California from its first settlement, etc., together with a sketch of the early history of Upper California. In the appendix will be found a carefully prepared table of all the claims presented to the board of commissioners, with the number of each on the docket of the commissioners, and of the district court to which it was appealed, and the corresponding number on the Index of Jimeno; also the name of the claimant, of the original grantee, the date of the grant, and the name of the rancho and of the governor who granted it, the quantity claimed, the county in which it lies, a brief statement of the proceedings with regard to it before the board, the district and supreme courts, the number of acres when surveyed, whether a patent has been issued, together with a full index of the names of ranchos and of claimants. It is hoped the volume will be found useful to the profession.

HOLMES' REPORTS.

[Holmes.]

Reports of cases in the circuit courts for the First circuit, from 1870 to 1875. By Jabez S. Holmes. Boston: Little, Brown & Co., 1877. One volume. Covers the same period as 3 and 4 Cliff., but does not contain any cases which appeared in those volumes.

HUGHES' REPORTS.

[Hughes (U. S.)]

Reports of cases in the circuit and district courts for the Fourth circuit from 1870 to 1883, with some old cases beginning in 1792. By Hon. Robert W. Hughes, district judge. Five volumes. Vols. 1-3 were published by W. & O. H. Morrison, Washington, 1877-80; vols. 4-5, by Banks & Bros., New York, 1883. The last volume is devoted to admiralty cases from 1808 to 1883.

The following preface is from vol. 1:

The decisions of the courts of the United States in the judicial circuit now designated as the Fourth, so far as yet published, are embraced in the two volumes of Burr's Trial, by David Robertson; the two volumes of Marshall's Decisions, published by John W. Brockenbrough; the volume of Taney's Circuit Court Decisions, published by J. M. Campbell; and the recent volume of Chief Justice Chase's Decisions, published by Bradley T. Johnson. In an appendix to Sixth Call's Virginia Reports are five decisions, three of which are not elsewhere to be found,¹ one of them by Chief Justice Jay, and the other two respectively by Associate Justices Iredell and Washington. These three cases, in order that they may be found in some volume of United States Reports proper, are incorporated into the present volumes. I have also incorporated a decision of Chief Justice Ellsworth never before published in a permanent form, and two other cases, from Francois Xavier Martin's Notes of North Carolina Decisions, published in 1797. [Hamilton v. Eaton, Case No. 5,980; Jones v. Neale, Id. 7,483.] This author was afterwards chief justice of the supreme court of Louisiana. The present volumes contain all the decisions up to this time made by Chief Justice Waite which he has reduced to writing; and all decisions of Circuit Judge Bond preserved in manuscript form, which I have been able after careful endeavor to obtain. To them I have added a number of decisions in circuit court made by the several district judges sitting there. I probably owe an apology to the profession for including in the present volumes so many decisions in bankruptcy and admiralty of the district courts, and especially so many which have been made by myself. But, in truth, the necessity which was felt to exist of publishing these district court decisions, suggested the publication of those also which I could collect of the circuit courts.

¹ [See Sheldon v. Custis, Case No. 12,736; U. S. v. Mundell, Id. 15,834; Banks v. Greenleaf, Id. 959.]

The admiralty jurisdiction of the ports and waters of Chesapeake Bay, and of the ports of the Carolinas, has been fruitful of many important cases, reports of which cannot fail to be interesting to admiralty lawyers generally, while they are almost indispensable to those who practice in the admiralty courts of the Fourth circuit. Many cases are decided in the admiralty courts proper, which do not reach appellate courts. These decisions are upon points most frequently arising in practice, and the rulings in them are really of more practical value to the admiralty lawyer than those often are in the exceptional cases which go up by appeal for final determination. These remarks apply with greater force to the decisions of the courts of bankruptcy contained in these volumes. In the single district of Eastern Virginia, there have been filed 6,455 cases in bankruptcy, and 161 suits connected with bankruptcy; 6,616 in all. When the writer came to the bench, in January, 1874, under rulings of circuit and supreme courts then recently and soon afterwards made, a large proportion of these cases were brought before him by petition praying the setting aside or modification or review of former orders and decrees made in them. Naturally, the action of the court upon these petitions suggested or required written explanations of the principles on which the court acted. These written decisions had often to be referred to in subsequent cases, and a desire for the publication of them in compendious and convenient form accessible to the bar has become general. These are the considerations which have induced the writer to insert many of the more important of his own decisions in bankruptcy in the second volume, and to collect from other districts of the circuit like decisions of his brethren of the bench. This he has done with diligence, and he regrets that he has been able to collect comparatively but few of these last.

Although the decisions in these volumes are not published under distinct classifications, yet the reader will find that they are in fact grouped in the following order, viz.: cases in equity, cases at law, indictments, ex parte proceedings under extraordinary writs,—these in the first volume; and, in the second, admiralty cases and bankruptcy cases. Near the end of each volume will be found a few cases dislocated from these groups. But for the feeling that reports professing to cover the period of the political offences against the civil rights and enforcement acts which have been tried in this circuit, would be deficient, if not embracing at least as many of the cases as exhibit the principles of law on which they turned, I should have gladly omitted the whole subject from these volumes. I reflect, however, that these are books for lawyers and not for politicians or the populace; that the whole class of civil disorders out of which the trials grew have ceased, I hope and believe, forever; and that even if there be in the evidence as reported anything which, in worse times than the peaceful era which we now have entered and confidently anticipate, would tend to produce or keep alive excited feeling, no such effect is or will be possible. I am sure that no public evil can come from publishing the three or four trials of the class alluded to which are given in these volumes; and I should regret to find that in the manner in which the evidence has been reported any individual or class has been wronged either by omission or exaggeration.

The following preface is from vol. 4:

The present volume of decisions in the common law, equity and bankruptcy courts of the United States, held in the Fourth judicial circuit, will be followed by a volume of admiralty decisions, now in press. These two volumes will terminate the present series of Reports, as the object of their publication will henceforth be fully subserved by the Federal Reporter, edited by Robert Desty, Esq., and published by the West Publishing Company, of St. Paul, Minnesota. That book furnishes with admirable promptness and fidelity reports of all important decisions rendered by the federal courts in all the judicial circuits and districts of the United States.

The following preface is from vol. 5:

The present volume is a collection of the decisions of the courts of the Fourth circuit on admiralty subjects which are not included in the various Reports of this circuit already published. Some of the cases contained in this volume have previously appeared in print. The first six were selected from old numbers of Hall's Law Journal (a magazine long out of print and scarce), and a number of the remainder have appeared in the Federal Reporter. But it was nevertheless deemed advisable to insert them, so as to make the volumes of Hughes' Reports an epitome of the federal decisions of the circuit—the more so, as the facilities for prompt publication afforded by the Federal Reporter will render unnecessary the continuance of the present series. It is to be regretted that reporters have not hitherto adopted more frequently the plan of collecting admiralty decisions into separate volumes. The practitioner who desires to make a specialty of admiralty finds the law on the subject scattered through scores of volumes of federal reports, many of them scarce and all costly. He may frequently have to purchase an entire volume for the sake of a single case. Hence, until late years the decisions of one circuit have been practically inaccessible to the bench and bar of another. The result has been a serious conflict of authorities on many points of admiralty law. The comparative cheapness of the later federal reports as compared with the old, the increase of association law libraries, and, above all, the foundation of the Federal Reporter will gradually make this conflict disappear. In fact it is already disappearing, and under the influences above specified the system of admiralty law is daily becoming more homogeneous and less fettered by the restrictiveness of former judges. And although in the past a support might not have been secured for such a publication, yet considering the unexampled growth of admiralty jurisdiction and litigation in the past decade, the day is not far distant when a magazine devoted exclusively to admiralty in America will be established and generously sustained. Then the admiralty lawyer will no longer be obliged, in order to keep posted in his profession, to cumber his library with hundreds of pages of mere descriptions of patent machines, or discussions as to whether some town ought to be made to pay her bonds. The plan of reporting by subjects instead of by states or circuits is certainly the proper plan and as certainly the plan of the future. A few cases have been incorporated in this volume which, while not strictly speaking a part of admiralty law, are so cognate thereto as to have been deemed worthy of insertion. The reporter, not wishing to make the judges responsible for his head-notes, has distinguished by an asterisk those which were prepared by himself, leaving without any distinguishing mark those prepared by the judges. Some of the cases have been annotated by additional authorities on the question decided; care being taken however not to use such notes as a means of inflicting the private opinions of the reporter on the profession. He regrets that the demands of his practice prevented him from making these notes more extensive.

LOWELL'S DECISIONS.

[Low.]

Judgments delivered in the federal courts for the district of Massachusetts, from 1865 to 1877. By John Lowell, district judge. Two volumes. Boston: Little, Brown & Co., 1872.

McALLISTER'S CIRCUIT COURT REPORTS.

[McAll.]

Reports of cases in the circuit courts for the districts of California, from 1855 to 1859. By Cutler McAllister. One volume. New York: John S. Voorhies, 1859.

MAC ARTHUR'S PATENT CASES.

[MacA. Pat. Cas.]

Reports of cases in the circuit and supreme courts of the District of Columbia on appeal from the commissioner of patents, with a table of the patents involved in such cases, and with references to cases wherein these patents have been subsequently litigated. By Frank MacArthur, examiner of interferences in the United States patent office. One volume. Washington, D. C.: William A. Morrison, 1885.

The following is the preface:

It is believed that these decisions of the judges on appeal, now presented to the profession in collected form, will prove an interesting addition to the literature of patent law. The decisions cover very nearly the entire period of the active life of the patent office. In the system of quasi-judicial investigation, or examination preceding the grant of the patent, which was instituted by the act of 1836, the judges of the circuit and supreme courts of the district of Columbia have acted for many years as the tribunal of last resort. According to the provisions of the original act of 1836 the applicant was given an appeal from the decision of the commissioner to a board of examiners appointed by the secretary of state for that purpose. By the act of 1839 this appellate jurisdiction was vested in the chief justice of the circuit court of the District of Columbia. This jurisdiction was extended by the act of 1842 to include the associate justices of the court. By the act of 1870 and by the Revised Statutes now in force the appeal is taken to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, sitting in general term. In their anomalous relations with an executive department, the judges do not exercise the purely judicial functions of a court of record. The judgment is recorded in the patent office and controls the further proceedings of the commissioner, but does not preclude any person interested from renewing the contest in another forum. The very singularity of this relation, however, gives peculiar value to these decisions as the opinions of the judicial mind upon the many questions that arise in the patent office in the preliminary stages of the patent unaffected by the presumptions of law that follow the patent itself throughout the subsequent litigation. In this regard these cases furnish a line of precedents bearing upon the controversies that arise by way of bill in equity under section 4915, Rev. St., to compel the issuance of the patent. For a brief period immediately following the opinion of the attorney general of August 20, 1881, the secretary of the interior exercised concurrent jurisdiction with the court as an appellate tribunal from the commissioner of patents, by way of petition, in the nature of appeal. It may now be regarded, however, as definitely established by the decision of the supreme court of the United States in the case of U. S. v. Butterworth, 29 O. G. 615, that the supreme court of the District of Columbia exercises an exclusive jurisdiction over the judicial actions of the commissioner. This circumstance may be thought to lend additional importance to these volumes. Many of the decisions appearing in this volume are already well known. Some of the opinions of Judge Cranch were included in an early edition of Curtis on Patents, and individual opinions have from time to time found their way into periodicals or have become familiar by dint of citation; but as a body of judicial learning, the decisions have been practically unavailable to the profession. Many of the cases were digested by Mr. Law in his valuable digest, under the name of "The Manuscript Appeal Cases;" but, as the lawyer is aware, the syllabus without the case is but an illusive guide to the law. This volume has been carefully and faithfully compiled from the original records on file in the United States patent office. It is expected that another volume of equal size will bring the Reports down to date, and it is the present intention of the author to include in the second volume the opinions of the attorneys general in patent matters, now scattered through the sixteen volumes of the Opinions of the Attorneys General. [Mr. MacArthur died shortly after the first volume was published, and the second was never issued.] The table of patents, which immediately precedes the text, will enable the reader to follow the subsequent history of the application or patent under consideration in any particular case so far as it has been involved in litigation, and has been construed, sustained, or declared invalid.

McCrary's Reports.

[McCrary.]

Cases in the circuit courts for the Eighth circuit, from 1877 to 1883. By George W. McCrary, circuit judge. Five volumes. Chicago: Callaghan & Co. The volumes appeared at intervals from 1881 to 1884.

McLean's Reports.

[McLean.]

Reports of cases in the circuit courts for the Seventh circuit, from 1829 to 1855. By John McLean, circuit justice. Six volumes. Vol. 1, Cincinnati: E. Morgan & Co., 1840. Vol. 2, Columbus: Derby & Allen, 1843. Vol. 3, Cincinnati: Derby, Bradley & Co., 1847. Vols. 4-6, Cincinnati: Derby & Co., 1851-1856.

The following preface is from vol. 1:

These Reports were prepared and published at the request of gentlemen of the bar, in different parts of the Seventh circuit; and it is hoped that they will be found somewhat useful to the bench and the bar, at least within the circuit. Many of the important cases reported, were taken to the supreme court for revision, and the decisions of the circuit court in all of them were affirmed, with the exception of some two or three decrees, the principles of which were mainly affirmed, but the forms of entering the decrees were modified. These modifications are stated in the Reports. In some of the opinions of the court, there will be found a similarity to the opinions of the supreme court, on a review of the same cases. This arises from the fact, that the opinions in both courts were written by the circuit judge; who does not deem it necessary to write the opinions delivered in the circuit court, over again.

MASON'S REPORTS.

[Mason.]

Reports of cases in the circuit courts for the First circuit from 1816 to 1830. By William P. Mason. Five volumes. Boston: Wells & Lilly, 1819-1831.

The following advertisement is from vol. 1:

The judicial systems of the United States, and of the separate governments composing the Union, give the promise of so unlimited an increase to the number of volumes forming the library of the American lawyer, already overcrowded with English reports, that some apology to the profession seems necessary for every additional one that is presented to it. The present series of Reports was commenced at a period when the relations between this country and Great Britain had thrown into the circuit courts of the United States an unusual quantity of business, and when the construction of national law, as well as the adjustment of private rights, had given great interest and importance to their decisions. From the local situation of the First circuit, a large proportion of the most important cases fell within the jurisdiction of this court; and it was thought that a collection of them might not be altogether unacceptable to the profession, nor without some advantage to the jurisprudence of the country. Although the same reasons cannot now be offered for the continuation of these Reports, as seemed sufficient to authorize their commencement, it is hoped that those gentlemen of the bar, who have occasion to look into this volume, will not find cause to regret its appearance. It has been the only object of the present reporter to give a correct statement of the cases as they were presented, and of the decisions of the court. The arguments of counsel have been added, when the nature of the discussion appeared to call for their insertion. To those, who are acquainted with the legal character of the learned justice who presides on this circuit, it will be sufficiently apparent, that this was all that would be left for the reporter to do.

NEWBERRY'S ADMIRALTY REPORTS.

[Newb.]

Reports of admiralty cases in the district courts for the western lake and river districts, from 1842 to 1857. By John S. Newberry, of the Detroit bar. One volume. New York: Banks, Gould & Co.; Albany: Gould, Banks & Co., 1857.

The following is the preface:

In this volume are collected the most important admiralty decisions, of seven districts of the United States, bordering upon the great northern lakes and the Mississippi river and its tributaries, for the last ten years. The admiralty courts have been gradually growing into favor with those doing business upon these waters; and they are fast absorbing the entire mass of maritime litigation growing out of the vast shipping interest and extended commerce of our inland navigation. And up to the present time, there has been no effort made to present in an authentic form, any of the admiralty decisions of the eminent judges presiding over these courts; but the profession have been compelled to rely upon newspaper reports, and tradition, for their knowledge of the decisions that may have been rendered. The want of such a book of reports has been often felt by those practicing in the admiralty courts; and it was to supply that want, that the reporter undertook to gather from the inland admiralty courts the materials forming the present volume. The author takes this opportunity to acknowledge with pleasure, the great obligation he is under to the judges whose decisions are herein reported, for their full and hearty co-operation and assistance in enabling him to present to the profession so complete, and as he hopes will prove, so valuable an addition to the admiralty learning of the country. He also would express his thanks to the many members of the profession, from Louisiana to Michigan, who have so kindly and promptly given so much valuable assistance in furnishing statements of facts, and memoranda of arguments upon the trial of the different cases. The publication of these Admiralty Reports will be continued, and will probably hereafter contain the decisions of other districts not reported in this volume.

OLCOTT'S REPORTS.

[Olcott.]

Reports of admiralty cases decided by Judge Betts in the district court for the Southern district of New York, from 1843 to 1847. By Edward R. Olcott. New York: Jacob R. Halsted, 1857.

PAINÉ'S REPORTS.

[Paine.]

Reports of cases in the circuit courts for the Second circuit, from 1810 to 1840. By Elijah Paine, Jr., counselor at law. Two volumes. The first was published in 1827, and the second in 1856, after the death of the editor, and under the supervision of Thomas W. Waterman, Esq. New York: R. Donaldson.

The following preface is from vol. 2:

A large proportion of the learning of the law is contained in the Reports. To be reminded of their utility, we need only to remember, that it is to this source we must look for the interpretation, not only of statutes, but also of all the leading rules and principles which compose our system of jurisprudence. Every elementary treatise derives its sanction from the reported cases, and no judicial proceeding is conducted without constant reference to, and dependence upon them. They are as various as the conflicting and diversified interests of society, no two cases scarcely ever being in all their features precisely alike. It is this protean character which gives them their true value, for they thus become eminently serviceable as examples. Arising, as they do, from the common transactions of active life, at the period of their decision they are of more or less practical significance; and while it must be admitted that some, in the progress of time, become obsolete, yet many, founded as they are upon the broad and everlasting foundation of universal justice, continue to be studied and cited long after the occasion which gave birth to them has been forgotten. It is not surprising, then, that this species of knowledge is sought after with avidity by the profession, and that the best and most useful libraries are those which are the most complete in all the standard reports. In a commercial community like ours, cases of deep general interest, involving many nice questions, are constantly being tried, and it cannot be doubted that the withholding an accurate report of them, would be a public misfortune.

The comparative value of reports must depend upon the importance of the questions decided in them, as well as upon the dignity, ability and learning of the court. It may be safely affirmed, that the cases in the second volume of Paine's Circuit Court Reports, are, at least, equal in interest and importance, to any to be found in similar publications, while some of them are of very decided value. With regard to the court, it may be sufficient to remind the reader that they not only emanate from the circuit court of the United States, but from some of the ablest judges of that court. Of the judges we have only to enumerate the illustrious names of Chief Justice Jay, Brockholst Livingston, Wm. P. Van Ness, James M. Wayne and Smith Thompson, to be satisfied of the high character of the bench which pronounced these opinions, and of their consequent weight as authority. To Justice Thompson, however, we are chiefly indebted for the learned, clear and satisfactory decisions which are contained in this volume. [Here follows a reference concerning Mr. Justice Thompson, which will be found in the Biographical Notes.] He subsequently filled the post and discharged the duties of chief justice of the state of New York; and on the 18th of March, 1823, a vacancy having occurred on the bench of the supreme court of the United States, by the lamented death of the Hon. Brockholst Livingston, one of the associate justices and presiding judge of the circuit court in the Second circuit, on the 9th of December of the same year Judge Thompson was appointed his successor. It was while he served in the latter capacity that the opinions contained in the following pages were pronounced. They were given by Judge Thompson when he had attained the fullest maturity of judgment, and after many years rich in experience as well as in study; they ought, therefore, to possess, and doubtless do possess, a superior value. This volume has been compiled from manuscript cases which the late Hon. Elijah Paine, Jr., had collected, and partly arranged with a view to publication. The design of Judge Paine was, that they should form a second volume in the series of his Circuit Court Reports, and he had selected them with care for that purpose. They begin in 1827 and continue to 1840, thus commencing where the cases in the first volume of Paine's Circuit Court Reports leave off, and extending over a period of thirteen subsequent years. They were all decided in the Second circuit with one exception—a case relative to the right of British creditors to recover claims which subsisted prior to the American Revolution, tried in the Virginia circuit; and in which the general principles of international obligation which ought to govern in such cases, are discussed with great learning and ability by Chief Justice Jay. As this case had been marked for publication by Judge Paine, and was in itself of considerable interest and importance, it was not thought advisable to omit it; although it did not come within the original design and scope of the work, which was simply to report cases tried in the Second circuit. The biographical sketch of the late Judge Paine [see Appendix], prepared by his brother, Dr. Martyn Paine, a physician of eminence of this city, will command attention for the feeling, yet truthful tribute of affectionate admiration and regard it pays to the memory of one whom, while living, the bar of New York delighted to honor, and the recollection of whose learning and virtues, now that he is no more, will long be preserved. The duties of the present editor may be comprised as follows: A careful and thorough revision of the manuscript; the preparation of an outline or statement of each case, except when rendered unnecessary by minuteness and circumstantiality in the opinion; ample and comprehensive, and yet concise head notes; a complete table of cases; and a very full index. Both volumes have also been annotated with a view to introduce the more recent cases. It is hoped that the notes, which are quite extensive, will prove useful, and that they will enhance the practical value of the work.

PETERS' ADMIRALTY DECISIONS.

[Pet. Adm.]

Admiralty decisions in the district court for Pennsylvania. By the Honorable Richard Peters, with some cases decided by Judge Hopkinson, from 1780 to 1806, and a few cases from other districts. The appendix contains the laws of Oleron, Wisbuy, and the Hanse Towns, with the marine ordinances of Louis XIV., a Treatise on Admiralty, and the laws of the United States relative to mariners. Two volumes. Sometimes printed as one. Philadelphia: William P. Farrand, 1807.

PETERS' CIRCUIT COURT REPORTS.

[Pet. C. C.]

Reports of cases in the circuit courts for the Third circuit, from 1803 to 1818. By Richard Peters, Jr., counselor at law. One volume. Philadelphia: William Fry, 1819. It covers part of the period covered by Washington's Reports, but no cases are duplicated.

The following is the advertisement:

The public are exclusively indebted to Mr. Justice Washington for the reports contained in this volume. They have been compiled from his note books, in which they were entered, with no view to their publication, but solely for his private reference. They will be found to contain all the essential parts of a full report of the cases, and a faithful statement of the opinion of the court, on the points intended to be decided. It would have comported more with the estimate the editor has formed of the duties executed by him, to have omitted his name in the title page, but in compliance with the wishes of Judge Washington, and as this volume forms the first, of a series of Reports he is about to publish, of decisions in the same court, and in which his agency will be more extensive, the present form has been adopted.

This volume contains all the cases decided in the circuit court, for the district of New Jersey, since Mr. Justice Washington presided in that court, and as late as April term, 1818; and all the decisions in the Pennsylvania district from 1815, to the division of the district, in 1818. The publication of the earlier decisions of the court, in the Pennsylvania district, has been undertaken by a gentleman, whose skill and ability for the performance of the task, is universally admitted, and by whose liberal relinquishment of the situation, in favour of the editor of this volume, he has become the reporter of the decisions of the circuit court of the United States, for the Third circuit.

ROBB'S PATENT CASES.

[Robb, Pat. Cas.]

A collection of patent cases decided in the supreme and circuit courts from 1789 to 1850, with notes. By James B. Robb, counselor at law. Two volumes. Boston: Little, Brown & Co., 1854.

- o The following preface is from vol. 1:

The collection of cases embraced in these two volumes, contain all of the patent cases decided in the circuit courts of the United States and reported prior to the first of January, 1850; and all of the cases decided in the supreme court of the United States to the same period. They are arranged as nearly as may be in chronological order; numbering one hundred and twenty-four cases, selected from sixty volumes of Reports, namely: Washington, Brockenhoro', Peters, McLean, Paine, Gilpin, Gallison, Mason, Wallace, Sumner, Baldwin, Story, and Woodbury and Minot, of the Circuit Court Reports;—and Cranch, Wheaton, Peters, and Howard, of the Supreme Court Reports, thus embracing all of the decisions illustrating the principles of the patent laws of the United States. A few cases have been decided by the state courts, involving, incidentally, questions arising under the patent laws, which have been omitted, as not affecting the principles or doctrines settled by the United States courts; exclusive jurisdiction of these subjects, in the administration of the patent laws, being vested in the United States circuit and supreme courts. The decisions upon the earlier statutes, in all cases which have been modified by subsequent legislation, have been appropriately noted, with reference to the statutes, a collection of which will be found in the appendix, with marginal notes indicating the alterations and additional provisions. The index embraces all of the topics discussed and decided by these courts, and is so full as to greatly abridge the labor of search for the requisite authority. It is proposed to continue this collection by the addition, from time to time, of volumes embracing the cases decided subsequent to the first of January, 1850, if the facilities afforded hereby shall be deemed sufficient to warrant it. It is much to be regretted that the numerous decisions of his honor, Judge Sprague, in the circuit court for the district of Massachusetts, have not been reported. Their luminous exposition of the principles of the patent laws, in their application to the increasing and ever-varying mechanical developments of the laws of phenomena, in their progress from obvious to refined and intangible distinctions, which characterize the cases which he has been called upon to decide, would not only have enhanced the value of these volumes, but would have greatly enriched the science of mechanical jurisprudence. Such of these decisions, however, as may have been preserved, will be collected and embraced in the subsequent volumes of these Reports.

SAWYER'S REPORTS.

[Sawy.]

Reports of cases in the circuit and district courts for the Ninth circuit, from 1870 to 1884. By L. S. B. Sawyer. Fourteen volumes. San Francisco: A. L. Bancroft & Co., and the Bancroft-Whitney Co., 1873-1891.

The following preface is from vol. 1:

The judges of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the Ninth circuit, yielding to a very generally expressed desire of the legal profession in the circuit, that their decisions should be reported in a regular series, have authorized the undersigned to report such of the numerous decisions rendered as may be supposed to be of a somewhat general and permanent interest to the profession. The series will commence with the reorganization of the circuit courts, by the appointment of circuit judges, under the act of congress of April 10th, 1869. The extension of the jurisdiction of the national courts by recent legislation, and the appointment of circuit judges, who will be at all times engaged in the discharge of their duties on the circuit, has tendered to largely increase the business of these courts. Many legal propositions of great interest and importance are discussed in the decisions now being rendered in the United States circuit and district courts, and no circuit is likely to present a greater number of new and important questions of lasting interest, than the Ninth. The Reports now commenced will embrace cases at law, civil and criminal; cases in equity, admiralty, and bankruptcy; and special cases arising under acts of congress. The circuit court for the district of California, in addition to its ordinary jurisdiction, has, also, the new and final appellate jurisdiction from the United States consular and ministerial courts in China and Japan, in the exercise of which novel and interesting questions for adjudication are likely to arise. This volume contains the first case brought to the circuit court from the consular court at Canton, in the Empire of China. Should the demand for the present volume indicate that it supplies a want to the profession, the series will be continued.

The following note is taken from vol. 4, p. 455:

The following cases were decided by Mr. Justice Field, in the circuit court, before the passage of the act of 1869, providing for the appointment of circuit judges. Those relating to the title to real property are of special interest to the profession in California. The other cases are believed to be of general interest. Most of them have been often cited from the manuscript by the California bar, and a desire has been expressed that they should be reported. The charges of the court, in the few instances in which they are given, were delivered in writing, after argument, upon the points of law involved. The questions received as thorough consideration as is given to cases tried without a jury.

SPRAGUE'S DECISIONS.

[Spr.]

Decisions by Judge Sprague in maritime, admiralty, and prize causes in the district court for Massachusetts, from 1841 to 1864. Two volumes. Vol. 1 is edited by F. E. Parker; vol. 2, by John Lathrop. Vol. 1 was published in 1861 by T. & J. W. Johnson & Co., Philadelphia. The second volume was published in 1863 by Little, Brown & Co., Boston.

The following preface is from vol. 1:

A small part only, of the decisions made by Judge Sprague, have ever been reported. Owing to his inability to use his eyes in reading or writing, his opinions were delivered orally. A considerable number of the opinions, embraced in this volume, especially the more elaborate ones, were originally written out from his dictation, and some of them are now published for the first time. The others were in the first instance reported by the counsel, and published in the Law Reporter, or elsewhere. All of them have been revised by Judge Sprague, and now appear with his sanction. In this revision, the original reports have, sometimes, been curtailed, by omitting the analysis and comparison of evidence, which, however important to the parties in the cause, are of no interest to the professional reader, who desires only to know what were the facts found by the court, upon which the law was pronounced. The head-notes were prepared by the judge; as a general rule, they contain only the points decided, but in some instances embrace legal propositions which were the foundation of the reasoning of the court. An occasional foot-note has been added, where the authorities subsequent to the decisions seemed to demand it; and these, and the references to cases, have been made by me as editor. In collecting the reported cases, I have had the valuable assistance of Mr. Charles Francis Adams, Jr., of the Boston bar, by whom most of that labor was performed.

The following preface is from vol. 2:

The first volume of Sprague's Decisions was published in 1861. In the early part of 1865, Judge Sprague retired from the bench. This volume includes the most important of the decisions rendered by him subsequently to the publication of the first volume of his decisions, and some of a prior date. All of them now appear with the sanction of Judge Sprague. The prize cases were prepared for publication by the Hon. Richard H. Dana, Jr. The foot-notes were made by me as editor, and the work has been published under my supervision. [Signed] John Lathrop.

STORY'S REPORTS.

[Story.]

Reports of cases in the circuit courts for the First circuit, from 1839 to 1845. By William W. Story. Three volumes. Boston: Charles C. Little and James Brown, 1842-1855.

The following preface is from vol. 3:

This volume contains the last opinions ever pronounced by Mr. Justice Story, and concludes the grateful labors of the present reporter. It will be found to contain no indications of failure of powers, but to give added proof of that comprehensive grasp of intellect, singular acuteness in analysis, luminous insight, and breadth of learning, which in him were so harmoniously blended, and directed to the great end of morals, justice and humanity. While the last opinion in this book was yet undelivered, Mr. Justice Story, after a short and violent illness, died on the 10th day of September, 1845, at the age of 66. [Here follows an account of the proceedings of the bar upon the death of Justice Story, which will be found under "Story" in the Biographical Notes.]

SUMNER'S REPORTS.

[Sumn.]

Reports of cases in the circuit court for the First circuit, from 1829 to 1839, by Hon. Charles Sumner. Three volumes. The second edition was published in 1851 by Charles C. Little and James Brown, Boston.

TANEY'S CIRCUIT COURT REPORTS.

[Taney.]

Reports of cases in the circuit court for the district of Maryland, decided by Roger Brooke Taney, chief justice of the supreme court, from 1836 to 1861. Reported by James Maron Campbell, of the Baltimore bar. One volume. Philadelphia: Kay & Bro., 1871.

The following notice is from page iii.:

As circumstances prevented the publication of this volume during the lifetime of the compiler, the laborious and important duty of reading the proof necessarily devolved upon others. In this emergency, Mr. Brightly, of the Philadelphia bar, most kindly offered his services. The family of the late chief justice desire to express their appreciation of the motives which prompted him to this "labor of love," while they feel assured they may unite with the profession in the opinion,

"Nil tangit quod non æquiparat."

VAN NESS' PRIZE CASES.

[Van Ness.]

Reports of two prize cases in the district court for the New York district. By the Honorable William P. Van Ness, district judge. New York: Gould, Banks & Gould, 1814.

The following is the preface:

The first of the following opinions was published in the National Advocate on the 3d January last. The amount of property in controversy, the nature of the principles which it involved, and the ability with which they had been examined and illustrated by the judge, gave to this case a novelty and importance that attracted very general attention. The publishers were so frequently applied to, by their customers and others, for copies of this opinion, without being able to supply the demand, that they at length resolved to reprint it in the form of a pamphlet. While it was in the press, they were informed that Judge Van Ness had decided another interesting question of prize law; and on application to him, received the second of the following opinions. This, in point of time, was first delivered; but as the printing of the other was commenced before it was obtained, the order could not conveniently be changed. This will explain also some allusions in the Case of Beswicke & Son, to questions decided in the Case of Richardson.

WALLACE'S NOTES OF DECISIONS.

Manuscript reports of cases in the Third circuit. See Wall. Sr.

WALLACE'S REPORTS.

[Wall. Sr.]

Reports of cases in the circuit court for the Third circuit in 1801. By John B. Wallace. One volume. The second edition was published in 1838, with two additional cases. This has been reprinted by W. J. Gilbert, St. Louis, 1871.

The following is the preface to the first edition:

By those who are conversant with subjects of municipal jurisprudence, the design of publishing memorials of adjudged cases in the circuit court of the United States for the Third circuit, will, no doubt, be received with approbation. Questions on the constitution and laws of the United States, on general commercial law, and the law of nations, must furnish a series of decisions highly valuable to every juridical officer, and of great importance to the community; and such are the questions which will principally occupy the attention of this court. It is only for the execution of the task, that I feel anxiety. I am no ways satisfied, that this first essay will be thought to augur favorably of the reporter. It may serve, however, to soften the rigor of judgment, to know that it has been made under considerable disadvantages which will not attend upon future efforts; and if, in these circumstances, the present publication should meet with patronage, I shall feel encouraged to proceed, in the hope of arriving much nearer to the point of merit. The state of each case will, I think, be found to be accurately given; and the opinion of the court, generally, in the words in which it was delivered; with only such slight departures in mere phraseology, as to create no variation in the sense. It does not come within the power of any one but the stenographer, to exhibit a copy of an oral discourse that shall, in every particular, comport with the original. Where the opinions were written, I have been favored by the judges with leave to take copies. As to the arguments of counsel, from their nature, they require much compression: where several are concerned; the arguments of all on each side must be thrown together. In doing this, much of the spirit, and many of the beauties of an eloquent debate will be lost. I have to lament, that it is not within the compass of such compilations to do justice to the great abilities which are conspicuous at the bar of the court in which these cases were decided. All that I can profess to have given on this head, is a correct state of the points made by the counsel, and the substance of the arguments on each side. It may be thought that I sometimes give to the arguments a cast rather more forensic than is usual in the modern style of reporting; and that I too frequently introduce into the principal report, colloquial and incidental matter. I am not conscious, however, of having indulged this too far; and where I have yielded to it, I promise myself, it will be found to answer some useful purpose; and to present, if not so much of symmetry, at least a more natural exhibition of the case. I have only to add, that in the outset of a great national judicature, it appeared to me proper, not only to record the more solemn sentences of the law, but also to preserve rules of practice, and the course of proceeding. In courts long established, and where the practical forms and principles are well understood, or may be traced to digested systems, the preservation of these incidental cases of a discretionary kind, would not be so important. But in this court, which must, in some measure, originate a code of practice, points of that nature, when settled, become of considerable consequence. Should my design be approved, I purpose to continue a report of the adjudged cases in the Third circuit.

The following is the preface to the second edition:

Frequent orders, which we have not been able to supply, for these Reports of the late Mr. Wallace, published many years ago, have induced a reprint of them; to which are added two new cases, decided in the same court, and hitherto unpublished. The volume appeared originally in a pamphlet number, and was intended to have been continued. The court itself, however, was of short duration. Its history, brief and instructive, has thus been beautifully given to us: "It was established at the close of the second administration of our government; and although this particular measure was deemed by wise men on all sides, and is still cited by many of them as the happiest organization of the federal judiciary, yet, having grown up amid the contentions of party, it was not spared by that which spares nothing. In a year after its enactment, the law which erected the court was repealed; and judges who had received their offices during good behavior, were deprived of their offices without the imputation of a fault." Much time and labor, it is known, were bestowed by Mr. Wallace, in recording the decisions of the court which succeeded; and we have lamented, in common with others, that the profession never realized the expectation long had, of seeing the decisions of Judge Washington thus favorably presented to the public. The publication, though actually begun, was delayed, and the manuscripts of that excellent judge, since printed, give ideas of the cases in general so correct, that considering the size of the work, and that it is still easily to be found, a continuation of the work of the original reporter is not undertaken.

The following reference to this work of Mr. Wallace is taken from Wallace's Reporters, pp. 340-341, footnote:

It was their author's intention [John Bradford Wallace, author of Wallace, Sen., Reports] to publish the decisions of Judge Washington [associate justice of the United States supreme court], and there were recently in the possession of his son, the late Horace B. Wallace, Esq., of Philadelphia, whose testamentary executor purposes to present them to the Franklin Library [now known as the "Philadelphia Library"] of that city, three large volumes richly bound in blue Turkey morocco of the Reporter's Notes, from 1801 to 1816, of cases in the Third circuit, of which the bench was then occupied by Judges Washington and Peters. They cover a part of the same term embraced by the work called "Washington's Circuit Court Reports": "a book," says Mr. Marvin (Leg. Bibl. 720), "which was printed from Judge Washington's Notes, never originally designed for the press; and which while accurate, so far as it goes, is but an imperfect monument to the judicial powers of that upright man. It was a matter of deep regret with Judge Washington, as it was with the profession of that day generally, and especially with Mr. Wallace's friends, that the decision of the Third circuit should not have been given to the bar by their original reporter. The work would have been an enduring monument alike of his fine intellectual powers and accomplishments, and of Judge Washington's first-rate capacities as a judge upon the circuit."

These Notes of Decisions by Wallace have been examined. They are contained in three manuscript folio volumes, in the Philadelphia Library. The first is a folio of trials, containing arguments of counsel, time of adjournment of court, remarks of Justice Washington of points of law, objections to evidence and witnesses, etc. The reporter seems to have watched the trials very closely, and to have taken minute and accurate notes of the proceedings. This folio contains no opinions. The second is a folio of hearings on motions and rules, with the points of counsel in reference thereto. The cases are the same as in the folio of trials. There are no opinions in the folio of rules, but the arguments of counsel are given exhaustively. The third is a folio of opinions, containing facts and opinions in federal cases, with a few state (Pennsylvania) cases added. Pencil notes on the margin seem to indicate that these cases have been resorted to for publication (probably for Washington's Circuit Court Reports, to certain volumes of which these marginal notes often refer, and with which the cases in this folio compare very closely). This folio, unlike the others, seems to have been prepared for the press, though the pages are not numbered, and seem to have been thrown together without order after copying the manuscript. The cases in all the folios are the same, and all the federal cases are contained in Washington's Circuit Court Reports.

WALLACE, JR.'S REPORTS.

[Wall. Jr.]

Cases in the circuit court for the Third circuit, from 1842 to 1862. Reported by John William Wallace. Three volumes. Philadelphia: Vol. 1, Walker, 1849; vols. 2 and 3, T. & J. W. Johnson & Co., 1854-1871.

WARE'S REPORTS.

[Ware.]

Cases decided by Hon. Ashur Ware in the district court for the district of Maine. Vol. 1 (1822-1829), Portland: Colman & Chisholm, 1839; 2d Ed., by Edward H. Daveis (with additional cases, 1854-1855), Boston: Little, Brown & Co., 1856; vol. 2 (1839-1849), by Daveis, and sometimes cited as Daveis' Reports, Portland, 1849; 2d Ed., Portland: Loring, Short & Harmon, 1873. Vol. 2 contains some of Judge Ware's decisions in the circuit court. Vol. 3 (1853-1866), by George F. Emery, Portland: Loring, Short & Harmon, 1874.

The following preface is from vol. 1, 2d Ed.:

The first edition of these Reports has been out of print for several years. In preparing the second, a few notes have been added, and some additional cases, decided since the publication of Daveis' Reports. The corrections of typographical errors in the first edition, wherever the sense is affected by them, have been made under the direction of Judge Ware.

The following preface is from vol. 2, first edition:

This volume contains a selection of cases in the district court, principally in admiralty, decided by Judge Ware since the publication of Ware's Reports, and also some opinions pronounced by him in cases decided in the circuit court. The Note upon the Admiralty Jurisdiction [Case No. 6,914], was written out at the request of the reporter, while the printing was in progress. The decisions in bankruptcy, which formed the great mass of the business in the district court, for some years after the act went into operation, have been omitted, excepting a few cases presenting points of more general application. The rubrics have been prepared under direction of the judge, and are generally given as made by him at the time the cases were decided.

The following preface is from vol. 2, 2d Ed.:

This volume is a reprint of Daveis' Reports, published in 1849. Its present title has been substituted for that of the former edition for sake of uniformity, it being the purpose of the publishers to issue a third volume of Judge Ware's Decisions, which have never been published in a form for preservation.

The following preface is from vol. 3:

A short time prior to the death of Judge Ware, the materials constituting the principal contents of this volume were placed in the hands of the reporter, for the purpose of preparing the same for publication in a form suitable for preservation. Some of the more important cases, especially those decided in Massachusetts district during the temporary illness of Judge Sprague, have been heretofore published in periodicals of an ephemeral character, but the major part of them has never appeared in print in any form. In preparing this, the third and last volume of Ware's Reports, the reporter did not have the benefit of the supervision of the author of these "decisions," which will account for (especially among those familiar with Judge Ware's chirography) defects which otherwise would have been avoided. But however defective the manner of executing the work, the text of the volume will be found as perfect as was practicable to make it during the process of printing; and although errors in the citations of authorities may be frequently noticed, especially of statutes, those can be readily overcome by referring to the "Errata," which has been prepared with care since the body of the work went to press. No apology surely will be required for preserving in an enduring form the eulogiums found in the appendix, much less for giving to the public the latest opinions of him of whose prior ones the eminent judge who succeeded their author so recently said: "I believe no treatises or reports are now extant which are at this moment more useful to the profession, or more frequently acknowledged as authority, or which can afford more knowledge and information, than these reports."

[Signed]

Geo. F. Emery.

The following advertisement is from vol. 3:

This volume contains the latest opinions of Judge Ware, and is entirely new. It is a sequel to the first and second volumes (the latter originally entitled "Daveis' Reports") issued in his lifetime. All together give to the public the benefit of his judicial labors for more than forty years. Congress having failed to confer on him the advantages of the retracy provisions now provided for judges of the federal courts, this publication appeals with all the more force to the patronage of a profession not wont to ignore the service of a public benefactor.

WASHINGTON'S CIRCUIT COURT REPORTS.

[Wash. C. C.]

Reports of cases in the circuit court for the Third circuit from 1803 to 1827. Reported by Richard Peters, Jr. Four volumes. Philadelphia: P. H. Nicklin and P. Johnson. Vol. 4 was published in 1829. A second edition was published in 1853 by T. & J. W. Johnson, Philadelphia.

The following advertisement is from vol. 1:

When, in 1819, the editor published "Reports of Cases Determined in the Circuit Court of the United States, for the Third Circuit," it was his intention to proceed with a work which would have placed in the hands of the profession, the decisions of that court from 1815 to the present period. This purpose has been suspended, in consequence of an impression, derived from the limited sale of the volume, that the publication of the earlier cases, should have preceded those which were then printed. That these cases would have appeared long since, was an expectation entertained and expressed at the period referred to. It was understood, that they had been prepared for the press, by a professional gentleman, who had devoted much time and attention to the trust; and who intended to complete the work within a short time. [This reference is to Wallace's Notes of Decisions; for an account of them see Wall. Sr.] These expectations have been disappointed; and in accordance with the wishes of Judge Washington, these Reports are now published; this volume being the first of a series, which will contain all cases decided in the Third circuit, during the time that distinguished and learned gentleman has presided in the court. The cases are taken from the manuscripts of the judge, and they will be found to contain all the matters essential to be known, and a full and accurate statement of the opinions of the court, in every case. It may be claimed with confidence, that this work will contain a body of law, of the highest interest to the community. The jurisdiction of the circuit court of the United States, extends to international and commercial questions, of the greatest, and of the most general importance: its particular province to examine and decide upon revenue, and questions arising under the patent laws; and the final determination by the court, of the many principles by which the land titles of a very considerable portion of Pennsylvania are regulated—these circumstances, together with the various and changing relations of the United States, between 1803 and 1815; our neutrality; our belligerent and peaceful positions; gave rise to very many of the most intricate and important legal investigations. The volume now published will be immediately followed by others, and the work will be completed as early as possible.

The following advertisement is from vol. 3:

The editor, in presenting this volume to the profession, begs leave to state, that, contrary to his expectations, the work cannot be comprehended in less than four volumes. This is the necessary result of the abundance and importance of the matter, contained in the manuscripts of Mr. Justice Washington; and of the length of the judicial period, during which he has, so honourably and so ably, presided in the circuit court of the United States, for the Third circuit. In this volume, are, the decisions of Judge Washington in the circuit court of Pennsylvania, from April term, 1811, to April term, 1814, inclusive; and from April term, 1818, to October term, 1819, also inclusive; and the cases decided in the circuit court of New Jersey from April, 1818, to October, 1820. The intervening cases are contained in 1 Peters's Reports, published in 1819. It is not intended to proceed further with the last-mentioned work; but to complete the publication of the remaining cases decided in Pennsylvania and New-Jersey, in a fourth volume to these Reports; which it is expected will be printed in 1828. The three volumes of these Reports, with First Peters's Reports, and the succeeding volume of the present work, will exhibit a series of decisions, commencing in 1803, and ending in 1828. In no portion of the political existence of the United States, have cases of such novelty, interest, and high importance to the community, been presented before the courts of the United States, for judicial investigation and decision; and before the circuit court, for the Third circuit, most of the questions of law arising out of these cases, have been first examined and adjudged.

The following preface is from vol. 4:

The editor has now completed the pledge given to the profession and to the public, on the commencement of this work. The present volume contains the decisions of the circuit court of the United States for the Third circuit, comprising the districts of Pennsylvania and New Jersey, from April term, 1820, to October term, 1827, inclusive; with some cases decided in 1818 and 1819, omitted in the third volume of this work; and completing the series of cases adjudged in that court from 1803. Few of the decisions of the court remain to be published. By the liberality of Messrs. Nicklin and Johnson, this volume has been extended to an unusual size, for the purpose of completing the series, as far as practicable; and it will be found to contain a body of most useful and highly valuable law learning, and an equal, if not a greater number of interesting cases, than any volume of reports heretofore published in the United States. In the conclusion of his labours, the editor claims to avail himself of the occasion to express his high sense of the judicial talents, legal discrimination, laborious and persevering industry, and exalted virtues of the learned and venerable judge, from whose manuscripts, exclusively, this work has been published. In this record of his feelings, he proudly testifies his gratitude for the affectionate friendship, and for the many manifestations of kindness and regard he has received from Mr. Justice Washington.

WOODBURY AND MINOT'S REPORTS.

[Woodb. & M.]

Reports of cases in the circuit court for the First circuit from 1845 to 1847. By Charles L. Woodbury and George Minot. Three volumes. Boston: Charles C. Little and James Brown, 1847-1852.

WOODS' REPORTS.

[Woods.]

Cases in the circuit courts for the Fifth circuit, from 1870 to 1882. Reported by Hon. William B. Woods, circuit judge. Four volumes. Chicago: Callaghan & Co., 1875-1883.

WOOLWORTH'S CIRCUIT COURT REPORTS.

[Woolw.]

Cases in the circuit courts for the Eighth circuit, from 1863 to 1869, being the decisions of the Honorable Samuel F. Miller, associate justice of the supreme court. Reported by James M. Woolworth, counselor at law. One volume. Chicago: Callaghan & Cockerroft, 1870.

RESOLUTIONS

AND OTHER

PROCEEDINGS UPON THE RETIREMENT OF FEDERAL JUDGES.

BETTS, SAMUEL ROSSITER.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1363.]

The following extract is reprinted from 2 Ben. 559:

Died at New Haven, Nov. 3, 1863, Samuel Rossiter Betts, for many years judge of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York.

The following were the proceedings in that court on the announcement of his death on the following day, Judge Blatchford, with Judge Benedict, of the eastern district, being on the bench:

Hon. Samuel G. Courtney, district attorney of the United States, moved the adjournment of the court as follows: "May it please your honors, I rise to perform the sad duty of announcing formally to the court the death of Hon. Samuel R. Betts, for nearly forty-five years the judge of the United States district court in this district. He died on Monday evening at New Haven, whither he had removed after his resignation of his seat upon the bench. My acquaintance with him was of recent date, but during the time that I have been officially connected with this court I have been brought into intimate relations with him, and I always found him courteous, kind, and urbane in every respect. To the older members of the bar his history is better known than to me, and I shall leave it to them to say what they have to say of his character and merits. I will only say that he died full of years and full of honors, and out of respect to his memory I move that this court do now adjourn."

Mr. E. C. Benedict rose to second the motion, and said: "I feel that it is my painful duty to say a few words in seconding this motion, because of my long acquaintance with Judge Betts, and my long practice in this court. I had known him since 1823, when I was a student in his office, and his family I had known before that time. I have practiced almost uninterruptedly in this court since his appointment, in 1827, by Mr. Adams, who, together with Mr. Clay, signed his commission. He came to this city from the country, where he had been eminent at the bar, and for some years circuit judge. He came, therefore, with great familiarity with the legal questions which occupy the courts of common law, but with little acquaintance with those with which an admiralty court must deal. When he came here there was almost no business in the court. It did not then sit a week where now it sits a month. Thus he had leisure to familiarize himself with the law of admiralty, and he soon became one of the most learned judges in that branch of the law. As time went on the business of the court increased, and his experience in admiralty became far more extended than that of any other judge that ever sat on the bench. He, more than any other man, formed the admiralty system of the United States. When he came to the bench the British view of the jurisdiction of the admiralty prevailed. He devoted himself to that branch of the law in the spirit which belonged to it of old, and which has since been adopted by the jurists and courts of this country, and his views have prevailed everywhere, though at first they were a novelty. His decisions were always characterized by acuteness, learning, and research. If they had been carefully reported they would have built up for him a reputation which would have been like that which the chancery decisions of this state gave Chancellor Kent, or which the English admiralty decisions gave to Lord Stowell. But in those days the newspapers were not, as they are now, volumes of reports, and Judge Betts always seemed not entirely satisfied with the form of his decisions, and was reluctant to publish them till he had given them a more perfect finish: and though I was appointed reporter of the court many years ago, I did not succeed in getting together matter enough even for a pamphlet, before his greatly increased labors by the bankrupt act of 1840 prevented his giving any attention to it, and the idea was abandoned till its importance was destroyed by reports of other courts. Judge Betts was a man of urbanity and kindness to all who practiced before him. All who practiced in his court, young or old, always felt that they had had full opportunity to be heard, and that they had been treated with uniform kindness and courtesy,—an excellent quality in a judge. We can hardly realize, in these days, when changes are so frequent upon the bench, what it was to have a judge upon the bench for forty years, as he was. He reached great age, and gave an example to us all of the results of a quiet and uniform and industrious life of moral and domestic virtue. His death calls upon us all to prepare for that end of life to which we must all come, and which few of us can expect to have deferred as long as it was in his case."

Judge Beebe then spoke as follows: "Perhaps I, too, should say a word on the occasion which has called so many members of the bar together. When a boy I commenced a student's life in the office of my friend who has just sat down, and soon gained familiarity with the business in that office, and therefore with the business of this court. And in my practice since that time I have experienced many kindnesses and often indulgence at the hands of Judge Betts. When I was a boy I always received from him treatment which gave me courage and hope, and during my long acquaintance with him there has been no jar in our friendship. I have always had the utmost respect and affection for him, and we all reverence his memory now that he has gone. Few men reached the years which he reached or the honors which he attained. He was a man of extraordinary industry, who never allowed any matter to pass before him without careful consideration, and a great many hours and years of labor were spent in elaboration, which he conscientiously believed to be his duty, for he was a man instant in season and out of season in the performance of duty. He has passed away, and it is due to us who remain to pay respect to his memory, and I again second the motion that the court adjourn."

Judge Benedict said: "My own relations with Judge Betts were perhaps somewhat different from those of any one present. I first began to know him as a student; my first cause I tried before him; I practiced before him as long as I continued at the bar, and when I took my seat upon the bench I was in some sense associated with him as judge. To his kindness to me as a lad, to his patience with me while at the bar, and to his uniform kindness to me while on the bench, I desire to bear my testimony, and the motion seems to me eminently proper."

Judge Blatchford said: "I can add but little to what has been said. Sitting in this place as the successor of Judge Betts, and brought into intimate familiarity as I am daily with his decisions in all branches of the law administered here, I cannot but express the obligations which both the bench and the bar are under to this distinguished judge for the light which he has shed upon the path of this court. My acquaintance with him began some twenty years ago, and my relations with him have been intimate since then. He was always kind, encouraging, faithful, industrious, and conscientious in the discharge of every judicial duty. Of one branch of his judicial career I can speak better, perhaps, than any other person. I refer to the great services which he rendered to his country and to the law, in the prize cases which came before the court during the late Rebellion. In preparing his decisions in those cases for the press, as I did, I was amazed at the industry with which the judge, from the seventy-eighth to the eighty-second year of his life, went through the mass of papers in those cases, going over the evidence in each, digesting it and spreading it out in an opinion, so that the volume now stands for the information of all who have need of information on any branch of that subject. As it was the first great war that the country had waged, he was, as it were, treading a new path, using principles which had been already discussed, but adapting them to entirely new circumstances. And it was done with a clearness and a care which made the work a fitting close to his career. He has added to the reputation of the country by it, and I think the country owes a greater debt to him than to any other man in this branch of the law. I cordially accede to the request of the bar, and direct the court to stand adjourned till Friday, and this motion to be entered on the minutes."

BOYLE, JOHN.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1364.]

The following obituary notice is reprinted from 1 McLean, 558:

Judge Boyle, like almost all the distinguished men of the west, and indeed of the east, was indebted for the eminence he acquired to his own exertions. Having no influential friends in early life, and his parents being poor, he was thrown upon the native vigor of his own mind; and the history of his life affords that fine development of mind and of character which justly excites universal admiration. At the bar he soon attained a lucrative business and an enviable reputation. Without his solicitation, and scarcely with his consent, in 1802 he was taken up by the people and elected to congress. In that body he became highly respected for his intelligence and uncompromising integrity. He attracted the attention and confidence of Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison, in a very high degree; the latter of whom, in 1809, unsolicited, appointed him governor of the Illinois territory. This office was much sought after and desired, but it was not suited to the taste of Judge Boyle, and he eventually declined its acceptance. The appointment was then conferred on Ninian Edwards, chief justice of the court of appeals of Kentucky. To the station thus made vacant, Judge Boyle was appointed. The important office of chief justice he filled with great ability for many years, until he was appointed district judge of the United States for Kentucky, on the promotion of Judge Trimble to the supreme bench of the Union. To this station he carried great experience and high talent; and he continued to discharge its duties most faithfully and ably until his lamented death, which took place in the winter of 1835. Judge Boyle's opinions, published in the Kentucky Reports, show a mind deeply imbued with the science of his profession. They are learned, and able, and just. They place his character for high intelligence and learning on an imperishable basis. Few, if any, of the sons of his adopted state have left to her a richer legacy. They emit and will continue to emit, in all time to come, a clear and a steady light on the jurisprudence of the state, and on rights public and private. Of such a legacy the state may well be proud. It was the result of patient and laborious research, and of high intellectual endowment.

To appreciate Judge Boyle's personal qualities, it was necessary to know him intimately. He was modest without affectation. His manners were simple and unobtrusive. In conversation he was not ambitious to shine, but, when roused to the support of his own views, it was difficult to meet him, and still more difficult to overcome him. He seemed in his discussions to have no object but truth, and he always yielded to conviction. He was above that pride of opinion which is the characteristic of a narrow mind. Few gentlemen of the profession equaled Judge Boyle in general legal acquirement, and he was surpassed by none in a knowledge of the principles of the common law. To the study of the common law he was attached. He entered into the philosophy of the system, and considered it as a noble monument of the wisdom of our ancestors. Judge Boyle's mind was acute and discriminating. He saw principles clearly, and applied them judiciously and powerfully. He was sometimes inclined to draw nice distinctions and to fall into metaphysical abstractions; but a sound and comprehensive understanding, and a thorough knowledge of the subjects he investigated, conducted him to a safe and just conclusion. The judgment of few men in any age formed a more unerring standard than his. No one associated with him in the discharge of judicial duties could differ with him in opinion, without being solicitous as to the correctness of his own views. The writer of this was intimately associated with this eminent man, in the latter years of his most useful life; and he learned to appreciate the high qualities of his head and heart. Many an instructing and interesting hour was spent in his society, which can never be forgotten. And in this intercourse, on more than one occasion, he remarked, that he had no ambition to gratify, and cherished no wish, beyond a sincere desire faithfully to discharge his public duties. A mind of purer aspirations, and of nobler aims, never graced a bench.

CAMPBELL, JOHN WILSON.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1366.]

The following obituary note is reprinted from 1 McLean, 557:

In the history of this excellent man, another instance is found where a high reputation was attained by unaided personal efforts. The struggle began early, and it terminated only at the close of his life. Judge Campbell was a good scholar, and possessed general knowledge. At the bar he was highly respectable; and in the legislature of Ohio, his adopted state, and in congress, he sustained a high standing. Having served several years in congress, he declined being a candidate for reelection, against the wishes of his constituents and friends. He would have been re-elected, probably, without opposition; and had he remained in congress, it is not doubted that he would have been elected speaker of the house of representatives. In 1829, he was appointed district judge of the United States, for the state of Ohio. The duties of this office he continued to discharge until his death, in 1833. Having been abstracted from his profession some 10 or 12 years, while engaged in political life, Judge Campbell, on taking his seat on the bench, reviewed his legal studies with as much energy and success as could be expected from the ardor of youth. He possessed a strong mind and a well-balanced judgment. His perceptions were not quick; but they were clear, and they were carried out and sustained by the most patient and laborious effort. In forming a correct judgment of men and measures, he had few equals; and in a manly independence and purity of purpose he was unsurpassed. As a judge, he was highly respectable, and, had his valuable life been spared, he would have become eminent. That indomitable spirit which, in youth, overcame all obstacles, was bearing him onward and upward in his judicial course. He had a capacity, a steadiness, and a perseverance which insured no ordinary degree of success, in every line of study which engaged his attention. Judge Campbell's modesty amounted to diffidence; and yet he had no common share of moral courage. He was rather prone to underrate his own powers of mind, and, indeed, he had as little of selfishness in his character as any other human being. His friendship was without alloy. It was deep and abiding. His heart was full of the most endearing principles of humanity.

CHASE, SALMON PORTLAND.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1367.]

The following obituary notice is reprinted from 4 Dill:

At the opening of the circuit court for the district of Nebraska on Thursday, May 8, 1873, the circuit judge announced the death of Mr. Chief Justice Chase, saying: "Gentlemen of the bar: The telegraph brings us this morning the sad intelligence of the death, on yesterday, of Chief Justice Chase. It is fitting that all classes of citizens should pay appropriate honors to the memory of one who for more than a quarter of a century has worthily filled so many places of public trust and confidence in the country. It is especially fitting that this should be done by the courts of law, and particularly by the courts of the United States. The illustrious deceased was the head of the national judiciary. He occupied the seat which the professional as well as the popular mind associates with the great and venerable names of Marshall and Taney. The seat to-day is vacant. The chief of the highest tribunal on earth—a tribunal more august than the Amphictyonic Council—a tribunal endeared to the American people by the spotless character of its individual members, and by the unclouded splendor of its reputation—lies, after a long life of usefulness and honor, silent in death."

(The court appointed a committee of the bar to draft appropriate resolutions, which were, on the following day, presented to the court by Mr. James M. Woolworth, the chairman, with appropriate remarks.)

The following are the resolutions:

"Resolved, that the death of the chief justice of the United States, announced in fitting terms by his honor, the presiding judge, has closed a career of eminent service and beneficence. In the first conflict with the arrogant slave power, he stood forth a stalwart figure, inspired by the loftiest philanthropy, and sustained by an unconquerable courage, and did dauntless battle for the weak and the oppressed. In the great Rebellion, which drained the best blood of the people and the vast wealth of the land, and the inexorable demand, still unsatisfied, called for new and strange devices for replenishing the treasury of the Union, his wisdom conceived, developed, matured, and executed a series of financial measures which supplied the great necessities of those times, and in these days of peace form an integral part of the government. And in that highest human dignity in which we most delight to honor him, the chief of the august tribunal over which he presided, adjudicating the new questions to which the war gave rise, and expounding the novel phases which the federal power has assumed, he towers before us a character solid, massive, and pure,—the peer of those greatest of our country's magistrates, Marshall and Taney."

"Resolved, that while we mourn the loss which the nation has sustained in the demise of this great and good man, we rejoice that his life was so long protracted to be illustrated by services so beneficent and noble to his country and race."

On behalf of the court, the circuit judge responded:

"We assure the bar that the court fully shares in the sentiments respecting the illustrious deceased, and his services and character, so appropriately expressed in the resolutions just presented, and in the eloquent observations with which they have been accompanied. It is not necessary to recount the history or services of the late chief justice. For more than twenty-five years his life has been spent in public employment, and in the public eye. To him have been committed, at various times, high executive, administrative, legislative, and judicial trusts. He has been called upon to act in many of the decided epochs which have marked the marvelous growth and development of our country during his time, and he has demonstrated his greatness by rising always to the full height of any demand made upon his intellectual resources. There is one portion of his public history which his countrymen, and lovers of constitutional liberty in all lands, now and hereafter, will cherish with peculiar interest. I allude to his services throughout the Civil War as the counselor of the lamented Lincoln, and as finance minister. Instead of pressing the securities of an imperiled nation upon the timid and unfriendly capitalists of the old world, he appealed with confidence to the people, whose highest interests were at stake. The result attested his wisdom, and surprised the world and even ourselves. To him, as secretary of the treasury, may justly be applied, in all its scope, the magnificent and striking eulogy which Webster pronounced on Hamilton: 'He touched the dead corpse of the public credit, and it sprang to its feet. He smote the rock of the national resources, and abundant streams of revenue gushed forth.' I am aware that the opinion has, to some extent, prevailed, that Mr. Chase did not increase his reputation by his services as chief justice of the supreme court. I do not concur in that opinion. In intellectual capacity, in purity of life and character, I regard him a worthy successor of the great men to whose seat he succeeded. Before his health gave way he seemed to do as much work in the supreme court, and on the circuit, as either of his associates, or as any of his predecessors, had done. Some of his published judgments, particularly those respecting the constitutional powers and relations of the state and federal government, and those concerning the novel questions which grew out of the civil conflict, in logical force, clearness, and finished beauty of expression, take rank with the best opinions of Sir William Scott or Lord Mansfield, and scarcely fall below those of even Marshall himself. We join with the bar and with all classes of citizens in mourning the death of the chief justice, and in desiring to pay honors to his memory. Accordingly, the resolutions presented will be ordered to be entered of record, and the court will be adjourned during the remainder of the day."

[The following is reprinted from the preface of Chase's Decisions, iv:]

On the receipt of the intelligence of the death of the chief justice, a meeting of the bench and bar of Maryland was held on the 9th of May, 1873, in the United States court room in Baltimore, and the following proceedings took place:

The Hon. Reverdy Johnson called the meeting to order by saying: "All are aware that the occasion that brings us together is to pay respect to the late chief justice, and, in order that we may organize, I move that the Hon. Justice Giles, United States district judge, be called to the chair."

This motion being carried, Judge Giles took the chair. On motion of Hon. Reverdy Johnson, Henry Stockbridge, Esq., was chosen to act as secretary. Mr. Johnson suggested the appointment of a committee to prepare suitable resolutions expressive of the sense of the meeting. The chair accepted the suggestion, and appointed Hon. Reverdy Johnson, I. Nevitt Steele, A. Sterling, W. S. Waters, R. S. Mathews, and J. P. Poe, who retired to draft the resolutions. The committee in a few minutes reported the following:

"Whereas, the bench and bar of Maryland have heard with deep regret the death of Salmon P. Chase, the late chief justice of the United States, and desire to express their sense of the loss which has been sustained by the country and by the profession, and of his eminent merits as a man and a judge, therefore, be it

"Resolved, that in the death of the late Salmon P. Chase the country has been deprived of the services of a jurist who has fairly adorned his high position, and who, by the purity of his life, the extent and variety of his learning, the comprehensiveness of his intellect, and unswerving devotion to justice and law, has left another illustrious example for the inspiration and guidance of our profession.

"Resolved, that the spotless integrity which distinguished his discharge of duty in the many official positions to which he had been elevated by the respect and confidence of his fellow citizens, fully entitles him to an honorable place in history, and to the grateful memories of his country.

"Resolved, while the bar of Maryland had not in any large degree the happiness of enjoying those genial and generous qualities which made the late chief justice the ornament of every social circle in which he was wont to move, they cannot refrain from bearing testimony to the impressions which his attractive qualities made upon them during his comparatively brief attendance in this circuit.

"Resolved, that the sympathies of the bench and bar of Maryland are respectfully tendered to the bereaved family of Mr. Chase, and the secretary of the meeting is instructed to forward to them a copy of these resolutions.

"Resolved, that the judges of the circuit court are requested to direct a copy of these resolutions to be entered upon the minutes of the court."

The Hon. Reverdy Johnson, in rising to second the passage of the resolutions, said he had enjoyed the acquaintance of Chief Justice Chase longer than any other member of the Maryland bar. He (Johnson) had known him at the bar, in the senate of the United States, and as secretary of the treasury of the United States, and in all these several offices he had not only known him generally, but intimately. He had discharged the duties of each with wonderful ability. He came to the bench upon the death of his immediate predecessor, in December, 1864. As secretary of the treasury he discharged the high functions of his position creditably, but he had not for years engaged in the active duties of his profession, and there was a doubt of his filling worthily the place of his great predecessor, but at his first term that doubt was removed; that term at which he first presided was the December term of 1864. There were then before the court cases involving many questions of admiralty law, and the rights and duties of citizens of states that had been involved in the war. Chief Justice Chase had on all the questions that had been presented for adjudication given opinions, and discussed each with so much ability that it showed that he was fully acquainted with the knowledge necessary for their proper adjudication. Those opinions were so clearly and elegantly expressed that they were models of judicial style. The bar and bench at once said that the ermine worn by his predecessor was in hands to preserve it unspotted. Mr. Johnson sketched the important decisions given by Chief Justice Chase in relation to the enforcement act, legal tender, and other matters, and said he was not unworthy to fill the place that Marshall had filled for thirty, and Taney for thirty-four, years. What was said by Randolph, of Roanoke, upon the occasion of the death of Marshall, might, with equal propriety, be said of Taney and Chase. He presided with native dignity and unpretending grace. In point of ability he was the equal of either of them. His opinions will bear the strictest scrutiny, and in learning and moral considerations compare favorably with those of his illustrious predecessor. There are men that survive upon the bench who fully equal him; there are men in the different states in the profession who might equal him, and it is to be hoped that in his successor may be found in equal degree the attributes of learning, mental power, courtesy of manner, and purity of character.

R. Stockett Mathews rose to second the motion of Mr. Johnson for the adoption of the resolutions reported by the committee. He said: He could not refrain from giving some expression to his accord with the thoughts expressed by Mr. Johnson. Mr. Mathews recalled Chief Justice Chase as he had seen him when full of life and vigor and manly beauty. Never had the speaker seen a man whose mere presence so impressed the beholder with a sense of capacity. He possessed a strong power of reasoning, that enabled him to grasp the most difficult subjects, and wrest from them their simplicity and clearness. He was a large man in the broadest sense of the term. Not a mere lawyer in unquestioning servitude to tradition, or in blind veneration for precedents, he sought to reach results in his decisions which would stand the tests of mutation of opinion, and changing conditions of society in coming generations. He did not seek mere popularity nor present applause, but with sure precision was always able to anticipate the judgment of the future. In his brave grasp of difficult problems it was of himself and his personal interest that he thought last. He possessed in a remarkable degree the suavity of temperament and the kindly graces of heart which drew towards him the homage and friendship of others with whom he associated, and especially of younger men, whom he never overwhelmed with inconsiderate exhibitions of his rank and greatness, out sought to win them by placing at their service his wealth of gathered stores, his ripe wisdom, and his sympathetic counsels. He numbered, perhaps, more warm admirers and a larger number of devoted friends than any statesman of his time. And one of them, in the dispatch sent to apprise his family at Washington of the sudden decease of Mr. Chase, has eloquently described him in a single sentence, "Our grand man is gone." Mr. Chairman, he was a grand man. It has been said that he was ambitious. But who, with such noble powers, such generous instincts, would not desire to put every great faculty at the service of his country? He was ambitious for a larger field and ampler opportunities to do good, and to achieve greatness for his nation rather than for himself. He may have felt that he was better fitted for the administration than the interpretation of law. One thing is assured beyond all cavil,—he filled many stations and discharged great trusts, and he adorned every position with the beauty of spotless probity, and fulfilled every duty with a disinterested patriotism which has seldom been surpassed. Mr. Mathews then drew a touching picture of Mr. Chase's appearance when he last saw him, some months ago, in Philadelphia, speaking of him as the "counterfeit presentment" of his former self, and closed with a warm tribute to his native royalty of heart, the charm of his manners, and the dignity of his public life.

When Mr. Mathews concluded, the resolutions were put by Judge Giles, and were unanimously adopted. The meeting then adjourned.

On the same day a similar meeting of the bench and bar of Virginia took place in the United States court room in Richmond, which was presided over by the Hon. James Lyons, with M. F. Pleasant, Esq., clerk of the U. S. circuit court, as secretary. Messrs. William Green, W. A. Maury, Bradley T. Johnson, James Neeson, Hon. E. H. Fitzhugh, judge of the chancery court for the city of Richmond, Hon. Beverly R. Willford, judge of the circuit court for the city of Richmond, E. Bardsdale, Jr., Esq., W. W. Henry, Charles Dabney, Hon. James C. Taylor, attorney general of Virginia, John O. Steger, and John Howard, were appointed a committee to prepare and report suitable resolutions. They reported the following:

"Seldom is it that the hand of death snatches from the place of honor a man more inspired by greatness and moral worth than Salmon Portland Chase, to whose memory we are now come together in these precincts of justice, which will know him no more forever, to lay tribute. His sudden death, after being so recently amongst us in apparently improved health, and deepening the impressions he had already made upon our minds and hearts, has caused a shock, from which we shall not soon recover, and is another solemn lesson that 'the paths of glory lead but to the grave.' From one end to the other of this broad and varied land will his death produce grief, and a sense that this time, in very truth, has death pulled down a great pillar of state, and that there are few in the land to supply his place. Called to the position of chief justice of the supreme court of the United States from the station of secretary of the treasury, as was his distinguished predecessor, like him, he rose superior to the passions and prejudices of the hour. His greatness could not have been subjected to a more crucial test than by his succession to the position made vacant by the death of that mirror of justice and judicial propriety, the venerable and ever to be revered Roger Brooke Taney. It had been many years since Mr. Chase had any experience at the bar when he was made chief justice; and, had he not been a man of extraordinary endowments, his appointment would have been a serious mistake; but it turned out that in his case the particular in which he was thought to be wanting—a sufficient practical acquaintance with jurisprudence—was one of his best qualifications, for he went on the bench at a time when he was soon to encounter those new and important questions which arose in the southern states after the close of the war,—questions which were only to be satisfactorily resolved by a mind of vigorous and comprehensive grasp, accustomed to a frequent recurrence to great principles, but, at the same time, accustomed to range untrammelled by precedents. That the mind of Chief Justice Chase was of that stamp, no person of discernment will question. It may be safely said that there was no man known to us who was better fitted to handle those novel questions than he was. His boldness and independence, and at the same time his sobriety, as a thinker, are too well known to be more than referred to. There was a massiveness and self-reliance, a solidity and equilibrium, about his mind that were impressive, and singled him out as one born to figure in matters of great concernment. The high traits of his intellect were conspicuously shown while he was at the head of the treasury, the duties of which position he administered with distinguished sagacity and originality; so much so that he falsified predictions as to the effect of his measures confidently made in high quarters in Europe. The consciousness of his masterly administration in finance was, it is believed, a source of great satisfaction to him. Endowed with an intellect of such characteristics,—mind impatient of things narrow or technical,—it was exceedingly opportune that, during the brief period he held a judicial station, there was work for him of a kind both suitable and congenial. He at once began to deal very masterly with the great international questions that came before the supreme court, sitting as a tribunal of prize; but, perhaps, in no cases did the greatness of his judicial qualifications so generally impress themselves on the whole country as in those cases usually called 'The Gold Cases.' His judgments in those cases were couched in terms so luminous, and enforced by reasoning so irresistible, that all previous doubts and conflicts—and they were many—were at once laid, and men wondered that a matter, now so clear, should ever have been obscured by misgivings. It is an interesting coincidence that the chief justice should have most distinguished himself as a judge in cases involving questions about the currency. The greatness of Chief Justice Chase was set off by a striking simplicity and directness, both in manner and diction. What he said was briefly said, and yet it always appeared by a curiosa felicitas to be fully said. His brevity was never cramped or straightened, but his subject was laid before you in all its length and breadth and thickness. His character was pure and spotless, and notwithstanding his life before his elevation to the bench was passed in times of great bitterness and rancor, in which he was a prominent actor, there never was a suspicion of his integrity. Viewed in his social relations, there is none of us who will not treasure the recollection of his personal intercourse with the deceased, or that will ever forget his geniality, tempered only, but not diminished, by a perfect and quiet dignity, or that readiness to listen, and entire freedom from dogmatism, which lent such a charm to his society.

"Resolved, that this meeting of the bar and judges of Virginia is deeply penetrated by a sense of the calamity which they, in common with the rest of the people of the United States, have sustained in the death of the Hon. Salmon Portland Chase, and that they will ever cherish his memory, which is endeared to them no less by many personal attractions and associations than by his eminent ability and wisdom.

"Resolved, that we will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

"Resolved, that the chairman of this meeting be requested to present a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions to the circuit court of the United States and the supreme court of appeals of Virginia, at Richmond, with the request that the same be spread on the minutes of the said courts.

"Resolved, that the chairman of this meeting be requested to transmit a copy of the preamble and resolutions aforesaid to the family of the deceased."

William A. Maury, Esq., moved the adoption of the resolutions, when General Bradley T. Johnson addressed the meeting as follows:

"Mr. Chairman: In the vicissitudes of life a man is seldom called upon to perform a sadder duty than I undertake now, for I am to speak of the death of one who was not only the lover of the liberties of this whole country, and the defender of its constitution, but he was the sincere sympathizer with the distress of my own broken and suffering people, the brave champion of their rights, and my personal friend. But now, while the country stands awe-struck at this unexpected dispensation of Providence, which has taken from it one of its foremost men, and words but faintly express our feelings, it is right and proper that we should bear our testimony, however humble, to his character as a man, his conduct as a statesman, and his purity and wisdom as a magistrate. From the beginning of that career which was to become so illustrious in American history, he evinced that high moral courage in the enunciation and defense of principles he thought true, that consistency in the maintenance of them, and that intrepidity in following them out, that have long since elicited the admiration of all, even those of us who differed from him so widely and so irreconcilably. Coming in the flush of mature manhood to the senate of the United States, he so bore himself in that high arena as to prove himself worthy of his great compeers. Called thence to preside over the destinies of one of the American commonwealths, he guided her action during those trying times so as to earn the applause of his fellow-citizens who had placed him there; and immediately afterwards, placed in charge of the finances of the United States, his will, sagacity, and skill so conducted them that he became probably the most efficient support of his government in the Civil War. He was placed on the bench in the last months of that struggle, and he at once appreciated clearly the great opportunities which opened on the cessation of it. He rose to the height of statesmanship which those opportunities required, and he was earnest in his efforts that they should be improved. He perfectly appreciated the danger to Republican liberty from the tremendous accession of power brought to the government by such a prodigious effort of national life, and his first endeavor was to restore the supremacy of the civil law over military rule; to bring back the rule of right and justice over that of force and the strong hand. Acting under the conviction of the absolute necessity for this, he sought to expedite it by declining to exercise his judicial functions in the territory lately in arms until civil authority was restored, until the writ of the law became supreme over the order of the soldier. He pressed upon the president the justice and necessity that this state of things should at once be inaugurated, and in 1867, when the proclamation of the executive of the United States had assured the world that such was the case, he first entered upon his duties here. His first coming among our people was received respectfully and unostentatiously. He had been the lifelong adversary of our political systems and our social organization, and his genius, more than that of any one man, had contributed to our overthrow, and we waited to see what application of his principles we should be called on to observe. A short time sufficed to dispel all doubts. Rising at once to the greatness of the occasion, he eliminated and declared the principles of public law which controlled our circumstances, and from them marked out an application which operated as amnesty, peace, and security for life and property. In the case of Keppell's Administrator v. The Petersburg Railroad, he announced that the contest through which we had gone was a civil war, and that all the consequences of general war flowed from it. He declared that the acts of the governments belligerent to the federal government, so far as they concerned private rights and personal obligations, were to be respected by the federal courts, and he held that the court would take judicial notice of the fact that the business transactions of life here during the war were based on Confederate currency, which currency was to be treated as of its real value.

"In the case of United States v. Morrison, in the South Carolina district, he decided that the orders of military officers in time of war protected persons obeying them from all liability, penal or personal, for acts of war. Following these broad and beneficent declarations of legal principles controlling the status of the late Confederate States, his decisions here during the few years he presided in this circuit did more to restore confidence, to reconstruct our shattered institutions, and to rehabilitate peace than all other acts of all other functionaries. With a contrary course of decision we should have been plunged in endless confusion. All contracts made during the war and acts done, all judicial proceedings, would have been considered void, and years of turmoil and exasperating controversy would have been before us. He saved us all this.

"The existence of the state governments de facto being granted, all their acts relating to the common affairs of life were sustained and upheld. The actual existence of Confederate currency acknowledged, all transactions based on it became obligatory and enforceable. Immunity for acts of war done in obedience to military orders once secured, prosecutions for treason became well-nigh impossible, and so his course of judicial decision at once restored confidence, quiet, and order among our people in all their relations to themselves. He went further, for he authorized me to record that his judicial opinion in the case of Mr. Jefferson Davis was that the adoption of the fourteenth amendment operated as a complete and perfect amnesty against all political offenses claimed to have been committed during the war, by aiding, assisting, or abetting it. His decisions have been followed by the supreme court, whose adjudications they preceded, and we are indebted to him for the policy of the law adopted and enforced by that tribunal. I do not believe that his abilities as a magistrate are yet fully appreciated by the profession, but I am sure that the final judgment of the bar will place his decisions side by side with those of Marshall and Taney, his great predecessors.

"His style was exceedingly clear and concise, and I know no happier specimen of judicial expression than that in the case of The Gary, where he calls admiralty 'the human Providence that watches over those who go down to the sea in ships, and do their business on the great waters;' nor that other one in the case of Texas v. Chiles, where, referring to the language of the old articles of confederation and of the constitution, he declares the object of the latter to be 'to make more perfect the perpetual Union' created by the former,—'thereby creating an indissoluble Union of indestructible states.'

"His purity as a man was beyond the breath of suspicion. While at the head of the treasury of the United States, disbursing the enormous expenditures of the war, his salary being insufficient to support his family, he paid his annual expenses out of the savings of former years, and went out of the treasury a poorer man than he went into it. He was ambitious,—not eager for applause nor desirous of the approbation of the public, but ambitious of serving his country and of reuniting her dissevered members; for, he said, his only desire to be president arose from the conviction that he could bring back reconciliation and peace were he intrusted with the power of chief executive to mould the policy of the government. He was so warm a friend, and so thoroughly a sympathizer with us, that he desired to make his home in this city; and on his last visit here he told me that if the house of the late Chief Justice Marshall had not been occupied by the gentleman who lives in it, he should have purchased it and fitted it up as his permanent residence and home. In his death the country has been deprived of a great magistrate, and we have lost a staunch and able friend."

Colonel H. Coulter Cabell followed in some remarks, stating that he had known Chief Justice Chase in early life, and in late years, and that he bore willing testimony to his rare ability and personal qualities.

The resolutions were then adopted. On presenting them to the circuit court of the United States, the Hon. James Lyons, the chairman of the meeting, paid a tribute of high eulogy to the character and abilities of the chief justice, and mentioned an incident which occurred during the reconstructive era, when Mr. Lyons casually mentioned to him that a staff officer of the general commanding had been detailed to do duty as presiding judge of the court of appeals of Virginia. Upon the chief justice expressing his incredulity as to such a fact, thinking that a jest was being made with him, the morning paper was produced, in which the military order was published, relieving an officer from duty as judge of the hustings court of the city of Richmond, and detailing him as judge of the supreme court of appeals of Virginia. "Great Heavens!" said the chief justice, "and will your bar consent to appear before a court thus constituted?"

His honor, Judge Bond, said: "Gentlemen of the bar: It is with sorrow for the occasion which requires it that I yield to the motion which you have offered. For the loss of the late chief justice, the nation at large will lament. His past eminent services in the congress of the United States, in the cabinet during the most trying period of the nation's history, and on the bench of the supreme court since, have taught all his fellow citizens to revere and honor him who love integrity and moral and intellectual worth. But to the bar and people of this judicial circuit his loss is particularly severe and painful. Assigned to this circuit, and coming among you as he did, immediately after the close of the war, when the citizens of these states, alarmed by the result, were doubtful of the future, when the rights of property and personal security were altogether unsettled, he was enabled by his great ability and knowledge of jurisprudence, notwithstanding the many new questions arising out of recent events, to inspire confidence in the courts of the United States, to restore quiet of mind, and to hold so evenly the balance of justice among his fellow citizens, who had widely and vehemently differed with him in the political forum, as to win the good opinion of the whole bar. One by one, rapidly those who endured the strain and severe anxiety of the great conflict depart,—men whom the republic would long delight to honor,—but among those whom we lament there is no one who will hereafter be thought to excel, in uprightness, ability, integrity, and patriotic devotion to the best interest of his country in war and peace, Salmon P. Chase. I shall direct your proceedings to be entered on the minutes of the court, and will adjourn at once in respect to the memory of the deceased."

The court then adjourned.

CRANCH, WILLIAM.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1368.]

The following proceedings are reprinted from 2 Hayw. & H. 435:

Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, for the County of Washington. October 15, 1855.

On the opening of this court this morning, John Marbury, Esq., after some preliminary remarks, read to the court the following proceedings:

At a meeting of the members of the bar of the District of Columbia and the officers of the courts, held pursuant to notice, John Marbury, Esq., was called to the chair, and John A. Smith appointed secretary.

Richard S. Coxe, Esq., rose and stated that the meeting had assembled in consequence of an event which, though long anticipated, had struck them with surprise. They had met to commemorate the life, virtues and character of their deceased brother, the Honorable William Cranch, chief judge of the circuit court and judge of the district court of the District of Columbia, who died at his residence in this city on Saturday last, September 1, 1855. Judge Cranch died at the age of 86 years, after having lived thus long as an individual, and has presided on the bench a longer period of time than had ever been heard of in a judicial officer. He was appointed a judge of the circuit court in March, 1801, 54 years since. He has now left us, and the place made vacant by his death is to be supplied; but he might say a long time would elapse before that place could be supplied with so acceptable a gentleman and one possessed of so much ability. All who knew him in the course of their practice in the courts, knew how well and admirably he fulfilled all the duties with which he was intrusted. Few judges ever excelled him; few ever equalled him in all the essentials of a great judge. He was eminent for learning in all the departments of law, (admiralty, chancery, criminal and common,) and was thoroughly imbued with the learning of the profession from the earliest days. We have met with a great loss, but thank God! he has left a bright example. We trust that every young man, while he reverences, will follow him—will imitate Judge Cranch in industry, and endeavor to equal him in learning, be pure of heart as he was pure, honorable as he was honorable, so as to have as pure and eminent a character for the admiration of his countrymen.

Mr. Coxe offered the following resolution: "Resolved, that a committee of five members of the meeting be appointed by the chair, to draft appropriate resolutions, on the subject which has thus convened us together." The chair appointed Richard S. Coxe, Wm. Redin, Joseph H. Bradley, James M. Carlisle and John F. Ennis, Esqrs., who having retired, subsequently returned, and by their chairman, Mr. Coxe, presented the following resolutions: "The Hon. William Cranch, chief judge of the circuit court and judge of the district court of the District of Columbia, having departed this life on Saturday, the 1st of Sept., 1855, the members of the bar and officers of the court, entertain the highest veneration for the private and public character of the deceased,—duly appreciating his great and varied professional attainments, his unsullied integrity, his patient diligence, his uniform courtesy and amenity of manner on the bench and in private intercourse, regard his death, though long anticipated, with deep regret as a severe public loss. They have therefore: (1) Resolved, that during the whole course of the private life of the deceased in this vicinity, extending beyond sixty years, he had eminently entitled himself to possess what he fully enjoyed, the unqualified admiration and esteem of our whole community. (2) Resolved, that as a reporter of the decisions of the supreme court, and as a judge of the circuit court, on the bench of which he occupied a seat for upwards of 54 years, he was distinguished for his acquirements in all the different branches of professional learning, for untiring industry, for indefatigable diligence in the discharge of his duties, for his kind and courteous amenity of deportment towards all with whom he had intercourse, for dignified, patient and impartial treatment toward his colleagues and the members of the bar. (3) Resolved, that we deeply deplore the loss which the community, the profession, and we ourselves more especially have sustained in the death of Judge Cranch. (4) Resolved, that in the manifestation of the high esteem and respect we entertain for the deceased, we will wear the customary badge of mourning for the period of thirty days, and will as a body attend his funeral. (5) Resolved, that we will undertake, with the consent and approbation of the family, to erect a substantial and appropriate monument over the grave of the deceased in commemoration of his character, and that the chairman of this meeting, Mr. Redin and Mr. Carlisle be a committee to carry this resolution into effect. (6) Resolved, that the chairman communicate a copy of these proceedings to the family of the departed, with an expression of our condolence with them in the loss they have sustained. (7) Resolved, that at the next meeting of the circuit court the chairman be requested to present a copy to the court, with a request that the same may be entered upon the minutes of the court. (8) Resolved, that copies of these proceedings be handed to the different newspapers in this district for publication. The resolutions having been seconded by Mr. Carlisle, with appropriate remarks, were unanimously adopted. John Smith, Secretary. John Marbury, Chairman."

After the reading of the above proceedings Mr. R. S. Coxe, with some appropriate remarks, seconded the motion that the same be entered on the minutes of the court, and then moved that the court adjourn one week. To which the Hon. James S. Morsell, the presiding judge, made the following reply: "Gentlemen of the Bar and Officers of the Court: We heartily unite with you in doing honor to the memory of our lamented brother, Judge Cranch. He was all that you so respectfully and appropriately ascribe to him. You have not said too much. A great and good judge has gone from us; his loss is deeply deplored by us all. But though he has gone, he will still live in the admiring memory of a grateful community, who have for so many years enjoyed the blessings of his able, pure and impartial administration of justice. In the eminent example he has left us of a pure and unsullied character and in the rich fruit of his long and indefatigable judicial labors. In addition to a display of superior legal talent, his course was marked by a calm and amiable composure of temper and patient forbearance, with an inflexible faithfulness and uprightness; to the rich and the poor he was alike impartial and just, always accessible and ready, cheerfully on all occasions, however arduous the duties to fulfill them. The court therefore order the resolutions of the bar and officers of the court to be entered on the records of the court, and the judges will wear the customary badge of mourning during the residue of the term." The court also passed the following order: "Ordered by the court that the court room be draped in mourning during the residue of the term."

Memoir of Wm. Cranch, LL. D., chief judge of the U. S. circuit court of the District of Columbia: "Wm. Cranch, chief judge of the U. S. circuit court of the District of Columbia, was the only son of Judge Richard Cranch, of Quincy, Mass., who emigrated from England to this country in the year 1746, and Mary Smith, a daughter of the Rev. Wm. Smith, of Weymouth, Mass. He was born at Weymouth on the 17th day of July, 1769, and received his early education from his mother, a woman of high accomplishments and of rare virtue, who instructed him also in the elements of Latin and algebra. He was afterwards fitted for college by his uncle, the Rev. Wm. Shaw, of Haverhill, Mass., in whose family he in the meantime resided. In 1773, he entered Harvard University, in the same class with his cousin, John Quincy Adams, between whom and himself there had always existed a sincere and intimate friendship, which remained unimpaired to the time of Mr. Adams' decease. In 1787, he graduated, and in the same year commenced reading law in the office of the Hon. Thos. Dawes, one of the justices of the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts. In July, 1790, he was admitted to practice in the court of common pleas, and in July, 1791, in the supreme judicial court. On the death of his relative, John Thaxter, Esq., who had been settled in the practice of the law, in Haverhill, Mr. Cranch removed to that place and took charge of his unfinished business. After practicing in the courts of Mass. and N. H. for nearly four years, he removed to the city of Washington, and had charge of the large contracts of Morris, Nicholson and Greenleaf, in that city. In 1800 he was appointed one of the commissioners of the public buildings, then in process of erection. In 1801 he was appointed by President Adams one of the assistant judges of the circuit court of the District of Columbia, under the act of the 27th of February, 1801; and on the resignation of Mr. Kilty, chief judge, in 1805, he was appointed by President Jefferson, in his place. Judge Cranch succeeded Mr. Dallas, as reporter of the decisions of the supreme court of the United States. These reports are well known, and are highly valued by the profession. He also made accurate reports of the cases decided in the circuit court of the District of Columbia, from its organization to 1841. These Reports have not failed to be acceptable to the profession and to the public, from the great variety and importance of the cases arising under the wide and peculiar jurisdiction of a United States court at the seat of government. In 1827 Judge Cranch, by request, delivered 'A Memoir of the Life, Character and Writings of John Adams' before the Columbian Institute. He also prepared a Code of Laws for the District of Columbia, in conformity to an act of congress, which was printed by order of congress but was never referred to a committee. In the year 1829 the degree of doctor of laws was conferred upon him by Harvard University. He was an honorary member of the American Academy of Arts and Science, also a member of the Antiquarian Society. The life of Judge Cranch, like that of many other distinguished men, has been marked with few of those vicissitudes which impart so great an interest in biography. In the regular exercise of his high duties for 54 years, his life has been varied only by those events which are incident to all men. As chief judge he has been eminent alike for profound learning, and for impartiality and wisdom. It would be difficult to find one in any situation who has labored more diligently, more patiently, or more successfully than he has done, in the office which he has so long and so faithfully filled."

CURTIS, BENJAMIN ROBBINS.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1363.]

The following matter is reprinted from 4 Cliff. 625:

Pursuant to the call of the committee appointed at the meeting of the bar held Sept. 18, 1874, the members of the bar assembled in the court room of the circuit court Oct. 7, 1874, at ten o'clock. Mr. Sidney Bartlett presided. The committee, through their chairman, presented their report, and members of the bar added their tribute to the memory of the distinguished deceased.

Report of the committee: "Circuit Court of the United States, District of Massachusetts. October 7, 1874. The members of the bar of this court, brought together by the news of the decease of their brother and friend, Benjamin Robbins Curtis, desire to place upon the records of the court the expression of their sense of personal bereavement and of the loss which the bar, the courts, and the country at large have sustained by his death. They recognized, with fraternal pride, in Mr. Curtis all the elements of a great lawyer and judge. Thoroughly grounded in the common and commercial law, master of equity in the peculiar yet broad domain of jurisprudence administered in the courts of the United States, the fullness, breadth, and accuracy of his learning were not surpassed at the bar or on the bench of his time. With a strong mind carefully trained and disciplined, capacious and retentive memory, sound and cautious judgment, the mental qualities which illustrated and gave full force and effect to the rest were an almost intuitive capacity to discern the points on which a cause hinged, and the power of simple, clear, comprehensive statement,—in method and manner as perfect when oral as when written, and which gave to the enunciation of legal principles something of the beauty and precision of the exact sciences. His manners at the bar and on the bench were quiet, courteous, and marked by a modest dignity and firmness which won, or, if need be, commanded respect. We may not better express the admiration and esteem in which Judge Curtis was held than to say that, when the last two vacancies occurred in the chief justiceship of the supreme court of the United States, he was deemed, by his brethren of the bar throughout the country, eminently fitted by wisdom, learning, love of justice, and a thoroughly judicial mind, to discharge the duties of that exalted trust. Of Judge Curtis, as an associate and friend, it may be said that the better he was known the more highly he was esteemed. Under a calm and quiet exterior, which to strangers seemed like coldness, he had warm affections and generous sympathies. Careful observation of life and manners, a liberal culture outside of his profession, conversation thoughtful and suggestive, and marked by curious felicity of expression, made him a most interesting and instructive companion. The name of Judge Curtis is to be added to the list of great lawyers and judges, who, not as a matter of sentiment merely, but as the result of careful study and reflection, were firm believers in the great truths of Christianity. Not inattentive to modern scientific thought or speculation, catholic in spirit, unwilling to judge others, he retained to the last his conviction and sense of the being and providence of God and the hope of immortal life. Recalling to-day his services to the cause of jurisprudence, his fidelity to duty, the amenity of his manners and the kindness of his heart, his pride in his profession and the lustre and dignity he imparted to it, and, above all, the integrity, weight, and influence of his character, his brethren of the bar gratefully pay this tribute to his memory."

Remarks of Hon. E. Rockwood Hoar: "Mr. Chairman,—I move that the sentiments of the bar, in regard to the death of Judge Curtis, as reported by your committee, be presented by the district attorney to the circuit court, which shall come in this morning, with the request that they be entered on the records of the court. I do not feel, Mr. Chairman and brethren, that it is necessary for me to add anything to the very complete expression of our thoughts and feelings on this occasion, which the report of the committee contains; yet I desire to add my personal expression of our sense of loss, and the more, because, to my own sorrow and regret, I could not attend the funeral services of our friend. Judge Curtis was a man in his position and relations in life so admirable and so complete, that a statement of his merits, modelled upon his own style of presentation, seems to me the most appropriate. What a monument at Mount Auburn records of one of his early associates at the bar is eminently true of him,—that 'he had the beauty of accuracy in his understanding, and the beauty of uprightness in his character.' I think that his loss at the present time is a national one, for this more than, perhaps, any other reason, that in the supreme court at Washington he was a model to the lawyers of the country; that in these days, when there are so many defects of taste, he was a model of good taste in the profession; that he did nothing in excess, while all his professional performances were adequate to the occasion. I think the loss of no lawyer in the country would be so much felt by the members of that high tribunal. In these days of loose and turgid eloquence, and of imperfect legal training, of which there are so many exhibitions before them, they must have constantly felt it a relief, and pleasure, and satisfaction, when they could turn for an hour or two to listen to that master of lucid statement, with a wealth of learning never paraded, but always ample in furnishing what the case and the presentation of it required, with clear perception of the point at issue, rigidly confining himself to conveying it clearly to the mind of the tribunal which he addressed, and then stopping. I think it is felt among the profession throughout the country that one of its pillars has fallen, as well as one of its ornaments. Entirely concurring with what the paper presented by the committee states of the personal courtesy, generosity, and kindness, which were exhibited by our departed friend, I think that, meeting here as members of the bar, we are entitled to say besides that our commonwealth and this bar has furnished to the country in him one who must be recognized everywhere as a great lawyer. Judge Curtis had his limitations. I do not know that I should be prepared to say or to think that, aside from what he was as a lawyer, he was also a great man. By this I mean that I do not suppose he has produced upon the country or the world any leading or great impression from any thing that he has said or done, except so far as he has made his profession respected, so far as he has administered the law in his judicial position, and as he has applied its principles, in his advocacy of cases, in a manner which tended to strengthen the foundations of society, and to illustrate the value of absolute justice. But the man who has made these contributions to society, who has done so much to keep the administration of justice steady and useful to mankind, to make all the machinery of government in its daily applications serviceable to the interests of his fellow-men, has a solid claim to respectful memory. Perhaps he has made no contribution to judicial science of the importance of those which were made by his predecessor, Judge Story. Perhaps, as development did not seem to be the order of his being to so great an extent as in some other great judges, it may have been well that in the earlier and formative period of our jurisprudence a man of a different character occupied the seat which he afterwards adorned. But for clearness, learning, steadiness, and uprightness, he has left a judicial fame that any man might envy."

Remarks of Gen. Benjamin F. Butler: "Mr. Chairman,—Being called to another sphere of public duty, I was unhappily unable to mingle my regrets with my brethren at the bar at the meeting of which this is an adjournment, at the great loss the bar of the nation has sustained in the death of our late associate, Judge Curtis. I have used the extended words, 'the bar of the nation,' because I deem the loss of such a lawyer, with so great a national reputation, of accumulated acquirements and extensive practice in the highest branches of jurisprudence, a national loss. It is a tradition, and a true one, that the memory of the work of a great lawyer exists only in the traditions of the bar; and even when embodied in the form of decisions of the bench, they are only sought after by his brethren for a different purpose, and hardly in commemoration of his fame. Still, I think the memory of Judge Curtis will live many, many years in that most able opinion delivered by him in the Dred Scott decision, worthy to be compared with that of Lord Mansfield on a kindred subject, which opened and developed an idea as to the rights of citizens, which has since been embalmed in constitutional law. If I were to venture to add, sir, a word to the resolutions now before us, so happily framed, it would be wherein they describe the lucidity and comprehensiveness of statement which so eminently characterized our deceased associate, and would add the word 'exhaustive.' Having had occasion to observe him in the greatest and most solemn trial had before the highest tribunal ordained by the constitution of his country, the senate of the United States, of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, I may be permitted with truth to say, that after Judge Curtis had finished his opening statement for his distinguished client, thereafterwards in that trial in his behalf, although many things were said, and well said, by the learned and eminent counsel with whom he was associated, yet nothing more that was new or pertinent was said. Because of the deep feeling of profound admiration which I have for the legal attainments, the judicial character, of Judge Curtis, I am exceeding glad that it has been permitted to me on this occasion, even by a single word, to testify my respect for his virtues, and to mingle my sorrows here with those of his brethren of this bar."

The chairman here read the following letter which he had received from Judge Campbell, formerly of the United States supreme court:

Judge Campbell's letter:

"169 St. Paul Street, Baltimore, Sept. 20, 1874. My Dear Sir,—The melancholy intelligence of the death of our friend, Judge Curtis, reached me through the press. I cannot refrain from expressing my sorrow for the bereavement which the legal profession of the country, his friends, and the community have sustained, to one of his most valued friends and associates. My relations to him commenced after my appointment to the bench of the supreme court of the United States, in 1853. Before that appointment was made, Justices Catron and Curtis informed President Pierce, on behalf of the court, that it would be acceptable to the justices. My reception in the court, as then existing, was cordial, and, as the survivor of all the members that composed it, I may be indulged in making the statement, that, in all of the consultations of that court, and in all of the official acts of its members, there was a seemliness and dignity of deportment, an earnest endeavor to execute justice and to maintain truth, and an impress of personal honor upon their deliberations and judgments, which commanded and was entitled to the approbation and esteem of the jurists of the land and the confidence of the people. In that court, Justice Curtis was an able and an esteemed member. He examined the causes submitted with caution and candor; he meditated the opinions he gave in the conference with care, and delivered them with precision, consideration, and deference to the opinions of others. The opinions he prepared have made for him a lasting reputation. My own relations with him were always those of kindness and good-will, and these relations were not affected by the war, which created so many estrangements. I find in my library, in a volume concerning the 'Worthies of England,' a description of one of the judges of the queen's bench in the sixteenth century. To this judge is attributed 'a great happiness in all the four faculties that make a lawyer: 1. A sharp invention and a clear comprehension to search all the circumstances of a case propounded. 2. Judgment to examine and weigh the particulars invented and apprehended, for truth lieth in things as gold in mines. 3. Memory to retain what is judged and examined. 4. A prompt and ready delivery of what is conceived and retained, set out with ingenuity and gravity. Oratio prompta non audax. What he said was close and pinching, and not confident and earnest; allowing passion not to disturb either the method or delivery of his discourse, but to quicken it.' On the margin of the page is written, 'Justice Curtis,' in pencil. I do not know that I could express my opinion of his characteristics with more satisfaction to myself than by adopting a description which I had applied as suitable to him. In the apparent decay of an ambition purely professional, and the diminution of profound and various learning which can only be obtained through such an ambition, among the bar of the Union, the loss of such a jurist is a loss to the bar. In these tumultuous and anarchical times, when landmarks are so little respected, the loss of a calm, conscientious, learned, independent, and approved constitutional lawyer may be regarded as a public calamity. With much respect and esteem, I am very truly yours, John A. Campbell.

"Hon. Sidney Bartlett, Boston, Mass."

Remarks of Mr. H. Weld Fuller: "Mr. Chairman,—I came here to listen, not to speak. But esteeming and loving Judge Curtis as I did, and having occupied a place under him during almost the whole of his judicial career, I trust you will pardon me for breaking the temporary silence which has followed the eloquent utterances of others. Many are present who knew him more intimately and shared more closely his confidence; and they can better speak of his social qualities and portray his noble character and high attainments. But my memory goes back to his college days, and to the rank he then held as a thinker and writer. He was distinguished before his entrance to the law school at Cambridge. Even then the tendency of his mind to matters of government and law was manifest. His prize essay had for its subject, 'How Far can Absolute Governments Depend upon the Ignorance of the People?' Indeed his step from boyhood to manhood seemed nearly instantaneous! There was a thoughtfulness and thoroughness unusual for his age. As a student he was indefatigable, and all his accumulations of knowledge, and the inferences incident thereto, were so classified and arranged as to be at all times at his command. During his whole life they seemed to come at his call, without confusion and clear as crystal. By this power of memory and association—modified by a sound judgment and a right application to legitimate issues—he could see and show to others the most striking features of a case, and hold the subject out, like a solid substance, for inspection. It was said of Lord Mansfield that his statement of facts was often equal to another man's argument; and this may be said of Judge Curtis. Without overstating or exaggerating the facts, he could so order and connect them with apt allusions and natural suggestions as to make the deepest and most favorable impression. His cases were always hinged on their strongest points, and opened to the most practicable view. Although strong, very strong in his friendships, he never exhibited any favoritism on the bench. He was courteous to all. The parties before him were as algebraic characters. He looked steadfastly at a legitimate result. Faithful and fearless, he was never arrogant or disdainful. It was a pleasure to serve him. He may have had his faults, but in my intercourse with him I could not see them. We can truly say, 'Happy is the state which has such men for counselors and judges!' When they leave us we are bereft, indeed."

Remarks of Mr. Elias Merwin: "Mr. Chairman,—It is impossible for me to add anything to the just and eloquent tributes which have been paid to Judge Curtis by the distinguished brethren who have preceded me. Did I consult my own feelings,—feelings which you, Mr. Chairman, who experienced, through so many years and to so great an extent, the constancy and reality of his friendship, will not fail to excuse,—my part-to-day would be only that of a sorrowing silence. The character of Judge Curtis was unique, but it was complete. Great as were his intellect and learning, he possessed in an equal degree those sterling personal qualities which give to human friendships their charm and value, and strength and solidity and dignity to character. It is true that he did not 'wear his heart upon his sleeve,' but with the modesty and reserve which belong to the most thoroughly great and genuine natures, he cherished the precious gift in a breast that was as pure and transparent as crystal. The waters were silent, but they ran deep. The predominant traits of his character and the controlling forces of his conduct, it always seemed to me, were justice, charity, and truth. Judicial in his moral as well as in his mental temperament, no considerations of expediency or self-interest marred the spotless integrity of his life. From this characteristic it followed that it was impossible for him to be a partisan, or that his patriotism should ever be a thing to be made or marred by popular clamor. Generous but unostentatious in giving, as in every other act and habit of his life, he likewise illustrated that rarer and higher form of charity, which thinketh no evil. Detraction never fell from his lips, and to envy he was as superior as to falsehood. In these respects he seemed to dwell upon a serener height and to breathe an untainted air. He was incapable of uttering or acting any thing which he did not mean, and therefore, in his case, when he did speak, it was speech, rather than silence, that was golden. Some men we honor for the prompt indignation with which they would repel and rebuke a dishonest suggestion. Others there are, and have been, to whom it is impossible that such a suggestion could be made. Judge Curtis, I think, was one of these. The wonderful precision and accuracy of his mental operations, I cannot but believe, were due in a large measure to the singular rectitude and force of his character. No baser metal thwarted its action, or caused the magnet to deviate from the pole. In contemplating the character of Judge Curtis, no one can fail to be impressed with the beautiful contrast presented by the rich diversity of his great intellectual gifts and attainments, and the absolute simplicity and unity of his moral nature. In him was exemplified that contradiction of traits which inspiration has depicted as the highest type of manhood,—in understanding a man, in malice a child. In recalling that illustrious career at the bar and upon the bench, we are at some loss to determine in what department of jurisprudence he was most accomplished or most distinguished. Superficial in nothing, he seemed in turn to be equally master of each. As he threaded his way—which he made luminous at every step—through the intricate mazes of some complex patent cause, it seemed for the time as if this certainly was his forte and province, pre-eminently. But then again his mastery of commercial and maritime law was complete, and he could expound and apply each with a practical sagacity and facility which one might suppose was due only to an experience that had been gathered in the counting-room and upon the quarter-deck. At the same time there was apparently no exigency in human affairs, arising from accident, mistake, or the frauds of men, for which his thorough familiarity with the principles and spirit of equity jurisprudence could not find some relief. Above and beyond all these, summoned, as he frequently was, to deal with the graver and grander problems of constitutional and international law, he, of all others, by the precision of his statement, the vigor of his logic, the repressed fervor of his convictions, and the elevated tone of his simple eloquence, called back for a while the now departed glories of Marshall and of Webster."

Remarks of Mr. Cyrus Cobb: "I am impelled to speak for the younger members of the bar. It was remarked at the former meeting, held immediately after his death, that to many Judge Curtis seemed cold and distant. An undoubted test of an elderly man's heart is the estimation in which he is held in the hearts of young men; and in this regard I would bear testimony in behalf of the young men, whom I, on a recent occasion, had the honor to represent in connection with Judge Curtis. Last June the first reunion of the Alumni of the Boston University School of Law occurred. In preparing for this event, the members of the Alumni sent invitations to the various members of the faculty, with the request that they respond to toasts to be given at the meeting. Judge Curtis, though one of the faculty, had never been able to officiate as such; hence no personal relations had arisen between him and the students, and they viewed him as one who could hardly be approached. At their request, however, I waited upon Judge Curtis, and made known their desires. He, with peculiar and unexpected urbanity, expressed his regrets that he could not grant their request, explaining that he had been forbidden by his physicians to expose himself to the night air, on account of a disease of the throat from which he was then suffering. I reported the result of the interview to my fellow-students. Then the suggestion was made that a note from Judge Curtis, to be read at the reunion, would be very highly prized, and the wondering query was expressed whether he would be willing to write such a note. I consented to wait on Judge Curtis again, with this object in view. I did so, and the response, which was in the affirmative, was gracious in the extreme. There was in both interviews, in which conversation was entered into by the deceased, a singular courtesy and kindness of manner, imparting an undefinable charm, which lingers with me still. The note was sent and read, and will be ever cherished by the Alumni. I would further say, that so strongly was Judge Curtis's largeness of heart impressed upon my own, I felt, when I heard of his death, as if some respected relative had departed, whom I had known and revered for years."

Remarks of Hon. Charles Levi Woodbury: "I had intended, Mr. Chairman, to have refrained from saying anything to-day, coming here simply to listen; but I cannot forbear to add my tribute to the memory of one whom I had known for nearly thirty years, and whose progress I had watched with admiration and esteem. When Judge Curtis came to the bench of the United States it probably was accompanied with the unanimous consent of all the bar of the circuit that he was the most fitting man to fill the seat then vacant. Before he left the bench it became my duty, as district attorney, to watch the proceedings of the court, and I can therefore cheerfully bear my testimony to those merits which have been acknowledged on all sides. There is one thing in Judge Curtis's personal character which has been hardly dwelt upon as much as it should have been, and that was that beneath the cold exterior, beneath the calm and regulated manner, there was borne a heart as warm and generous as any man could desire to be the possessor of, true in its instincts, and firm in its resolves. I have known him, in cases where he had thought the judgment had fallen too hard upon his client, to turn and relinquish every dollar of his fee, in order to soften the adverse blow, and that, too, without a word, without any open demonstration, and probably without anybody knowing it except myself, his book-keeper, and client. With such knowledge of his personal character, I think no one can fail to believe, as I believe, that Judge Curtis filled out the accurate calibre of a man, in all its fullness and fairness. Of the great loss his death has caused to the profession, to the bench, and to those who unfortunately are involved in litigation, none can refrain from admitting. I have no more to say than this, but I have said it simply to add one single point to the well-merited eulogies given by the members of this bar."

Remarks of Mr. Causten Browne: "Mr. Chairman,—I beg the indulgence of the bar while I add a few words to those expressions of respect and attachment with which we are now, as a body, taking leave of our late distinguished associate and friend. I am sure we should all be willing to lengthen out the minutes of this hour, the last in which we, who knew him well, knew him as a class better than any other men did, can speak here to one another of those qualities which we most loved to contemplate in him while he lived, and shall most love to remember in him now that he is gone. We are in no danger of being immoderate in our speech. None of us ever knew a man whose memory would more reproach us than his would do, if for any cause we should fall into exaggeration or extravagance in what we have occasion to say. In regard to the character and the foundation of Judge Curtis's professional fame, I wish to make but one remark; and that relates to the completeness of his equipment, intellectual and moral, for the work of his life. It might not be difficult (it certainly would not be easy) to find a man with as fine a natural capacity for the acquisition and digestion of legal learning as he had;

or a man as comprehensively and exactly read in the law as he; or a man having his knowledge of the law as perfectly in hand for use on the 'occasion sudden' as was his; or a man of like power of legal reasoning, illustration, and expression; or even a man with the same exquisite habit of mind, always calm, always vigilant, always ready. But to find a man who had all these possessions combined, and thus to make good the loss which this bar and the bar of the nation has sustained, would be a very difficult task indeed. I believe that the depth of the impression which he made as a lawyer upon the minds of his time was not so much owing to the degree in which he possessed one or more of the cardinal qualities I have mentioned as to the fact that he possessed them all, each in first-rate degree, and all in perfect balance and proportion. A young man, coming a stranger into a large and strong bar like this (as I did in the year 1852, when Judge Curtis had just gone upon the bench), is apt to be deeply impressed by the marked manifestation on the part of the bench of certain moral qualities, which others, not so anxiously situated, might take for granted; and it is of some of these qualities, very conspicuous in Judge Curtis, that I wish to speak. He was a very patient judge. I suppose he thought that it was as much a judge's duty to be patient as it was to be learned, and that his possession of much learning did not excuse him from the obligation of patience towards those who had less. And, in his case, I early observed that whatever encouragement or exhilaration a young advocate might miss in the frigid and reserved and distant manner which was maintained by the bench, was more than made up by the steadiness conferred upon the speaker by the quiet and courteous attention with which he was listened to from the beginning to the end of what he had to say. If a young advocate happened to be making bad work of it, he was at any rate not helped downward by the slightest manifestation of weariness or vexation from the bench. He was a perfectly impartial judge. If we are to speak of this trait in its highest aspect, we cannot do better than to apply to Judge Curtis the language which he himself applied to another distinguished jurist of this bench (I mean—and I delight in this brief opportunity of doing him honor—Mr. Justice Sprague) on the occasion of his retirement from judicial life: 'The bar have found in you that absolute judicial impartiality which can only exist where an instructed and self-reliant intellect is joined to a tender and vigilant conscience and a firm will.' Not a word can be spared from this definition. It was all true of Judge Sprague. It was all true of his judicial comrade, Judge Curtis. We may assume now that all judges mean to be impartial, as it is here defined. But it is not possible that all, or more than a very few, should have an intellect at once instructed and self-reliant, a conscience at once tender and vigilant, as well as a firm will; and without them all, it is most true that absolute judicial impartiality, to be useful to the world as well as meritorious in its possessor, cannot exist. He was an absolutely independent judge,—independent not only in conduct, so that in his judicial seat he neither feared nor favored any man, but by natural sentiment, so that he could be and was single-minded, having no ends, large or small, to accomplish, outside of and apart from the great end of doing justice. He had an ambition, of course, to command the respect of his contemporaries, and to make himself a lasting reputation as a wise and learned judge; but he had no judicial ambition beyond this. How he would appear, what people would say, how his or anybody's personal feeling would be affected if he decided thus or thus, were thoughts of which he was simply incapable. He was that kind of man that could not lower himself to entertain such considerations. The result of the possession and steady exercise of this principle or instinct of independence was to make the administration of the law in his court profoundly respected. Patient, impartial, independent, possessing these three qualities in absolute perfection, he might have been much less able and much less learned than he was, and still have been a judge whose time we could look back upon with pride and gratitude. After Judge Curtis's return to the bar, I enjoyed frequent professional intercourse with him, mostly as his colleague; and it was in this relation of senior counsel that I find much to remember with peculiar interest and admiration. It was here that the characteristics I have mentioned, of his holding his power calmly in reserve and letting it forth in full strength at the instant it was called for, and his having his learning always ready in hand for use as the occasion sudden might require, made him so supremely valuable to a junior associate. He was patient and courteous in consultation with him; generous in giving him his opportunity in the trial or hearing of the cause; considerate and forbearing towards his mistakes; ready, on occasion of his successes, with words of commendation, very few, very appropriate, and (it could never be doubted) perfectly sincere. Towards the court he maintained a dignified courtesy which was so perfect as to be a model. The principles by which he guided his conduct towards the court were the highest. He was incapable of abusing the trust which every court must put in its counselors. In matters pertaining to this trust, he walked in the light of a 'tender and vigilant conscience' as well as an 'instructed and self-reliant intellect,' and neither did, advised, nor permitted anything which did not at the time stand approved by that scrutiny.

"I would fain linger for a moment on one or two traits which marked Judge Curtis in his private intercourse with his friends. You can bear witness, Mr. Chairman, that none who did not know him at home knew him at all. He was indeed (how strange it seems to us who so knew him, that it should surprise anybody!) a very warm-hearted, tender-hearted man. He prized the affection of his friends. He relied much upon it for his enjoyment of life. It might be truly said of him that the friends he had, and their adoption tried, he grappled them to his soul with hooks of steel. He sympathized readily and tenderly in their distresses, and testified that sympathy by many and many an act, very fragrant in the memory now; but of which he never spoke. I must resist the temptation to dwell longer on such recollections. One more thought let me express before I take my seat. Others may have left as much, nay, in some respects, perhaps, more than he did, to command the admiration of us, the younger men of this bar; but no one has left us so much that we could safely and reasonably imitate. If we shall do so successfully, we shall do honor to ourselves and to our profession."

Remarks of Hon. Richard H. Dana, Jr.: Mr. Chairman,—I had not the fortune to know Judge Curtis privately, well. I can therefore only speak as to that side of his character which was presented to the public. And everything has been so well said that I should not rise were it not that I am unwilling to lose an opportunity of at least attempting to express my own sense of what every one here feels. Seeing you, sir, reminds me of the first time I heard Judge Curtis, when he was at the age of thirty-three, in the trial of the great case of the overseers of the poor of Boston against certain proprietors of lands in the city. It was a great cause, from the amount involved, from the principles necessary to be passed upon, and from the eminence of the counsel engaged in it, of whom I now recall, besides yourself, Charles Loring, Judge Fletcher, and Mr. Curtis, the youngest of the counsel. I mention it, because I know you will agree with me that he then made a deep and lasting impression upon the bar and the bench. It is no breach of confidence, I suppose, for me to say that at the close of one day's great debate, at Mr. Loring's office, where I was a student, one of the counsel said, 'That young man ought to be chief justice of Massachusetts.' Mr. Loring replied, 'There is no court in Christendom he is not fitted now to preside over.' This was a great deal to be said of so young a man, and by such an authority as Mr. Loring; but I do not think any large deduction need be made from it by those who have watched Mr. Curtis's career to its close. About twenty-two years ago, the bar, the political world, and the public were extremely excited by the fugitive slave trials. There was a strong tide setting for the conviction of the rescuers. I felt deeply on the subject on account of my political opinions, and as counsel in the cases. Judge Curtis presided. I regretted deeply the conclusions to which he had arrived on the law. I knew he would conduct the trials with impartiality. What I now wish to say is that I felt then, and have felt ever since, that there was in the conduct of those trials more than passive impartiality. There was, on his part, an affirmative determination that the trial should be had with absolute fairness. At a critical stage of one case, he volunteered a suggestion in favor of the accused as to the weight of testimony, which, I think, in the measuring cast, secured the verdict of acquittal. And they who remember how things then stood at Washington in those days will see the force of the suggestion that Judge Curtis had not been confirmed by the senate, but was acting upon an executive appointment, made during a recess of the senate.

"As I knew but little of Judge Curtis privately, I can only speak of him as his constitution and temperament were a kind of study to a spectator who respected him as much as I did. I think I am not wrong in the belief that from the earliest he exercised over himself an extraordinary command, and enforced a constant mental and moral self-discipline. I think, perhaps, we may say that in the smallest matters and in his social relations he held a kind of court within himself, and weighed evidence and settled the principles applicable to the case, before he allowed himself to express an opinion, or say anything that might affect the rights or feelings of any man. An exaggeration was to him an untruth, and he would have felt himself dishonored if he said more than was necessary at any time on any subject. Enough, perhaps, has been said already on the subject of Judge Curtis's precision and conciseness. It would be presumption for me to pass judgment upon his higher powers, his instincts or his qualities as a jurist, but I certainly may express the admiration I felt, beginning with the trial I have spoken of, for his power of condensed statement,—a power which none could appreciate so well as those who had prepared themselves upon the same subject. And whenever I have heard Judge Curtis state his propositions on a subject which I had myself made a matter of study, I listened to it with something of that surprise and delight with which one who has labored through the slow and repetitious processes of arithmetic sees his work done before his face by the methods and signs of algebra. I think, though relative criticism is rarely well, it would be no disparagement to the members of any bar in America to say that for condensed statement he has not left his superior; and, brethren, speaking of our own bar, were it not that the presiding officer of this meeting is still active among us, we might safely say that in that respect he has not left his equal."

At the close of Mr. Dana's remarks, the report of the committee was unanimously adopted.

Circuit Court of the United States. District of Massachusetts. May Term, 1874.

Present: Honorable Nathan Clifford, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, Assigned to the First Circuit; Honorable George F. Shepley, Circuit Judge of the United States, First Judicial Circuit; Honorable John Lowell, District Judge of the United States District of Massachusetts.

The district attorney addressed the court as follows:—"May it please your honors,—When the sad intelligence of the death of Judge Curtis, coming over the wires, was announced to the court upon the day of his decease, Mr. Justice Shepley, who was presiding, at once directed the court to be adjourned. Upon the day of the funeral the court also adjourned, that the members of the bar might attend the services, and that they might hold a meeting to take such action as should be deemed proper upon the occasion of his decease. That meeting was attended in unusual numbers by members of the bar from every district in this circuit, and from other districts, all profoundly penetrated with undissembled sorrow at the death of their distinguished brother, leader, and friend; and eminent counsellors from the great metropolis gave utterance to their common sympathy with the members of this bar and the profession everywhere at the great loss which the country had sustained in the death of Mr. Curtis. At that meeting a committee was appointed, to report at an adjourned meeting the sentiments of this bar upon the occasion of the death of Mr. Curtis. That adjournment has been held this morning, and the expressions of the sentiments reported by the committee were adopted; and in accordance with the custom of this bar, the attorney of the United States has been requested to present them to the court, and to ask to have them spread upon its records. In compliance with this request, and also moved by the deepest admiration for the unsurpassed ability and attainment of the deceased, as a lawyer, judge, and jurist, and with the highest respect for his professional, judicial, and personal character, I respectfully request of your honors that these expressions of the sentiments of the bar, after they have been read by the chairman of the committee, may be extended upon the records of the court."

Hon. Benjamin F. Thomas, chairman of the committee of the bar, read the expression of the sentiments of the bar, as reported by the committee and unanimously adopted at the bar meeting.

Mr. Sidney Bartlett addressed the court as follows:—"May it please your honors,—The resolutions drawn up and presented by the chairman of the committee express in a truthful and I think not exaggerated form the estimate in which Judge Curtis was held by his associates of this bar. It is now forty years since he removed to this city and began here his professional life. During nearly that entire period, relations the most friendly, perhaps I may say intimate, have subsisted between him and myself. I cannot, therefore, suffer him to pass away without uttering my vain regrets, nor without briefly stating some of the features of his mind and character by which he won and deserved the great eminence to which he attained,—the profound respect and regard in which he was held. To those who hold that intellectual qualities are usually to be traced to a preceding generation, I have too scanty means to furnish information. That he was the son of a mother of great intelligence, and of the highest womanly virtues, is known to me; and among his collateral kindred was one, recently departed, who, in addition to his many other virtues and accomplishments, stood among the foremost in the field of letters,—the author of the 'History of Spanish Literature.' Of his earliest training nothing can be known beyond the circle of his home; but his life in college gave token of his high faculties, and his career in the law school at Harvard, under the charge of the learned, acute, and able Ashmun, drew the attention of his instructor and of his classmates, and led to the firm anticipation of his future success. So much by tradition was known of Judge Curtis by his brethren when he became, in 1834, a member of this bar; and from that period until his death he has walked before us, his conduct and qualities are personally known to us, and we can speak of them truthfully with such discrimination as our recent loss and the deep regard in which we held him permit. As the result of this retrospect, I feel confident it may be said that the great distinction attained by Judge Curtis was in his mastery of the common law. I do not mean to say that with a mind so wide as his, and filling the great judicial position he did, he failed to become familiar with the rules and principles of equity jurisprudence; nor that, like some admirers of the common law, he held that admirable system in disesteem. Whoever will peruse his recorded judgments will find how thoroughly, when the occasion arose, he mastered, and how acutely and comprehensively he applied, those principles; but, if I mistake not, he may also find slight though not disfiguring traces of a mind thoroughly imbued with the principles of the common law, and which that common law had moulded. In this, his favorite science he had among us no superior and but few equals. But legal scholarship, however wide and thorough, might, without the addition of his other marked qualities, have limited him to the life of an author and a student; furnishing, through his pen, thoughts and principles, the weight and value of which, in their practical application, must be found and wrought out by others. Had he lacked the power of giving weight to his words by the mode of their utterance, he could hardly have attained distinction at the bar; but he added to his other learning a familiar acquaintance with the beauties and the strength of the tongue he spoke, and from them he formed for himself a style of surpassing simplicity and power. The clothing he thus gave his thought, striking as it was, would, with the thought itself, have failed of its true effect, if he had not added to it a clearness of statement and a rigorous logic that I have rarely known to be excelled. Quick in his perceptions, he had also a power of memory which was almost wonderful. I recollect to have heard him state that when he had finished the study of Stephen on Pleading, he found himself able, without recurrence to the book, to state in their order every proposition it contained. It is possible that his severe training in the common law may be supposed by some to have made his mind too highly technical; but if this were so, it would be difficult to point out an occasion where in professional or judicial life it effectively obscured his vision of the right, or narrowed the breadth of his view. We are too near the period of the nation's great struggle to expect a uniform concurrence in the estimate to be formed of Judge Curtis's merits as a student and expositor of the constitution. It has sometimes been said that sound and broad views of constitutional law require in addition to the powers of a jurist those of a statesman familiar with the actual administration of the government, as well as a thorough knowledge of its early history. Judge Curtis held no political office except for a short period when he was a member of the state legislature. He took no part in what is usually termed the administration of the government, state or national; but whereforever, in civil controversies, he was called on to determine the rights of parties to property or estate under the constitution, it is believed there is a complete concurrence in the estimate of the strength and soundness of his views. Whatsoever may be the difference of opinion as to the merits and conclusiveness of his arguments or judgments on questions of constitutional law, involving political considerations, few, I think, can peruse his address to the senate, in the case of the impeachment of President Johnson, and his admirable judgment in the Dred Scott Case, without conceding that he had thoroughly studied the constitution, was familiar with the history of our governments, state and national, and that on the powers he exhibited on both those occasions may well be rested his reputation as a constitutional lawyer, a jurist, and an advocate. I have thus stated to your honors the estimate in which the character, capacity, and learning of our friend, as a lawyer, whether exhibited at the bar or on the bench, must, I think, be held by those who knew him. With what clearness, vigor, courtesy, and fairness these faculties were applied at nisi prius is known to us all. No counsel or client could have ever left his court, whatsoever might have been the issue, without feeling assured that his cause had been disposed of ably, carefully, and without bias.

"As a citizen, as a man filling the relations of domestic and of social life, Judge Curtis was, I think, less widely known. Not that he held aloof from affairs of public interest, nor that he failed to form and to express to those who sought them, his views and judgment upon the important events or questions of his day; but he had an inherent disinclination to be publicly and actively engaged in giving effect to the results of his careful thought on public topics, and contented himself with communicating and discussing the same with those with whom he was familiar. Of his bearing and the mode in which he filled the relations of private life, it is difficult for me to speak measurely. It was obvious to those who knew him best that his whole life was a life of discipline. Grave almost to a fault, unless life is to be exclusively devoted to serious purposes, he yet carried with him a heart capable of the widest and most generous sympathies, but which was careful not to suffer itself to be led astray by false or exaggerated sentiment. Thus constituted, he carefully fulfilled the duties of life, but not to the exclusion of cordial and intimate friendships, the memory of which will be a melancholy pleasure to many beyond the professional circle. A few lines occur to me at this moment which admirably, I think, sum up the character of Judge Curtis:—

'Though deep, yet clear; though gentle, yet not dull; Strong without rage; without o'erflowing, full.'

"May it please your honors,—our associate is lost to us. The ranks close up. In the firm step and manly bearing of the column which presses on may be had the assurance that soon other talent, other learning and discipline, will be found to scale the eminences of the law; but to those who, side by side with him, have been so long engaged in the contests of the profession, may be permitted the trite, melancholy, but not thoughtless exclamation, 'We shall not look upon his like again!'"

Reply of the Court: Mr. Justice Clifford replied to the address of the bar as follows:—"Gentlemen of the bar,—Of all the lessons of life, the most solemnly instructive is death, as the lesson of death accords, in its teachings, with the substance of the divine admonition that the great aim of man here should be to prepare for his own well-being in the life to come. Bereavements which sever even the dearest ties of love and friendship are of constant occurrence, and they should admonish the bereaved that it 'is not all of life to live, nor all of death to die,' as man should live to fulfil the law of his Creator; and to promote as well as he may all the great ends of his being, and should never forget that his works will follow him into the spirit world. Admonitions of the kind have more than once, since the presiding justice came into the court, been addressed to the members of this bar, when they, as now, have been called to mourn the loss of some one of the most eminent and highly esteemed of their present or former associates. Experience shows that none are exempt from the sentence, as it applies to the whole human family without regard to station, attainment, or usefulness. Your most polished and eloquent orator bowed to the inexorable doom, within the period mentioned, while yet in the midst of his usefulness, and the great magistrate of your state obeyed the dread summons only a few years later; and, more recently, the great philanthropist of the country, who at one time was the reporter of the decisions of the most learned judge who ever presided over the deliberations of this court, followed his eminent patron to the grave. Webster also is gone, though he died at an earlier period, and yet the demands of the destroyer are not satisfied. Such vacancies unquestionably served to weaken for the time the power and influence of your circle, but it still embraced one of the eminent leaders of the American bar. Better evidence need not be required than is exhibited in the assemblage here convened, that death has again invaded your ranks; and the appropriate resolutions presented in behalf of the bar announce, what was but too well known before, that you are now called to mourn the loss of your distinguished leader, of whom it may be properly said, he had no living superior at the American bar. Equals, undoubtedly, he had, who still survive to honor and adorn the record-roll of the legal profession, yet it may nevertheless be safely affirmed that your deceased brother had no living superior practicing in the federal courts, without fear of contradiction from the bench or bar. You have assembled to express your sorrow for the loss which the bar of this court, and of the country everywhere have sustained by the decease of our lamented brother, and to pay appropriate honors to his memory, and the court is here to mingle their sorrows for the great bereavement with those of the bar, and to unite and co-operate with the bar in such proceedings as they may deem it proper to adopt on the occasion, and to comply with their request that their proceedings may be entered in the records of the court. Death having removed from your circle, and from the extended sphere of his professional employment, an associate so distinguished, and with whom you have so long maintained such intimate social and professional relations, it is eminently fit and proper that you should pause in the midst of your usual avocations, and give public expression to your sense of the great loss you have sustained, and to the profound respect and veneration you entertain for the private virtues and distinguished professional services of the eminent jurist whose earthly career is now closed for ever. Influenced by such considerations, the court cordially approves the resolutions presented in your behalf, and unhesitatingly assures the members of the bar that they do heartily unite with them in responding to the sentiments which the resolutions so appropriately express. Such a manifestation of the sense of the great loss which has been sustained by the decease of our esteemed brother is no more than what is fitting on the occasion, and entirely accords with our own views and feelings upon the subject. More than forty years have elapsed since he commenced his career at the bar, and yet it may not be amiss to remark that he came into the legal profession without any deficiencies to supply in his preparatory education, and that the history of the time shows that he entered at once into a successful and remunerative practice.

"Competition at the state bar was, perhaps, never greater than at that period, as the ranks of the profession were filled with men of great legal learning, erudition, and experience, but all admit that he was eminently successful in every point of view which evidences the rising prospects of the younger members of the profession. Day by day his reputation as a sound lawyer and successful advocate increased throughout the whole period of his professional life which preceded his elevation to the bench of the supreme court of the United States. Years before that event occurred he was second to none of his associates, except the great leaders of the bar, such as Webster and Mason, all of whom, with one accord, upon the decease of the late Mr. Justice Woodbury, joined with the other members of the bar in presenting his name to the president, to fill the vacancy created by the decease of that distinguished jurist. Appointed to that bench, as it were, by common consent, and carrying with him into the court the fruits, not only of his excellent early training, but of the untiring studies of his riper experience, his success in that new and responsible sphere of duty was not a matter of surprise to any of his old associates, as all well-informed persons knew that he possessed good health, and an active, vigorous, and logical mind, well stored with legal knowledge and erudition, as the fruits of patient industry and long and active experience at the bar; nor were the public expectations disappointed, as the result showed that he was able to meet every demand upon the station, whether it had respect to the performance of the varied and responsible duties it imposed, or to the dignity of the office, or to the elevation of the individual character of the incumbent. Throughout the comparatively brief period of his judicial life, his opinions delivered in the supreme court are published in the volumes of that period, which also contain the opinions delivered by all his learned associates, and it is no more than just to say that his opinions compare favorably with the opinions delivered within the same period by the other members of the supreme court. Considered as a whole, they are characterized by a clear statement of the facts of the case, and by an accurate application of sound principles of law to the well-ascertained state of the case. Consequently his judgments remain undisturbed, and, it would seem, must ever remain as safe precedents and correct expositions of law, as applied to the cases then before the court. Two volumes of his opinions, delivered in the circuit court, have also been published, and those decisions are everywhere admitted to be of great value to all whose duty it is either to discuss or decide legal or constitutional questions. Complete success attended him as a judge in the performance of all his duties while he remained on the bench, and many of his friends were much disappointed when he resigned his seat to resume the practice of the profession which he relinquished when he accepted the commission of associate justice of the supreme court. Deep regrets undoubtedly were felt by many at his decision, but no one ever questioned his right to resign, and pursue a more lucrative employment, as the compensation of a supreme court judge at that period was quite small when compared with the remuneration which a jurist of his acquirements and experience might reasonably expect to receive from a full practice. Friends left behind him know full well that he more than once remarked that it was the duty he owed to his family that induced him to resign, which is certainly a motive that all are bound to respect. Eminently successful though he was as a judge, it is nevertheless true that his highest eminence and widest reputation were acquired in his forensic displays as a lawyer and advocate, and in one respect his reputation derived from that source is as peculiar as it is exalted and resplendent.

"Other living examples of the kind there are, but they are few, where a judge of a high court has been able to leave the bench and resume the practice of the law, and find himself able to win new professional honors beyond what were accorded to him before his elevation, and to secure and retain for a long period a much increased and greatly more lucrative practice than he enjoyed before he accepted the station from which he subsequently retired. Instances are certainly more frequent where the retiring judge, though he left the bench with high expectations of renewed professional success, has either fallen a prey to some lurking disease, and become incapable of protracted mental exertion, or lived to find that all his hopes of professional preferment were vain, and finally to linger out an existence rendered unhappy by chagrin and disappointment that younger men than himself have succeeded to the fruition of the hopes which induced him to withdraw from the bench, and return to the profession from which he had been promoted. Nothing of the kind occurred in the case of our deceased brother, as all will bear witness who were in a situation to see and know what took place. Instead of that, old clients hastened to offer new retainers, and new clients flocked in the same direction, securing to the new applicant for professional employment, in a brief space of time, more important and remunerative engagements than he ever represented before he was promoted to the high place from which he voluntarily retired. Such peculiar events in the history of a professional man evince beyond controversy that the individual in question possessed unusual qualifications to serve the interests of those who with such alacrity and spontaneous concurrence hastened to engage his professional services. Nor was that impression a fanciful one, for his forensic power in the discussion of questions of law and constitutional questions, as they arise in controversies between party and party, were scarcely ever surpassed, especially in cases where law and fact are both in dispute. Beyond all doubt he was a good jury lawyer, but his highest eminence was acquired in the discussion to the court of mixed questions of law and fact, as he never failed to exhibit the whole substance of the case in such a concise, clear, and, at the same time, comprehensive form that the tribunal addressed seldom or never found much difficulty in determining that he was either right or wrong in his view of the case; and if right, it almost invariably followed that his client was entitled to prevail, for he never intended to ask the court to apply to the case an unsound legal or constitutional principle. Though uniformly faithful to his client, he was, nevertheless, true to the court, and never, for the sake of success, would consent to exert his forensic power to subvert sound principles of law, to mislead the court, or to confound the rules of right between man and man. Skillful advocates in such cases have often appeared here and in the supreme court, but none are remembered, within the period mentioned, who excelled our deceased brother in dealing with large masses of complicated testimony, where it became necessary, in the opening of the case, to present a summary view of the whole in a succinct, clear, and at the same time sufficiently comprehensive form to convince the tribunal addressed that it embraced the whole substance of the principal matters in controversy between the parties. Such a statement, if made orally, in order to be effectual, must be comparatively brief and always clear, and it must be just, and embrace the substance of the matters in controversy, else it will fail to be convincing; but if it possess all of those requisites, it is oftentimes the best argument which can be addressed to a court. Success was often won by the subject of these remarks by such efforts, for which the character of his mind, aided by his great experience, was strikingly fitted. Much of his success in the great controversy as to the title of the quicksilver mine, in which he was opposed by one of the most effective advocates of our country, was due to the exercise of that high faculty of his mind. Beyond all doubt, it was the effective and masterly opening statement made by the deceased in the great impeachment trial that contributed very largely to give his distinguished associate an easy and triumphant victory in closing the case for the accused president. Examples of the kind almost without number might be given in which his success here and in the supreme court was due in a great measure to his superior power and skill in stating the case, but the occasion is not one for any such details. Logical force, clearness, and precision, and a ready perception characterized his intellect, as evidenced by his judicial decisions and by all of his forensic efforts at the bar. His rule, it is understood, was, before he entered upon an argument, to learn the whole substance of the material facts, which he did by consultation with his client or his associates, or by his own personal study of the record, without which not even his wonderful power of statement would have been of much avail, as it is difficult for an advocate to explain to the court what he himself does not understand. Having mastered the facts, his own reflection, aided by the inexhaustible stores of legal knowledge which he possessed, enabled him to accomplish the rest without much additional preparation, as he was able to see almost at a glance the legal weight and significance of every well-ascertained fact in the case, whether considered separately or as a whole. Instructive examples are remembered when, at the outset, he compressed the facts of the case into a statement so concise that it could not be forgotten, and yet so just, forcible, and exhaustive that it really left little occasion for further elaboration or enlargement of the argument. He seized, as it were, intuitively, the salient points of the case, which, in the clear illumination of his extensive learning, usually impressed the tribunal addressed with the conviction that the points made by him deserved consideration, and in doing so he uniformly dismissed all minor matters, and bent the whole energies of his mind to the propositions of law and fact which he believed should decide the controversy. Few men were better able to define a doubtful constitutional provision, or to interpret correctly an ambiguous statute, or to analyze a confused record, or to explain a complicated machine, or to ascertain the exact question presented in an agreed statement, or the precise effect of an obscure or intricate pleading, or the true construction of the conflicting and uncertain provisions of a written contract, deed, or will. Experience had made him familiar with every branch of jurisprudence, whether common law or equity, commercial law or admiralty, patent law or the law of insolvency and bankruptcy, and his experience as a judge, and his long practice in the federal courts, had also made him familiar with the law of prize, and the law of nations.

"Probably he never had much practice in criminal cases, but his reported decisions rendered in the circuit court during the six years he was in commission as an associate justice of the supreme court, fully justify the remark that he was also familiar with the criminal law, as well as with every branch of civil jurisprudence. Clearness, brevity, force, and good judgment characterized all his forensic efforts in the discussion of matters of fact or issues of law to the court. His address was dignified, calm, and thoughtful, and he never failed to impress the mind of the tribunal addressed that his propositions were entitled to weight, by the justness and logical force of his arguments, which were expressed in language so pure and appropriate that his sentiments never needed the adjunct of fervor or impassioned appeal to make his remarks effective, for the reason that neither fervor nor appeal could add anything to their force. Artifices he never employed, nor would it have been appropriate, as his power of reasoning was sufficiently great to render any appeal to sympathy, prejudice, or feeling quite unnecessary, and he seldom indulged in any such course of remark. But it is a mistake to suppose that his arguments were devoid of warmth and earnest conviction. On the contrary, occasions are remembered when, under the weight of heavy responsibility, and impelled by strong convictions, he, as it were, involuntarily gave utterance to passages of deep solemnity and impressiveness, which showed that he possessed a cultivated imagination as well as great logical resource. Marked success attended him both as a justice of the supreme court and in all his career as an advocate at the bar, in both of which callings he was at times exposed to great responsibilities. Few examples there are where a judge has been compelled to assume a greater responsibility than was devolved upon the distinguished jurist, whose death is the occasion of these observances, when he was constrained by a sense of duty to dissent from the majority of the court in the great case which was decided during the last term he ever sat in the supreme court bench. Judges and jurists may differ in opinion whether he was right or wrong, but all must agree that he acted from a sense of public duty, and that he vindicated his conclusion by an ability and a course of reasoning rarely ever surpassed. Courage is well-nigh as essential in a judge as in a military commander, and all must admit that the dissenting judge showed by his course on the occasion referred to that he was prepared to go wherever conscientious duty pointed out the pathway. Responsibilities of an unusual character were also assumed by him when he engaged to assist in conducting the defence of the president.

"Public men differed widely upon the subject, but no one who ever read the record of his masterly opening statement of the case will deny that he met the whole matter of the accusation in the most fearless manner, answering every part of the charge by a clear statement of the facts, and by a sound exposition of every legal and constitutional question involved in the case. Never, perhaps, did the great qualities of his mind shine brighter than on those two occasions,—the one showing his high qualifications as a judge, and the other his unrivaled powers as an advocate. It seems almost superfluous to speak of the character of our deceased brother, as all admit that it was spotless, and that he lived a life of uprightness and purity from his youth to the moment when he yielded up his spirit to the great Creator. Except for a brief period, his whole professional life has been spent here, and it must be gratifying to his immediate friends to know that all those who have known him most intimately are the freest to admit that in all their intercourse with him he was always actuated by a strict regard to what was right, and by a faithful adherence to every professional engagement. Such a vacancy creates a great void, which is deeply felt by the court as well as by the bar. Many years of intimate relations had endeared him to the court as an example of high professional honor, and as a friend always to be trusted without fear that any confidence reposed would ever be misplaced. Our loss, my brethren, is great; but the loss of his family is much greater, and to them we tender our sincere sympathies. Pursuant to the request of the bar, it is ordered that the resolutions presented in their behalf, and the proceedings of the bar, together with the remarks made by the members of the bar in their support, and the remarks of the court, be entered in the record, and the court stands adjourned until to-morrow morning at ten o'clock."

DAVIS, DAVID.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1369.]

The following proceedings upon his retirement from the bench are reprinted from 7 Biss. 15:

Hon. David Davis, justice of the United States supreme court, assigned to this circuit, having resigned his position on the bench of that court, for the purpose of filling the position of United States senator, to which he had been elected by the legislature of the state of Illinois, the members of the bar within this circuit took early occasion to express their sentiments toward the retiring justice.

Action of the Chicago bar: The Chicago Bar Association, at their regular meeting, passed the following resolutions: "The Honorable David Davis, one of the justices of the supreme court of the United States, after a service of more than a quarter of a century as judge of the circuit courts of Illinois, and of the federal courts, having recently retired from judicial life, the Bar Association of Chicago think the occasion fitting and proper for an expression of the sentiments of esteem and personal good will, entertained by its members, in common with the bar of the country, toward him. During his judicial career no member of the legal profession or the community in which his courts were held ever questioned his integrity and honor. He has those clear perceptions and that keen sense of right which made his judgment of facts presented better than precedents, and enabled him to administer the law according to its spirit. In his service of more than fourteen years upon the supreme bench at Washington and at the federal circuits, he was distinguished among his fellow judges for intellectual strength, sound judgment, and ability to analyze principles; and his opinions are models of directness, brevity, and force. In laying aside his judicial robes for another field of service to his country, Judge Davis carries with him the respect, the confidence, and the affectionate regard of the legal profession of the country."

The following were the proceedings of the southern Illinois bar:

Circuit Court of the United States, Southern District of Illinois, Thursday, July 12th, A. D. 1877.

Present, Hon. Thomas Drummond, Presiding Judge. Samuel H. Treat, District Judge.

This day comes into open court Hon. J. T. Stuart, who addresses the court as follows:

"May it please your honors: A meeting of the bar of this district and state was held in this court room on yesterday, in which almost every section of the state was represented, and to be remembered for its numbers and for the talent, learning, and reputation of its members; a meeting called to take action in relation to the retirement from the bench of Hon. David Davis. It was hoped and expected that the able lawyer, Hon. Stephen T. Logan, now venerable on account of his character and age, would perform the duty now devolved upon me of presenting to this honorable court and asking to be spread on its records these resolutions, passed by that meeting of the bar:

"Resolved, that the members of the bar of the state of Illinois view with sensibility the retirement of the Hon. David Davis from the bench of the supreme court of the United States, and express their profound regret that the country is deprived of the benefit of his services in that distinguished place, which he has so long adorned by his learning, his industry, his urbanity, and his conscientious devotion to duty.

"Resolved, that, in retiring from his eminent judicial station, he carries with him the confidence and high personal and professional respect and regard of the members of the bar of the state of Illinois.

"Resolved, that a copy of these resolutions be forwarded by the chairman of this meeting to the Hon. David Davis, with an earnest expression of the hope that his future career may be as useful to his country and as honorable to himself as his past, while judge in the courts of the state of Illinois, and of the United States."

"The resolutions are expressive of the opinions of the bar in regard to that distinguished citizen, and I can add but little to their force. David Davis was elected judge of the eighth judicial circuit of the state of Illinois in the year 1848, that being the first election for judges under the constitution of 1847, making the office elective. The eighth circuit was then composed of the counties of Sangamon, Tazewell, Woodford, McLean, De Witt, Champaign, Piatt, Macon, Moultrie, Shelby, Christian, Logan, Vermillion, and Edgar; a large circuit, and embracing a fair average of the intelligence of the people of the state, and of the talent of the legal profession. The election of Judge Davis, then a young man, in such a circuit, was no inconsiderable compliment; but it was a higher compliment that for the ensuing six years he discharged the duties of that office so well, that in 1854 he was re-elected without opposition, and again re-elected in 1861 without opposition in a circuit somewhat changed. Mr. Lincoln was no mean judge of human nature; he had practiced law at the same bar with David Davis from 1835 to 1848, and before him as judge for the twelve years prior to his election as president; and when he became president he appointed David Davis to the second vacancy on the bench of the supreme court of the United States. Judge Davis was a justice of the supreme court of the United States, and presiding justice of this judicial circuit from 1861 to 1876, a period long enough to test his capacity as a man and a lawyer. It would, perhaps, be out of place for me, before your honors who have known him so long and well on the bench and in the conference room, to say how well he discharged the duties of that high office, the most important and dignified in the government; that from the time of his appointment to his retirement his capacity for judicial usefulness continued to grow and expand; that he administered the law and constitution faithfully, loved the truth and the right, followed fearlessly and boldly where his convictions pointed the way; that he was a just judge; that his retirement from the bench has been followed by the regrets of the profession and the country; and that, especially in the language of these resolutions, he carries with him in that retirement 'the confidence and high personal and professional respect and regard of the members of the bar of the state of Illinois.' In presenting these resolutions and confining myself to the judicial life of Judge Davis, I, perhaps, have said all that I ought to say; but I cannot refrain from adding, on my own account, that I have known David Davis intimately and well as a man and as a lawyer, and in his social relations, for these forty-two years past; and that in all these relations he is without a stain, and that in all he has been true to himself, honest and honorable, and that, from all his past life, he may be safely trusted to do, on all occasions, only what he believes to be true and right."

It is ordered, that the foregoing resolutions and the address of Hon. John T. Stuart thereupon, be spread upon the records of said court, and a certified copy thereof be transmitted to the Hon. David Davis.

Action of the Indianapolis bar: At the meeting called at the United States court room in Indianapolis, to take action expressive of the feelings of the bar, in regard to the retirement of Judge David Davis from the supreme bench, the following proceedings were had: Judge Walter Q. Gresham presided, and the Hon. John D. Howland acted as secretary. A committee on resolutions, consisting of the following gentlemen, was appointed: Hon. Joseph E. McDonald, Gen. Benj. Harrison, Judge S. H. Buskirk, Hon. Thomas M. Brown, Hon. J. D. Morris, Judge Sol. Claypool, and Hon. W. P. Fishback. This committee retired and shortly reported the following resolutions:

"The members of the bar of the courts of the United States in this district, in view of the voluntary retirement of the Hon. David Davis from the supreme court, and the bench of this circuit, respectfully ask this court to accept and place upon its records this testimonial of respect and affection for the great judicial officer who has withdrawn from this department of the public service. We have, for the last fifteen years, had personal knowledge of Judge Davis as one of the associate justices of the supreme court, and as the justice assigned by that tribunal to hold the courts of the United States in the seventh judicial circuit, and we have fully appreciated his learning and ability as a judge, and his fearless, independent, and impartial administration of justice. His knowledge of affairs, his intuitive discernment of character, his rapid analysis of evidence, however voluminous and complicated, his robust sagacity in detecting the vital facts in a cause, and his broad and masterly application of principles have stamped his judicial career as one of singular usefulness, and have furnished an example of judicial service which can never be forgotten by those whose privilege it has been to assist in it as members of his court. And it is not the judge alone whose loss we deplore. The man whose society we have enjoyed, and whose confidence many of us have shared, is dearer to us than the officer. His liberal humanity, his ready recognition of the rights and feelings of all with whom he is brought in contact, his indifference to merely accidental distinctions, his kindly interest in the young, his evident anxiety to search out and vindicate the very right of a cause, and his contempt for all arts, appliances and influences by which the mind may be diverted from the direct channel of justice, have enriched and ennobled his career, and will make its memory precious to us forever."

Senator McDonald presented the resolutions. He referred to the time when Judge Davis came upon the bench as one particularly calculated to test the character of the man and the judge. Partisan strife ran high, and this had been intensified and embittered by Civil War. But when Judge Davis assumed the bench the partisan was lost in the judge. From the beginning to the end of his judicial career he was never known to swerve from the path of official duty.

General Harrison referred to the rare success of Judge Davis in winning and retaining the respect of lawyers, litigants and jurors. His attainments and personal character compelled the respect of all with whom he had intercourse as a judge or as a man. As a judge he was unsurpassed; his powers of analysis were especially marked in the manner in which he dissected intricate questions of evidence, and the clear and comprehensive way in which he presented such to juries. It is the expectation of his friends that he will pursue the same independence and unswerving integrity of character in the new position to which he has been called, as he ever manifested on the bench.

Hon. A. G. Porter said that Judge Davis was distinguished for the strong yet simple honesty of his character. He was intellectually and morally honest, and in his personal relations he was always honest and straightforward. He said some one had described him exactly when he remarked that "Judge Davis was big all over, intellectually, morally, and personally."

Hon. W. P. Fishback referred to the wonderful clearness and readiness of Judge Davis in grasping and analyzing legal questions. His was eminently a legal mind. He also referred to his rare social gifts, his kindness and simplicity of character. Hon. John Hanna, General Thomas Browne, Judge Buskirk, W. H. H. Miller, T. B. Buchanan and H. D. Pierce also made remarks, each paying tribute to the high qualities of Judge Davis as a judicial officer and a man.

The resolutions were then unanimously adopted and ordered spread upon the records of the circuit court, and a copy of the same sent to Judge Davis.

DAVIS, JOHN.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1369.]

The following proceedings are reprinted from 1 Story, 618:

"Within the period of time embraced by the present Reports, the Honorable John Davis, the learned and venerable district judge for the district of Massachusetts, resigned the office, which for more than forty years had been graced by his dignity and wisdom. Upon an intimation that it was his intention to resign, a meeting of the Suffolk bar was held on the 9th of July, 1841, at which it was unanimously resolved:

"That the attorney of the United States be requested, in the name of this bar, to make known to Judge Davis the high sense we all entertain of the importance of his judicial labors, which for so many years have exhibited varied and accurate learning, sound and discriminating judgment, unwearied patience, gentleness of manners, and perfect purity; and that Mr. Attorney be requested to express our heartfelt wishes, that he may find in retirement that dignified repose, which forms the appropriate close of a long and useful life, and to bid him an affectionate farewell."

In accordance with these resolutions, Franklin Dexter, Esq., the district attorney of the United States, at the time appointed, rose and addressed Judge Davis as follows:

"May it please your honor:—By these resolutions I am requested, in the name of the Suffolk bar, to express to you their high sense of the value of your judicial labors, and their acknowledgment of the personal kindness, as well as the distinguished ability, with which they have been performed. This is, sir, to me a most grateful duty;—and yet I feel the difficulty of giving any adequate expression of the deep feelings of my brethren, without danger of offending the modesty, which, through a long life of usefulness, has adorned so many talents and so many virtues. I will not, therefore, depart from the simple but comprehensive language of the resolution in describing to you our general estimation of your judicial character and conduct. But let me assure you, sir, that these are not words of mere form, required by the occasion; but the sincere and spontaneous expression of the feelings and opinions of every member of the bar, and of this commercial community. It can rarely happen, that a judge, who is called upon to decide so many delicate and important questions of property and of personal right, should so entirely have escaped all imputation of prejudice or passion, and should have found so general an acquiescence in his results. It is not to be forgotten in the peaceful tenor of the present times, that your official career has been formerly marked with extraordinary difficulties. When you assumed its duties,—more than forty years ago,—before any of this fraternity had begun the active business of life,—the stores of judicial learning in that peculiar branch of the law, which you have been called most frequently to administer, were by no means so near at hand as at present;—then it was necessary to peruse the sources, and from those fountains your own decisions have, with those of your distinguished contemporaries in Europe and America, drawn down the principles of the admiralty law within the reach of comparatively easy exertion. A few years after that time the system of commercial restrictions, adopted by the general government, threw this portion of the country into a state of unparalleled distress and exasperation. An abundant and overflowing commerce was suddenly checked in all its issues and enterprises, and the revulsion threatened to break down the barriers of law by which it was restrained. It was in the district court, and under your administration, that this struggle took place; and although juries refused to execute the obnoxious restrictions in cases, required by the constitution to be submitted to them, yet the supremacy of the law suffered no detriment in the hands of the court. Few of us can remember this civium ardor jubentium, but all can imagine, how painful a duty it was to be thus placed in opposition to the feelings and interests of this community. Perhaps I may be pardoned for recalling to the minds of the bar, in your presence, the beautiful language in which your own regrets were expressed, when you felt obliged to declare, that, disastrous as its consequences were to the country, the embargo was still the law of the land, and as such to be obeyed. I lament the privations, the interruption of profitable pursuits and manly enterprise, to which it has been thought necessary to subject the citizens of this great community. I respect the merchant and his employment. The disconcerted mariner demands our sympathy. The sound of the axe and of the hammer would be grateful music. Ocean, in itself a dreary waste, by the swelling sail and floating steamer, becomes an exhilarating object; and it is painful to perceive, by force of any contingencies, the American stars and stripes vanishing from the scene. Commerce, indeed, merits all the eulogy, which we have heard so eloquently pronounced at the bar. It is the welcome attendant of civilized man, in all his various stations. It is the nurse of arts; the genial friend of liberty, justice, and order; the sure source of national wealth and greatness; the promoter of moral and intellectual improvement; of generous affections and enlarged philanthropy. Connecting seas, flowing rivers, and capacious havens, equally with the fertile bosom of the earth, suggest, to the reflecting mind, the purposes of a beneficent Deity, relative to the destination and employments of man. Let us not entertain the gloomy apprehension, that advantages so precious are altogether abandoned; that pursuits so interesting and beneficial are not to be resumed. Let us rather cherish a hope, that commercial activity and intercourse, with all their wholesome energies, will be revived; and that our merchants and our mariners will, again, be permitted to pursue their wonted employments, consistently with the national safety, honor, and independence.' From that time, sir, down to this most interesting period, when you are about to surrender the high trust, you have so long holden, it is enough for me to say, that the bar have felt undiminished confidence in the ability and integrity of your administration of the law, and that our filial respect and affection for yourself has constantly increased with your increasing years. And while we acknowledge your right now to seek the repose of private life, we feel, that your retirement is not less, than it ever would have been, a loss to the profession and to the public. I am further instructed, sir, by the fraternity, to bid you an affectionate farewell, and to express to you their heartfelt wishes, that you may find in retirement that dignified repose, which forms the appropriate close of a long and useful life. May it be so, sir. May you live long and happily,—as long as life shall continue to be a blessing to you; and so long will that life be a blessing to your friends and to society."

Judge Davis was sensibly affected at this address, and it was some moments before he was able to respond. When he commenced his reply, the bar rose and gathered round the bench, while the venerable judge delivered the following address:

"Gentlemen of the Suffolk bar:—I receive gratefully and with deep sensibility your generous and kind expressions, communicated by a representative most justly entitled to that selection, and to whom I would tender my acknowledgments for his very acceptable performance of the duty, which it has been your pleasure to assign to him on this occasion. There are considerations, besides habitual taste and temperament, which would dispose me to meet the event of this day in silent soberness, with the full persuasion, which, I was assured, might be indulged, that our official relation would be dissolved with mutual friendly regards. But I yield to an arrangement, which is more consonant with your kind wishes, and in which there seems to be an obvious propriety and fitness. At all times, and especially in this place, we are bound to regard the fitness of things. Somewhat more than half of my life has been spent in the office, which I am now to relinquish.

With the members of this bar, and with their predecessors, I have had frequent, gratifying, and improving intercourse. Should I attempt to give expression to the recollections, which on this occasion arise rapidly and somewhat confusedly to my view, I could do it but imperfectly. If a history of my time should ever be sketched, it must be with more deliberate preparation. Some reminiscences, however, seem due to the occasion; the indulgence is among the privileges of age,—a privilege, I hope, which will not be abused.

"The Suffolk bar, at the commencement of the present century, was not numerous, though even then, I believe, solicitous aspirants were heard to complain, that the profession was crowded. The whole number was but thirty-three; five barristers; twenty attorneys of the supreme judicial court, and eight of the common pleas. The barristers were James Sullivan, Theophilus Parsons, William Tudor, Perez Morton, and Shearjashub Bourne.

"Attorneys of the supreme court: Thomas Edwards, Jonathan Mason, Christopher Gore, Rufus G. Amory, Joseph Hall, Edward Gray, John Davis, Harrison G. Otis, Joseph Blake, Jr., John Lowell, Jr., John Quincy Adams, John Phillips, George Blake, Ebenezer Gay, Josiah Quincy, Joseph Rowe, William Sullivan, Charles Paine, John Williams, William Thurston.

"Attorneys of the court of common pleas: Edward Jackson, Foster Waterman, David Everett, John Heard, Charles Davis, Charles Cushing, Jr., J. W. Gurley, H. M. Lisle. Of these, there remain nine fellow surviving associates;—Hall, Otis, Adams, George Blake, Gay, Quincy, Rowe, Williams, and Cushing. Messrs. Hall, Otis, and Blake have retired from the bar. Adams, Gay, Rowe, Quincy, and Cushing have changed their residence; and Mr. Williams is the only one of the number now having a place at the Suffolk bar.

"The officers connected with the United States courts in this district, in my time, besides the present occupants, are H. G. Otis, George Blake, Andrew Dunlap, and John Mills, attorneys; Nathan Goodale, William G. Shaw, and John W. Davis, clerks; Samuel Bradford, Thompson J. Skinner, James Prince, Samuel Harris, and Jonas Sibley, marshals. Mr. Otis was but a short time in office, being removed by President Jefferson, in a few months after the appointment received from President Adams. Mr. Blake held the office many years, some of them years of great and peculiar pressure and perplexity, with eminent ability and assiduity. His successor, Mr. Dunlap, performed his official duties with similar energies, and with his characteristic ardor, tempered with gentlemanly address. Many now present remember his signal exertions, when he stood alone in the arduous trial of the pirates, in 1834, the number of the men on trial for their lives, as was remarked by their junior counsel, being equal to the number of the jury, by whom their fate was to be decided. Mr. Mills, who succeeded Mr. Dunlap, has recently resigned. He left us with the cordial esteem of all, with whom he was connected,—faithful, accurate, and able in his official transactions. It was only regretted, that he did not find it convenient to make this, the place of his business in office, his place of abode. The discreet employment of a competent and very attentive assistant, in a great degree, was a sufficient substitute. It has always, I think, been important, and the urgency is continually augmenting, that the attorney, marshals, and clerks of the United States courts in this district, should reside in or near the place, where the business, to which their offices have relation, is almost wholly transacted. Of Marshals Bradford, Prince, Harris, and Sibley, I have spoken in deserved terms of commendation, when the present marshal, Mr. Lincoln, took the requisite official oaths in this place. Of his immediate predecessor, Mr. Sibley, I feel bound to say, in addition, that, to his attention and exertions, we are very much indebted for the ample and very acceptable accommodations for the United States courts, and all connected with them, in this edifice, by arrangements with the city government. There have been times, when there has been peculiar embarrassment in this particular. Frequently, no place could be found for holding the courts of the United States, but in a hotel. And at one time, I recollect, Marshal Prince announced, that he had written, or should write to Washington, that he knew not, where to find a place for the court, but under the great tree on the common.

"Among the clerks of this court, the last-named was, as you know, most near and dear to me. I am happy to say, also, that most of you were witnesses of his carefulness and courtesy, and how faithfully and acceptably he discharged all the duties of his trust. When your obliging sentiments were read, and I listened to the interesting accompaniments, offered by a son of an esteemed friend and classmate, it brought to recollection a reply made at a council fire, in a talk in our forest border. 'Good words,' said an aged chief, 'Good words, and I will tell them to my children.' Your good words I cannot tell to my son, but I shall tell them to his children. Of his six sons, all now very young, some one or more may, at some future time, have the ambition to take a place in your corps. If so, I am sure, they will find a welcome, and be received with generous good will. Mr. Bassett, my son's assistant in his illness, and his tried friend and classmate, became his successor in the office. You well know his merits, his accuracy, and fidelity. Everything in his department is to my entire satisfaction. The connexion of the court with the present district attorney and marshal is quite recent. If I should have remained in office, I well know the satisfaction, with which my intercourse with them would be attended. It will be experienced, I am confident, in abundant measure by my successor, and by all, with whom they may have connexion, in the interesting offices committed to their charge. The Suffolk bar is greatly increased in the forty years of my judicial life. There are on its list more than six times the number of 1801. If we deduct from the list those, who are engaged in other pursuits, though their names still stand on the honorable roll, the acting number will still far exceed the rate of increase of population in the scene of action. There are other causes, prevailing in this very busy and flourishing portion of the community, greatly affecting and varying the statistics and condition of the bar, in this city and its vicinity, on which I cannot here enlarge, but which every intelligent observer must have perceived. They are considerations, which have brought here and well rewarded the transition of distinguished advocates from other counties and from sister states. The fair field has been occupied and honored by Dexter, Ward, Prescott, Jackson, Bigelow, Webster, Pickering, Choate, Jeremiah Mason, Fletcher, Sprague, Peabody, and others, who have been cordially received by those, whom I may term the home members. Men of eminent attainments, now in judicial office,—Story, Putnam, Shaw, and Thacher,—have appeared as advocates in this court, and occasionally distinguished counsellors from other counties, and from other states. If in my department I have been deserving of the commendation, which it has been your pleasure to bestow, much, very much, is due to my cherished intercourse with such men, as well as to my habitual respect and regard for your profession.

"It is a profession highly honorable, for it is highly useful. It has been embraced by the wisest and best of men, and in every country, having any pretensions to freedom or intelligence, the able, upright, well-instructed lawyer is of high consideration. The studies, in which he is accomplished, his knowledge of men in all their relations, his habits of research, reflection, and discrimination, the frank and independent tone of his character, inspired by the very genius of his profession, his unshaken fidelity to his trust, his varied intellectual acquisitions, his power of clear, forcible, and impressive communication,—all inspire confidence, respect, and esteem. In the various perplexities of life he is the safe and confidential counsellor. He enters the temple of justice, a representative of others, with rights, which all are bound to respect. Property, reputation, the peace and repose of families, the affairs of various associations, the dearest temporal interests, are occasionally committed to his charge. Too often does the sad occasion occur, when some forlorn being, in a state of awful uncertainty, leans on him for support, and life hangs trembling on his exertions. The learned author of Eunomus suggests the opinion of one of his friends, a respected veteran, who had retired from practice, in regard to the moral tendency of the profession, which, if it were just, would impair its estimation and cloud its brightest honors. That friend is represented, as declaring, that 'He would never breed up a son of his to the profession, if he could not leave him a competence, independent of it, because he doubted much, whether he could thrive in it, at all events without sacrificing more of his honor and conscience than a man of any delicacy would wish for.' Very different was the opinion of my excellent predecessor, the Hon. Judge Lowell, an ornament of his profession, the delight of every friend and admirer of virtue, genius, and intelligence. I remember to have heard him more than once express, in his emphatic manner, his persuasion, that the sentiments and habits, generated by legal studies and pursuits, were a precious security against wreck of character, and that they had a favorable tendency to invigorate and improve the moral sense, as well as the intellectual faculties. In this sentiment he is sustained by Lord Coke. 'For thy encouragement,' says that eminent jurist, 'cast thine eye upon the sages of the law, that have been before thee, and never shalt thou find any, that have excelled in the knowledge of the law, but hath drawn from the breasts of that divine knowledge, honesty, gravity, and integrity.' With such convictions and the eminent examples, which it has been my good fortune to witness, it has been my endeavor to maintain a corresponding deportment. We have all, I trust, been habitually mindful of our respective relations. Truth, says Malebranche, loves gentleness and peace. It has, I hope, been evinced, in our transactions together, sometimes of exciting tendency, that irritation and ill humor are not necessary incidents in legal controversies; but that the precious elements, truly and essentially appertaining to tribunals of justice, forbearance, moderation, and mutual civility, are the most favorable for full discussion and just decision, and in entire consistency with that manly character and uniform assertion of right, which it is the honor and the duty of the bar and the bench respectively to maintain.

"When I received my appointment, there was a distinct circuit court. The district judge had not a seat in that court. It was then my impression, abundantly confirmed since, that the alteration of the law in that particular is not an improvement. The employments of the district judge, of various descriptions in court, and of ministerial and miscellaneous character, are of such amount in this highly commercial district, that it seems neither reasonable nor advantageous to require his attendance and agency in another court. This consideration will be more especially urgent, if a bankrupt law should be enacted, and the jurisdiction of the court should be enlarged in reference to crimes and offences, one or both of which augmentations of the duties of the district judge, there seems reason to expect. By becoming connected with the circuit court, I had the satisfaction of an association and intimacy with the venerable Judge Cushing, and of affording, I believe, some acceptable aid in his decline of life; and I have, in my turn, received relief and great enjoyment with his distinguished successor, the Hon. Mr. Justice Story. In that connection I have found every thing that could be wished. In business, never asking nor expecting from me more than my engagements in my own special sphere would consistently admit. By his eminent ability and unwearied industry, in a great degree relieving a solicitude, which I might otherwise have experienced, from responsibilities in reference to the circuit court, and by his able decisions, as well as by his learned labors, inter sylvas academiae, affording salutary aid in various departments of my official duty. I have noticed with pleasure the improving influence of the law school in the University. The professional publications from some of his young pupils at this bar are highly honorable to them and to their instructor. I must forbear, gentlemen, to enlarge, though there remain topics, connected with my position, which it would not be impertinent to consider. A great portion of the business, which we have been concerned in transacting, has been of admiralty jurisdiction, in which the trial rests wholly with the judge, as to fact as well as law. This characteristic, in regard to a large portion of the cases before him, is attended with peculiar solicitudes, requiring the candid consideration, which I have had the happiness to experience. It would be a great relief to the judge, and might be an improvement, though of this I am not certain, if facts in admiralty and maritime cases were made triable by jury, as they are rendered by statute in regard to seizures on land. The solicitudes of the bench, arising from the present law and practice in that particular, are, however, not of such character and degree as to call for the alteration suggested. In this respect, as well as in all other branches of practice, I have been relieved by the courtesies of the bar, which I have uniformly enjoyed, and for which you have my cordial thanks.

"Dr. Taylor, in his Elements of Civil Law, has a remark not inapplicable to my present position. It is relative to the passes or bridges, over which the voters in ancient Rome proceeded to give in their ballots. 'It was in this pass, that people of sixty years and upwards were objected to, and refused the right of suffrage: for, as sexagenarians could not be members of the comitia, as they could not be compelled to execute any public office after that age, so the younger sort thought it unreasonable, that they should be indulged their suffrage, and thrust them by, as they came along,—whence the phrase "deponant senes."' Upon this rigid system, I should long ago have been 'deponantus;' but am willing to believe my generous auditors would consent to give me still further grace. But the time of release has arrived, and meets with my acceptance. I bid you an affectionate adieu, thankful for all your kindness, and for the gratifying and improving opportunities, which it has been my favored lot to enjoy, in the connexion now to be dissolved. It is painful to employ the solemn word, 'dissolve.' Our official connexion will cease; but reciprocal esteem and good-will, will, I trust, remain in continued exercise. I shall rejoice in all I may see or hear of your prosperity and honor; and may the Father of Mercies, the giver of every good gift, sustain, animate, and guide you in your assiduous progress in the path of arduous duty."

Judge Davis then descended from the bench, and took leave of the members of the bar and the officers of the court individually. The character of this learned and able judge was marked by a wise patience of investigation and a clear discrimination of principles. Yet it was not alone in his judicial capacity, that he won the esteem of all around him, but rather that to the high intellectual powers which he displayed in all the labors of his office were superadded a mild urbanity of manner, an unprejudiced candor of judgment, and a uniform dignity of deportment, which rendered him as much beloved as respected.

DILLON, JOHN FORREST.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1370.]

The following proceedings are reprinted from 5 Dill. 575:

On the 26th day of May, 1879, the circuit judge sent the following letter of resignation:

"Davenport, Iowa, May 26th, 1879. To the President: I hereby tender my resignation of the office of circuit judge of the United States for the eighth judicial circuit, to take effect on the 1st day of September, 1879. The date thus fixed will enable me to attend the rest of the summer circulits to dispose of the unfinished business before me, and will likewise enable my successor, should he be nominated and confirmed before congress adjourns, to qualify in time to hold the earliest of the fall terms. In voluntarily terminating a judicial career of nearly twenty-one years on the state and federal bench, it seems fitting to add that I take this step not because I am dissatisfied with the duties of the office, but because I have recently been honored by an election to a place of commanding usefulness in Columbia College, where the labors are lighter, the compensation greater, and which also, in the leisure it affords as well as in the duties it requires, offers opportunities for the study and advancement of the law that may well satisfy the highest professional ambition. I have the honor to be, with the highest regard, your obedient servant, John F. Dillon."

The resignation was accepted in the following letter:

"Department of Justice, Washington, June 11th, 1879. Honorable John F. Dillon, United States Circuit Judge, Davenport, Iowa: Sir:—Yours of the 26th ult., tendering to the president your resignation of the office of circuit judge of the United States for the eighth judicial circuit, to take effect September 1st next, is received, and the resignation accepted according to its terms. The president desires me to express his regret that we are to lose you in the judicial service, and to wish you a most cordial and agreeable career in the other duties which you have decided to enter upon. In these expressions will you permit me also to concur. Very respectfully, Charles Devens, Attorney General."

Kansas.

On the 10th day of June, 1879, the members of the bar in Kansas in attendance at the June term of the United States circuit court, at Leavenworth, passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, that the Honorable A. L. Williams be authorized to present the accompanying address to the United States circuit court, and ask that it be spread upon the records; and that the Honorable Robert Crozier, on behalf of the state judiciary, and the Honorable George R. Peck, the United States district attorney, on behalf of the practicing attorneys of the United States circuit court for the district of Kansas, be requested to follow with appropriate remarks; and that the reporter be asked to insert the proceedings had in court in this behalf in the next volume of reports."

On the next day Mr. Williams presented, in open court, the following address on behalf of the bar, Mr. Justice Miller presiding:

"To the Honorable John F. Dillon: Sir:—At a meeting of the bar of the eighth circuit, assembled at the present term of the United States circuit court for the district of Kansas, it was unanimously ordered that an address be prepared and presented to you which should appropriately express the sentiments of the profession upon your voluntary retirement from the bench. In obeying that command, we feel that it is impossible by mere words to convey to you, and through this expression (which we shall ask to be made a matter of record) to the public, any adequate idea of our sense of inestimable loss in your retirement. For ten years past it has been the habit of the bar of this circuit to look forward to the recurrence of your terms with the highest anticipation of the pleasure of meeting you as a friend and the invaluable experience of attending upon your righteous and learned judgments. What has gone on so long and with unbroken regularity, and thus has been knit into a delightful custom, it had fondly seemed to us would end only with your earthly career. We can only look forward to the approaching close of this relation with sadness. It is seldom, we believe, that there is mingled in so great a degree the respect and admiration due to an able and upright judge with the tender regard which only characterizes sincere and intimate friendship as may be found in the case of the bar of your circuit towards yourself. It is a matter of public concern when a judge, with special aptitudes for his great calling, ripened by twenty-one years of continuous experience, becomes emeritus and retires upon his well-earned honors. The loss is not ours simply, or chiefly, nor are we alone fully appreciative of it. But the connection of bench and bar is such that we can most appropriately testify to it. We desire to assure you, sir, with a sincerity that is unfeigned, that though this proceeding partakes somewhat of the formality of procedure in a court of justice, yet this is no formal leave-taking. It is a parting that touches the heart and suffuses the eye. We cannot hope to add by this tribute anything to your great fame as a chancellor and judge. Neither can we extend your reputation as a philosophic student and writer upon the law, already firmly established among all Anglo-Saxon people. We seek to express only our appreciation of your public services as a jurist as witnessed and known by ourselves, and our regrets that they are about to end.

"The bar of your circuit owe you a debt of gratitude for many things, and not the least for the uniform help and encouragement you have ever extended to young practitioners. Your unfailing patience, the stimulus of your approving smile, your genial obliviousness of the crudities of the young lawyer struggling for a place with his abler fellows, have endeared you to both young and old, and taught us all lessons of charity and forbearance. Not a few of the younger lawyers of your circuit owe and attribute the greater part of the success they have achieved to the direct personal interest you have taken in their careers. Nor should we omit gratefully to acknowledge the service we may all derive from the example of your professional and personal life. You have taught us not only that there is no excellence without great labor, but how marvelous a degree of excellence labor united to probity of conduct may attain. We behold in you one who owes nothing to fortune, and but little to preferment—one who has risen by force of merit alone. No envy or detraction can shadow any honors you have or may receive, or any fortune with which you may be endowed, for it must be admitted on all hands that every step in your ascending ladder has been fairly and industriously scaled. And, finally, we desire to thankfully testify to your ability and absolute fairness as a judge. You have ever impressed upon the laity no less than the bar, by your clear and comprehensive judgments, that law is a rational and coherent science, the end of which is justice. Your decisions have always been illustrated with clear and judicious expositions of the law, which satisfied the reason and convinced the judgment. Your practical intellect has always penetrated the husks of discussion to the kernel of controversy, and your conclusions have, for the most part, not only met the approval of the bar generally, but have been warmly acquiesced in even by the counsel whom your judgments have defeated. A term of this court has not only been regarded by the oldest and most experienced of our practitioners as a school where the better parts of their profession were ably taught, but it has been a source of pride to us all that, as counsellors here, we were assisting in as pure and efficient an administration of public justice as is possible anywhere. It is with the greatest satisfaction, however, that the bar of this circuit is credibly informed that your new avocation will indulge you in that studious leisure which, with the preservation of your strength, must result to the highest benefit of the philosophic student of the jurisprudence of this country. In conclusion, we would say that we hope and wish that every good fortune may attend you; that your physical and mental vigor may be long preserved for the sake of the noble science to which you have consecrated your life; and that you may preserve undimmed your recollection of the bar of the eighth circuit, who will ever remember you with the warmest affection and esteem.

W. H. Rossington,
"Edward Stillings,
"Robert Crozier,
"A. L. Williams,
"J. D. Campbell,
"Committee."

Following this came an address on behalf of the practicing attorneys of the United States circuit court, by Mr. George R. Peck:

"May it please the court: It would be obviously improper, in the performance of the duty assigned to me by my brethren of the bar, to mar the beauty and the appropriateness of the address just presented to the court by any formal or extended remarks. This is no time for praise, unless it comes from the heart. What I could wish to do is to impress upon this proceeding that it is a tribute, not to the judge, but to the friend. As has been so well suggested by my friend Mr. Williams, all motive for mere flattery is past. Whatever may be said here is the genuine and spontaneous feeling of the heart, or it is nothing. The court, like the king, never dies. Judge Dillon's place will be filled by another, and our contentions go on as before; but we shall miss the features of that familiar face, miss the tones of that familiar voice. If I were called upon to analyze Judge Dillon's character, I should place, where it properly belongs, the moral above the intellectual—the heart above the mind. Genius may inspire admiration, but it is only the kind and sympathetic heart that can win affection. Judge Dillon's crowning glory is that goodness and greatness which has endeared him to all, and especially to those who, by reason of their professional duties, know him best. I do not doubt that he is ambitious in common with other men, and I presume he is not insensible to the many honors which have been showered upon him, but we have all seen in that pure and blameless life, that in the heart of the great judge, dearer than ambition, dearer than fame, is that sentiment so beautifully expressed in the lines of Tennyson:

'Howe'er it be, it seems to me
'Tis only noble to be good.
Kind hearts are more than coronets,
And simple faith, than Norman blood.'

"I ought to speak of his learning, known and recognized by jurists and lawyers everywhere; of his legal writings, which are cited as authority in the rude court-room of the frontier and in the classic walls of Westminster Hall. I ought to speak of his industry, that devotion to the laborious duties of his station which has enabled him to do what I believe no other circuit judge has ever done—to hold two terms of court in each district of his circuit during every year of his administration of the judicial office; and when we remember that his circuit is an empire extending from the British possessions to Louisiana, from the Mississippi to the mountains and beyond, it seems almost marvelous. I ought to speak of that high sense of duty which governed all his judgments, and by which he measured all rights in the just and even balances of the law. I ought to speak of that clearness of vision which enabled him to see what we could not or would not see, which guided him straight through all our fallacies and all our sophistries to the very heart and truth of the matter. I ought to speak of that dignity mingled with human sympathy, which made it plain to all men that here was a man who never forgot that he was a judge; here was a judge who never forgot that he was a man. I ought to speak of that strong sense of justice and equity, that hatred of wrong and oppression, which were so marked in his judicial character, that I have thought if, like Sir Matthew Hale, he should enter unheralded the court-room of the unjust judge, robbed only in a miller's coat and hat, all heads would bow and all tongues exclaim, 'This is a judge!' I ought to speak of his firmness, which ever upheld the right and repressed the wrong with the same iron hand. I ought to speak of our pride—pardonable pride—that when that venerable institution of learning, seated at the commercial gateway of the continent, with wealth and power at its command, sought to find the one man who could fill a most important chair, she reached her hand across the prairies and plucked this flower of our western civilization. But I have no heart to speak of these things at this parting moment. I can think only of his goodness, his kindness, and his sympathy. I know not whether a lawyer's prayer can avail anything in the chancery above, but, speaking for all my brethren of the bar, if I would take him by the hand—that hand which has led us all so long—I would say, good bye, and may God give you peace, health, strength, and happiness, always."

On behalf of the members of the southern Kansas bar, the following address was delivered by Mr. A. A. Harris, of Fort Scott:

"May it please your honor: The members of the bar of the southern portion of the state feel that they cannot permit this occasion to pass without an expression of their approbation of every word of the address which has been reported and unanimously adopted. Accordingly, as their humble spokesman, I here declare, not only for them, but for the people of southern Kansas, irrespective of party, creed, or sect, that, in common with the enlightened people of the whole circuit, we greatly regret Judge Dillon's determination to retire from the bench. Upon one occasion, when a client of mine had a suit pending in this court which involved to him a very large sum, and an adverse decision of which would reduce him to poverty, I was asked by him what sort of a man Judge Dillon was, and what sort of a court we had to try our case in. I told him that Judge Dillon was a pure man, and an able man; that the court was the best one in which to try a good case that I had ever practiced in, and the worst one in which to try a bad case. I intended, sir, by that to say, that in the court where Judge Dillon presided law and justice were impartially administered. At the June term, 1878, on a motion to remand a cause to the state court, in which some exceedingly difficult points were to be determined, Judge Dillon, after argument by myself and my very able opponent, told us from the bench one morning that he would be glad to hear us further on the points involved. I could but say to him that about all I knew about the removal act of 1875 I had learned from him. Sir, I care not what may be the wisdom of the executive, or that body which has the power to confirm his nomination, we shall not find in Judge Dillon's successor the stout arm, the clear intellect, and full, complete learning upon which we have heretofore so implicitly relied. We part with him with great regret. We shall watch his future career with great interest, and, howsoever fortune may smile upon him, he may rest assured that he has no warmer, truer friends than we."

On behalf of the state judiciary, the following remarks were made by Mr. Robert Crozier: "I would have been satisfied to have abided by the report of the committee as embodying my own views of the subject under consideration, but having been chosen by the committee to speak on behalf of the judiciary of the state, in addition, a few words are appropriate. Being an old citizen of the state, and well acquainted with the judiciary thereof, from the origin, I feel at liberty to express that which I am fully advised are the views of the gentlemen occupying judicial positions in the state at the present time. Before the advent of Judge Dillon as judge of the eighth circuit, we were prepared, looking to his former reputation as a jurist, with which we were to a considerable extent acquainted, to welcome him with glad faces and open arms, and we did so. During the time of his administration of the law as judge of the eighth circuit, our expectations as to his manner of conducting the business of that position were and have been fully realized. We all have looked to the recurrence of his terms as seasons when we might be enlightened by his luminous exposition of the laws and the acknowledged justness of the decisions he made; and we were glad to be permitted, in the exercise of the functions devolving upon us, to sit under the rulings of one commanding the respect of the whole of us. After an experience of ten years, I can now say, for the judiciary of the state, that our highest expectations in this regard have been more than fully realized; and now that the fates have decreed there shall be a final separation, our admiration is as glowing as at the beginning. We welcomed him with open arms upon his advent; and we bow him out at his exit with the same feelings of respect and kind regard that then influenced us. He goes to a place occupied by one of the distinguished sons of the republic—a position of commanding influence in moulding the jurisprudence of the nation; and although separated from us physically, we shall feel contented that we shall hear from him as one of the great brotherhood of lawyers, whose influence in moulding the destinies of the nation are superior to that of any other class of its citizens. Individually, I have been honored with his acquaintance and flattered with his personal friendship; and I can say for myself, and, I think, for that, for the judiciary of the state, that the regret at his departure will be considered not only a personal loss to us, but a deprivation to those with reference to whom we must administer the laws of the state. We take, however, to ourselves this consolation, that, though removed to another sphere, it will be one of such commanding influence that, although not binding upon us, we shall be compelled to respect his utterances. Whatever betide—whether we see him again speedily or otherwise—when he comes amongst us again, although disrobed of the ermine, we shall welcome him as cordially, respect him as thoroughly, and admire him as unreservedly, as at any stage of his career among us, when clothed with power to command us."

Response of Judge Dillon: "Gentlemen of the bar. I have no words fitting to respond to the addresses with which I have just been honored. My mind is burdened and saddened by the reflections which this parting scene suggests. How can I give them expression? I ought scarcely to attempt it. I feel bound to the state of Kansas by ties peculiarly strong. Ten years ago, although a stranger to them personally, the bar of this state, with great unanimity, recommended my appointment. Since 1869, I have been present at every term of the circuit court in Kansas, except in June, 1875. I have seen the docket grow from sixty cases to five hundred. I have given, relatively, more of my time to Kansas than to any other part of my circuit. My relations, therefore, with the bar which I see before me to-day, have not been distant and occasional, but constant and intimate.

"It gives me the sincerest pleasure to be publicly assured, at a time when no motive for flattery can be perceived, that my retirement from the bench is regretted. Your approving judgment, your words of kindness and generous praise, and your well wishes for my future welfare, are dear to my heart. No ordinary temptation has induced me to surrender my commission as the judge of this circuit. No surprise could have been greater than the offer of Columbia College, which I finally accepted. I saw from the first what a wide field of usefulness, and possibly of distinction, it opened before me. I perceived at once the advantages of its more liberal compensation, lighter labors, and greater opportunities. But I assure you that it cost me a painful struggle for more than two months to consent to leave the associations of a lifetime—to exchange old friends like those now present for new acquaintances, to leave the circuit I love so well to go to untried duties beneath a strange sky and among unfamiliar faces. If my health and strength are preserved, I shall strive to vindicate the wisdom of my decision by strenuously devoting my energies to the elevation and advancement of law. In the venerable institution to which I have been called, the great Chancellor Kent, pure and simple in his character and tastes as a child, after he had voluntarily closed his judicial career, and when the shadows of his life were cast towards the east, delivered the lectures which constitute his Commentaries on American Law, and which will cause his name to be known and cherished for generations to come, wherever, in its widening conquest, the English language shall carry the English law. Such an example may well tempt and inspire the humblest of his successors.

"The change I have made, although great, is not radical. It enables me the better to carry out the fixed plan of my life. When called to the bench, nearly twenty-one years ago, the picture of the judicial office as drawn by Sidney Smith before the lawyers of the northern circuit made a deep impression on my mind. Even now I think I can recall it from memory: 'He who takes the office of an English judge as it exists at this time, takes into his hands a gem, great and glorious, perfect and pure. Shall he mar it? Shall he darken it? Shall it emit no light? Shall he find it a diamond? Shall he leave it a stone?' The ideal of an American judge should, I have always conceived, be equally high. I have had many and great controversies to decide. You know me well, and it is an estimable satisfaction to be assured, in this impressive and public manner, that, in your judgment, I do not surrender the jewel of the great trust which I have had in my keeping marred or dimmed or darkened. But I may not say more. I part from you with the most unfeigned regret. From the bottom of my heart I reciprocate your regard in the amplest measure. The richest legacy I carry with me, next to the consciousness that in the record of my judicial life there is not a single line that, living or dying, I would wish to blot, is the expression of your friendship, confidence, and regard contained in the address with which you have so signally honored me, and in the remarks which have accompanied it. I shall cherish it as long as I live, and its record here is one to which my children, and those who care for me after I am gone, will point with pride. Farewell!"

Mr. Justice Miller then said: "The court is in full sympathy with the bar in the sentiments which have just been expressed in regard to the retirement of one of its members. Judge Dillon's resignation is a loss which must be felt by the bar of the eighth circuit, by the people among whom he has administered justice so long and so well, and by his associates on the bench of which he is about to take leave. This loss, however, is not equal in its effects upon all these classes. His brethren in the courts, who have co-operated with him in the arduous duties of a judge, who have received his aid, who have been with him in council and shared his labors, are the heaviest losers. It is, therefore, eminently appropriate that they should join in testifying to their appreciation of the man and his services by directing that the communication from the bar be spread upon the records of the court. If I may be permitted, as the presiding justice for the circuit for a period including the entire time of Judge Dillon's service in the court, to indulge in a suggestion of my own special misfortune in the matter, I must say that it is greater than that of others; for he whom I had hoped, as he came later, might remain longer in this court than I, and to whom would have fallen the duty of making the sad comments appropriate to the severance of our official relations, is the first to leave our common sphere of official duty. Though in his case the cause is one which carries him to a less laborious, a more profitable, and let us hope a more agreeable and perhaps useful field of labor, and though this must, as it ought, mitigate the pains of separation, it remains true, as regards myself, that I cannot hope in any successor, however talented by nature or accomplished by learning, the same assistance in the performance of my own judicial duties, and the same relief from unnecessary responsibility as presiding justice, which have made my relations with him so pleasant. When you add to this the interruption, more or less, of our social relations—relations which are imperfectly expressed by the strongest terms of affectionate friendship and unlimited confidence—it will be seen with what emphasis I unite with the bar and other members of the court throughout the circuit in this cordial tribute of respect and expression of regret at the retirement of Judge Dillon from the bench."

Missouri.

"St. Louis, July 12th, 1879. Honorable John F. Dillon: My Dear Sir:—At a meeting of the bar of this city a committee was appointed, consisting of George A. Madill, Alexander Martin, Thomas C. Reynolds, James Taussig, G. A. Finkelnburg, Joseph Shippen, and John R. Shepley, to prepare and submit an address to you upon the occasion of your retirement from the bench, to be subscribed by the members of the bar, placed before the circuit court for the district, and then transmitted to you. These were done, and now by their direction I enclose to you that address; and in so doing, permit me to say that there are few things in my professional life that have given me greater pleasure than to transmit to you this record of the high estimation in which you are held by your brethren of the bar in this district. You will find there the names of all those, except a few absent from the city, who have been connected with the court over which you have presided for so many years with such distinguished ability. Yours truly, John R. Shepley."

Address of the bar: "St. Louis, June 23d, 1879. Honorable John F. Dillon: Sir:—As members of the St. Louis bar, we desire to express our regret that your official connection with the United States circuit court for the eighth circuit is about to terminate. But your voluntary retirement from the bench to another field of professional honor and usefulness affords an opportunity, which we gladly embrace, of presenting to you this expression of our respect and confidence. To you, as an author, the profession recognizes its indebtedness for a work which is a permanent contribution to legal literature, and is accepted as a standard authority wherever the English language is spoken. To you, as a judge in high station for nearly twenty-one years, we bear testimony to a career distinguished by uniform dignity and courtesy, by marked ability, great industry, and perfect integrity. Questions of wide variety and of the gravest importance have engaged your attention, and found their solution in judicial opinions marked by clearness of statement, vigor of thought, and profundity of learning. To the discharge of onerous duties you have brought a mind gifted with sound judgment, fortified by varied experience and enriched by wide research. While your career has largely advanced and elevated the science of the law, it has also endeared you personally to the hearts of the people among whom your labors have been performed. Assured that you bear from the west to the east a public judgment of duty well and faithfully discharged, accept this our sincere testimonial to worth and ability." Signed by John R. Shepley, Thomas C. Reynolds, John W. Noble, D. P. Dyer, James O. Broadhead, Henry Hitchcock, Thomas T. Gantt, George A. Madill, John B. Henderson, John D. S. Dryden, Chester H. Krum, Joseph Shippen, Thomas C. Fletcher, and by one hundred and forty other members of the bar of St. Louis.

"Davenport, Iowa, July 14th, 1879. Honorable John R. Shepley: My Dear Sir:—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 12th inst., transmitting, by the direction of a committee, the address of the members of the bar of the city of St. Louis upon my retirement from the bench of the circuit court. This impressive testimonial of the respect and estimation in which I am held by the bar of the great city of St. Louis, where for the past ten years so considerable a part of my official duties have been performed, has given me the sincerest pleasure. I have read it with pride, and shall preserve it, with the autograph signatures, as a cherished memorial of my life on the circuit. I gladly avail myself of this occasion to express to the learned bar of St. Louis my grateful acknowledgments for their uniform kindness, respect, and consideration, and especially for the address with which they have honored me. I beg to assure them that I carry from the west to the east nothing which I more truly prize than their approving public judgment and friendly regard. Asking you personally to accept my thanks for the kind sentiments with which you accompanied the address, I remain as ever, very truly and sincerely yours, John F. Dillon."

There was subsequently presented, on behalf of the members of the bar and the citizens of St. Louis, the following invitation, engraved and elegantly illuminated:

"St. Louis, Mo., September 1st, 1879. To the Honorable John F. Dillon, United States Circuit Judge of the Eighth Circuit: Sir:—The undersigned, lawyers, business men, and others, citizens of St. Louis, Missouri, viewing with profound regret the prospect of your relinquishment of the judicial station you have so eminently adorned, desire to make a suitable demonstration of their high respect and regard for you personally, and of the veneration in which you are held as a wise, learned, and upright judge by them and the entire community of this city. They therefore tender you a public banquet, in St. Louis, at such time as you may be pleased to designate. We are, sir, your obedient servants, John R. Shepley, George A. Madill, John B. Henderson, John C. Orrick, Elmer B. Adams, A. M. Thayer, John W. Noble, William Patrick, James O. Broadhead, Nathaniel Holmes, James J. Lindley, David Wagner, Lucien Eaton, Newton Crane, Nathaniel Myers, Thomas E. Tutt, Scruggs & Barney, George Bain, Gerard E. Allen, Thomas C. Reynolds, Henry Hitchcock, John M. Krum, C. S. Hayden, Samuel T. Glover, John D. S. Dryden, Chester H. Krum, Thomas T. Gantt, Charles P. Johnson, S. D. Thompson, D. P. Dyer, Thomas C. Fletcher, M. Dwight Collier, R. J. Lackland, William Barr & Co., Samuel C. Davis & Co., E. O. Stannard, and ninety others."

To which was given the following response:

"Davenport, Iowa, September 15th, 1879. Gentlemen:—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 1st inst., in which, after expressing your regret at my retirement from the judicial station I have held among you so long, you offer me the compliment of a public banquet as a testimonial of your respect and regard. I perceive from the signatures to the invitation that it comes from many of the eminent lawyers, great merchants, and leading citizens of the city of St. Louis. Of the similar expressions which the event referred to has called forth in this judicial circuit, none has penetrated me more sensibly; and if anything could make me regret a step taken from a sense of duty to myself and my family, it would be that I was leaving a region in which my judicial labors are so generously viewed and parting from friends so devoted, to enter upon untried duties in a community in which I am personally almost a stranger. I had hoped until today that I might be able to accept the proffered honor, but, for reasons which I need not detail, I find that I must go east immediately, and it is quite uncertain when my duties and engagements there will allow me to return to the west. I am, therefore, most reluctantly obliged to forego the pleasure of meeting you in the manner you propose, and the privilege of expressing my profound sense of the many obligations under which the people of St. Louis have placed me, and saying my farewell to you and your citizens in person. Permit me to add yet another word. I look upon your invitation not simply as a compliment to me personally, but also as an expression of your sense of the supreme importance of the judicial office, not only to the great interests which you represent, but to the entire country. The fearless and independent discharge of the duties of a judge will inevitably bring him into frequent collision with private interests and public sentiment. In such a discharge of duty the judge needs at all times the consciousness of the support of the substantial interests of the community. It gives me pleasure to say that I have always noticed a sound, healthy, and enlightened public opinion on this subject among your citizens, and every judge in this country, of whatever grade, will be animated, cheered, and strengthened by your influence and example. I have the honor to be, as ever, most obediently yours, John F. Dillon.

"Messrs. John R. Shepley, Gerard B. Allen, George A. Madill, Thomas C. Reynolds, John B. Henderson, and others."

Arkansas.

A large meeting, composed of the Little Rock Bar Association and of members of the legal profession from other parts of the state now attending court at the capital, was held on Saturday morning, June 14th, 1879, at the supreme court-room, for the purpose of taking appropriate action in relation to the resignation of the Honorable John F. Dillon of the office of United States circuit judge for this judicial circuit.

Upon motion of the Honorable Henry C. Caldwell, judge of the United States district court for the eastern district of Arkansas, the Honorable E. H. English, chief justice of the supreme court of the state, was elected president of the meeting, and Mr. Eben W. Kimball secretary. The chief justice, upon taking the chair, cordially thanked the meeting for the honor conferred upon him on this occasion. He then briefly stated the object of the meeting, and said that he, in common with the whole bar of the state, exceedingly regretted that Judge Dillon had resigned his present position on the bench, which he had so long, so acceptably, and so honorably filled, and where he had won a national reputation; that Judge Dillon was a man of pure and exalted character—a judge of extraordinary attainments, application, and legal knowledge, and one whom the people of the west and of Arkansas regretted to see retire from the judiciary. But, he said, while he now leaves the bench, he will not be lost to the profession, for in his new vocation (a position which would do honor to any lawyer) he would not only be able to instruct the young men of the country in the science of the law, but also to write law books for the use of the profession generally—a work for which no one seemed better fitted than Judge Dillon. The chief justice spoke very feelingly and eloquently of the high character and great services of Judge Dillon, and was listened to with marked delight and approval.

Upon motion of Mr. U. M. Rose, the chair appointed a committee of three to draft resolutions properly expressing the sentiments of the bar of Arkansas in relation to the resignation of Judge Dillon. The committee consisted of Messrs. U. M. Rose, T. D. W. Yonley, and R. A. Howard. The committee reported the following resolutions. Before reading them, Mr. U. M. Rose read to the meeting the following extract from a letter recently received by him from Judge Dillon:

"Leavenworth, Kansas, June 8th, 1879. Dear Judge:—Your letter of the 24th ult. has followed me around the circuit and found me here. It anticipated an event which became a fact accomplished before it was received. I could easily perceive all the probable advantages of the offered exchange of places—the lightened labor, the increased compensation, and opportunities for professional gains or distinction, if, happily, I had the ability to achieve the latter; and yet I hesitated long in reaching a resolution. I hope I have decided wisely. It cost me a painful struggle to consent to leave the friends and associations of a lifetime, and particularly the bar of the circuit, to whom I feel so much indebted and so warmly attached. My thoughts and reflections are tinged with sadness whenever I think that I have severed the ties which connect me with the circuit, and go to new duties, in a strange and distant place. If my health remains to me, I shall try to demonstrate the soundness and wisdom of my judgment by doing more for my profession than it was possible for me to do on the tread-mill of the bench, with its ever-increasing weight of duties. I beg leave to add that I part with no district with more sincere regret than with yours, with Judge Caldwell, and the bar of Arkansas. I have always been treated by them with marked consideration and kindness. Very sincerely yours, John F. Dillon."

Resolutions:

"Resolved, that, having been advised of the resignation by the Honorable John F. Dillon of his position as judge of this circuit, we are impressed with a feeling of regret, and desire to convey to him in a respectful manner our sincere admiration for the great learning, impartiality, and uprightness displayed by him while on the federal bench, the soundness and accuracy of his opinions, and his uniform kindness and courtesy to the bar; for a consistent administration of justice that has shed a lustre on the science of the law, and has in many ways conduced to its clearness and purification.

"Resolved, that, as Judge Dillon retires to another field of labor, we trust that he may find in it a wider usefulness, and some diminution of the arduous toil that has marked his judicial life, and which seemed to test the limits of physical and mental endurance; and we beg leave to assure him that he carries with him our best wishes for an easier and a long and prosperous life, during which he may, by his investigations, add to his valuable contributions to legal learning, which have already made his name a household word with the bar and the courts of the country.

"Resolved, that the secretary of this meeting be requested to forward to Judge Dillon a copy of these resolutions."

Upon motion of Mr. M. W. Benjamin, the resolutions were unanimously adopted. Upon motion of Honorable R. C. Newton, Judge Rose was requested to furnish the meeting with a copy of the abstract of Judge Dillon's letter, just read by him, and the same was made a part of its proceedings. It was moved by Mr. John McClure, and carried, that the secretary of this meeting be requested to furnish the papers of the city with a copy of its resolutions and other proceedings for publication. Upon motion of Mr. Yonley, the secretary was requested to present to the United States circuit court for this district a copy of the proceedings of this meeting, with the request that they be spread upon the records of that court. The meeting then adjourned.

A true copy. Attest: Eben W. Kimball, Secretary.

The following answer was given:

"Davenport, Iowa, July 9th, 1879. My Dear Sir:—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the proceedings of the bar of Little Rock relative to my retirement from the bench. I am deeply sensible of the debt I owe to the bar of your state, and I fully prize this expression of their regard and friendship. I am grateful for it. It places me under a perpetual obligation. I part from them with unaffected regret. They have a sunny spot in my heart, and a cherished place in my memory. I beg you to accept, personally, my warm thanks for your kind expressions and well wishes. I am, very truly and sincerely yours, John F. Dillon.

"Eben W. Kimball, Esq., Secretary, Little Rock."

Nebraska.

At a session of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Nebraska, held at the court-house in the city of Omaha, on the 26th day of June, 1879—Honorable Elmer S. Dundy, district judge, presiding—Mr. E. E. Brown, a counsellor of the court, appeared and stated that on that day, at a meeting of the members of the bar, whereof he was president, a committee was appointed to express in fitting resolutions the sentiments of the meeting upon the occasion of the retirement of his honor, the circuit judge, from the bench, which committee consisted of Mr. J. M. Woolworth, Mr. E. Wakely, Mr. Clinton Briggs, Mr. J. H. Broady, and Mr. D. G. Hull; that the said committee had reported to the meeting certain resolutions, which were unanimously adopted; and that the said meeting had instructed him to present the same to the court and move that the same be spread at length upon its records. He thereupon presented the said resolutions to the court, and moved that the same be recorded in the record of its proceedings. Whereupon it was ordered that the motion be granted, and the clerk spread the said resolutions at length upon the records of the proceedings of the court. The resolutions are as follows:

"Whereas, the judge of this circuit, the Honorable John F. Dillon, is about to surrender his trust by resignation, to accept a high honor tendered to him by Columbia College, we, the members of the bar in attendance upon the United States circuit court, for ourselves and in behalf of the bar of this state, do resolve:

"First. That, during the whole of his service on the bench of this circuit, which was preceded by a judicial career of much honor, Judge Dillon has devoted to the discharge of his great and laborious duties the full measure of integrity, capacity, learning, industry, and impartiality demanded of the incumbent, as attested by the general judgment of the bar and the people.

"Second. As a jurist and legal author, he has advanced the profession, has won a national reputation, and reflected credit upon the west, where his work has been done.

"Third. As a citizen and man, he has secured the very high respect and confidence of the public, by the sincerity, uprightness, and purity of his life and character, his fidelity to obligation, and his sense and love of justice in the administration of his office.

"Fourth. In the new and responsible field of duty to which he is called, he will have our utmost faith in his ability to meet its demands with signal usefulness and success, and our earnest wishes that he may be in all things prospered.

"Fifth. That the circuit court be requested to cause these resolutions to be entered in the record of its proceedings, and that a copy thereof be transmitted to Judge Dillon."

Iowa.

"Des Moines, Iowa, August 22d, 1879. Honorable John F. Dillon, Davenport, Iowa: Dear Sir:—The bar of Iowa desire that you will accept at their hands, at such time as will suit your convenience, a complimentary banquet. We have been appointed a committee of the bar of the state to communicate this wish. Allow us to suggest some evening during the next term of the United States circuit court at this place. We sincerely hope you will accept this proffered compliment. So long identified with the profession and with the judiciary, so intimately connected with the growth and prosperity of Iowa, and so much esteemed and respected as you are by her bar and people, we shall regard it as a very great pleasure indeed to unite and extend to you our friendly greetings before you leave to enter, as we hope, upon even a larger field of usefulness. Be pleased to advise us of your pleasure in the premises. We are, judge, as ever, your friends, truly,

"George G. Wright, Des Moines,

"John H. Craig, Keokuk,

"E. H. Stiles, Ottumwa,

"W. F. Brannan, Muscatine,

"George J. Boal, Iowa City,

"O. P. Shiras, Dubuque,

"John N. Rogers, Davenport,

"N. M. Hubbard, Cedar Rapids,

"Committee."

The following response was made:

"Davenport, Iowa, September 13th, 1879. Gentlemen:—Your invitation to accept a complimentary banquet from the bar of the state came here in my absence and awaited my return. I have held it for some days unanswered, and have just definitely ascertained that it will not be practicable, in view of my other duties, to engage to accept it, as I am called east immediately, and the time of my return to the state is uncertain. I trust it is unnecessary to add that the invitation and the warm terms in which you have been pleased to refer to me and to my judicial and other labors are sensibly felt and fully appreciated, for I assure you that I am bound to the state of Iowa by no ordinary ties. For one and forty years I have lived within this state. As a boy I played upon the banks of her great river, and her noble prairies have become incorporate into my very existence. Here I was educated and married; here my children were born; here I have been honored by successive elections to high judicial station; and here, under her skies, my sun has already passed its meridian. Iowa has been to me a generous mother, and neither time nor distance can weaken my attachment to her. My relations, public and private, have been chiefly with the bar of the state, and I am truly sorry that I am precluded by other engagements from accepting the most grateful, and in all probability the last, honor I shall ever receive at their hands. I remain, as ever, very sincerely and faithfully yours, John F. Dillon.

"To the Honorable George G. Wright and others, committee."

Minnesota.

The members of the bar of the district of Minnesota, at the opening of the June term of the United States circuit court, at St. Paul, on the 16th day of June, 1879, held a meeting to determine what testimonial of their respect and esteem should be tendered to Judge Dillon on the occasion of his withdrawal from the bench of this circuit. A committee composed of Charles E. Flandrau, John B. Sanborn, George L. Otis, George B. Young, and Harvey Officer, was chosen, with full powers to represent the bar of the district and arrange such proceedings as in their judgment would be suitable and proper. It was decided to tender to Judge Dillon a banquet and an address.

The following correspondence ensued:

"St. Paul, Minn., June 20th, 1879. Honorable John F. Dillon: Dear Judge:—The bar of Minnesota, learning that you are about to terminate your judicial relations with this district, desires to manifest its very high esteem for you as a man, a friend, and a judge, and invites you to meet it at a dinner to be given in your honor at the Metropolitan Hotel, in this city, at such time as may be agreeable to you. We hope you will gratify us by accepting this invitation, and to designate such time as will best suit your pleasure and official engagements. With much respect, truly your obedient servants and friends,

"Charles E. Flandrau,

"John B. Sanborn,

"George L. Otis,

"George B. Young,

"Harvey Officer,

"Committee."

Reply:

"St. Paul, Minn., June 27th, 1879. Gentlemen:—Your invitation to a banquet proposed in my honor was received some days since. I have been waiting till some fortunate interval in my official duties would allow me to accept it. But it has turned out otherwise, and the demands upon my time are such that I must leave St. Paul on to-morrow. Much to my regret, I am compelled to decline, during my present stay, an invitation which, you scarcely need to be assured, it would have given me the sincerest pleasure to have accepted. I beg to tender to the bar my thanks for this renewed mark of their regard. With great respect, I am very truly and sincerely yours,
John F. Dillon.

"Messrs. Charles E. Flandrau and others, committee."

On the 28th day of June, 1879, the bar, having learned that Judge Dillon would take his departure from the city in the evening of that day, assembled in the court-room, under the call of the committee, in large numbers, at 3:30 P. M. On the opening of the court, Judges Dillon and Nelson being on the bench, Mr. Flandrau, who had been chosen by the committee to deliver the address of the bar, addressed the court as follows:

"May it please your honors: The great majority of the members of the bar of this district have grown up with it since its organization, and will probably continue to practise in it until their retirement. It is natural, therefore, that we should feel a deep interest in the question as to who shall be intrusted with the administration of its affairs. When the growth of the west rendered it necessary to increase the force of the federal judiciary by the creation of the circuit judges, we were all much rejoiced when we learned that Justice Dillon had received the appointment for this our circuit. He was no stranger to us—his fame as a jurist had preceded him. His services have so endeared him to us all that when we learned of his intention to resign his position, although in exchange for new honors, our regret was great, and we determined that he should take with him an avowal of our sentiments. A committee of the bar of the district have prepared an address to be presented to Judge Dillon, and have conferred upon me the honor of bearing it to him. With the permission of your honors, I will now deliver it."

The address to Judge Dillon:

"Honorable John F. Dillon, United States Circuit Judge, Eighth Circuit: Dear Judge:—The members of the bar of this state have learned, with profound regret, that you have decided to sever your connections with the bench of this circuit. They have enjoyed, for the long series of years during which you have been its presiding justice, such agreeable relations with you personally and officially, and have held you in such high esteem as a man and a judge, that they desire to make some public expression of the sentiments universally entertained by them on the occasion of this their last opportunity of holding official communication with you. We will not ask you, or the world, to weigh our opinion by the standard of our professional consequence; we know that we represent a frontier district, and we have nothing to say as to our own importance, but we can, without egotism, affirm that we are a fearless and independent bar, and that nothing could induce us to give expression to what we did not conscientiously believe. Let the value of our views, then, be measured by their sincerity. We recognize in you a man of extraordinary learning in all the branches of knowledge that combine to make a thoroughly good judge. We also concede to you all those qualities of temperament which are essential to the same end. You have been patient, when we have been tedious; you have been amiable, when we have been irritable; you have always been clear, when we have been in doubt. It has been an edifying pleasure to us to listen to your lucid expositions of the many difficult questions, which we have, in the discharge of our professional duties, so often submitted to you for solution. The varied interests that have been referred to your decision have involved the welfare of the greatest enterprises of the northwest, and these contests have arrayed in antagonism forces of corresponding magnitude; yet your wisdom and impartial justice have enabled you to satisfy all interests and make your judgments respected by all parties. The highest tribute we can pay to your excellence as a judge is to say that in all the long years in which we have practiced before you, and in all the various contests which we have represented as counsellors in your court, the instances which any of us can recall in which we have suffered defeat are very rare indeed, where we have not, on reflection, been compelled to acknowledge the correctness of your decisions; and in no case have we ever had occasion to doubt your perfect impartiality and conscientious discharge of duty. We have, by our long and intimate association with you, ceased merely to respect and venerate you as a judge, but we have also learned to love you as a friend. Your departure from us, therefore, involves much more than the ordinary consequences of official change. The loss to the bench may be supplied, and the wheels of the law revolve as before, but the severance of the closer ties which unite us is irreparable. There could be no more fitting occasion than the present one of leave-taking, for us to assure you that nothing has ever occurred in the administration of your official duties in this district, or elsewhere in your circuit, which has in the slightest degree abated that perfect trust you early inspired, and which time has ripened into faith.

"We've seen the actions of your daily life
Scann'd with all the industrious malice of a foe,
And nothing meets our eyes but deeds of honor."

"It is gratifying, however, to know that the step you have decided upon does not wholly withdraw you from the profession, but merely changes the sphere of your usefulness. We hope to share the benefits of your labors in many valuable contributions to the literature of the law, which your learning, experience, and the dignified repose which will attend your future duties, will so eminently qualify you to produce. We congratulate the bar of the future on securing so competent an instructor. No word that we can utter could add anything to the high compliment which has been paid you by the venerable institution which has chosen you to fill one of the highest places in its bestowal. The bar of the whole west will feel honored in your selection, and will take pride in your success. We bid you an affectionate farewell, and assure you that the best wishes of the whole bar of Minnesota will always follow you, wherever duty or pleasure may call you.

"Charles E. Flandrau,
"John B. Sanborn,
"George L. Otis,
"George B. Young,
"Harvey Officer,
"Committee."

After reading the address, which was richly engrossed in a handsomely ornamented morocco case, it was handed to Judge Dillon by Judge Flandrau, who then continued: "Allow me to present to you an engrossed copy of the address, with the compliments of the bar of the state. I am also commissioned to move his honor, Judge Nelson, on behalf of the bar, to allow the address to be entered upon the records of the court, which motion I now make, and ask that it may be granted."

In support of the motion, the following addresses were made:

Address of Mr. District Attorney Billson: "The address to which you have listened, Judge Dillon, portrays only in subdued colors, I am sure, the sentiment, not too strongly expressed by the word 'sorrow,' with which the bar of Minnesota have contemplated your withdrawal from the judicial office. So long, so rich, and so varied has been your experience as a minister of justice; so unremitting has been your industry; so ardent and exclusive your devotion to the law; so high have been your professional ideals, and so conspicuously conscientious and disinterested your pursuit of them, that, in our minds, the blind goddess and her scales are scarcely more intimately associated with the judicial function or more emblematic of its unerring discharge. I think I shall only give voice to the common experience of our bar, when I say that the opportunities we have enjoyed of observing your ample learning and your skillful methods in the dispatch of business have been the most stimulating and highly prized of our professional privileges. The patience and circumspection with which you have been cheerful to listen and inquire; the rapidity with which you have grasped, and the tenacity with which you have remembered, the most intricate statements of facts; your quickness to apprehend an argument of counsel, and to further illustrate its correctness, or to expose its fallacy; your happy combination of capacities for the widest generalization and for the most detailed and discriminating analysis; above all, the benevolent solicitude, the consummate skill, the sound discretion, and frequently the splendid success, with which you have ever striven to avert that sometimes inevitable but always deplorable catastrophe, an incompatibility between fixed principles of law and the equities of a particular case—all these are salient features of your official character, as we have learned it and loved it during ten years of professional contact, and as we shall bear it with us in perpetual remembrance.

"It has been your good though arduous fortune to preside over a circuit imperial in extent, resources, and variety of industrial pursuits—skirting, as it does, the Mississippi from its source almost to the gulf, with its western confines resting on the mountains. Vast and various as the ordinary litigation of such a circuit must have been, its dignity and difficulty during the last decade have been enhanced by three convulsions which have successively afflicted the several portions of your circuit. You have been called upon to administer upon the wreck of the confederacy in the south; upon the bankrupted railroad corporations in the north; and in the central part of your circuit upon the most formidable conspiracy against the public revenues which has been known to the new world. I refer to the late unlamented whiskey ring. Your decisions upon the grave and often novel questions thus precipitated on your court, have been perused with admiration by the profession throughout the country, and, with a gratifying degree of confidence, are everywhere cited as authority by bench and bar alike. In a word, you have made solid and fame-worthy contributions to the noble science of the law, upon which have labored the closest thinkers of many ages, and which, with all its imperfections, is one of the finest creations of human reason. As representing a department of the public service co-ordinate and intimately associated with that from which you are about to retire, I wish before closing to give brief expression to the sense of loss which I know will be keenly felt throughout all branches of the federal service upon the retirement to another field of labor of one who has been confessedly among its brightest ornaments, and who has added new lustre to the already illustrious name of the federal judiciary."

Mr. C. K. Davis' address: Governor Davis said: "Judge Dillon:—The bar of this state received the announcement of your resignation with expressions of regret more touchingly eulogistic than words can here express, with due regard to the formality of this proceeding. Men of sensibility will not say in his presence concerning a person who is the object of their affection, nor can such a person hear without embarrassment, those words which fully satisfy the feeling which prompts them. History, even though it speaks with the voice of friendship, does not say, and cannot say, to him all that absence and the future will require. This bar cannot, however, forego the opportunity of this sad moment of parting, of this moment which gathers up into the heart its full sense of the fact that we are to stand before you as a judge no more, to cause you to feel how great is our esteem for you, how great our deprivation is. It so happened that we urged your appointment as circuit judge, many years ago. Of the many eminent names which were under consideration for that nomination, your own was preferred by us, not for any personal reasons, because few of us then enjoyed your acquaintance. We had, however, become familiarized with your judicial character by frequent applications in our courts of your decisions as judge of the supreme court of Iowa, and we were guided to our preference by them. We found in them learning always more than sufficient for the case; intellectual vigor, to which that learning was an armor, not an incubrance; mental independence creative in its character; a judicial conscience which dealt with the case and not with its consequences. With these, our prepossessions, you came to us, and there is not a member of this bar in whom they have not passed into convictions which are adorned and made forever beautiful by an abiding love and esteem for those personal traits which experience only can teach, and which absence cannot destroy or even dim. The resolution which you have taken, while it grieves, does not surprise us. There are limitations to all endeavor and ambition, and surely the administration of the laws of seven commonwealths, which hold six millions of people, which present diverse institutions, Codes which, though perhaps analogous, are yet so different as to perplex; where civilization and empire are so visibly overspreading a region where terminus has not yet set up his landmark; where a legal system must be created in a few years which will survive when the erasing finger of time has made illegible the decrees which establish it; surely these are boundaries which circumscribe the greatest capacity and resolution. It was for you, and not for us, to say when you should pause. It is our gain and your glory that so much of this vast work has been done. It will not pass away. It will endure in precedents, guiding human concerns when all recollection of us is lost. It is due to you to speak of one act of your judicial career which has benefited this state and is appreciated by our people more, perhaps, than has been signified to you. The financial catastrophe of 1873 afflicted us deeply. It left our future unsecured. Our great railway system, which had been projected and partially constructed towards the British possessions, was paralyzed at the moment when consummation seemed very near. The land grant depended upon the completion of the enterprise, and it was not easy to see how this could be done in the war of disappointed and clamorous interests and in the debility of bankrupt corporations. But in this court the expansive and administrative forces of the system of laws here administered were fully proved. The settlement of private right was made instrumental to the public good, and both private right and public good were perfected and increased. The road was built, the lands were earned, the frontier was advanced, and the homes of thousands stand to-day where we feared the wilderness would be supreme for many years. By this the court has earned what courts seldom receive—the gratitude of a people for a judicial act. Our regret at your retirement from the bench would be greatly increased were we not assured that the new field of usefulness to which you have been invited affords an ampler verge for what you would necessarily have continued to contribute to had you remained in your present office. It has become apparent that our system of laws some time ago arrived at that stage of complexity and contradiction of precedent which demands a reformation and second growth. The time, which we can all remember, has passed when an authority in point, exhumed by mousing industry, was a kind of fetich before which judges bowed and opposing counsel were dumb. Principle, so long suffocated beneath the mass of cases, has been compelled to rise and to remit them to their auxiliary places. This is a time like those when the great civilians were ordered by Justinian to formulate the immense mass of the Roman laws; when commerce and the extending empire compelled Mansfield to project by a continuous judicial travail of thirty years the commercial code of all English-speaking people; when the failing feudal abuses, vicious in their last extremity, compelled D'Aguesseau to remodel the law of France. These works were done by judges. The work soon to be done in our day must principally be done by judges. We hope and expect that in your new vocation you will continue to contribute powerfully to that great result, which is destined to condense and make more certain and symmetrical our cumbrous jurisprudence. Nothing more remains for me to say, except to assure you of an abiding esteem, affection, and respect, and to hope that in all stations to which you may be called, your evening of life may be made pleasant by honor, love, and troops of friends, and by the gladsome light of jurisprudence."

Mr. Gordon E. Cole's remarks: "May it please your honor: In rising to express my cordial concurrence in the sentiments of the address of the committee, I know that I but give utterance to the universal expression of the bar of the district. The announcement of your determination to withdraw from the very arduous duties—none more so, I believe, in the world—of the judge of the eighth circuit, has elicited an unanimous expression of regret such as has rarely greeted retirement from judicial office. The patience and painstaking with which you have ever sought to solve the most difficult problems of both law and fact; the wisdom with which, under your administration, the harshest and most technical rules of the common law have been attempted by equity; the ripe legal learning and felicitous language which has enriched and adorned your judicial decisions; the uniform kindness and courtesy which has characterized the intercourse of the bench with the bar, have endeared you to the bar of this district in a vastly more than common degree. Every country and state has, or has had, its golden age of the law, to which the profession loves to recur. The era of Marshall in the nation, of Kent in New York, of Shaw in Massachusetts, of Gibson in Pennsylvania, of Mansfield in England, and of your honor's administration in the eighth circuit, were all such periods, and will alike be remembered as luminous epochs of judicial history. You go from us to enter upon a more remunerative and less laborious field of labor, clothed as with a mantle with our heartiest wishes for your abundant success, and followed by our profoundest regrets for the step which robs us of a judge whom we can love, honor, and respect, and the bench of one of its brightest ornaments."

Mr. Thomas Wilson followed with these remarks: "May it please your honor: I wish only to add a word. What one of us on this occasion says, is but the echo of what every other feels. Though it is but recently that you first came among us, we feel your loss as almost irreparable. Never before have I known a judge to secure, or, as I believe, deserve, more unreservedly and unqualifiedly, the admiration, confidence, and affectionate regard of the bar. You have come up to, yes, elevated, our most exalted ideal of a great and good judge, and at the same time you have bound us to you by a friendship that will be as lasting as our lives. Wherever you go our friendly eyes and hearty benedictions will follow you. I hope our loss may be your gain; that your afternoon of life may be cloudless, and your friends in your new home be as hearty and true as those who to-day so much regret to be compelled to say good-bye."

At this point, during a brief pause in the proceedings, Judge Nelson inquired, "Is there anything further, gentlemen?" and receiving no response, Judge Dillon himself said:

Judge Dillon's response: "Gentlemen of the bar: The address of the bar of Minnesota, and the remarks which have accompanied its presentation, fill me with sentiments of gratitude which any poor words of mine can but inadequately acknowledge and express. Nearly ten years ago I came to this city, bringing with me my commission as judge of this circuit. I was personally unknown to the entire bar of the state. You received me with characteristic cordiality and warmth. Since then I have attended nearly every term of the circuit for this district, and the relationship thus created has been to me one of uninterrupted satisfaction. You will, therefore, readily credit me that your public assurance that the relation has been satisfactory to you, and that you view its termination with regret, cannot be otherwise than extremely gratifying to me. We met as strangers, and I beg to say that no part of your address gave me such real pleasure as the assurance that we part as friends. It has fallen in the line of my duty to decide, in connection with my learned associates, many causes involving large interests, some of which have excited warm feeling, and have been conducted with zeal, and in which the result must at times have disappointed counsel as well as suitors. Yet, such has been the uniform respect and confidence of the bar, that, so far as I know or believe, my judgments have left no wounds which did not readily heal without a scar. You have been pleased to refer to my official conduct in decisions in very complimentary terms. I cannot but feel that this is largely due to the partiality of friendship. It is fitting that I should acknowledge that for whatever praise I may justly merit in this respect I am largely indebted to the wise counsel of my associates, and to your ability and learning. Fortunate is the judge who has the enlightened aid and the steady support of such a bar as I have been accustomed to meet at every term in the state of Minnesota. He who holds the office of judge of this circuit, holds a place of great responsibility and great difficulty. He who discharges all of its varied and exacting duties must shun delights and live laborious days. No man's unassisted judgment is equal to the work, and I feel that my obligations to the bar are far greater than theirs to me. I am your debtor, you are not mine.

"You refer to the new field of labor which I am about to enter. I forbear any extended allusion to it, and will only say that the action of the venerable university in coming to this remote circuit in the west to fill a chair in the institution which, with pardonable pride, points to the lectures of Chancellor Kent, delivered therein fifty years ago, could not have been more of a surprise to you than it was to myself. The increased leisure it gives, the nature of the duties it requires, the compensation it affords, and the great opportunities, direct and collateral, it presents, combined to convince me that I ought to go. I do not seek it for a life of inglorious ease, but that I may the better be enabled to discharge that debt which Lord Bacon says every lawyer owes to his profession. Our official relations are practically dissolved. This is my last regular term. In this parting hour I love to contemplate you, not simply or chiefly as the trusted counsellors of the court, but as an assemblage of my friends. The bar has always been my constituency. I claim no merit but a strenuous and well-meant endeavor to discharge all my public duties. The regard and respect of the bar is the only reward I have coveted, or now prize. I bear with me nothing but the most pleasant memories. I carry away nothing so priceless as the public and impressive expression of the esteem in which I am held. I part from my faithful and generous associate—I part from you all—with tender regret. The reflection saddens me that as a judge I shall never again visit your beautiful city and prosperous state. But I shall never cease to think of you with affectionate kindness, and shall always regard my relations to you as among the most fortunate circumstances of my life. I hesitate to speak the sad word which makes me linger, but which must needs be spoken—farewell—and may the good Father of us all have you in His holy keeping."

Remarks of Judge Nelson: Judge Nelson closed with the following remarks: "I cannot permit the occasion to pass without expressing my hearty concurrence in the sentiments of the bar, uttered in such fit and appropriate language. The judicial circuit sustains a great loss by the retirement of Judge Dillon from the bench, of which he has been so bright and conspicuous an ornament. It is a great loss to us all. As a friend and associate for the past ten years, engaged in the common pursuit of administering justice in this district, I shall mourn his absence from the stated sessions of the court, and lament the loss of his counsels. His open, frank, and genial manners; his judgment, so well ripened; his learning, so varied, so extensive; and, above all, his love of truth and justice, so keen and instinctive, secured my respect at the outset; and I ever found I could rely upon his opinion with a confidence in its correctness which is rarely experienced. I will not speak of our social relations, which have been so pleasant and agreeable, but cannot forbear thus publicly acknowledging my esteem for him as a man, and my high appreciation of his services as a pure, just, and impartial judge. I have known him better than you have; my opportunities have been greater, my associations more intimate. Where you have seen the mature and well-considered judgment, I have witnessed the extensive research, the untiring labor, and the zeal for the truth brought to the investigation of difficult questions of law and fact. I entertain towards him the warm affection of a brother, and part with him, as we all must, with deep sorrow. It is very gratifying, however, to know that he enters a new field of usefulness, which he is well adapted to adorn, and where he will have ample opportunity to elevate and ennoble our profession. My best wishes go with him. May he be spared to continue his useful life, and may the bond of friendship cemented during his official connection with the court in this district remain unbroken in the future. The request is eminently proper, and these proceedings will be spread upon the minutes of the court. It is so ordered."

HOLMAN, JESSE LYNCH.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1377.]

The following notice is reprinted from 2 McLean:

"In the spring of 1842, Judge Holman, of the district court of Indiana, deceased, and Judge Huntington was appointed in his place. Judge Holman was appointed district judge some years before Indiana was included in the seventh district. On the organization of the state government he was appointed one of the supreme judges.

of Indiana, and continued to serve in that capacity until a short time before he received the appointment of district judge. He commenced his professional life in Kentucky, but removed into Indiana several years before it became a state. Judge Holman was a sound lawyer, and a man of good mind. In all the relations of life he was most exemplary; and, as a judge, he was above reproach. His loss was regretted, universally, by the profession; and to his family and connections it was irreparable. He died as a good man would desire to die, in the full assurance of a blissful immortality."

HOPKINS, JAMES CAMPBELL.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1377.]

The following obituary is reprinted from 7 Biss. 8:

The Honorable James Campbell Hopkins, late district judge of the United States for the western district of Wisconsin, departed this life at his residence in the city of Madison, Wisconsin, on the 3d day of September, A. D. 1877, during the June term of the circuit and district courts of the United States for that district. On the 4th day of September, 1877, a meeting of the bar was held in the United States court room at Madison, and was called to order by H. S. Orton, Esq., on whose motion S. U. Pinney, Esq., was made chairman, and Rufus B. Smith, Esq., secretary. On motion, a committee was named by the chairman, consisting of H. S. Orton, Geo. B. Smith, Wm. F. Vilas, J. C. Gregory and H. M. Lewis, Esquires, to draft and report suitable resolutions, expressive of the sense of the bar in respect to the death of Judge Hopkins.

The committee reported the following resolutions:

"Whereas, it has pleased Almighty God, in His inscrutable providence, to remove by death, our distinguished fellow citizen and professional brother, the Hon. James C. Hopkins; therefore,

"Resolved, that we especially condole with the bereaved and stricken family in their great affliction, and assure them of our deepest commiseration and sympathy, and while our weak words of well-intended consolation cannot assuage or mitigate their sorrow, we may be allowed to express the hope that he who has thus left them desolate, has passed into a happier existence, and that they will confidently submit to this painful dispensation of Providence, and put their trust in the 'Father of the fatherless, and in the widow's God.'

"Resolved, that in the death of our lamented friend, the bench has lost an able and an upright judge, our profession one of its most honored and distinguished lawyers, society one of its most useful and respected members, and the state one of its best and most prominent citizens.

"Resolved, that the community has seldom been called to mourn the loss of one so perfect in all the elements and accomplishments of manhood, whose mental structure and acquirements were so symmetrical and available, whose social qualities and manners were so agreeable and attractive, and who was alike able and eminent as a lawyer and a judge. He was cut off in the midst of his arduous judicial labors and in the full maturity of his intellect and judgment, and when he had already achieved high honors and attained great success in the high position he occupied, with the promise and prospect of still greater usefulness and higher eminence in the future. Our memories of Judge Hopkins will always be agreeable. In all social relations he was ever cheerful, courteous and kind, and it seemed to him a pleasure to render personal and professional favors. Upon the bench he was prompt, systematic, studious and attentive, patient and impartial, modest and forbearing, yet dignified and firm. He had great natural aptitude and vast and varied learning as a lawyer, uncommon mental strength and resources, readiness of apprehension and perception, clear and honest judgment, and remarkable powers of reasoning, analysis and discrimination in investigation of all subjects and questions brought to the bar of the court or examined in judicial consultation.

"Resolved, that in Judge Hopkins and in his successful career in life, the young have an example worthy of imitation, in self-reliance, industry, patience, economy and success.

"Resolved, that a committee be appointed to present these resolutions to the circuit and district courts of the United States, and to the supreme court and circuit court of the state, in this city, and request their entry of record."

The resolutions were seconded, and appropriate remarks having been made by several of the members of the bar present, were then unanimously adopted. The chairman appointed H. S. Orton, Geo. B. Smith, and I. C. Sloan, Esquires, a committee to present the said proceedings to the courts named in the resolutions, to be there entered of record.

To the Hon. S. U. Pinney of Madison, Wisconsin, the reporter is indebted for the following sketch of the life of Judge Hopkins:

"James Campbell Hopkins was born in the town of Pawlet, Vermont, April 27th, 1819, and was at the time of his death in the fifty-ninth year of his age. His ancestors both paternal and maternal were Scotch-Irish. When about five years of age, he with his parents removed to the town of Hebron, Washington county, New York, and not long afterward to the town of Granville, where he resided until he commenced his professional career. He was educated at the academy in North Granville, and in the spring of 1840 entered upon the study of law in the office of James McCall, Esq., at Sandy Hill, New York, and afterward continued it in the office of Messrs. Bishop & Agan, at Granville. He was admitted to the bar at the January term of the supreme court, in Albany, in 1845, and immediately after began the practice of his profession with Mr. Agan, at Granville, continuing with him about two years, and then forming a law partnership with Mr. Bishop, which continued until he removed to Madison, Wisconsin, in the spring of 1856. He was postmaster at Granville for a period of five years, and in 1853, he was elected to the senate of New York, from the district then composed of the counties of Saratoga and Washington; he was an active, influential and efficient senator, and a member of the judiciary committee of that body. Upon his settlement in Wisconsin, he became associated in practice with Hon. Harlow S. Orton, and at once entered upon a large and successful business. Soon after his arrival in Wisconsin a Code of Practice substantially like that of New York, was adopted, and he performed the principal work in arranging it, and adapting it to the provisions of the constitution and judicial system of the state. Politically he was an ardent Whig, so long as that party existed, and on the formation of the Republican party, allied himself and acted with that organization; but during his residence in Wisconsin, he gave but little attention to politics, his time being entirely occupied with the duties of his profession. He manifested but little or no ambition for the doubtful honors in modern political life. He was an excellent lawyer, well read in his profession, and entirely devoted to its duties. With a clear discriminating mind, familiar with the practical affairs of business men, and the methods of business transactions, and with a judgment rarely at fault, he was a cautious, safe and reliable counselor. He was a close student, and prepared his cases for trial or argument with care, and was almost certain to be ready whenever they were reached, and for any emergency which might be reasonably anticipated. In the presentation of them, whether to the jury or the court, he was clear in statement, incisive, vigorous and able in argument, and keeping clearly in view the practical necessities of the case, he sought rather to instruct and convince, than to entertain or captivate his hearers, and whether at nisi prius or before the appellate court he was a wary, vigilant and formidable opponent. Quick to detect an error or mistake, he was certain to take advantage of and expose it. In his intercourse with his professional brethren he was obliging and courteous, and with an extensive fund of general knowledge he was a pleasing and instructive conversationalist. Added to these advantages, his habits of great industry, and promptness in the discharge of his duties, personal as well as professional, enabled him to acquire an extensive and lucrative practice, and a prominent position in the front rank of the bar of the state.

"By act of congress of June 29, 1870, Wisconsin was divided into two judicial districts, the eastern and the western, and on the 9th of July, 1870, Mr. Hopkins was commissioned as district judge for the newly-created western district. He at once entered upon the discharge of the duties of his position, and until his last illness he devoted with unremitting zeal and industry all his learning, his extensive experience and distinguished ability to the requirements of his judicial station. A love of order and prompt and exact administration of the law, and his kindly courtesy and unwearied patience, rendered practice in the court in which he presided pleasant and attractive. Counsel never had occasion to complain that they had not been fully and fairly heard before him, or that even an implied restraint had been placed on an exhaustive discussion of all their points. In the hearing and decision of equity causes, and in the administration of the system of bankruptcy then in force, with which he became thoroughly conversant and skilled in its prompt and efficient administration, he had few, if any, superiors. He delivered many valuable opinions which stand deservedly high as authority on questions of bankruptcy law. Long familiarity with and wide and varied experience in business transactions, enabled him to easily master the details of a cause, and readily perceive the precise point upon which it depended. He was quick to detect any artifice, fraud, or sham, and prompt and resolute to expose and rebuke it. The resolutions of the bar give such full expression to his traits of character, personal, professional and judicial, that further statement seems superfluous. During the seven years of his judicial life, when not engaged in his own district, his time was almost constantly occupied in holding court in other districts of the circuit, and frequently at Chicago, where he was highly esteemed as an able judge, and wherever it was his fortune to preside, he won, as in his own district, the confidence and respect of the profession and all interested in the orderly, intelligent and impartial administration of justice. He was a genial gentleman, an excellent lawyer, and an able and faithful judge."

INGERSOLL, CHARLES ANTHONY.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1378.]

The following is reprinted from 4 Blatchf. 517:

"The following proceedings took place at a meeting of members of the bar, held in the city of New York, on the 9th of February, 1860, on the occasion of the death of the Honorable Charles A. Ingersoll, district judge of the United States for the district of Connecticut. The Honorable Samuel R. Betts, district judge of the United States for the southern district of New York, presided at the meeting. The Honorable Josiah Sutherland, a presiding justice of the supreme court of the state of New York, the Honorable Joseph S. Bosworth, chief justice of the superior court of the city of New York, and the Honorable Charles P. Daly, first judge of the court of common pleas for the city and county of New York, were vice presidents of the meeting. Kenneth G. White, Esquire, clerk of the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York, and Robert D. Benedict, Esquire, were secretaries of the meeting. On motion of the Honorable Truman Smith, seconded by Daniel Lord, Esquire, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted, after the meeting had been addressed by the Honorable Truman Smith, Daniel Lord, Esquire, James T. Brady, Esquire, and the Honorable John McKeon:

"Resolved, that the bar has received with deep concern, information of the removal, by death, of the Honorable Charles A. Ingersoll, judge of the United States for the district of Connecticut, and, for several years past, and during his last judicial service, sitting as judge in the courts of the United States for this district, whereby not only the legal profession of the two states, but the public generally, have sustained an irreparable loss.

"Resolved, that we entertain a high sense of the uniform courtesy, firmness, industry, intelligence, great learning, and strict impartiality and rectitude with which he discharged his official duties, and that his example may well be propounded for the imitation of the youthful members of the legal profession, and especially of all such as aspire to a high place in the confidence and affection of their fellow-men.

"Resolved, that our sense of the disinterestedness of the deceased judge, and of his devotion to his public duties, is greatly enhanced by the circumstance that his exercise of judicial functions, in this city, was uncompensated, except that he earned in our midst a name and character of more value than riches.

"Resolved, that we proffer to the family and friends of the deceased, on this occasion, our heartfelt sympathies for the loss they have sustained. But we trust that they will, after referring this painful event to the dispensation of a wise Providence, find many consolations in the high name and spotless character which their departed relative left behind him.

"Resolved, that a copy of the proceedings of this meeting, signed by its officers, be transmitted to the widow of the deceased, and that the same be furnished for insertion in the newspapers, both of this city and of the city of New Haven."

On motion of the Honorable Gilbert Dean, it was ordered, that copies of the proceedings of the meeting be transmitted to the district court of the United States for the district of Connecticut, and to the circuit and district courts of the United States for the southern district of New York, with requests that they be entered on the minutes of those courts. The meeting was then adjourned.

JOHNSON, ALEXANDER SMITH.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1379.]

The following proceedings of the bar are reprinted from 14 Blatchf. 555:

The members of the bar in the city of New York met in the United States circuit court room, on February 5, 1873, in pursuance of a call numerously signed, to take action with reference to the death of the Honorable Alexander S. Johnson, circuit judge of the second judicial circuit of the United States. The meeting was called to order by Hon. Henry E. Davies, who said: "I have been requested by a number of members of the bar to propose, as chairman of this meeting, the Hon. Samuel Blatchford." Judge Blatchford was unanimously elected president of the meeting.

Mr. Davies then said: "I have also been requested to propose, as vice-presidents of this meeting, the Hon. Charles L. Benedict, Hon. Nathaniel Shipman, Hon. William J. Wallace, Hon. Hoyt H. Wheeler, Hon. Noah Davis, Hon. William E. Curtis and Hon. Charles P. Daly; as secretaries, Hon. Stewart L. Woodford, John I. Davenport, Esq., and George F. Betts, Esq." The gentlemen named were elected unanimously.

The officers having taken their seats, William Allen Butler, Esq., spoke as follows: "Mr. Chairman,—I have been requested by the committee having charge of the arrangements for this meeting, to present resolutions expressive of the sentiments of the bar of New York in reference to the occasion which has led to this meeting. There are present, Mr. Chairman, eminent members of our bar, who were associates of Judge Johnson during his career as a lawyer, and others who were his associates upon the bench of the highest court of our state; and from these gentlemen we shall no doubt hear, in fitting terms, in reference to the character, the attainments and the public service of Judge Johnson, which, necessarily, are only briefly alluded to in the resolutions which I shall have the honor to present. If I am permitted a single word of preface, I will take leave to say that a gathering like this seems to me to afford a very striking illustration of the community of interest—I might say the identity of interest—between the members of the bench and of the bar, as co-workers in the same sphere of duty. It is more than a quarter of a century since Judge Johnson left the active practice of the profession here in New York, to take his place as one of the judges of the court of appeals, as then constituted. And yet, during all the interval of time since he left us, until now that we meet to pay this tribute to his memory and to his public services, we have always claimed him as a member of this bar. We have seemed to be identified with him in the many occasions when it was our duty and his to act together in reference to great and important questions relating to commercial law, and to all the other interests which are so frequently involved in the discussions of the profession and in the decisions of the courts; so that we have been still his associates. We have been before him as advocates, and have had the opportunity of witnessing the impartiality, the candor, the learning, the integrity which he brought to the discharge of his official duties; and we have also felt that there never was any interruption of that kindly feeling which to so large a degree existed towards him on the part of all the members of the profession who were brought into contact with him when he was one of us, and which was continued on his part during his long judicial service. When we last saw him presiding in the circuit court a few weeks since, it was painfully apparent that he was yielding to the burden unwisely devolved upon a single judge, which he had only too willingly assumed, and under which he struggled to the utmost of his ability, in a manner which entitles us to say that his effort to sustain it was heroic. In the circumstances of his death we find abundant occasion for regret; but he has left us an example of untiring devotion to duty; and as we now, standing beside his bier, look back over this honorable and finished career, I think we may all take from it a high incentive to that continuance in patient, thorough and effective service which, alike for the humblest as the highest toiler in our ranks, is its own satisfaction and reward. By your leave, Mr. Chairman, I will now offer the following resolutions:

“The members of the bar of the city of New York, convened to take action in reference to the death of the Honorable Alexander S. Johnson, late circuit judge of the United States, for the second judicial circuit, hereby resolve as follows:

“Resolved, that we have learned with profound regret of the death of Judge Johnson, which deprives the bar of this city and state, and of the circuit of which he was the honored judicial head, of a wise and able judge and an upright man, eminent in the public service, and justly held in the highest esteem in all the relations of life.

“Resolved, that in the professional career of Judge Johnson, and in the various public positions filled by him—as a judge of the court of appeals, to which he was elected in 1851 for the full term of eight years; as a commissioner under the treaty of July 1st, 1863, with Great Britain; as a member of the commission of appeals, to which he was appointed in January, 1873; as a judge of the present court of appeals, from December, 1873, to January 1, 1875; and in the federal judiciary, as circuit judge of the second judicial circuit, from October, 1875, to the date of his death—the discharge of his high functions was marked by a constant and undeviating devotion to duty, by high intellectual ability and by absolute rectitude of purpose.

“In the retrospect of his public life we recall these conspicuous traits of his character, and of his judicial action, alike in justice to his memory, and in grateful recollection of his services to his state and country. Thoroughly grounded and versed in the science of the law, and with a large experience in its practice, it was his endeavor, as a jurist, to apply those well established principles, which are the basis of the due administration of justice, so as to reach in each particular case a conclusion resting upon their sure foundations. This characteristic of his mind eminently fitted him for the duties of the bench of an appellate court, and is amply illustrated in his reported opinions, which are distinguished for clear and lucid expositions of legal principles, and their close and discriminating application to the most intricate and important questions of law and fact. While the reports of our highest state court abundantly attest the fulness of his learning, the breadth of his intellect and his ceaseless industry, the rare personal qualities which gave a peculiar charm to his character, evinced in the unvarying urbanity and patience, the genial courtesy and self-control, the cordial sympathy, without bias and interest, without partiality, which with him were inseparable from the discharge of duty, will be specially cherished by his associates and contemporaries, and should be perpetuated in this testimonial to his worth. Our sorrow at the termination of his useful and honorable life, heightened by the consciousness that it was hastened by the undue pressure of judicial labors and responsibilities against which he struggled with self-sacrificing toil, finds a solace in the reflection, that, to the last, he was an example of fidelity to duty, and that, as a minister of justice, he died in the service he imposed.

“Resolved, that a copy of these resolutions, attested by the officers of this meeting, be presented to the circuit court of the United States in this district, and to the court of appeals of this state, in such manner as shall be directed by the chairman, for entry on their minutes, and that a copy be also transmitted to the family of Judge Johnson.”

Hon. George F. Comstock spoke as follows: “I beg to second the resolutions which have been read. The attention of the bar, of the bench and the public has been arrested by the sad event which is the occasion of this meeting. We are met together as members of a common profession, to give expression to the sense of the loss which we feel in the death of Alexander S. Johnson. That event was unexpected to us; indeed, the intelligence of it came upon us with a startling suddenness. It is very well known that some two or three months ago his health had been giving way under the accumulated labors imposed upon him by the high judicial position which he so honorably and so usefully filled. It is also known, that, now only a short time ago, he went to the island of Nassau for the benefit of its mild and genial climate, in the hope and expectation, in which we shared, that his health would be restored, and his usefulness continued. The first news we hear from him is the sudden and sad announcement of his death. Judge Johnson was eminent as a lawyer, a jurist and a citizen. I had the rare good fortune to know him, I think I may say intimately, during nearly the last twenty-five years of his life; and it is to me a source of profound satisfaction to believe that I enjoyed his friendship, as I gave him, most unreservedly, my own. The impression made upon me by his talents and learning, by the purity of his life, by his genial nature and the graces of his character, are with me a recollection which will remain as long as memory lasts. His career at the bar was comparatively a brief one, and mainly, if not wholly, in the city of New York. I was never a witness of that career, but it must have been one of laborious study and practice, for it made him one of the most accomplished lawyers that I have ever known. At an unusually early age for elevation to the bench, the display of his learning and powers in the highest court of the state attracted to him the attention of the profession generally, and their appreciation of his rare qualities was exhibited by his nomination and election to that tribunal. He became a judge of the court of appeals at an earlier age than any other person upon whom that distinguished honor had been conferred; nor has it happened more than once, if at all, since that time. During the succeeding eight years of his life, and while, according to ordinary experience, he had scarcely reached the full maturity of his powers, he served in that capacity, and, as the whole profession witnesses, served eminently and usefully. At the expiration of that period the mutations of politics, the shortness of judicial terms, and the elective system, deprived the state for a considerable number of years of his services in a judicial capacity. Retiring from the bench, he became a resident again in his native city of Utica. The well-earned reputation which he enjoyed for learning, ability, perfect independence and impartiality, marked him for selection as the voluntary judge or arbiter in cases of private submission to him by the parties. I happen to know very well that he became the standing referee of the interior of the state in many cases of unusual importance, submitted to him by the parties with the same confidence in his learning and in his judgment which they would have in the decisions of courts of the highest authority. The creation of the commission of appeals restored him to judicial life. He held a seat in that high tribunal by appointment, but for only about one year, when he was transferred, also by appointment, once more to the court of appeals, to fill a place made vacant by the tragic death of Judge Peckham, who was buried in the ocean by the sinking of the steamer Ville du Havre. At the expiration, or soon after the expiration, of that official term, Judge Johnson received, now about three years ago, from the president and senate of the United States, an appointment to the distinguished position of judge of this circuit, by far the most important of the circuits into which our federal jurisprudence is divided. He held that office to the close of his life, and we believe that he sank beneath the crushing weight of the labors which it imposed upon him. And in this connection I ought to mention the fact (which is contrary, I believe, to a received impression) that, when he ceased from his labors, prior to the October term, he had almost entirely cleared his docket of cases argued. During a considerable portion of Judge Johnson's judicial career, it happened to me to be associated with him. With him were also associated Denio and Selden, names which are high on the roll of judicial fame. The relation to him to which I refer enables me, I think, to form a just judgment of his rare and excellent qualities as a lawyer and a jurist. I have nothing to say of his mental peculiarities; for he had no peculiarities or eccentricities of mind. His mind was simple, direct and strong. If any quality or sentiment belonging to him as a judge was in predominance, it was his prevailing and pervading love of justice and of right, as ascertained by sound and beneficent rules of law. I think his purely intellectual faculties had their highest exercise in the quick and ready appreciation of the facts of a case in their true relation to the principles of law. He, more rarely than others, mistook mere resemblance in circumstances for analogy in principle. Few, if any, of his contemporaries had a more varied and extensive knowledge of the law. None had a more discriminative judgment. He had the rare common sense which looked through the false, and took in the true relations of a controversy; but it was a common sense cultivated and adorned by the learning of the books. The duty of impartiality in a judge is so plain that it is only feeble praise to say of a judge that he is impartial. But I think I can truly say of Judge Johnson, that his was the most absolutely impartial mind that I ever knew. The parties to a controversy were to him a mere abstraction. He looked always directly at the merits of a controversy without any distracting thought or wish. To me he seemed always to be inaccessible even to the subtlest of those influences which sometimes, it must be confessed, are a disturbing weight in the even balances of justice. The judicial opinions which he has left will be an enduring record. They will long be read and appreciated as models of neatness, simplicity and precision. Their characteristic and their charm is the utter absence of ambitious ornament and display. They are truly the reflex of that modest and unassuming character which distinguished him in all the relations of life. He was wholly free from vanity or self assertion. If he had pride, it was only the pride which lifted him above all meanness and wrong. Such as I have most feebly portrayed him, was our deceased friend and brother. We shall see him no more, but his eminent and honorable career in the public service, illumined, as it was, by the radiance of his private virtues, will long be to us a memory to cherish, and an example of inestimable value. Our holy religion tells us to believe that he has exchanged earthly toil for eternal rest."

Hon. E. C. Benedict then said: "Mr. Chairman, —Although I knew Judge Johnson during all the time that he was at the bar in this city, and subsequently on the bench—I may say that I knew him very well, personally and familiarly, though not intimately—I do not rise to say anything with regard to his professional and judicial career, except that from the heart I shall vote for the resolutions which have been read, and that I concur in the very excellent remarks which have been made by Judge Comstock and Mr. Butler. I shall say only a word or two with regard to Judge Johnson in another aspect of his public and personal life. I had the honor to be associated with him during all the time that he was one of the regents of the University of the State of New York, and although the duties of that office are unostentatious, they are highly useful and important to the state. It is not always that gentlemen who follow the law with so much earnestness, so much zeal and so much real love for its principles, find time to step aside into the more graceful pursuits of literature and science. Judge Johnson came into the board of regents fully sensible of the importance of its duties; and he brought to their exercise not only that wisdom, acuteness and impartiality which characterized him as a lawyer and a judge, but the love of letters, also, and generous learning with which he was deeply imbued. He came into the board as the successor of the late eminent Rev. Dr. Campbell, of Albany, who decorated the metaphysical theology and earnest and devout faith of one of the strictest sects of our religion with the generous and refining influences of secular learning. Judge Johnson was immediately made the successor to Dr. Campbell on the committees on the state library and on the state cabinet of natural history. The state library was at that time, or a little before, put into the hands of the regents as trustees, to manage and care for it. They found it a library of some ten thousand volumes, with many broken sets and shattered bindings, carelessly kept and carelessly used. They have made it, to-day, one of the best, and best conditioned libraries in the country, containing more than a hundred thousand volumes. On that committee Judge Johnson's bibliographical knowledge, exquisite taste and great culture in books were made exceedingly useful in filling the gaps in the library, in adding to its stores, and in making it what it should be—a permanent and useful library in all departments of learning and literature. His position on the committee on the state cabinet was no less agreeable to him. Mr. Agassiz once said in my hearing, on a great public occasion, that the first question of a man of science in New York was, 'which is the way to Albany?'—the home of that great cabinet and of Professor Hall, the geologist and paleontologist of the most world-wide reputation, who is the curator of the cabinet. One of merely professional tastes might be long acquainted with Judge Johnson without finding out that natural history might have been all in all his study, so quietly did he indulge in the charm of those studies. He knew enough of them all to be even more than merely intelligent in their literature and science. He was himself a careful observer of objects, especially with the microscope, and he was a general reader of the literature of those subjects. He knew not only the theories that are now fresh, but also those that were fresh and believed in by everybody and exploded before he was born. His occasional hours, therefore, with his committee and with Professor Hall in the cabinet, were among the luxuries of his life. He exhibited the same qualities as a member of those committees and as an individual associate of the members of the board and in its meetings, which he exhibited on the bench and at the bar, and in social life, and which have been alluded to with such just feeling and truth by Judge Comstock and Mr. Butler; the same personal amenity, the same cheerfulness and the same quiet and unostentatious way of doing his duty under all circumstances. He left the board of regents by resignation, because the judicial appointment which he had received rendered him, as he thought, incompetent to hold the two offices; otherwise, as he often said to me, he would have been glad to continue in the board, and lamented that he could not be with us at our meetings and participate in our duties as he had formerly done. Although the office of regent is one of much labor, no pay, and little glory, still it is well to tell of such a man as Judge Johnson, that he considered usefulness as the best pay and the truest honor, and that he fulfilled all the duties of that non-professional and unsalaried office, with the same ability and faithfulness, and the same personal loveliness (if I may use such an expression) that he did the more distinguished public offices which he filled."

Edgar S. Van Winkle, Esq., said: "Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen of the bar—After the very expressive and eloquent resolutions, and after the just and extended remarks of the gentlemen who have spoken in regard to Judge Johnson's accomplishments and character, I shall not attempt to detain you by any repetition of the views which have been so well put before you; for in attempting to do so I should only display my own inferiority. Having been requested to make some remarks at this meeting, I have consented to do so; but, holding the same views as those gentlemen by whom the just character of Judge Johnson has been so well and so particularly set forth, it would seem that there was but little left for me to say; and there is but little, except generalities. The custom we have, bench and bar, of meeting as one body on the death of any distinguished member of our profession, whose character we have revered and whose talents we have esteemed, is a beautiful custom, I think; one which tends to keep alive in our hearts a feeling of affinity with one another, a feeling that our connection with our departed friends does not cease entirely on their death, and that in our memories their talents and their virtues are embalmed, and that they serve as an incentive to us to endeavor to follow in their footsteps. And more particularly when a prominent occupant of the bench, one who has worthily and successfully for a long period of time fulfilled the difficult duties and functions of that position departs, it seems more than ever proper that we should meet again together, the bench and the bar, and repeat in such meeting our estimate of the character of our departed brother. A judge in any part of this circuit, the territory embraced by this circuit of the United States court, has anything but a sinecure. We know and we see that in all the superior courts a judge has a burden upon him which few constitutions, mental or physical, can bear. And I often admire the courage which enables men who know what is awaiting them in a short time, to assume the burdens of such an office as this. Therefore, my friends, we should rally to the support of the custom, and speak a good word in behalf of every one of those gentlemen, those martyrs, who, having worthily fulfilled the office of judge, have then passed away. When, unexpectedly to me, I was requested to take a part in these observances, I felt inclined to refuse; but, upon consideration, it seemed to me I had no right to do so. And, moreover, I feel towards the worthy members of our profession that degree of respect and affection, I may say, that I would not refuse to contribute what little I could, however inconsiderable it might be, to the preservation of the custom which we have adopted in this country, and which we are now carrying out; and I feel a share of that loyalty which impels and justifies even the meanest clansman in casting his mite, however slight it may be, upon the cairn of a fallen chieftain. And the judge whom we lament was a chieftain; he was a great judge; he had those qualities which belong more especially, in their influence and fitness, to the judicial office. He had honesty, he had industry, he had intelligence, he had learning, he had fearlessness, he had firmness, and he had a love for the duties he was called to perform. As to his learning, the decisions with which our books are filled bear testimony. It needs no further remarks on my part. I can add nothing to what has been so well said here to-day by gentlemen well able to speak of the value of those decisions, and to judge of the learning which they embalm. That he was industrious, I think cannot be doubted, apart from the asseverations of his friends to-day; because I am persuaded, from what I have seen, that a person who filled the judicial offices which he did—and more especially in this circuit—without industry could not with honor have survived a single term. So great and important were the interests before him, so pressing the necessity for decision. It is hardly necessary to extend the catalogue of qualities which I have named as those which constitute a great judge. As to the integrity and impartiality of Judge Johnson, I never heard the slightest impeachment of it; nor do I believe but that the persons the most inimical to Judge Johnson (for even the best men have their enemies) would abstain from making such a charge as that. If we look at his decisions, if we read them carefully, we shall see that, though he was a man, as we are, and subject to all the infirmities of human nature, yet when he entered the judicial office he became removed, as it were, from those infirmities. And you perceive all through his decisions, whatever they may be, that in his mind there stood, over and above all, the figure of justice with the flaming sword that would not permit anything unworthy to enter the sanctuary of his mind. There can be but few subjects more worthy of our consideration than that of a member of the profession who has reached the highest attainable honors it offers at the bar, and eminent judicial honor on the bench—I say there can be few subjects of contemplation pleasanter to the legal mind than that of such a man, subject to all the infirmities of nature, subject to all the influences that cunning or ability could spread around him, subject to be misunderstood and misrepresented, and yet who, by force of his inward contemplations and his own respect for virtue and right, has lifted himself above the fogs and tempests of the world, to a serene height, where he can look down upon the follies and weaknesses of the world as one who has passed through and over them, and can, from his elevation, announce the decrees with which law and equity, the twin offsprings of justice, inspire him. Well and ably did he fulfill all his functions; and I trust that all here are united in one feeling, that in renewing our friendship for each other we at once strengthen the bond which binds the bar and bench together, and raise a tribute of affection to the memory of our friend, and of admiration for his many virtues."

Luther R. Marsh, Esq., spoke as follows: "Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen—An early acquaintance with Judge Johnson, ere he came to the bar, and since continued, may give me warrant, perhaps, for a single word. Were I to state my thoughts in a condensed form, I should but re-word the resolutions. They express, I am persuaded, the sentiment of the bar—of the bar of this city and of the bar of the state—at this sad bereavement. He, to honor whose memory we have met, received an inheritance from his country which he was proud to maintain. His mother was the daughter of the second son of President John Adams. As early as 1797—ere Utica had received the christening of its present name—while yet it was known only as 'Old Fort Schuyler,'—his grandfather, Bryan Johnson, was a prominent and valued citizen, and contributed largely to the impulse the infant received in growth and prosperity. Concurrent with the present century, from the beginning down to recent date, his father, Alexander B. Johnson, was one of the foremost men of Utica, in commerce, in influence, in finance in literature.

And so it happened that the departed jurist came to his profession through a youth and education of uncommon advantage. All that could be done by affluence, by social position, by opportunity, by appliance, by stimulus to effort, was his; and these advantages fell not on unfruitful ground. He had an intuitive apprehension, a great intellectual capacity, and was quick to appropriate and assimilate the benefits that I have mentioned. He took delight in scientific research, and was a man of general culture and scholarly attainments. Not content with surface views, he liked to think out principles to their last analysis. He was peculiarly well fitted, as I think, for success at the bar, for forensic debate, and for the presentation and argument of the principles that obtain in the administration of justice. He was endowed with a sweet and magnetic voice, and a most winning manner. But he was not to stay in the arena long. The bench was his destiny. It was there that the largest portion of his business life was spent, in the manner narrated by the resolutions and by the gentlemen who have preceded me—in the exercise of the Godlike prerogative of applying the principles of law to the rights of men. That he performed this duty with inflexible integrity and rare ability, in recorded opinions which stand as landmarks in the troubled sea of controversy, and to the acceptance of all, is conceded by all. I have often thought, sir, that if fortune had given him a seat on the bench of the supreme court of the United States, at Washington, he would have been most admirably adapted for the wider range of that majestic tribunal, before which come, for adjudication, the conflicting interests of the whole country, and whose voice is authoritative to its utmost bounds. Sir, I have noticed, by the newspapers, that the bar of Utica, in his own native county of Oneida, are meeting to testify a similar honor to that which we render to his memory to-day. The city of Utica, as the city of New York, claims him as her own. That city, sir, has done credit to her position as the geographical centre of the state, by making it, from early time, the legal centre as well. She has produced the ablest lawyer, as such, whom our state, and, as I think, our country, has seen—Samuel A. Talcott. His scarcely less famous partner, William H. Maynard, has sent down to us a reputation for transcendent ability as a lawyer, and fabulous powers of memory. Since that time she counts, among her ornaments, Greene C. Bronson, Henry R. Storrs, Joseph Kirkland, Joshua A. Spencer, Samuel Beardsley, Hiram Denio, and William Curtis Noyes. She has furnished for our state, in succession, three attorney generals—Talcott, Bronson, and Beardsley. At the time of the death of the eminent jurist whom we mourn, she filled two seats on the bench of the highest courts of the United States: one in the circuit court, which his lamented death leaves vacant, and one on the supreme bench at Washington. And even now, at this very hour, the senatorial representation of the great state of New York is filled by her two citizens, Roscoe Conkling and Francis Kernan. Utica, so highly favored, now enrolls, with pride, while yet in sorrow, the name of Alexander S. Johnson on the bright scroll of her departed sons. We, of New York, claim him too; and there, as here, the bench and bar, laying this tribute on his tomb, in a common sympathy mourn their loss, and hold his memory in honor."

Calvin G. Child, Esq., then said: "Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen—I have heard the resolutions read, and although a stranger to most of you, I desire simply to express, in common with you of the New York bar, the sentiment which we of Connecticut, being so closely allied with you in the second circuit, feel upon the occasion which has called you together. The pressure of the judicial duties of Judge Johnson has kept him out of our state almost entirely, except in the matter of appeals. His predecessor, although a native of Connecticut, came to the bench of this circuit with a reputation acquired in your state. We knew him whom you mourn to-day by a like judicial reputation; and I could not keep silent, sir, with these proceedings before me, without taking advantage of the opportunity to express our sympathy, and our participation in these ceremonies to-day, and the respect we all feel for the judge who has been loaned to us by the state of New York. There is an old Japanese custom, sir, that when the body of the dead passes, each neighbor shall carry it for a short distance, as a neighborly duty which they owe to the memory of him who has gone; and in that spirit, on behalf of the bar of Connecticut, I would to-day with you stand around the bier of Alexander S. Johnson, and speak for our bar the sentiments that we have of respect for his memory, his judicial talents and his judicial integrity."

The resolutions were adopted unanimously.

The president, in accordance with the resolutions, appointed Mr. Benjamin D. Silliman and Mr. William Allen Butler a committee to present the resolutions to the court of appeals of this state and the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York.

JOHNSON, BENJAMIN.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1380.]

The following notice is reprinted from 1 Hemp. vii.:

The late Benjamin Johnson of Arkansas, who sat in those courts for nearly thirty years, and was their pride and ornament, generally wrote out his opinions, and before his death placed such as had been preserved in my hands. Of him I cannot speak without emotion; and when I remember that he died full of juridical honors, beloved by all, without an enemy in the world, admired for the purity of his public and private character and for his devotion as a Christian, respected for his unbending integrity and for a heart full of kindness to all, I cannot but say to myself we shall not see his like again. He was a safe, patient, and able judge; and the judicial distinction which he won extended far beyond the boundaries of his state, and we may well wish that the judiciary of our country was always represented by such men.

LEAVITT, HUMPHREY HOWE.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1382.]

The following proceedings upon his retirement from the bench are reprinted from 2 Bond:

On Thursday evening, March 30, 1871, a banquet was given by the bar of the southern district of Ohio at the St. Nicholas Hotel, in Cincinnati, in honor of Judge Leavitt. It is certain that a company embracing more eminent legal talent never assembled in Ohio. The entertainment in all of its appointments was unexceptionable. At the head of the table was seated the Hon. Henry Stanbery, Judge Leavitt, the guest of the evening, and other distinguished persons. At 11 o'clock, Mr. Stanbery, rising, addressed the assembly.

Address of Mr. Stanbery: "Gentlemen: No more agreeable duty could have been assigned to me than that of presiding at this banquet. Lawyers seldom come together as a body except to pay a last tribute of respect to the memory of a departed brother. Hard-worked as a profession, it is a rare thing for us to meet together for social enjoyment. No other profession stands more in need of such recreation, and yet none sees less. I hail, therefore, with great pleasure, this gathering of the bench and bar. But, gentlemen, it is not that consideration alone that makes this meeting an agreeable one, so much as the particular occasion which brings us together. We are met to express our respect and esteem for our honored guest upon his retirement from the bench. Perhaps there is no one present who has for so many years stood in the relation of lawyer to judge as I have occupied toward the friend who sits by my side. I doubt not it was this consideration more than any other which moved the committee to place me at the head of this board. On July 21, 1834, I was present at a session of the district court at Columbus, when the commission of Judge Leavitt was read, and when he took his seat as judge of that court. I refreshed my recollection by examination of the journal of the court, yesterday. My impression then was, that during all the time which has since elapsed, Judge Leavitt was never absent from a regular term of the court. I again referred to the journal, with the assistance of an obliging deputy clerk, and must confess that the record did not sustain me. We did find one term at which Judge Leavitt was not on the bench, but it must be added that it appeared from the journal that at that very time, though unable to leave his distant residence, he was busily engaged in hearing cases 'at chambers.' Where shall we find another instance of faithful service so long continued and so punctually performed? But this is not all. The question is not merely how long, but how well. The answer to this question needs no reference to the journal, no profert of the record. I stand here as a living witness, surrounded by a cloud of witnesses, to give the answer. The judicial station requires something more than long continued services. It requires diligent study, patient attention, strict impartiality, purity of life, social as well as official, good temper, and courteous demeanor. I have practiced the law for many years and in many courts, and I can say, without hesitation, that I have never practiced before any judge in whom these virtues were more fully illustrated. After the long career of public duty, our venerable friend retires to private life without a stain upon the judicial ermine. In a few days another judge will sit in his accustomed seat. Let us hope that the coming man may enjoy as long a career of usefulness, and earn as good a title to the respect and affection of the bar as his predecessor."

Mr. Stanbery then proposed the first regular toast of the evening, as follows: "Our Honored Guest." In response, Judge Leavitt said:

Remarks of Judge Leavitt: "Mr. President and gentlemen: I have often, in the course of my life, had occasion to wish that I had some of the powers of an orator. I regret to say that this high qualification has never pertained to me, and now I feel greatly embarrassed and very much at a loss to respond in fitting terms to the kind utterances of my learned and excellent friend, the president of this meeting, and the sentiments contained in the toast. It was the remark of the celebrated Edward Burke, the English statesman and philosopher, that the legal profession had a contractile influence upon the intellect, as well as upon the social affections. This language, of course, was made applicable to the English bar. The learned orator had never known much about American lawyers. [Applause.] It affords me great pleasure to utter upon this occasion my entire dissent from the opinion expressed by the eminent Mr. Burke, in regard to the bar of this country. From my long association and intercourse with them, I have every reason to believe, and to infer that the sentiment uttered by the distinguished statesman to whom I have referred, has no application to the bar of the United States. There is not only the mental qualifications and accomplishments belonging to the American bar which pertain to any other calling or profession, even of the highest literary order, but in point of moral qualities they are not inferior to other classes and descriptions of persons. If I needed an evidence of the truth of my own position in this regard, I think I might properly point to the present assembly and the occasion upon which they have met. You are not here, my friends, to celebrate or memorialize the incoming of a new judge to an official position. You are not here under circumstances that show you to be actuated by selfish or interested motives. You are here simply to commemorate the fact that an old gentleman who has been very long upon the bench is about to retire from that office, to civil life, to a place and a position where he can never hope to exercise any official patronage or to confer favors upon others, professional or otherwise. In other words, you are doing honor to an ancient judge without expectation of favor from his hands hereafter. I allude to this fact to show that your conduct upon this occasion is entirely devoid of any selfish motive or incentive, and hence I derive the argument that there is no defect in the heart of the American bar. [Applause.] Gentlemen, the compliment which has been uttered by my excellent and long-known friend, the president of this meeting, is one to which I can not respond. He has done me justice, and more than justice. If there is any merit in a very long judicial life—in discharging the duties of a judicial station with honest purposes and motives—then I grant that the compliment may not be undeserved. If, however, it is intended to accord to me the merit and the high distinction of great learning, great judicial ability, then I fear the compliment is not deserved. I have always endeavored to hold the scales of justice with a firm and equal hand. [Great applause.] I could not claim, without extreme arrogance, that I have not committed many errors and mistakes in my judgment. I have no doubt that I have; but as it is human to err, I have no right to claim any exemption from the common lot of humanity. I will remark, as the fact has been referred to by my learned friend, that in July, 1834, I first took my seat upon the bench of the district court. At that time the whole state of Ohio formed one judicial district, and the courts were then located at Columbus. Up to the time of the division of the state into two districts, in 1855, there was comparatively little business either in the circuit or the district courts of the United States. My friend will recollect distinctly that the more important cases that came before the circuit court prior to the division of the state, were cases involving controversies in relation to the title of land in the Virginia military district; and I may remark here that there were very few, if any, cases which came before that court during the period to which I refer, in which my learned friend was not counsel on one side or the other. [Applause.] After the year 1855, when the state was divided, and when the courts for the southern district were established in Cincinnati, a very changed state of things existed. That city being the great commercial center for the state, business came like an avalanche into both the circuit and the district courts, and from that period I have been actively and laboriously employed in the duties of my station. [Applause.] The district court of the United States, as you are aware, has exclusive and original jurisdiction in all cases of admiralty, and it has also the same jurisdiction in all seizures upon land, and all proceedings in rem against property for forfeiture for violations of law. It has the exclusive jurisdiction of all suits against public defaulters, and for the recovery of debts due the government. It has concurrent jurisdiction with the circuit court of the United States in all crimes. In addition to the matters of jurisdiction to which I have referred, there were occasional cases arising under the fugitive slave law—the act of 1793 at first, and then the act of 1850. In fact, there were cases of this description, more of them in my court, to be tried by me, than I was anxious to have; but it has been very well remarked that judges can not choose the cases which they will pass upon or try. During nearly all the terms of the circuit court the labor and responsibility of presiding devolved upon me, as the duties of the judge of the circuit did not often permit him to attend the terms of that court. Without dwelling upon this subject, so far as my learned friend has given me any credit for long and laborious service, I accept the compliment, for I think I have, perhaps, had a longer judicial term of life, with one or two exceptions, than any federal judge under the government of the United States. I know of few, indeed, that have exceeded me in length of term. [Applause.] One remark further, gentlemen, and I shall take my seat. In regard to my motives in judicial action, allow me to say for the benefit of the fraternity, that in early life I was forcibly impressed with the utterance of Lord Mansfield in the Case of John Wilkes, when, in deciding the points of error that were made, he said: 'I love popularity, but it is the popularity that follows, not that which is run after; it is not the popularity that is gained without merit, and lost without crime.' [Applause.] From the bottom of my heart, I now express my thankful acknowledgments for the compliment which it has pleased the gentlemen of the bar of the southern district of Ohio to pay me upon this occasion. [Loud and prolonged applause.]

Mr. Murat Halstead, editor of the Cincinnati Commercial, an invited guest, appropriately responded to the toast, "The Press;" in conclusion, stating "that he had joined with very great sincerity in this testimonial toward a gentleman whose name was a synonym for all that was honorable and upright in the judiciary."

The following letter, from a distinguished member of the bar, since "freed from the toils which so long pressed upon him," was read, and elicited great applause:

Letter from Hocking H. Hunter:

"Lancaster, O., March 27, 1871.

"My Dear Sir: I truly regret that business engagements place it out of my power to participate in the entertainment on Thursday, to be given as a testimonial of esteem and regard to our venerable friend, Judge Leavitt, on the occasion of his retirement from the bench. I acknowledge myself, within the terms of your letter, to be one of those who have been 'longest associated,' professionally, in the exercise of his judicial functions, with the judge, extending, in fact, throughout the whole period of his service. And I assure you it would be very gratifying to me to be with the brethren in the expression of their approbation of his official life, now about to be brought to a close. It has been pure and faultless in purpose, just, upright, impartial, diligent; and now, at the advanced period of life which he has attained, it is my wish to assure him that I hope he may enjoy many happy days and years of life, freed from the toils which have so long pressed upon him, and when the end cometh that it may be to enter upon a new life of endless felicity. Hoping the occasion may be one to be followed by grateful recollections, I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant, H. H. Hunter.

"To W. M. Bateman, Esq."

McLEAN, JOHN.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1325.]

The following proceedings are reprinted from 1 Biss. 9:

Hon. John McLean, associate justice of the supreme court of the United States, whose opinions form a large part of this volume [1 Biss.] and of whose reports this series is a continuation, died at Cincinnati on the 4th day of April, 1861, at the age of seventy-six years, being at that time the senior associate justice of that court. Judge McLean commenced the practice of the law in 1807, at Lebanon, in Warren county, Ohio, and five years afterwards was elected to congress in his district, which, at that time, included the city of Cincinnati. In 1814, he was, by the unanimous vote of his district, re-elected to congress, which position he resigned to accept a place in the supreme court of Ohio, to which he had been elected by the legislature of that state. He remained on the supreme bench of Ohio till 1822, when he was appointed commissioner of the general land office by President Monroe, and in the succeeding year he became postmaster general. On the 7th of March, 1829, he was appointed by President Jackson one of the justices of the supreme court of the United States, and at the January term, 1830, entered upon the duties of that office, which he continued to discharge for more than thirty years, and until the time of his death. The decisions of Judge McLean in the supreme court are reported in Peters' Reports, commencing with the third volume, and in the twenty-four volumes of Howard. His opinions on the circuit are found in the six volumes of Reports which bear his name, and are concluded in the present volume.

At a meeting of the members of the bar and officers of the supreme court of the United States, held in the supreme court room, December 2d, 1861, Richard S. Coxe, Esq., on behalf of the committee appointed for that purpose, submitted the following resolutions:

"1. That the members of this bar and the officers of the court entertain a profound sense of the loss which, in common with the entire nation, they have sustained in the death of the late Mr. Justice McLean, so long known to the community, and in an especial manner to the profession, for his exalted legal accomplishments, the purity of his private character, and the eminent ability with which he discharged the duties of the high offices, judicial, administrative, and legislative, with which his name has been so long and honorably associated.

"2. That we will wear the accustomed badge of mourning during the present term of the court.

"3. That the chairman and secretary of this meeting transmit a copy of these proceedings to the family of the deceased, communicating, at the same time, the deep and sincere sympathy felt by its members in the affliction with which they have been visited by a wise and merciful Providence.

"4. That the honorable the attorney general be respectfully solicited to present these proceedings to the supreme court, now in session, and to ask that they may be entered on the minutes of the court."

At the opening of the supreme court on the following day, Mr. Bates, the attorney general, presented to the court the proceedings and resolutions of the meeting, and moved that they be entered on the minutes of the court, addressing the court, as follows:

"May it please your honors: I appear before you now not on my own motion, but at the request and by the authority of my brethren of this bar, who have desired me to say to you, in their behalf, a few words expressive of their feelings, and it is with an emotion of sadness, bordering upon melancholy, that I find myself constrained by circumstances to mark my first official appearance in this high court with the repulsive prestige of a bearer of bad news.

"For the heart of man will sympathize with surrounding facts, and will, often unconsciously, associate ugliness and vice with the messengers of evil, and will on the contrary, impute beauty and goodness to the agents and instruments of its pleasure. This is a sentiment known of old as a truth rooted in the human heart. 'How beautiful,' exclaims the holy prophet, 'how beautiful, upon the mountains, are the feet of Him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace!' Oh! that to-day it were my delightful office to bring you good tidings, and to publish to you peace. But, unhappily, it is not so. Since the first organization of this court, no term has yet been held under circumstances so gloomy and sorrowful. I look up to that honored bench and behold vacant seats. Even this august tribunal, the co-equal partner in the government of a great nation, the revered dispenser of our country's justice, shares with us in feeling the common sorrow, and suffers in the common calamity. It is shorn of its fair proportions, and weakened and diminished in its strength and beauty, by the present loss of one entire third of its component members. And where are the wise, learned, and just men who used to fill those seats? Gone from this theater of their fame and usefulness, while all of us remember them with respect and gratitude, and mourn the loss of their valuable services. Two of them have been peacefully gathered to their fathers, and have left their fame safe and unchangeable, beyond the reach of malice, and secure against accident, embalmed in history, and hallowed by the grave. And one of them in the ripe vigor of his manhood, and in the pride of a noble and highly cultivated mind, has been swept away from his high position by the turbulent waves of faction and civil war. And this is not all. Your lawful jurisdiction is practically restrained; your just power is diminished, and into a large portion of our country, your writ does not run; and your beneficent authority to administer justice according to law, is for the present, successfully denied and resisted. I look abroad over the country and behold a ghastly spectacle; a great nation, lately united, prosperous, and happy, and buoyant with hopes of future glory torn into warring fragments; and a land once beautiful and rich in the flowers and fruits of peaceful culture, stained with blood and blackened with fire. In all that wide space from the Potomac to the Rio Grande, and from the Atlantic to the Missouri, the still small voice of legal justice is drowned by the incessant roll of the drum, and the deafening thunder of artillery. To that extent your just and lawful power is practically annulled, for the laws are silent amidst arms. But let us rejoice in the hope that these calamities are only for a season; that the same Almighty hand which sustained our fathers in their arduous struggle to establish the glorious constitution which this court has so long and so wisely administered, will not be withdrawn from their children in a struggle no less arduous to maintain it. Now, indeed, we are overshadowed with a dark cloud, broad and gloomy as a nation's pall; but, thanks be to God, the eye of faith and patriotism can discern the bow of promise set in that cloud, spanning the gloom with its bright arch, to foreshadow the coming of a day of sunshine and calm, and to justify our hope of a speedy restoration of peace, and order, and law.

"This much, may it please the court, I have ventured to say as what seemed to me a fitting preliminary to the discharge of the duty, imposed upon me by my brethren of the bar. Of course all the members of the court know the fact that since the close of the last term, their old and honored associate, Mr. Justice McLean, has departed this life, for all men take sorrowful notice when 'a prince and a great man has fallen in Israel.' But the members of the bar, in pursuance of a worthy custom, long established, and stimulated, no doubt, by their personal reverence for the virtues and the learning of the departed judge, have held a meeting and passed a series of resolutions, which they have done me the honor to confide to me, with the request that I would present them here and ask that they may be entered upon the minutes of the court as a memorial of their profound veneration for the dead, and for the high tribunal of which he was so long a worthy member. I shall not take the risk of marring the strength or beauty of the resolutions by attempting to recite them, or to comment upon them. Let them speak for themselves, for they speak well. But I believe it is the custom here and I hope it will not be unseemly in me to say a few words of my own about that virtuous man, who, though he is dead, still lives in his good works and teaches by his bright example. I had not the honor of his intimacy, but I have known him personally for more than thirty years, and under circumstances which attracted and enforced my observation. I did not consider him a man of brilliant genius, but a man of great talents, with a mind able to comprehend the greatest subject, and not afraid to encounter the minutest analysis. He was eminently practical, always in pursuit of truth, and always able to control and utilize any idea that he had once fully conceived. In short, he was a sincere, earnest, diligent man. And this, I suppose, is the secret of his success, the reason why his course through life was always onward and upward. I am informed by those who have had good opportunity to know him in all the relations of life—as a lawyer, a judge, an executive officer, a neighbor, a friend, a professing Christian—that, in their belief, all his duties, in every relation, were fully performed. As a man, he lived a blameless life, and not blameless only, but sweet and attractive, by the habitual exercise of all those benevolent virtues which characterized and adorned his mild and gentle nature. And while he pursued with diligence every line of study which might serve to make him at once a blessing and an ornament to society, he looked steadily beyond this transient scene, knowing that this world is but a school of preparation for that eternity upon which his soul rested with undoubting faith. I think the outlines of his character may be sketched in a very few words. He was a ripe scholar; an able lawyer, as you, his brethren must know; a bland and amiable gentleman; a strict moralist; a virtuous man; and, above all, a modest and unobtrusive Christian philosopher. It is not for us to judge of his final condition; but, as feeling and thinking men, when we view the spotless morality of his life, and the quiet meekness of his piety, we have good reason to hope that even now he is enjoying the rich reward of a well-spent life, in blissful communion with the spirits of the just made perfect. This much, at least, we do know, that his life has been a blessing to many individuals and a great benefit to his country, and that, dying in honored old age, he has left behind him the sweet savor of a good name."

Mr. Chief Justice Taney replied: "The members of the court unite with the bar in sincere sorrow for the death of the late Mr. Justice McLean. He held a seat on this bench for more than thirty years, and until the last two years of his life, when his health began to fail, was never absent from his duties here for a single day. His best eulogy will be found in the reports of the decisions of this court during that long period of judicial life, and these reports will show the prominent part he took in the many great and important questions which from time to time have come before the court, and the earnestness and ability with which he investigated and discussed them. They are the recorded evidence of a mind, firm, frank and vigorous, and full of the subject before him at the time. Before he occupied a seat on this bench, he filled the office of postmaster general of the United States, and in that post displayed an administrative talent hardly ever surpassed, with a firmness of character, and uprightness of purpose never questioned. Words of eulogy are hardly needed in memory of one so widely known and respected, eminent in political as well as judicial life. We deplore his loss, and join the members of the bar in paying due honor to his memory, and direct the motion of the attorney general, and the resolutions of the bar in relation to our deceased brother, to be placed on record, with this response from the court; and, as a mark of respect, we will adjourn to-day without transacting any of the ordinary business of the court."

The following is reprinted from 1 Bond, 607:

Proceedings of the United States circuit court within the southern district of Ohio, and of the bar of Hamilton county, Ohio, on the announcement of the death of Hon. John McLean, associate justice of the supreme court of the United States: "Thursday, April 4, 1861. It having been announced, that Mr. Justice McLean, the presiding judge of this court, departed this life, this morning, at his residence near Cincinnati, it is therefore ordered that business be suspended, and the court do stand adjourned until 9½ o'clock tomorrow morning.

"Thursday, April 11, 1861. Stanley Matthews, Esquire, presented the following proceedings, and moved the court that they be entered on its journal:

"At a meeting of the members of the Hamilton county bar, held in the United States circuit and district court room in Cincinnati, on Friday, April 5, 1861, on the occasion of the death of Judge McLean, Judge H. H. Leavitt was called to the chair, and William M. Dickson chosen secretary. Whereupon, on motion, Messrs. J. L. Minor, Judge Bellamy Storer, M. H. Tilden, Henry Stanberry, William Johnson, D. K. Este, C. D. Coffin, and George E. Fugh were appointed a committee on resolutions, who, after retiring, came in and reported the following, which were unanimously adopted:

"It has pleased God to terminate the mortal life of our friend and neighbor, John McLean, late an associate justice of the supreme court of the United States. He died at his late residence in Clifton, near this city, yesterday morning, full of years and of honors—a man without reproach—a distinguished statesman—a patriot, untouched by degeneracy—a learned, laborious, patient, and upright judge—a benevolent and public spirited citizen—in all the relations of husband, father, friend, and neighbor, affectionate and faithful, a model Christian gentleman. We sincerely mourn his loss, and deeply sympathize with the family and relatives in this affliction, and as a mark of respect for his virtues, his talents, his attainments, his exemplary life and character, we will attend his funeral in a body.

“Resolved, that a copy of these proceedings be presented by the district attorney of the United States for this district to the circuit and district courts for entry on their minutes. That copies be presented by the chairman of this committee to the several courts of this county and city for entry on their minutes. That the chairman of this meeting communicate a copy to the family of the deceased. That the secretary furnish copies to the several newspapers of the city for publication.”

“Thereupon Judge Leavitt made the following remarks: “I have great pleasure in making known my cordial concurrence with the bar of this city in the well-deserved tribute of respect to the memory of Judge McLean embodied in the proceedings now presented. The terms of eulogy in which they have expressed their estimate of his high moral qualities and distinguished public services as a statesman and a judge are not exaggerated; and it is fitting that his ‘great example and his name’ should be honored by those who survive him. His life is deplored as a national loss; all feel that a great and good man is dead. To the members of the bar of this court, in which for more than thirty years he has presided with so much ability, and so greatly to the acceptance of the public, his loss must be felt with peculiar sensibility. It has made a breach which cannot easily be repaired. I sympathize deeply in the feelings of the bar, on the occasion of this afflictive dispensation of Providence. It is now nearly twenty-seven years since I became associated with Judge McLean on the bench of this court. His death has sundered a relation not only long continued, but which was throughout of the most friendly character. As his friend and surviving member of this court, it is not strange that my heart should be sorely pressed with a sense of bereavement and desolateness; and I am glad of the opportunity of placing upon the records of this court a testimonial of my exalted estimate of his vigorous intellect, his well-balanced judgment, his great judicial learning and acquirements, and the uniform courtesy and integrity which marked his long career as a judge.”

“The court orders the proceedings to be entered on its journal.”

McNAIRY, JOHN.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1335.]

The following note is reprinted from 1 McLean, 560:

At the time of his resignation, Judge McNairy had been longer on the bench than any other judge in this country, or in England. By General Washington he was appointed a territorial judge, of the south-western territory; and on the organization of the state of Tennessee, he received the appointment of district judge of the United States, for that state. Increasing infirmities induced him to resign a short time before his decease. He was a man of sound understanding, and of sterling honesty. In the full vigor of his intellect, he was a good lawyer, and a safe judge. In all his views, and especially on legal subjects, there was a strong vein of common sense, which preserved him from error and led him to a correct conclusion. At no time of his life was he ambitious to be considered a technical lawyer; his aim was to understand and administer the spirit of the law, rather than its letter. Judge McNairy lived universally respected, and died universally regretted. He was an elevated and just magistrate, and a good citizen. He lived long, but as it regards his friends and his country, he did not live in vain.

MARSHALL, JOHN.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1335.]

The following proceedings of the bench and bar are reprinted from 1 McLean, 555:

At July Term, 1835, the following proceedings took place in relation to the decease of Chief Justice Marshall: The United States circuit court, for the seventh circuit and district of Ohio, opened, Monday, July 13th—present, Judges McLean and Leavitt. Immediately upon the opening of the court, Mr. Hammond, the eldest member of the bar present, rose and announced the death of Chief Justice Marshall, in the following terms: “It has pleased Divine Providence to terminate the earthly career of John Marshall, late chief justice of the United States—a citizen without reproach—a patriot soldier of the Revolution—the friend, the companion, the biographer of Washington—the jurist, who, of all his compeers, has effected most to explain, to establish, and to vindicate a just interpretation of the constitution, its remedial bearings upon, and applications to, the individual rights and wrongs of the citizen. He departed this life at Philadelphia, on Monday afternoon, July 6th, in the 80th year of his age, surrounded by weeping relatives and mourning friends. He departed, as he had lived, an illustration to all around him of the Christian’s hope and the good man’s resignation. We must all feel the space made void by his departure. We must all deplore it—not for the departed, but for the country—for ourselves. Our consolation is, that he has left to us—to posterity—

“His great example and his name.”

Whereupon the court immediately adjourned.

Tuesday Morning, July 14. So soon as the court was opened, Mr. Scott rose and addressed it thus: “A tribute of respect is due to departed excellence, whether, whilst living, the excellent qualities of character were displayed in the unobtrusive exercise of those private virtues, which rendered him useful as a citizen and endeared him to his family and to his friends, or in the discharge of those high official responsibilities, which the constitution and laws of his country may have devolved upon him. The private and public virtues of the late Chief Justice Marshall, to whose memory we pay this last tribute of respect, cannot be too highly appreciated by us who survive him. As a jurist, he has never been surpassed, and but seldom, if ever, equalled. The labor, the care, the anxieties of a long life almost exclusively devoted to the service of his country, are ended. A great man has fallen: but he has left an imperishable monument of his fame. His decisions as a jurist belong to posterity, who will not fail to do him justice. The ultimate effects of these decisions, which evince such grasp of thought, on many of the great constitutional questions on which the politicians of his day were so much divided in opinion, remain to be tested. And although some may have entertained doubts whether their ultimate tendency might not be injurious, yet none, I presume, ever entertained doubts as to the purity of his intentions. He now rests from his labors, let us revere his memory, and imitate his virtues. The last tribute of respect must soon be paid to each of us; our life is as a vapour, which remaineth but a time, and then passeth away. I am constituted the organ of a bar meeting held yesterday, to present their proceedings to the court. I now present them, and move that they be entered on the journals.”

The proceedings of the bar meeting having been read by Mr. Scott, Judge McLean responded to the motion in the following terms: “The court feel great satisfaction in directing that the proceedings of the members of the bar, on this melancholy occasion, shall be placed upon their record. It is the highest respect which we can show, officially, to the memory of that exalted citizen, whose loss we all deplore. For more than six years, I have had the honor to be intimately associated with the deceased, in the discharge of public duties; and this has been more than sufficient, to give me the highest admiration and respect for his eminent qualities, professional, intellectual, and moral. This is not the place nor the occasion, to speak at large of those great talents, and of that elevation of character, which, in the station he occupied, secured to him, beyond that of any other individual, the public confidence. His monument is seen in the judicial history of his country; and it is as imperishable as are those great principles, which, in so distinguished a manner, he contributed to establish. He has fallen, and though he has fallen ripe in years and full of honors, yet his whole country will lament the loss—the profession will lament it—and most of all will the loss be felt and deplored by those who were associated with him on that bench, of which he was the distinguished ornament.”

The following is reprinted from 1 Brock. 9:

Memoir of John Marshall, by Joseph Hopkinson, read on the third day of March, 1837, to the “American Philosophical Society.”

[Mr. John W. Brockenbrough, the reporter, appended the following foot-note to this memoir in the first volume of his reports: “The following brief sketch of the life, character, and services of the late Chief Justice Marshall, from the pen of a ripe and accomplished scholar, is now offered as an appropriate introduction to these volumes. It was, perhaps, inseparable from the preparation of such a memoir, that it should be tinged, in some degree, with the political opinions of the author, and it was also fit that the task of executing it should have devolved on one, who was not only eminently qualified for it in other respects, but whose political opinions fully accorded with those entertained, with remarkable consistency, and enforced with singular power, by the late chief justice of the United States. To that portion of the following paper which discusses the grave and, as some suppose, the very debatable question of the nature and scope of the powers conferred on the supreme court by the constitution of the United States, the editor does not deem it proper, in this place, to express either approbation or dissent; but has chosen to present it, unmutated and unaltered, as it came from the hands of Judge Hopkinson.”]

“The delay which has taken place in the performance of the duty, with which the society has honoured me, has been occasioned by various considerations which it is unnecessary now to explain. I need not assure you, that none of them will be found in an indifference to the appointment, and much less to the illustrious subject of it. The interest, the attention, which that commands, will not be impaired by the delay. There is nothing transient in the character and services of Chief Justice Marshall; nothing to be lost or forgotten in the lapse of months or years; nothing that time and reflection will not confirm and consecrate. They are inseparably connected with the institutions of our country; with its character and destinies. You will recognize and feel them now, as fully and freshly as on the day of his death. While it is the pride of our society to enrol on its list of members, the most distinguished and honoured citizens of our great republic, it is a consequence of this gratification that we are called upon, from time to time, to record also their death, and to lament the loss of their labours and virtues, of their lessons and example. Illustrated as our roll is with the names of the great and good, of the learned and wise, there is none that can claim pre-eminence over John Marshall. This great man, truly and emphatically so, was born in Virginia, in the county of Fauquier, in the month of September, 1755. During his boyhood and youth, this county was frontier territory, with a scattered and rude population, and the means of obtaining even an ordinary education, exceedingly imperfect and uncertain. Notwithstanding this disadvantage, the talents of young Marshall developed themselves at a very early age. He exhibited, as we are informed by one of his dearest friends and most eloquent eulogists, a decided taste for English literature, and especially poetry and history. It is worthy of observation that a mind of such solid structure, of such capacities for profound and abstruse researches, of such gigantic powers, should first have attached itself to poetry. ‘He was enamoured,’ says the friend alluded to, ‘of the classical writers of the old English school of Milton and Shakspeare, Dryden and Pope.’ Even here his superiority appears. What a noble selection of masters? Here we had some assurance of the future man. He took his lessons of literature from deep and pure sources; his teachers were the princes and nobles of the art, who stand on pedestals of adamant with admiring ages rolling at their feet. How unlike the sickly, ephemeral, false, and impure models to which the young readers, (and some old ones,) of the present day devote themselves, corrupting their taste, debilitating their judgment, and touching their morals with dangerous principles and irregular passions! Some of these literati, know little more than the names of Milton and Shakspeare, Dryden and Pope, and are ignorant even of the names of some of the most illustrious poets of our language. This occasion will not suffice for tracing the progress of John Marshall from infancy to manhood. When he reached the age of twenty years, the struggle of his country against foreign oppression had assumed a serious and decided shape. ‘We must fight!’—said an intrepid patriot of the east. ‘We must fight,’ was the response of the brave and true spirits of the south. The animating call struck on the heart of Marshall, and electrified the whole man. The course of his education, the charms of literature, retirement, and study, were abandoned; and he betook himself to the field of mortal strife, where the victory was to be won, and his country saved, by strong arms and stout hearts. In the summer of 1775, he received a commission of lieutenant of a company of minute men, and was shortly after engaged in battle. He was in the severe and sanguinary conflicts of Brandywine, Germantown, and Monmouth. Does not this remind us of the best days of Greece and Rome, when their statesmen, their orators, poets and historians, however eminent, encountered the dangers and sufferings of the battle field on the call of their country? Yet we cannot but shrink and shudder to see such a life as that of John Marshall, placed in the balance against some hireling soldier, whose existence is of no value, and who is probably well paid for all the hazard to which he exposes it, by his shilling or six pence a day. But it was the cause, it was his country that demanded the sacrifice, by whatever hand he might fall. Thank heaven, he was reserved for higher and more essential services to that country. In the midst however of the stirring scenes of war, Mr. Marshall must have found some means and opportunities for study, for in 1780, he obtained his license to practice law. He then returned to the army, and continued in it to the termination of the contest. After this period his fellow-citizens seem to have understood the value of his character and talents, and to have taken possession of them. The people, until they become bewildered and maddened by the delusions and passions of party, are not blind to such gifts, nor to the worth of such men. Mr. Marshall, soon after the peace, was a member of the legislature of Virginia, and of the executive council of the state. In 1788, he was elected a representative of the city of Richmond, in the state legislature, and so continued until 1791. At this time he returned to his professional labours; but in 1795, he was again induced to take a seat in the legislative hall. He was offered by President Washington, the office of attorney general of the United States, which he declined; he withstood the solicitation of the same president to accept the appointment of minister to France, upon the recall of Mr. Monroe. In 1797, Mr. Marshall, yielding his private interests and decided inclination to the public service, accepted from President Adams, the place of one of the envoys to the court of France. The papers written on our behalf, and addressed to the French ministers, in the discussions of the grave and important subjects of the controversy between the two countries, have not been overlooked or forgotten by those who have taken an interest in the history of the United States, at that embarrassing and perilous period. These documents are enduring monuments of the talents, knowledge, patriotism, and prudence, of Mr. Marshall, to whom the preparation of them was confided. Clear and impregnable in his principles of national law, faithful and firm to the rights of his country, he vindicated her claims with a sagacity and discretion, which gave no advantage to the adversary in the manner more than in the matter, of the dispute. On his return from this mission, he resumed his professional duties. In 1799, he was elected to congress. At this moment, he was offered a seat on the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States, but did not accept it. The time which the society may allot to me on this occasion, and which I fear I shall extend beyond my right, will not admit even of a cursory exhibition of the independent and brilliant career of Mr. Marshall in the legislature of the Union. His speech on the case of Jonathan Robbins, will never be forgotten or surpassed. It is a perfect model of argumentative eloquence. No attempt was made to reply to it. It could be assailed at no point. It was not possible to bring contradiction or doubt upon it; there was an end of the question. In 1800, Mr. Marshall was appointed secretary of war, and very soon afterwards secretary of state, which place he held but for a short time.

"We have now arrived at the period of Mr. Marshall's life which was to enlarge the foundations of his reputation, and give it an imperishable solidity. On the 31st day of January, 1801, an auspicious day for our country, John Marshall was appointed, by President Adams, chief justice of the United States. If our constitution is dear to us, if we should cherish the form and principles of a government suitable for a free and intelligent people, we should bless the day when it became the right and duty of this great and pure man to develop, define, and establish, the true and fundamental powers and character of our incomparable government, incomparable only when understood and administered by the principles which, from time to time, as occasions required, the chief justice, aided and sustained by his learned associates, has applied to its provisions; thus becoming part of itself, and necessary to its healthful, durable, and consistent action. Of the value of his clear, discriminating, and vigorous intellect; of his immaculate and independent integrity; of his comprehensive, but regulated views; of his cool and firm judgment in the exercise of his high powers, as the interpreter of the constitution and the law, and the administrator of justice, by and according to them, and them only, every one will truly judge, who can justly estimate the importance of the department of the government of which he was the head. The judiciary is the protecting, conservative power, not only of the rights of every citizen, but of the Union. It keeps every member of it in its right place, to the use of its proper functions, and no more. It compels each orb, the great as well as the small, to move in its prescribed sphere, and brings the wanderer back. It restrains the ambition and power of the strong, and defends and secures the rights of the weak. Should New York, with her two or three millions of citizens, and Rhode Island, with her few thousands, appear as adversary suitors, before this august tribunal, the one is no longer great and strong, her power is not seen or felt, nor the other feeble and small. Their territory is not measured, their numbers are not counted; their rights only are known and considered. The constitution and the law decide the question between them; and both are equally bound to submit to the award. To this court, then, is committed the harmony of the Union; the rights of states and citizens; the perpetuity of our government. The errors of the executive seldom reach beyond some single, immediate object; they are transient, and may be remedied without any ruinous shock to the great interests of the community. The legislature may promptly recall an inadvertent or impolitic act; but the decrees of the judiciary are written on brass; they are the enduring laws of the land, as binding as the constitution itself. Rights become incorporated with, and founded on, them, which may not be shaken without disturbing and weakening every right. For this high trust, John Marshall, above all men, was constituted by every quality and acquirement necessary for its pure and perfect administration. Pardon me if, on this theme, I have enlarged too much. It is my solemn conviction, that it is a theme which should engage the deep and constant attention of every American. There is no safety for any right you enjoy, without an upright, learned, and independent judiciary; there is safety for every thing, and under all circumstances, while the judiciary is preserved, competent in knowledge, fearless in integrity, faithful to the constitution, steadfast in principles, and firm in public confidence. Having no connection with, or dependence on, the changes of parties and men, it is raised above the rough storms and fitful currents which agitate and befoul the lower atmosphere of politics and politicians. If it shall ever happen that changes on the bench are to change and unsettle fundamental principles of constitutional law; if new judges are to bring with them new doctrines, then the decrees of the court will be as vacillating as the votes of a popular assembly, and confidence and security will attend them no longer. The constitution will become a moving body of sand—a quicksand where no firm footing can be found—instead of a rock on which we may build and rest, without fear, for ages. How transcendent in power and dignity is this tribunal! It is the concentrated force of the whole Republic. There is nothing on earth like it. Its arms embrace the extremities of this vast empire; its voice is heard and obeyed in its remotest parts. Proud, powerful, and sovereign states submit to its decrees, and the assembled representatives of sixteen millions of freemen may stand rebuked before it. There is truly nothing on earth like it.

"The honoured gods
Keep Rome in safety, and the chairs of justice Supply with worthy men."

"The judicial services of Chief Justice Marshall are recorded where they must remain undefaced, while the government and its institutions, which they have illustrated and invigorated, shall continue to exist. May they be perpetual! The people will be secure and happy under them, if they will learn the difficult and rare lesson, to 'know their own happiness.' In his political creed, the chief justice was a disciple, or rather an eminent teacher, of the Washington and Hamilton school. In that faith he lived and died, having found, it is presumed, nothing that he thought better. While the lawyer will review the judicial life of John Marshall, with admiration of his learned sagacity and profound judgment; of his wonderful powers of illustration and analysis; and remember with affection his encouraging and amiable deportment to the most humble advocate; while the statesman will reverence his clear and expansive views, and his unerring comprehension of cardinal principles; we must contemplate him, also, as a philosopher, and a man, and look to his more private virtues and accomplishments. He was an illustrious example of the truth, that simplicity is of the essence of greatness. It is so in man, in the arts, in every thing. He showed us, that domestic virtues and habits, in their most simple and amiable forms, may accompany and adorn the most powerful intellects, and exalted genius. Who excelled him as a husband and a father, as a kind, generous, and considerate friend? Whose cheerfulness was more unaffected and exhilarating? For more than twenty years, I enjoyed the personal acquaintance, I may say, the friendly regard of the chief justice. I have seen him in public and in private, on the bench of justice, and in the more endearing courtesies of social intercourse. In such moments, he was as playful as a boy. He was not afraid that his dignity would suffer, by the indulgence of a natural gaiety of temper. He was a hearty laugher, and caught and enjoyed a joke, beyond any other man I have known. It was delightful to see that leviathan intellect, sporting with the playfulness of a child; indulging in the light and amiable charities of life; enjoying to his heart's core, its innocent amusements; taking an interest in its ordinary concerns, and mixing, without reserve, in the humours of the company, and the hour. This was a spectacle more rare, than the display of superior talents, and extraordinary attainments. This is to be truly a great man. I have seen him, listening eagerly to a pleasant story; catching with intense attention, every point and turn, and giving, from time to time, note of enjoyment in unrestrained bursts of hilarity. He made it no part of his dignity and self-respect, to wrap himself in a solemn reserve; to play the 'Sir Oracle;' to affect to be above the common feelings and excitements of his fellow-beings; to look with a cold and supercilious brow upon the occupations, interests, and pleasures of inferior men. I have seen his dark and penetrating eye, sparkle and flash with delight, at the recital of some anecdote of poignant and exciting humour. Lord Wellesley, in his account of the character and habits of William Pitt, says, that 'he seemed unconscious of his superiority;' that he 'plunged heedlessly into the mirth of the hour,' and was endowed with 'a gay heart and social spirit, beyond any man of his time.' But was not Chief Justice Marshall, a philosopher in the highest and best sense of the term? The character of his mind, was that of deep reflection, and close reasoning. He sought truth in great principles, and not in accidental circumstances, or the authority of names. Having found the principle, he brought it to the case before him, by a train of deductions, which it was impossible, to separate, terminating in the conclusion, with the most perfect conviction of its truth. He was, in jurisprudence, such a philosopher, as Sir Humphrey Davy was in chemistry. He never experimented at random, trusting to chance for a discovery. His object, and the means by which he sought, and expected to attain it, were philosophical, precise, and consecutive. He settled his principles, as the platform of his operations, and worked on them, step by step, until by, and through them, he reached the desired end. It was well observed to me, that there is philosophy in the judicial opinions of the chief justice, the philosophy of reasoning, of making clear and accurate deductions, from solid and established premises. This is, assuredly, a philosophy more useful and rare, than the impracticable theories, and wild visions, which are often called so.

"On the 6th day of July, 1835, in this city of Philadelphia, John Marshall died—with the same serenity in which he lived—

"Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him; and lies down to pleasant dreams.

At a meeting of the judge, the members of the bar, and the officers of the circuit court of the United States, for the eastern district of Virginia, held in the court room, in the city of Richmond, on the 23d November, 1835, the Honourable Philip Pendleton Barbour, was called to the chair, and Mr. Henry Gibson, clerk of the circuit court, was appointed secretary to the meeting.

The following preamble and resolutions were proposed by B. F. Leigh, Esq., and were unanimously adopted:

"John Marshall, late chief justice of the United States, having departed this life since the last term of the federal circuit court for this district, the bench, bar, and officers of the court, assembled at the present term, embrace the first opportunity to express their profound and heartfelt respect for the memory of the venerable judge, who presided in this court for thirty-five years,—with such remarkable diligence in office, that, until he was disabled by the disease which removed him from life, he was never known to be absent from the bench, during term time, even for a day,—with such indulgence to counsel and suitors, that every body's convenience was consulted, but his own,—with a dignity, sustained without effort, and, apparently, without care to sustain it, to which all men were solicitous to pay due respect,—with such profound sagacity, such quick penetration, such acuteness, clearness, strength, and comprehension of mind, that in his hands, the most complicated causes were plain, the weightiest and most difficult, easy and light,—with such striking impartiality and justice, and a judgment so sure, as to inspire universal confidence, so that few appeals were ever taken from his decisions, during his long administration of justice in this court, and those only in cases where he himself expressed doubt,—with such modesty, that he seemed wholly unconscious of his own gigantic powers,—with such equanimity, such benignity of temper, such amenity of manners, that not only none of the judges, who sat with him on the bench, but no member of the bar, no officer of the court, no juror, no witness, no suitor, in a single instance, ever found or imagined, in any thing said or done, or omitted by him, the slightest cause of offence. His private life was worthy of the exalted character he sustained in public station. The unaffected simplicity of his manners; the spotless purity of his morals; his social, gentle, cheerful disposition; his habitual self-denial, and boundless generosity towards others; the strength and constancy of his attachments; his kindness to his friends and neighbors; his exemplary conduct in the relations of son, brother, husband, father; his numerous charities; his benevolence towards all men, and his ever active beneficence; these amiable qualities shone so conspicuously in him, throughout his life, that highly as he was respected, he had the rare happiness to be yet more beloved. He was, indeed, a bright example of that true wisdom, which consists in the union of the greatest ability, and the greatest virtue.

"Resolved, that in addition to the reasons common to us, with the whole people of the United States, we have peculiar cause to regret the loss of this wise and just magistrate, and great and good man.

"Resolved, that for the purpose of rendering merited honour to his memory, and of perpetuating, as far as it is possible to perpetuate, this expression of our sentiments of love and veneration for the judge, and the man, the circuit court be requested to enter these proceedings on its records. And that the chairman and secretary of this meeting, be requested to communicate the same to his family."

NELSON, SAMUEL.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1387.]

The following proceedings upon his retirement are reprinted from 10 Blatchf.:

The bar of the United States courts for the second circuit will meet in the United States circuit court room, on Friday, January 17th, 1873, at 2 o'clock, P. M., to take action upon the retirement of Mr. Justice Nelson from the supreme court of the United States. Edwards Pierrepont, Geo. Ticknor Curtis, George Gifford, Murray Hoffman, Erastus C. Benedict, William M. Evarts, James W. Gerard, Theo. W. Dwight, Charles O'Connor, Edwin W. Stoughton, Joshua M. Van Cott.

At a meeting held in pursuance of the foregoing notice, and on motion of Joseph S. Bosworth, Charles O'Connor was elected president. On motion of Sidney Webster, the following gentlemen were chosen to be vice presidents: James W. Gerard, Murray Hoffman, Edgar S. Van Winkle, Joseph S. Bosworth, Welcome R. Beebe, Henry Nicoll, John McKeon, Erastus C. Benedict, John K. Porter, Henry E. Davies, Edward J. Phelps, John Ganson, George B. Hibbard, Lyman Tremain, Francis Kernan, Henry R. Selden, Samuel Hand, Richard D. Hubbard, Charles R. Ingersoll and Henry E. Stoughton. Clarence A. Seward named as secretary of the meeting, Sidney Webster.

The meeting having been thus organized, the president said:—

"Brethren of the bar: The great lawyer who for half a century has been practically the very life and light of our jurisprudence, has retired from active duty. His illustrations of practical justice remain for our enlightenment and will descend to posterity. In these—his gifts to man—the present and the future are participants alike; but in some things we are exclusively his beneficiaries. His magnificent demeanor on the bench was a model of all the judicial graces. In that high place his princely bearing and lion front inspired every honest suitor with confidence, while it paralyzed the most audacious guilt. These things we have witnessed and will ever remember; but neither tongue nor pen can convey to future times an adequate portraiture of them. These memories and the pleasure of contemplating him in the serenely tranquil retirement which closes his great career are our own. The Augustan age of our jurisprudence, when Wells and Emmet argued the causes which Kent and Spencer decided, is happily connected in history with all that is now recognized as best and purest by the period which Nelson adorned. Patriotism and professional pride can hope for no more than that the rising lawyers of to-day may sustain and transmit to worthy successors the great fame derived by their class from such high sources and through such a noble channel."

Edwin W. Stoughton then moved that a committee of five be appointed by the chair to prepare an address to be presented to Mr. Justice Nelson, which motion having been adopted, the following gentlemen were named by the president as such committee: Edwin W. Stoughton, Benjamin D. Silliman, Theodore W. Dwight, George Gifford, Cornelius Van Santvoord.

The committee, after consultation, presented the following address:

"To the Honorable Samuel Nelson: Sir:—Your retirement from the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States, after a judicial service of more than forty-nine years, is an event which the members of the bar of the federal courts cannot allow to pass into history without connecting therewith the expression of their profound sense of the solid benefits conferred by your labors and example upon the bar and people of this country. Appointed at an early age to the bench of the circuit court of the state of New York, you commenced your judicial career under a system which pledged to you a long and independent tenure; in return for which, you devoted to the discharge of your responsible duties, faculties and acquisitions which singularly fitted you to administer justice among men. You brought to this work great energy, a noble ambition, an earnest love of justice, absolute impartiality, an elevated conception of all the duties of a magistrate, united with a judgment of unsurpassed soundness. Acknowledging responsibility only to your conscience, to the law, and to your God, you early won the confidence of a bar, among whose members were numbered some of the greatest lawyers of the last generation. From the circuit court of the state you were advanced to the supreme court, and there you proved yourself worthy to sit in the place of the great masters of jurisprudence who had preceded you, and whose reputations will endure forever. Again you were advanced, and the bar, with pride, saw you robed as chief justice of the state. As such you presided for many years, and had your judicial career terminated with the resignation of that office, the records of jurisprudence would have transmitted your name to posterity as that of a great and just judge. Your labors were not thus to end. You had administered justice for the period of twenty-two years. During that time you had mourned the departure of many members of that illustrious bar, which had greeted your entrance into judicial life. Around you had grown up a younger bar, to whom you were an object of admiration and reverence. You had served the state of your nativity well, and well had you maintained the state and even national fame of the court over which you presided. Your opinions there delivered will long stand as examples of the right application of established legal principles, exact learning and sound common sense to the cases presented for judgment. More than twenty-seven years ago, in the full maturity of your powers, you were appointed an associate justice of the supreme court of the United States. There, and at the circuit, you encountered new and untried questions. The law of nations, of admiralty, of prize, of revenue, and of patents, you mastered, and, as those who now address you can bear testimony, administered with unsurpassed ability. With critical accuracy you studied and applied a vast amount of legislation and a multitude of rules, comprised within the special branches of jurisprudence you were compelled to administer. The benefits you conferred did not consist solely in bringing, as you did, to the investigation and decision of causes, a deep insight—a judgment matured by long and varied experience and solid learning—the fruit of a life of study and reflection. Your kind and generous treatment of young lawyers ever encouraged them to renewed exertion; and, in struggling to deserve your approval, they were inspired by a worthy ambition, for they knew that your standard of professional excellence was high, and that to win your approval was an earnest of future distinction. Beyond all this, you have afforded to the bench of this country an example by which the wisest and best of its members have profited, and, by your long and spotless life as a magistrate, you have added dignity and lustre to the history of our jurisprudence; for, whilst the degradation and corruption of the judges of a nation inflict upon it an offensive, a revolting blot, their independence, their purity and their learning have ever written the proudest annals of national life.

"There are among those who now address you, many who have so long been accustomed to your presence upon the bench, that they will never be quite reconciled to your absence. They will sometimes earnestly wish that you could have remained to steady them in the performance of their duties, until the close of their professional career. Nevertheless, all who now address you will never cease to be thankful, that upon your retirement to your family and home, it can be said of you as was said of Lord Mansfield: 'It has pleased God to allow to the evening of an useful and illustrious life, the purest enjoyments which nature has ever allotted to it, the unclouded reflections of a superior and unfading mind over its varied events, and the happy consciousness that it hath been faithfully and eminently devoted to the highest duties of human society.' Earnestly hoping that these blessings may be enjoyed by you for many years, the members of the bar who unite in this tribute to your worth, remain forever your friends."

Edwards Pierrepont, in moving the acceptance of this report, addressed the chair as follows:

"Mr. Chairman: When eminent men have died, it has been the custom among civilized nations to take some public notice of the event. But the number of those who have voluntarily retired from a great office are so few, that it can hardly be said, that any custom touching such retirement has been established; the rarity of this occasion makes it the more noted, and for every reason it was most fit that you, Mr. Chairman, should have been selected to preside at this unusual meeting of the bar. When a man in his early prime resigns a high office to enter some broader field of ambition, or to seek new gratifications in the pursuit of wealth, he neither deserves nor receives any especial marks of approbation from his fellow-men. But when one has spent a long life in the public service, and has so borne himself in his great office as to command the respect of every honest citizen, and at the call of duty lets go his hold on power, while all his faculties remain, he is a man so rare as to attract more than a passing notice; and we have met to say something of this grand old man who was eighty years old the 8th of November last, and who, by continuing three months longer, would have had an uninterrupted career of judicial life full fifty years. We search in vain for a career like this! How nobler is it, than to have clung feebly to his place until death pulled him reluctant from his seat. How like the man, how in harmony with his high sense of duty, was his retirement from an office in which he, sooner than others, felt that the burden of his years might possibly diminish his usefulness. No pride, no love of power; no vanity stood for a moment in his way; a lofty sense of duty governed him in the end as at the beginning, and as all through his life. It was well known, if Judge Nelson retained his office until April next, that the half century of his judicial life would then be complete, and many supposed that the natural desire to fill up the fifty years would prolong his stay upon the bench; but those well acquainted with Judge Nelson knew that the high tone of his character would not allow him to retain the office one day after he became satisfied that he could not fully discharge its duties. Lord Mansfield, the chief justice of the king's bench, resigned at the age of eighty-three. He had been upon the bench thirty-two years. Between Judge Nelson and the lord chief justice there were some striking points of resemblance. So noted was Lord Mansfield for preferring substantial justice to musty precedent, and so firmly did he believe in the flexibility of the common law, and that its rigid rules should bend to new exigencies in the advancement of commerce, of science, of civilization and humanity, that it was a common thing for the old lawyers to sneer at what they called 'Lord Mansfield's Equity Judgments;' and Junius, in a letter addressed to the lord chief justice, November 14th, 1770, says: 'Even in matters of private property, we see the same bias and inclination to depart from the decisions of your predecessors, which you certainly ought to receive as evidence of the common law. Instead of those certain positive rules by which the judgment of a court of law should invariably be determined, you have fondly introduced your own unsettled notions of equity and substantial justice. Decisions given upon such principles do not alarm the public as much as they ought.' The public were not alarmed; the public saw that Lord Mansfield was right, and that 'equity and substantial justice' was what good men desired, and not inequity and injustice, in deference to worn-out precedents unsuited to the advancing times. In earlier years we heard the same criticisms from old lawyers about the rulings of Judge Nelson, and almost in the same language; but the names of those who censured Lord Mansfield and Judge Nelson for their adherence to 'equity and substantial justice' are already forgotten, while both of these great jurists will be held in reverence so long as the common law continues to be administered.

"In the construction of statutes of the United States, subtle and unsubstantial technicalities, interposed to defeat justice, had small chance of success where Judge Nelson was presiding. At the trial of the great frauds of Kohnstamm, I was employed by the government to conduct the prosecution; several of the eminent lawyers here present were engaged for the defence, and one, now no more—the lamented and much beloved James T. Brady—whose great legal abilities would have made him distinguished without the aid of his more brilliant and unparalleled rhetorical powers. Mr. Brady, with his usual eloquence and skill, summed up the case for the accused; but the jury found the defendant guilty; and upon remarking to Mr. Brady that the jury were prompt, and that I feared a disagreement, 'I had hoped it,' said Mr. Brady, 'until the charge, but what could I do against that old lion there?' turning towards the judge, as he sat kingly upon the bench, and looking like a veritable old lion, as he was.

"Nature did much to make Judge Nelson what he has been. Nature gave him a commanding presence, a strong constitution, and even balance of the passions and the intellectual faculties, a genial soul and great vital forces, a natural love of right and substantial justice, a resolute will and an honest heart; a mind, body, and a moral tone, healthy, manly and robust. Culture did greatly aid him; but his natural endowments were vast. He did not deserve much credit for being a great, just man; he could not help it very well. It was natural and easy; and his life flowed on as the strong current of a river. It would be interesting and instructive to have his brother judges of the supreme court give their estimates of Judge Nelson's characteristics and judicial abilities. I have frequently heard several of them speak of their eminent associate, and quite recently the chief justice has expressed unmeasured admiration of the easy facility, wisdom, ability, and remarkable character of him whose retirement from the bench the chief justice considers an irreparable loss to himself personally, and to the public service generally.

"The influence of Judge Nelson upon the New York bar has been very great. The tone and manners of the bar will always depend upon the tone and manners of the bench. Good temper, courteous manners, and dignity of deportment are very important, if not essential, in the administration of justice. The bar and the bench will ever go hand in hand and quite abreast in every respect, and the community are quick to discover the fact; and great merchants and men of business will not entrust their important interests to a bench and a bar composed of inferior men; and so sure as you degrade the bench, you degrade the bar; and, with equal certainty, you thus drive the important business from the lawyers and the courts, and other means of adjusting differences of magnitude will be found.

"Judge Nelson took no active part in politics; but no man was a more close or more interested observer of public affairs. In the distracted times of 1860, when the Democratic party looked around for a candidate who could unite the north and south, and command the confidence of the entire country, Judge Nelson seemed to be the only man; the sole difficulty in the way was the fact that he was a member of the supreme court; and the sentiment of the people seemed then, as now, to be, that, when a man enters that temple of justice, and puts on the robes of office, he shall never make the sacred seat a stepping stone from which to ascend to any political place.

"When the governments of Great Britain and of the United States undertook a negotiation which resulted in the treaty of Washington, our sagacious secretary of state, with that good judgment for which he is distinguished, selected (by the approval of the president) Judge Nelson as one of the high commissioners; and the crowning act of a great career in the public service was the prominent part he took in concluding that treaty, by which enduring peace between these two great nations, speaking the same language, governed by similar laws, and worshipping the same God through the same religious forms, was secured. The Lord Chief Justice Mansfield lived five years after resignation of his office. May our equally great and equally respected Judge live many times those years, if he so wishes, and God wills; 'and when old Time shall lead him to his end, Goodness and he fill up one monument.'

On the conclusion of the remarks of Mr. Pierrepont, the meeting was addressed by Clarence A. Seward, who said:

"Mr. President: It is with unfeigned satisfaction that I concur in the adoption of the proposed address. It is meet and right that the evening of a well-spent life should be brightened, ere its close, by the commendation, 'Well done, good and faithful servant.' The utterances of approval are more timely now than if postponed until sorrow tempered them. Better is it to say to the living, 'Thou art worthy of honor,' than to reserve the recognition for eulogy and mausoleum.

"For thirty years have respect and friendship, formed in school-boy days at Cooperstown, grown stronger, and with them both is mingled an affection which, to-day, finds cause for regret that professional intercourse must henceforth cease. For many repeated words, kindly suggestive of patience, hope, and promise, I am to-day the debtor of him in whose honor we are gathered here. Therefore it is that I appreciate the privilege of acknowledging my obligations, and of uniting with those who are here assembled to testify to him the high regard in which he has been held by those among whom his lifetime has been spent.

"No one feels more grateful than I do, that we are not assembled here as a brotherhood in mourning, but to testify our affectionate regard for one who still lives, as is so felicitously stated in the address, "to enjoy the happy consciousness that his life has been faithfully and eminently devoted to the highest duties of human society."

"It is not necessary that one should have passed away to insure an example worthy of emulation. There are three characteristics of Mr Justice Nelson, which conspicuously marked his judicial career, and which may be mentioned in his lifetime, without trenching upon propriety, as worthy of observance. They are his calmness, courtesy and dignity. His calmness was imperturbable, and never deserted him. Procrastination and ignorance could not disturb it. Ill temper could not ruffle it. It held himself in check, and restrained the ebullitions of others. It permeated the atmosphere of the forum, and insured confidence and decorum. His courtesy was natural, and therefore always manifest. It insured a patient hearing, and its silent influence, teaching by example, secured the courtesy of all. If it failed in so doing, a kindly word from him restored the broken harmony. His dignity was his own, not borrowed. It was nature's outward clothing of the gentleman within. It repelled familiarity, as it forbade insult, and it imparted itself alike to counsel, witnesses and jurors. It 'grew with his illustrious reputation, and became a sort of pledge to the public for security.'

"These three qualities are said to have been the attributes of Lord Mansfield, but his biographer assures us, 'that he had a serious defect, a want of heart.' No biographer of Samuel Nelson will ever make that charge against him. Contemporaries and tradition will alike refute it. That he has a large heart, filled with human kindness, those who knew him best can best attest. It acted like a magnet in the court room, and drew from every one respect, which, longer continued, ripened into affectionate regard. It insured for the younger members of the bar a manifestation of attention, precisely equal to that which was bestowed upon older and more able advocates. It sympathized with nervous inexperience, and was itself too tender to wound by biting sarcasm or harsher jest. It could be just to one not liked; more than that—it could be just to a friend, and in so doing rise superior to apprehensions of possible hostile comment. Of his logical understanding, quick perception, judicial abilities and juridical knowledge, there is no occasion now to speak. They are evidenced for ourselves and for posterity in the 'Reports,' and need no encomium now. I never heard but one criticism upon his conduct as a judge, and that was the old one made of a celebrated English judge, that 'he did not dispatch matters quick enough.' This complaint is to be answered now, as it was answered when made two hundred years ago: 'But the great care he used to put suits to a final end, as it made him slower in deciding them, so it had the good effect that causes tried before him were seldom, if ever, tried again.' When they were decided, whether verbally or in writing, the decision was couched in a few apt and expressive words, for he seemed to believe in the maxim of Lord Bacon, that 'a much-speaking judge is not a well-tuned cymbal.' Our regret here to-day is, that he will no longer preside among us; that he has asked for his 'writ of ease,' and to be relieved from the duties of his office, and almost in the language of one of the chief justices of England, addressed to Charles II., because 'he could not, in good conscience, continue in it, since he was no longer able to discharge the duty belonging to it.' In his retirement, so honorably sought, he carries with him the respect, the veneration, and the affection of that bar which knew him best.

"Mr. President, when Sir Matthew Hale died, his friend Baxter purchased a Bible, in which he placed a print of the deceased judge, and underneath it he wrote these words: 'Sir Matthew Hale: That pillar and basis of justice, who would not have done an unjust thing for any worldly prize or motive, entered on, used and voluntarily surrendered his place of judicature with the most universal love, and honor, and praise that ever did English subject in this age, or any that just history does record.' What was true of England's most venerated chief justice is equally true now of New York's most venerated judge. Professional ties are broken here to-day, never to be reunited. Those of friendship still remain, and across them, as across the cable, we send our New Year's greeting to our retired chief in his country home, with our benedictions for his instruction and example. We can see the frosts of eighty years gathering upon his honored brow. It is our gratification, as it is his, to know that their whiteness and purity are rivalled by his judicial robes, worn for half a century, without spot or blemish."

In seconding the motion for acceptance, William M. Evarts spoke as follows: "It is our expectation, Mr. Chairman, that appropriate committees will be appointed to present this address to Judge Nelson, in the name of his brethren at the bar, to the United States circuit court of this district, and to the supreme court at Washington, and, in connection with the address and with these dispositions of it, appropriate to our feelings and our duty, I may be permitted to say a few words. When you notice that, in the year 1821, Judge Nelson was a member of the constitutional convention of this state, and that in the year 1871 he was a member of the great diplomatic body which disposed of all differences between Great Britain and his own country, you have included, as between the points of the compasses, a great span, I will not say in the life of a man, but in the life of this nation. And, in naming these two great public trusts that he has discharged, you have exhausted the list of all his public duties, all his public services, and all his public honors that do not belong exclusively to the profession of the law and the distinctions of the judiciary. Now, we must consider how large a combination of what constitutes the fame of very many celebrated men is united in the fame and the services of Mr. Justice Nelson. As the address has noticed, while exhausting the honors and filling out the services of the highest judicial stations of the state, he justly earned, by the manner in which he discharged these great duties, a place by the side of the most eminent lawyers and judges whom the state has produced. From the moment that he was transferred to the federal judiciary, until his retirement, the general judgment, not only of this bar and of this community, but of the bar of the United States, and the sense of the country at large, confirm his position as on a level with that of the most celebrated judges of the nation. Again, if we compare him with those who have gained great fame, among ourselves or in the mother country, in the different departments of the law—as common-law judges, as equity judges, as admiralty judges—who is there but must concede that in the number of his causes, in the magnitude of his judgments, in the wide comprehension of the principles which he applied in each of these different departments of the law, he stands now, in his old age, to be compared with such masters in those separate departments as Sir William Scott, Lord Eldon, Lord Mansfield, Dr. Lushington, Kent, Spencer, Tilghman and Shaw. We find also, in this extraordinary life, no defect apparent, and nothing wanting. We mark a collective force and strength of varied and prolonged service and of sustained credit in his career, which are not to be conceded to any single life of judicial distinction, either in England or with us. He had, by the lofty discharge of the great trusts confided to him, in the language of Lord Bolingbroke, 'built up about him that opinion of mankind, which, fame after death, is superior strength and power in life.' Whenever he moves, in whatever attitude he is regarded, these traits of dignity and force of character must always be accorded to him. My own personal observation, Mr. Chairman, covers the whole period of Judge Nelson's services in the judiciary of the nation, and carries me back through a few years of his latest service as chief justice of this state. He signed the warrant for my practice as an attorney. My first knowledge of him, probably, was at the term of the court at which I received it, and subsequently during the three or four years while he remained on that bench, I had the good fortune to make his personal acquaintance, and the honor to make arguments before him in several suits. I argued, I think, before him one of the very first causes of much importance after he took his seat here, in the circuit court of the United States, being a re-argument of a cause which I had argued before Judge Thompson, and his death had left undecided. From that time to this, in New York, in Vermont, and at Washington, socially and professionally, I have enjoyed his kind friendship, and he has ever been present to my personal and professional admiration. Mr. Chairman, Archbishop Whately, in his notes to Lord Bacon's Essays—which, I believe, scholars and moralists regard as a not unworthy commentary on so celebrated a text—has drawn a contrast between the relations to the community of a great lawyer and of a great judge, that is more pointed than it is flattering to those of us who adhere to the bar—more pointed, perhaps, than is just. He says, in substance, for I quote only from distant memory, that when a pre-eminently great advocate dies, or is withdrawn from the service of the law, it by no means follows that the public or the administration of justice thereby suffers a loss. For, as he suggests, the great interests of society, demanding, and the whole judicial establishment existing for, the perfection of the administration of justice among men, where an advocate has so far outgrown his fellows as greatly to overmaster them by his eloquence, by his learning, by his will, by his fame, and so, suitors find at their service no equal weight to throw into the scales of justice against him, perhaps the community, instead of losing, gains something by the subtraction of this disturbing force. But, this critic adds, with regard to a great and eminent judge, there arises no such question. His talents, his powers, his authority, his name, his fame, are wholly committed to the general interests of the whole community, and when he is withdrawn from the scene of his labors, and from their beneficent distribution and activity, it is, for the moment, as if the sun were taken from the heavens. Do we not all agree that, if this be true of any judge, it is true of Judge Nelson? Now, Mr. Chairman, may we not all be permitted to feel, at this point in this remarkable life, and before the end, death, has set its coronation to its illustrious work, that we may assign to Judge Nelson a place by the side of Eldon and Mansfield, of Kent and Spencer, of Shaw, of Marshall, and Taney, among those who share the lustre of the Homeric eulogy of men 'renowned for justice, and for length of days.' Indeed, sir, in face of the classic caution against premature judgment, we still fear no imputation of rashness in pronouncing this life fortunate, although it has not reached its close."

The address presented by the committee having been adopted, it was then resolved, on motion of Edwards Pierrepont, that it be signed by the officers of this meeting, and presented to Mr. Justice Nelson. The following committee on presentation was appointed by the president: Edwards Pierrepont, Edwin W. Stoughton, Clarence A. Seward, Edward H. Owen, Charles M. Keller, William M. Evarts, Sidney Webster, Thomas C. T. Buckley, Joshua M. Van Cott, John E. Ward, Samuel L. M. Barlow, Aaron J. Vanderpoel, James Thomson, Augustus F. Smith, John Sherwood. It was then moved by Edwin W. Stoughton, that a committee be appointed by the president to present the address and the proceedings of this meeting to the United States circuit court for the southern district of New York. An amendment thereto was offered by Clarence A. Seward, that the president of this meeting be chairman of this committee, which having been put to vote by Mr. Seward, and accepted by the meeting, and the original motion having been adopted, the president, in pursuance thereof, added the following gentlemen as members thereof: James W. Gerard, John McKeon, Daniel D. Lord, Benjamin D. Silliman, Joseph H. Choate, Stephen P. Nash, James C. Carter, Charles Donohue, George Bliss, Jr., Charles M. Da Costa. A motion of William

M. Evarts was then adopted, that a committee be appointed by the president, to present the address and the proceedings of this meeting to the supreme court of the United States at Washington; and the following gentlemen were appointed to form such committee: William M. Evarts, Edwards Pierrepont, Edwin W. Stoughton, George Ticknor Curtis, Samuel J. Tilden, George Gifford, Charles M. Keller, Charles F. Blake, Sidney Webster. John K. Porter moved that a committee be selected by the president, of which Edwin W. Stoughton be chairman, to present the address and proceedings of this meeting to the court of appeals of the state of New York, at Albany, which having been carried, a subsequent motion was made by Mr. Porter and adopted, that the chair be authorized to name the members of this committee after the adjournment of this meeting. The following gentlemen were subsequently selected by the president: Edwin W. Stoughton, John K. Porter, Francis Kernan, Lyman Tremain, Samuel Hand. On motion of George Gifford, the meeting adjourned. Charles O'Connor, President. Sidney Webster, Secretary.

Presentation of the address: In fulfillment of the agreeable duty imposed upon the committee appointed to present the foregoing address, Mr. Stoughton, Mr. Seward, Mr. Owen, Mr. Keller, Mr. Webster, Mr. Buckley, Mr. Vanderpoel, and Mr. Thomson, waited upon Mr. Justice Nelson at his residence in Cooperstown, on Wednesday, the 12th day of February, 1873. The committee invited the circuit and district judges of the federal courts for the second circuit to accompany them as their guests. Judge Woodruff (the circuit judge) and Judges Benedict and Blatchford (district judges) accepted the invitation. Judges Shipman, Hall, and Smalley were unable to be present. Mr. Justice Nelson informed the committee that he would be pleased to receive them and the judges in his house at two o'clock. The attendance of Mr. Pierrepont, the chairman of the committee, having been prevented by illness, Mr. Stoughton was chosen in his place, and introduced the committee, and the purpose of its presence, by the following remarks:

"Honored Sir: We appear before you to-day as a committee of the bar of the second circuit, appointed at a large meeting of the members thereof, lately held in the city of New York, for the purpose of taking action upon your retirement from the bench of the supreme court of the United States, after an uninterrupted judicial service of nearly fifty years. That meeting was presided over by the leader of the bar, Mr. Charles O'Connor, and the members of the bar composing it unanimously adopted an address, which with their entire proceedings, as there recorded, they have instructed the committee to present to you. We are here to discharge that agreeable duty. We are here upon a mission of deep interest to the bar we represent, and, as we believe, to the bench and to the country,—to the bar, because it owes to you reverence and honor for your long, unwearied service in encouraging and instructing them; to the bench, because it is your debtor for the noble judicial example you have recorded for its guidance; to the country, because you deserve its gratitude for the devotion of your life to its service, in the performance of duties the most arduous and the most useful which man can perform for his fellow-man. That distinguished members of the bench share these sentiments with us, is illustrated by the appearance before you upon this occasion, of Judges Woodruff, Blatchford, and Benedict, whose reputations have already become national, and who, laying aside other pressing engagements and duties, have come to you from afar, at this inclement season of the year, to manifest by their presence the interest which they feel in this most unusual ceremony. The other federal judges of the circuit in which you so long administered justice would have also been here, had not imperative engagements elsewhere prevented, as they have signified by letters which this committee will hand you. The committee regret that the sudden illness of their chairman, Judge Pierrepont, has prevented his attendance here. In consequence of this, he who addresses you has been appointed in his place; and now, in discharge of the duty imposed upon the committee, we read to you the address of the bar, which we are instructed to present."

Mr. Stoughton here read the address, and in delivering it to Judge Nelson, with a copy of the proceedings of the meeting, added: "In delivering this to you, as we now do, we tender to you our most heartfelt respect and reverence."

Judge Woodruff then addressed Mr. Justice Nelson as follows: "The members of the bench of the circuit over which, honored sir, you have so long presided, desire to express their cordial concurrence in the sentiments of the address tendered to you by the bar of that circuit. So truthfully and so well those sentiments are expressed in that address, that we should weaken its force and gracefulness, and diminish the pleasure of this occasion, if we were to attempt a reiteration, on our own behalf, of what has been there stated. As members of the bench, we may, however, add, that your long experience and the learning and wisdom you have brought to the discharge of the duties of your high position have lessened our labors, enlightened our understandings, eased the burden of our responsibilities, and greatly furnished us for the performance of the duties we have yet to discharge; which we have to discharge, I regret to say, without the present aid, counsel and advice we should receive from you had you deemed it wise to continue in the position from which you have now retired. Your learning has instructed us; your example has stimulated and encouraged us to a higher estimate of judicial worth, and has awakened a nobler ambition to do what belongs to our several duties so as to gain a kindred, though it be humbler, appreciation when our work shall be finished. By that example our pathway is made luminous, and the grace and dignity which adorn the judicial office is constantly presented to us. A judicial life of fifty years marked, all along its array of days and months and years, by learning, integrity and a pure conscience, and by the honor, respect and confidence of your fellow-men. Our sincerest wish can offer to you no higher or warmer expression of our admiration and regard than the earnest prayer that we may be able, in our stations, to deserve some reasonable proportion of the esteem now so justly and so cordially felt for you. I have, further, only to say: may the days be yet many in which you shall go in and out before us in reverence and in honor. May your last days be your best days; and may they be crowned with that reward which is the true aspiration and the blessed hope of a Christian life."

Mr. Justice Nelson made the following reply:

"Gentlemen of the committee: I cannot but feel extremely honored by this address of my brethren of the bar, on the occasion of my retirement from the bench, not more from the friendly and complimentary opinions therein expressed than on account of the unusual and extraordinary mark of respect and affection with which it has been presented; and I am the more deeply impressed with this manifestation from the consideration that the gentlemen of the bar who have originated and promoted this honor, some of whom are before me, have been themselves not only eye-witnesses of the judicial administration which they so favorably commend, but in which many of them largely participated in their professional capacity. I shall ever recur to the sessions of the United States circuit court held in the city of New York, extending over a period of more than a quarter of a century, with pride and pleasure. The calendar was large, and many of the causes important, involving great labor and responsibility. As an evidence of the magnitude of the business for many years, the court was held three months in the spring and three in the autumn of the year, and still left an unfinished calendar. But the gentlemen of the bar concerned in the trials were intelligent, faithful to their clients and to the court, whose learning and diligence in the preparation greatly relieved the judge of his labors, and whose professional deportment and respect banished from the courtroom every disturbing element, leaving free the full and undivided exercise of the faculties of court and counsel in their inquiry after the truth and justice of the case. No one knows better than the presiding judge how essential this state of feeling between the bench and the bar is, not only to the ease and pleasure, but to the sound and successful administration of the law. I have said that the gentlemen of the bar who have originated this unusual honor have been eye-witnesses of the judicial services so highly commended. On the other hand, I can say that I have witnessed their professional career from the beginning, and until their present eminence, many of whom hold my license to practice when chief justice of the supreme court of the state. The eminent chairman of the meeting, Mr. O'Connor, the eldest of them, is scarcely an exception. The first session of the supreme court of the state, after my appointment as associate justice, was the May term of 1831, held in the city of New York, more than forty-one years ago. He was then a young counsellor, just rising in the profession. He held a good many briefs in cases before the court from the young attorneys, and was struggling upward manfully and with youthful ardor, contending for the mastery, against the aged and elder counsellors at the bar—Jay, Ogden, Colden, Munro, the elder Slosson, Sherwood, Anthon, Duer and others, who then held almost a monopoly of the business before the courts. The prevailing impression had been, and to a qualified extent was then, among the junior members of the bar, that the experienced seniors had the ear of the court. This, according to tradition among them, had been undisguisedly so, and to a much larger extent, before the old and revered supreme court of the state. But even at the time I speak of, this feeling in the court, and which was perhaps not unnatural, had not entirely disappeared. It required, therefore, ability, courage, and resolution on the part of the junior to encounter this impression, which he must in some degree have felt in the trial of strength against the experienced and favored senior. In the country, where I have always resided, Talcott, a young counsellor, remarkable for intellectual power and legal learning at his age, led the way, under some discouragements, in the trial and argument of causes before the circuits and in banc. Other juniors, taking courage from his example, followed. He was afterward attorney general of the state, the youngest counsellor, I believe, ever appointed to that office in New York at the time, with, perhaps, the exception of Josiah Ogden Hoffman, among the earliest of the attorney generals. I was still young when advanced to the bench of the state, and, as was perhaps natural, my sympathies inclined toward the younger members of the bar, struggling upward and onward in their profession, and, as far as was fit and proper, they had my favorable consideration and kindness. I would do injustice to my feelings and convictions if I closed these few observations without making my acknowledgments to the bar of the second circuit, of my great indebtedness to them for any judicial standing to which I may be entitled. Since my first advancement to the bench, nearly half a century ago, I have had their uniform good-will and friendship, have been instructed by their learning and encouraged by the expression of their favorable opinions. They have ever been not only ready but forward to economize and lighten the labors of the court when the amount of the business pressed the hardest, even at the expense of their own personal convenience. So uniform and habitual were these exhibitions of respect and friendship, that I felt, when in court and engaged in the administration of the law, that I was surrounded, not in courtesy, but in reality, by professional brothers, and that every error would be charitably considered, and every act worthy of commendation would receive its full reward. This address of the bar of New York on the termination of my judicial labors, and in approbation of them, I look upon as the crowning reward, which will be a source of perpetual consolation in the decline of life, and so long as a kind Providence shall permit the speaker to linger here on earth in the enjoyment of faculties unimpaired."

PITMAN, JOHN.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1390.]

The following proceedings are reprinted from 2 Cliff. 628:

At an adjourned meeting of the members of the bar of the Rhode Island district, on Monday morning, November 21, 1864, the following resolutions, reported from the committee previously appointed upon the subject, were unanimously adopted:—

"Resolved, that the death of John Pitman, district judge of the United States for the Rhode Island district, though an event in the course of nature at his advanced age of fourscore years, has, by its suddenness, in the midst of his labors, unannounced, in the still night, when no man keepeth watch, filled us with awe and dread in presence of that august power in whose hands are the issues of life.

"Resolved, that in recalling the judicial career of Judge Pitman, whether as witnessed by and known to ourselves or as derived from those who knew him in earlier years, we behold only virtue and goodness, an enlightened intelligence, untiring industry, unwearied patience, a clear perception, a sound mind, a conscientious love of truth and justice, uncorruptible integrity, unblemished honor, and a true humanity.

"Resolved, that though it is our peculiar province, as members of the legal profession, to express our sense of the character and worth of the deceased as a lawyer and a judge, we would not fail to recognize the common bereavement of the whole community in the loss of an able, upright, and faithful magistrate, an exemplary citizen and a good man, whose unsullied public and private virtues won for him the respect and honor of all men throughout his long and useful life, and have secured for him an affectionate, lasting remembrance in death.

"Resolved, that while we would not intrude upon the sanctity of private grief, we respectfully tender our sincere condolence to the family of the deceased in their great bereavement.

"Resolved, that Wingate Hayes, Esq., be requested to present these resolutions to the United States circuit court now in session in Providence, with a request that they be entered upon the minutes of the court as a tribute of respect to the deceased.

"Resolved, that as a further mark of respect we will attend the funeral of the deceased in a body; and that these resolutions, signed by the chairman and secretary, be communicated to the family of the deceased, and published in the daily papers. Samuel Currey, Chairman.

"James Tillinghast, Secretary."

Proceedings in the United States circuit court:

The United States circuit court convened, pursuant to adjournment, in the court room, on Monday morning at 11½ o'clock, Judge Clifford presiding. There was a large attendance of the members of the legal profession. Hon. Wingate Hayes, at the request of his associates of the bar, presented and read to the court the foregoing series of resolutions, and made the following address:—

"May it please the court:—The members of the bar of this district have requested me to present to the court certain resolutions adopted by them as a tribute of their respect to the memory of the late Hon. John Pitman, judge of the United States district court for this district. In performing this duty it may not be improper for me to refer to some of the prominent events of his life, leaving to your honor, from whom the bar hope to have a response to their resolutions, and to my older brethren, who enjoyed a longer and more intimate acquaintance with Judge Pitman, to speak of those qualities of head and heart which particularly distinguished him. Judge Pitman was born in Providence, February 23, 1785. He graduated at Rhode Island College (now Brown University) in 1799, having entered that institution in the tenth year of his age. He received from the same University in 1843 his degree of doctor of laws, and at the time of his decease had been one of its trustees or fellows for more than thirty-six years. Upon leaving college he entered the law office of Hon. David Howell, who was afterwards his immediate predecessor as district judge, and pursued the study of the law there, and at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and in New York city, for nearly seven years, when arriving at the age of twenty-one, and becoming eligible to admission to the bar, was admitted to practice in the mayor's court of New York in June, 1806,—De Witt Clinton signing his certificate of admission,—and in the supreme court of that state in the August following, his certificate then being signed by Chancellor Kent. He opened an office in New York city, but in the spring of 1807 went to Kentucky, where in the September following he was admitted to the bar, and practised law until September, 1809. He then returned to Providence and practised his profession until 1812, when he removed to Salem, Mass. There he formed the acquaintance of Judge Story, an acquaintance which ripened into an intimate friendship, and was terminated only by the death of that distinguished jurist. Mr. Pitman remained in Salem four years, and then opened an office in Portsmouth, N. H., where he practised law from 1816 to 1820. The events of the period during which he resided at Salem and at Portsmouth, and the associations and influences by which he was surrounded, were well calculated to develop those traits of mind and of character which marked him during the remainder of his life. The war between this country and Great Britain, and the complicated and important questions growing out of it, furnished a large business to those lawyers whose learning and skill commanded the confidence of the community. Mr. Pitman soon entered upon an extensive practice in the prize courts, and drew, it is said,—with what truth I do not know,—the first libel in prize under the constitution of the United States. The Reports of the United States circuit court and of the supreme court of the United States attest with what ability and success in the discussion of the law of prize he met in those forums; the leading advocates of the country, some of whom, like Mr. Dexter and Mr. Webster, became, and remained for life, his personal friends. At the New Hampshire bar he came in contact with such men as Mason, Jeremiah Smith, Bartlett, Sullivan, and the Bells,—names your honor will readily recognize, of lawyers in the front rank of their profession. In 1820 he returned to his native town, where he continued to reside ever afterwards, with the exception of a few years which he passed at his country residence on the shores of Narragansett bay. In December, 1820, he was appointed district attorney, and in 1824, district judge, which office he held for forty years, and until the time of his decease. On Tuesday last, in the absence of your honor, Judge Pitman presided in this court, and delivered the charge to the grand jury. On Wednesday and Thursday he sat by your side, attentive and interested as usual in all the business of the court. Thursday night his spirit passed away. The death of Judge Pitman, at any time, could not fail to be an event of melancholy interest to this community. Occurring as it did in the daily performance of his judicial duties, stricken down almost in our very presence, the public, and especially the members of this bar, have received the intelligence with the most profound emotion. While I would not intrude upon the province of others in attempting an estimate of the judicial character of Judge Pitman, I may be permitted the single remark that no man could see him upon the bench without being impressed with his perfect impartiality, firmness, and love of truth. He was 'justum et tenacem propositi virum.'"

Hon. Samuel Currey then addressed the court as follows:

"May it please your honor: I have much to regret the absence on this occasion of the Hon. Richard W. Greene, the senior practising member of the bar in this district. I have just received a letter from him stating that illness prevents his attendance here, and requesting me to express to the court his regret at being absent on this melancholy occasion, as well as the deep sympathy that he felt with the court in its bereavement, and also his own sorrow at the loss of a personal friend, with whose career as a lawyer and a judge, and whose character as a man, he had been acquainted for a great number of years, and with whom he enjoyed the warmest friendship. Judge Pitman was an old man comparatively, when I first knew him. He had already sat a number of years upon this bench. I formed his acquaintance, and I recall it now with pleasure and with emotion, under his own roof, in the sanctuary of his own home, when I was a young man and a student in college here thirty years ago. I recall with pleasure and pride his kindness, his generous, urbane hospitality, his gracious deportment and manner to me as a young man, as gentle as a woman, as simple as a child. I have had the pleasure—and I have always esteemed it a great one—of enjoying his friendship from the first to the last of my acquaintance with him. Many changes have occurred within those thirty years, but none in Judge Pitman, except—the effect of advancing years—an increasing goodness and sincerity of character. I think, sir, I but express the sentiment of this whole community, and the entire circle of Mr. Pitman's friends and acquaintances in Rhode Island and out of it, when I say that he was a singularly pure, upright, and honest man,—the highest and the best attainment of humanity, and the noblest work of God. To say that he was an impartial judge, is only to say what was almost self-evident to every man. To say that he was an honest judge, is to say that he attained to the highest honesty of which human nature is capable. To say that he lived his long life, that he officiated in his long judicial career without blemish and without censure, without spot or imperfection of any kind, except what necessarily pertains to humanity, is but to say what every heart feels on this occasion.

"Judge Pitman's career was an enviable one. To be a judge is to fill a high place in human society. To be a judge and to render satisfaction to the community in which his magistracy is exercised is the greatest honor that can befall a man, as it is the highest attainment of our laborious profession. But to have been associated many years in his judicial career with such men as your honor's predecessors on this bench, with Judge Curtis, with Judge Woodbury, and for a much longer course of years with the illustrious Judge Story, was something to be written in any man's biography. I know from the testimony of the jurists to whom I have referred (and I never heard anything to the contrary from any of them), that he enjoyed in a singular manner the friendship, confidence, and love of your honor's predecessors on this bench. I am not able to go behind the period of my own experience, but that experience extends as a professional man over more than twenty-five years in this court; and during that period I have always admired the patience, the industry, the calmness, moderation, firmness, and dignity of Judge Pitman, both when he has been sitting with his associate chiefs and when he has been sitting alone. I remember an instance which I may be permitted on this occasion to mention. Some years since, when he had a laborious case to decide, he said to me, as I happened to be in his office on chambers business: 'Have you given attention to such a question of law? I have been trying to get at the foundation of that question; I believe the more I study into the law, the further I am from reaching the sources of its knowledge.' He stated to me what the question was and how much time he had bestowed upon it. And I recollect subsequently hearing his written opinion or decision upon the case, which embraced a very wide examination of statute and common law. This instance is but one of many I could mention, detailed to me by members of the profession older than myself and now passed away, by gentlemen who enjoyed his friendship, who were intimate with him as a man and familiar with his character and his labors as a judge, and who entertained toward him the same high opinion which I had formed and have now endeavored feebly to express. To-day, your honor, we part with this eminent man forever. His place among the living is vacated. He has withdrawn. But the philosophic mind, and yet more the Christian mind, cannot help tracing him in a future life. And as we stand here to-day to do him honor, to recall the life that he lived here, the character he exhibited here, the virtues he possessed here, the purity and uprightness of the man, the sincerity of the Christian, we can feel no uneasiness as to his condition in the future and the better world. He died in a good, honored age. He died, as far as we know, without suffering and without a pang; and we can say, 'Peace and honor be to his grave, and immortal happiness to his spirit,' as we bid him, to-day, farewell."

Judge Clifford responded as follows: "The court cordially concurs in the resolutions presented by the bar as a tribute of respect to the memory of the late Judge Pitman, district judge of the United States for this district. Your request, also, that the proceedings of the bar may be placed upon the records of the court is a very proper one, and one which receives the ready assent of the court. Considering the kindly relations always subsisting between Judge Pitman and myself since our acquaintance commenced, I cannot suffer the occasion to pass without remarking upon the circumstances under which they have been sundered, and expressing my own deep sense of the loss which the court, the bar, and the public have sustained in his death. You all know that the present session of the court was opened by him in my absence on the 15th of the present month, and that he presided during its organization and delivered the charge to the grand jury. On the following day he sat by my side during the greater portion of the session, and concurred in the opinion which was read at the opening of the court. Towards the hour of adjournment, but before the session closed, he signified his intention to retire on account of ill health. Pursuant to his usual course on such occasions, he requested that the trial of the cause before the court should proceed, leaving it to be inferred that he would shortly return. Supposing that he would presently resume his seat on the bench, I acquiesced in the suggestion, and the trial of the cause proceeded. When he left his seat I have no doubt he expected to find relief in the open air, and that he in a brief period would be able to return; but he was disappointed in that expectation. Failing to find the expected relief, he left and went to his residence, and at the usual hour in the evening retired to rest. Whether he slept or not is not known, but when morning came it was found that his spirit had fled to Him who gave it, and it may confidently be hoped to receive the reward of an upright, faithful, and unoffending life. Such, in brief, are the circumstances under which your and my official relations to the deceased have been suddenly terminated; and I cannot but think that they are such as should admonish us all that in the midst of life we are in death, and that no one here knows who will next be called to give his final account. Happy indeed will it be for that one, whoever he may be, if he can hopefully expect to be as well prepared for the solemn event as was the subject of these remarks. Judge Pitman was born in this city on the 23d of February, 1785, about two years after the treaty of peace. Nativity, however, was by no means the only tie which bound him to your locality. On the contrary, it was here that he received his classical education, and it was here also that he pursued the study of the legal profession as the chosen pursuit of his life. Having completed his preparatory studies, he entered Brown University in September, 1795, and graduated there with the degree of bachelor of arts in four years after he was admitted. Shortly after he graduated he entered the office of David Howell, Esq., afterwards district judge of the United States for this district, and completed his studies in his office. Like most young men, when first admitted to the bar, his first inclination was to leave his native city and to endeavor to earn success and distinction in some other locality. Accordingly he practised law for a short time in the city of New York, and afterwards at Salem, in the commonwealth of Massachusetts, and then removed to Portsmouth, in the state of New Hampshire, where he remained for four years. During the period last mentioned, he was brought in contact with some of the ablest jurists in the United States. Rockingham bar at that period had enrolled among its members such men as Webster, Mason, Smith, Sullivan, and Bartlett, as well as many others of great learning and experience. Contemporaries of that day agree with one accord that Judge Pitman even in that circle sustained a high rank in his profession, and that his personal character was above reproach. All who knew him concurred in the opinion that he was a lawyer of good judgment, high attainment, and much esteemed by the court. Actuated, however, by the attachments of early manhood, he accepted, in September, 1820, an invitation to return to his native city, where he has ever since resided in the midst of the friends of his youth. President Monroe appointed him district attorney of the United States for this district on the 9th of December, 1820, and he continued to discharge the duties of that office with distinguished success until the 4th of August, 1824, when he was appointed district judge of the United States for this district. Forty years and more have elapsed since he entered upon the duties of that important office, and there lives not a man to say that he has been guilty of intentional error. Better things need no man have said of him than can be truly said of the subject of these remarks, that his whole course as district judge of the United States was such for the period of forty years that all knowing him agree that he was a good man and a just magistrate. Prior to my appointment to the bench of the supreme court, I had no personal acquaintance with my lamented associate. Since that time our relations have been intimate and cordial. Gone to the grave in the midst of a community where he was born, and where he has lived for the last forty years, he needs no commendation from any quarter. Justice, however, requires me to say that for the six years during which we have been associated together in this bench, I have always found him faithful to his duties, and anxious, in the decision of cases submitted to our determination, to reach the justice of the cause without the least bias, prejudice, or partiality. His example of purity and uprightness is a good one, which all may well seek to emulate, but which few or none can hope to excel. Pursuant to the request contained in the resolutions, let the proceedings of the bar be placed upon the records of the court."

POPE, NATHANIEL.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1391.]

The following obituary notice is reprinted from 4 McLean:

Since the publication of the third volume of these Reports, it has pleased God to call from life the Honorable Nathaniel Pope, district judge of Illinois. He died, after a brief but severe illness, at St. Louis, shortly after the adjournment of his court, at Springfield, in June, 1849, about sixty-six years of age. Judge Pope was among the early settlers in Illinois. He first established his residence at Kaskaskia, and continued to reside there until within a few years before his death. The place was abandoned by him, probably, from the repeated floods in the Mississippi, of late years, which inundated the town and rendered it unhealthy. When he first made Kaskaskia his residence, it was, in population and intelligence, the first place in Illinois. It was the seat of government for the territory. On the organization of the Illinois territory, in 1809, he was appointed, by Mr. Jefferson, secretary of the territory; which office he filled with credit to himself, and usefulness to the public. In 1819 the state of Illinois was organized, and Judge Pope accepted the appointment of district judge of the United States. At the time of his death, he had been thirty years on the bench, a length of time, of which we have few examples in our country. While secretary of the territory, and until he was appointed to the bench, Judge Pope practiced his profession; and, from the first, stood at the head of the bar in the territory. He had influential connections and friends in Kentucky, and elsewhere, which, with his own high standing, gave him no small influence with the earlier administrations of the general government. And in his territory and state, he was a very prominent and leading citizen. His independence and strict adherence to the political principles he avowed, which may be classed with the Jefferson school, left him behind the progress of others, who professed to be of the same school.

He was a man of decided talent. He never sought to become conspicuous as a speaker on the stump, at the dinner table, or in any such ephemeral exhibitions. But he was a man of much research, and of deep thought. He had a very strong and vigorous mind. In conversation, and in his opinions on the bench, and elsewhere, he was distinguished for the soundness of his positions, and the force of argument by which he maintained them. His arguments were drawn more from the resources of his own mind, than from the hackneyed views of others. Whilst, in his legal opinions, he showed great respect for authority, he was never satisfied where his own judgment did not lead to the same conclusion. I was associated with him twelve years on the bench, and I seldom differed from him, in an opinion pronounced, without feeling solicitude in regard to my own views. He was an able common lawyer, and there were but few persons, in any part of our country, whose constitutional opinions were entitled to higher respect. With the history of the constitution he was well acquainted; and he understood well the respective powers of the federal and state governments. He seemed to be more desirous of discharging his duty faithfully, than of leaving memorials of his acts. He reported but few of his judicial opinions, two or three of which give value to this volume. No man entertained loftier views of the duties of a judge, and no one ever exercised a purer judgment in the decision of causes. Firm in his convictions, he never yielded them without being convinced of error; and then no one conformed to right and justice more cheerfully than he did. In this he set a beautiful example of an unbiased judgment, however strong and firm, ready to yield to the force of argument. He was above the infirmity of narrow minds, which considers a change of opinion as evidence of weakness. The state sustained a great loss in the death of this distinguished man. To his family the loss was irreparable, as he lived in their affections in no common degree. And associated with him as I had been, for so many years, I heard of his death with the deepest sensibility, and sincerely deplore his loss.

SPRAGUE, PELEG.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1395.]

The following address of the bar on his retirement is reprinted from 2 Spr. 352:

To the Honorable Peleg Sprague:—Sir: The members of the bar of the courts of the United States, in which you have presided during the last twenty-three years, cannot allow you to withdraw yourself from the office of judge without an expression of their high estimate of your public services, their profound respect for your judicial qualities and attainments, and their grief for the physical disability which has caused your retirement. They esteem it to be due to their country, to you, and to themselves that they should bear their testimony to the great value of those services and to the rare combination of intellectual and moral powers which alone could make them possible. They have found you to be not only thoroughly instructed in the common law, but master of those special branches of jurisprudence and legislation which it has been your peculiar province to administer. They have found in you such power of analysis as they have not known surpassed, united with sound judgment to weigh its results. They have found in you that absolute judicial impartiality which can exist only when a tender and vigilant conscience is joined to an instructed and self-reliant intellect and a firm will. And these great powers and attainments have been used by you so steadily, so patiently, so continuously, through more years than are comprised in the professional life of most of us, that we have scarcely known, and your patience and courtesy have never allowed us to realize, that, during much of the time, you have been a sufferer from physical pain, and, during all the time, that you have been in a great measure unaided by that precious sense of sight, without which such labors as yours would have seemed impossible. We are heartily thankful for the great benefits you have conferred, not on us only, but on this community, and on our country, whose judicial bench you have strengthened and illustrated. We deplore the cause which has seemed to render your retirement necessary. Would that it were in our power to do something to alleviate your condition, instead of giving expression to our sorrows and to our affectionate respect!

B. R. Curtis,
Charles G. Loring,
Sidney Bartlett,
J. H. Clifford,
T. D. Elliot,
George Lunt,

G. S. Hillard,
H. W. Paine,
John C. Dodge,
R. H. Dana, Jr.,
C. L. Woodbury,
S. H. Phillips,
Committee of the Bar.

Boston, March 27, 1865.

STORY, JOSEPH.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1395.]

The following proceedings are reprinted from 1 Woodb. & M. 9:

At a meeting of the bar of the circuit court, on the 1st of October, 1845, Hon. Stephen Longfellow, the president of the bar, in the chair, the following resolutions, which had been drawn under previous appointment by Charles S. Davis, Esq., were presented and adopted:

"Resolved, that the members of the bar of the circuit court of the United States in Maine, do not meet for the first time since the lamented decease of the Honorable Joseph Story, late presiding judge, without deep emotions of sorrow and sympathy. That although they were not sure that they should ever see him again upon the circuit, and experience the continued benefit of his eminent judicial talents, and invaluable labors upon this bench, they hoped that the sphere which had been so long enlivened by his active presence, would be still animated by his living spirit; and from the vigor and vitality of his constitutional temperament, the vividness of his intellect, and his undiminished interest in the cultivation of his favorite science, they had looked forward to an extended period, in which the public and the profession should enjoy the prolonged light of his powerful and comprehensive mind, and the genial influence of his instructions and example, among the emanations that should most gracefully adorn, in its grateful coming on, the mellow evening of his life.

"Resolved, that while in common with the rest of their professional brethren, and the great community of the wise and good, throughout the country, they share the sense of this immeasurable and universal loss, so much deplored by the lovers of justice, virtue, and order, everywhere in our land, they cannot but feel, in the most lively manner, the portion which falls to their own lot; nor cease to recall the gratification inspired, and the cheering and instructive impulses imparted, by his spring and autumnal visits to this part of the circuit during the space of near a quarter of a century. And that the brief moment which has elapsed since his lamented decease, has not abated their earnest desire to offer and record their imperfect expression of admiration for his departed worth, and cherished attachment to his memory.

"Resolved, that in coming together from distant parts of this district, on the morning of the fall term which forms the commencement of the eastern circuit, so suddenly ensuing upon this striking termination of his unexpired judicial labors, while they do not feel that they can add anything of weight to the first spontaneous tributes that have already been so worthily paid by older bars, and especially that which was pronounced with so much force and feeling upon the immediate announcement of the mournful event, by the assembly of the bar of the metropolis of New England, to his consummate character as a judge, an author, a teacher, a citizen, and a friend, it may not be unbecomingly that they should embrace the occasion thus presented, and thus bringing home to them the abrupt and affecting close of their late relation, to declare their consciousness of the distinguished privilege they have enjoyed in its having subsisted so long and with so much cordiality and satisfaction, and with so much advantage, as they persuade themselves, to the advancement and dignity of the profession, and the illustration of the doctrines of the legal science, in the high administration of justice in all its appropriate departments upon sea and land; and that they should indulge their own sincere feeling, in summing up in such expression as may be in their power, the high sense they entertain of his singular excellence and endowments as a jurist, a magistrate, and a man. As no one was more generous in his own awards to the merits of others, or poured more faithful tributes to those whom he has lamented, it is meet that his memory should not want the meed which it has so richly earned, and that full measure of acknowledgment and appreciation, of which, however amply accorded by contemporary testimony, the delicate propriety of professional relations may have suppressed the unrestrained utterance during his official life. To him, no longer living, we only pay due honors.

"Resolved, that while many of us remember the lively satisfaction with which the extension of his circuit to this district was hailed, and recall the occasion of his cordial greeting upon the erection of our eastern section of the ancient commonwealth into an independent state, and some still recollect the period of his original elevation to the bench, we may all rejoice that the day has more than fulfilled the auspicious dawn, and has created such a clear and steady light, so broad, illumining, and vivifying, wherever it has spread, and upon whatever subjects it has shone, that although the living orb may be withdrawn, no night can follow.

"Resolved, that we regard his advancement to the highest seat of our American judicature, in conjunction with his eminent associates upon the supreme tribunal of the nation, and his able coadjutors upon the circuit, as marking an epoch from which we may date an era in the annals of our jurisprudence, of which our time shall, happily, not see the end; one, as we may properly feel, on the part of the American bar, of which his vast and various learning, the affluence of his juridical attainments, the universality and splendor of his accomplishments, the munificent gifts which he has laid upon the altar of the law, the attractive graces with which he has attired its service with those elaborate and abundant expositions, of which he was the author, to us its breathing oracles,—have been among the most authentic and important elements. And when we call to mind his zeal in the cause of its science, his unwearied and exhausting labors in deepening and clearing the sources, conducting the streams and enlarging the limits of legal knowledge, the mature developments, and disciplined energies which he has brought to it, of his intellect—and summon up that signal capacity of grasping the most abstruse, complicated, and difficult subjects—that quickness of conception, almost amounting to intuition, outstripping the process of logical deduction, and anticipating the results of profound and laborious reflection—that vigor of comprehension from which nothing escaped—that fervent and intense analysis, of which nothing could elude the keenness or resist the force—that eminent sagacity and judgment to which his other faculties were subservient, and all other operations and resources only ministering—the copiousness and clearness of living eloquence with which he has illustrated, explained and enforced the strictest and purest doctrines of law and equity—the charms he has given to the study, and the captivations with which he has invested the pursuit—the elevation he has imparted to the practice—the scale of legal attainment, and standard of professional excellence, which he has done so much to raise and to improve—the exalted tone of morality which he has infused, and the enthusiasm which he has inspired, especially in the breasts of younger votaries, and the undecaying glow which he has lighted up again in the bosom of those who have longest cultivated the profession, at once kindled and fed by the treasures of legal lore which he has lavished upon it—and when we add again the kindred fields of philosophy and literature which he has delighted to explore, and from which he has won so many appropriate wreaths—and more than all, when we bring up to our thoughts that true, enlarged and essential humanity which was the life-spring of his nature, and gave such energy to his indignant denunciations of all the darker violations of its natural dictates, that genuine love of liberty which he cherished with religious devotion, and the intrepid firmness with which at the same time he upheld the most rigid sanctions of private law, and the most grave and sacred injunctions of public justice—we deem all these to have given a splendor to his name and time, and to have thrown a glory around them, which, while it has illuminated our own hemisphere, has cast its effulgence with no measured radiance, or mere reflected lustre, abroad—and have made him by all confession among ourselves, and the consenting suffrage of enlightened foreigners, one of the greatest masters of the legal science in the world, and the most illustrious genius of the jurisprudence of the age.

“Resolved, that while we thus partake in no common share the sensibility with which society in all its circles surveys its loss, in him who sleeps beneath the tranquil shades of Mount Auburn, now consecrated anew by receiving his remains; and while we mourn with those who mourn it most, and forget not the goodness of his heart, the gentleness and united ardor of his nature, the genuineness and instinctiveness of his sympathies, and pass not over what has been termed, with more than classic purity, the daily beauty of his life, and all those blended graces in his character, which were among its most expressive lineaments; and while we may be allowed to call to mind especially the cordial charm which he threw over his constant intercourse with his professional brethren, like that which pervaded his whole familiar converse; we may well rejoice, and with devout gratitude, above all, we do rejoice, that his great powers were bestowed upon some of the best and weightiest interests of the social state, the most grave and important objects to which the highest active, moral, and intellectual powers can be applied, the most vital concerns to the well-being and condition of mankind, in the established reign of justice, equity, and order. We rejoice that it was eminently his fortune to carry out so near to its natural close, a career rarely equalled in the judicial life of a single individual, rewarded by so many results, and crowned with such celebrity. The sun knoweth his going down. And although painful and unexpected, we may not feel it to be otherwise than a final, harmonious felicity, in keeping with his single lot, that he should have breathed his last before he retired from the bench: ‘Felix non vitæ tantum claritate, sed etiam opportunitate mortis.’ We rejoice, too, that faculties which could have never been imparted in vain, and seldom granted with more prodigality, should have been thus exerted for some of the noblest earthly purposes to which they could have been appointed—that he should have exercised so large and beneficent an agency in the most useful affairs of society, and varied interests of mankind—that trusts of the most important and comprehensive character, such as are implied by Providence in the talents given, and their highest principles in the capacity for their discharge thus committed, should have been so far fulfilled—that he should have left such invaluable legacies of his wisdom and learning to the profession and the world, in works of which we cannot weigh the worth, and which those who come after us, will not willingly let die. And we may well rejoice, moreover, that he should not have been called to pay the great debt to nature, until he had so largely and so nearly discharged that which it was his pride to acknowledge himself to owe to the science and the profession; one which he felt within himself such a conscious power to discharge, so far as it should be compatible with the sovereign dispensations of the divine will. And most devoutly do we rejoice that the record of his fidelity should have so fully been completed. ‘Quicquid ex illo amavimus, quicquid mirati sumus, manet, mansurumque est in animis hominum, in æternitate temporum, fama rerum.’ While we are thus called to feel, in his own expressive words, that ‘there is an excellence over which death hath no power, but lives on through all time, still freshening with the lapse of age;’ and are also led to read the solemn sentence inscribed upon the portals of the grave, ‘Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it,’ and are drawn to listen to the closing requiem of mortal labors, in the divine voice, ‘Blessed are the dead, that die in the Lord, for they rest from their labors, and their works do follow them;’ we follow with this parting tribute of our affection and admiration the departure of his immortal spirit, entering upon that reversion of fame which awaits illustrious worth in this world, and, as we humbly hope, that high reversion which faith assigns to the pure and just in the future.

“Resolved, that these resolutions be communicated to the Court at the opening of the term, and that a copy be also forwarded to the family of the deceased by the President.

“Stephen Longfellow, Pres’t.

“Phineas Barnes, Sec’y.”

On the opening of the circuit court, on the same day, in pursuance of the foregoing, the attorney of the United States, Augustine Haines, Esq., presented these resolutions to the court, with an appropriate address. To these proceedings, his honor, Judge Ware, the associate presiding judge, responded as follows.

“Gentlemen of the bar: On my part, as one of the court, I receive with profound sensibility, and cordially respond to the terms in which you have expressed yourselves in regard to the late presiding judge of this court. Having been associated with him for more than twenty years in the performance of judicial duties in this district, on this occasion, which brings back fresh to my recollection the incidents occurring in an official connection of such a length of time, in all respects so pleasant and instructive, and now forever dissolved; I should do injustice to my own feelings, if I should confine myself to a mere formal response to the sentiments which have been so appropriately expressed by the gentlemen of the bar.

“Since the last term of this court, by the dispensation of an all-wise Providence, he has been called to the world of his fathers, prematurely, we shall be ready to say, when we regret the loss of what a few years more of life and health, if they had been spared, might have given to our common country, and especially to the profession to which his life had been devoted; but we can hardly say prematurely when we look to the monuments of learning and industry which he has left, or to the widespread fame which rests as a living glory on his memory. He has been called from the scene of his labors, full of honors and ripe with the fruits of a well-spent life. Judge Story, with an intellectual temperament which perhaps originally inclined him to the more graceful and attractive pursuits of general and polite literature, early applied himself to the severer studies of the law; and without wholly abandoning the cultivation of elegant letters as a graceful ornament in every profession of life, devoted the main energies of his mind to his chosen science. From the commencement of his professional studies, this became the great business of his life, and was continued with unwearied perseverance to its close. From such long and persevering devotion, continued with a zeal that never cooled, I may say with an enthusiasm that never faltered, much might be naturally expected even from common powers of mind. But when that patience of labor that asked for no repose, was united as it was in him with extraordinary quickness of apprehension, a remarkable tenacity of memory and rare maturity of judgment, great effects might naturally be expected. The result certainly has not disappointed what might have been the most sanguine anticipations of his friends. He has placed himself among the very greatest lights of jurisprudence. If we may rank him with a Parsons, a Marshall and a Kent, of our own country, without apprehension that he will suffer by the comparison, so we may place him in company with the greatest names in jurisprudence that have adorned the annals of that country from which we have derived the body of our common law. There are few who will not admit that he was a fit companion for the Hales and Holts, the Hardwickes and Mansfields, who have illustrated the law in the land of our fathers. In the monuments of learning and industry which he has left behind him, he far excels any of them. His juridical works, including his judgments pronounced in litigated causes argued before him in the circuit court, together with his elementary treatises on various titles of the law, fill nearly thirty large volumes, the exclusive productions of his own mind, exclusive of his numerous and often very elaborate opinions comprised in the series of the Reports of the Supreme Court, extending through a period of thirty-four years. Few men, of whatever fertility or industry, in any department of human learning have ever written more. No magistrate and no author in any age has enriched the jurisprudence of the common law by so great an addition to its treasures, whether we regard his works in their actual amount or the variety of the subjects which they treat. Called upon by his official station to administer every branch of the law, his judicial opinions cover the whole ground of jurisprudence, and he has treated them all with such affluence of learning and accuracy of discrimination, that it is difficult to say with what department of the law he was most familiar. Whether he is dealing with the abstruse and technical points of the old common law, or the complicated and subtle, as well as the liberal and enlarged principles of equity, or again with the delicate and difficult constitutional questions which arise out of our mixed and complex system of simple and complex governments, or with those great subjects of international law which grow out of a state of war, and arise in the prize jurisdiction of the admiralty, his knowledge seems to be equally intimate and exact in all. On all these matters, so various and important, he has been called upon officially to form and deliver opinions in which private rights were involved and complicated, not only with great principles of law, but often with great public and national interests. It would be giving high praise to any magistrate to say that he exhibited intellectual endowments equal to the work. But in saying so much, I shall, I trust, be justified in adding that this would not be awarding the full measure of praise that may justly be given. On all of these he has exhibited a depth of learning, an acuteness of discrimination, a profoundness of judgment, and a fertility of illustration, which, all together, have been equaled by few magistrates of any age, and been surpassed by none.

"It may be too much to expect of any man, however wide his learning and however penetrating his judgment, that every decision made in the course of a long and laborious judicial life, should be free from all error. Never to fail in judgment does not belong to the condition of humanity. And if it shall hereafter appear on a more profound and critical examination, that error has in some cases crept into his judicial opinions, it will, I believe, also be found that he has left as great a number of judgments behind him, which will remain to future ages permanent landmarks of the law, as any other judge that ever sat on the bench in this country or in England. But there is one quality in the judicial opinions of Judge Story, in which, if they are not altogether permanent, they are not surpassed by those of any other judge in the annals of jurisprudence. If there be a latent error in them, they usually themselves furnish the means by which it may be detected. For such was his conscientious diligence, the extent and profoundness of his learning, and the fertility of his mind, that the subject was seldom dismissed until it had been analyzed with the most thorough exactness, until all its analogies and distinctions had been critically examined, the whole dissected by a most subtle and accurate logic, and over all had been thrown the light of all the learning that pertained to the matter. So that if the reader hesitates as to its conclusion, the exuberant learning with which the opinion overflows will lead him to all the law which is applicable to the subject. So thorough and exhausting is the examination in some of his opinions, that they may be studied and relied upon, both as elementary and didactic commentaries, and as copious and complete disquisitions on the particular points of law involved in the cases, so that the most careful researches into the sources of the law will add nothing to the fullness of the discussion. It may well be doubted whether any magistrate in any age ever has pronounced more judgments of this character, equally distinguished for the variety and extent of learning, by which they were illustrated, and the profound analysis by which both the rules of law and the judicial decisions bearing upon them have been reduced to their simple elementary principles. But it is not only by profound and learned judgment that this eminent magistrate has enriched the science to which he devoted his life. He has given to the profession a large number of elementary treatises or commentaries on various titles of the law, at once so simple and clear in the method, that the unlearned may read them with the most easy and perfect comprehension of the whole matter that is treated, and at the same time so copious, exact and searching in the analysis and discussion of principles and cases as leaves nothing to be desired by the learned. It is when we regret the loss of other works of the same character which we were led to expect from his learning and diligence, that we are constrained to say, in our deep regret and sorrow, that this great light and ornament both of his country and of his profession has been prematurely taken from the scene of his labors. From the contemplation of the great learning and laborious diligence which distinguished him as a magistrate, we may turn with singular satisfaction to the manner in which he discharged the various duties of his high and responsible office. All who have practiced in his court will bear witness to the uniform urbanity of his manner of presiding at trials. It was an urbanity that was extended to all. But to the younger and more inexperienced members of the bar, on their first introduction to the court, it was something beyond mere official civility. It was marked with that gentleness and indulgence that seemed to belong more to the partial favor of a parent than the severe gravity of a judge. And it was perhaps owing to this gentleness and suavity of manner in the presiding judge, that in the sharp conflicts which so frequently arise in the contentions of the bar, so few occurred before him which left any root of bitterness behind them. On this occasion it belongs more appropriately to me to speak of him as a magistrate; but I cannot conclude this imperfect tribute to the memory of a good and great magistrate without adding a few words of his character as a man. Great talents and great acquirements extort our admiration to a certain extent, with whatever moral qualities they may be combined. But we render our homage with cheerfulness and pleasure only when we find them united with purity of personal character, unspotted integrity of life and elevation of moral sentiment that bear a just proportion to the endowments of the mind. On the unstained purity and moral elevation of Judge Story's character as a private individual and a member of society, the memory of his friends may dwell with unmixed pleasure. The moral frame of his mind had its foundations deeply laid in religious principle. He lived and died in the faith of a Christian, with a deep and habitual persuasion that he was both an accountable and an immortal being. It was this deep and abiding faith that lent its soft and beautiful colors to the whole tenor of his life, which gave energy to every effort which might improve and elevate the moral dignity of his fellow-men, which in the evening of life led him to seek a place of repose for the dead, which by its rural and tranquil beauties might associate images of gentle and melancholy tenderness with the most solemn feelings that ever enter into the heart of man, and finally prompted him, when the spirit was in his last moments flickering over his mortal and expiring body, in the last audible words he uttered, to commend his soul to the God who gave it. On a life thus spent and thus closed, surely his friends may look back with unmingled pleasure. The death of such a man at any period of his life, is felt with deep sensibility, and more so, when as we fondly hoped that his days might have been prolonged through many years of usefulness. It was the will of Providence that it should be otherwise, and all that is left for us is to follow him to his grave with unavailing regret, and accumulate honors so richly due to his merits, the justice of which I trust will be acknowledged by a distant posterity."

Judge Woodbury then observed, in substance, as follows: "These resolutions, gentlemen of the bar, shall be entered upon the records. The appropriate tribute to the memory of my predecessor, which has been paid by you on this occasion, is most fully concurred in by the whole court. My associate has responded in feelings, common to us both, on account of the lamented decease of Judge Story, and also in those remembrances and delineations of his character, on which a longer and closer intimacy with him qualified and rendered it more fit for my associate to dwell. All of the profession, however, in this circuit, and to some extent in the Union, and indeed, wherever an enlarged jurisprudence, connected with commercial, constitutional and national topics, exists, may well take the liberty to express, what they cannot but feel, a deep sense of the great loss, they have sustained. The eloquence and learning, which in him have adorned this bench for near a quarter of a century, and still longer that of the supreme court of the United States, the tomb has now closed over forever. You will no more listen to the tongue, that so long and so ably vindicated here the jurisdiction and powers of the general government; and while it defended innocence with ardor, and relieved the oppressed by a most liberal exercise of equitable principles, lost no fit occasion to expose injustice and punish guilt. But it is some consolation, that such men do not live in vain for the future any more than the past in respect to their fellow-men. The courtesy and blandness of manner in the deceased must long be remembered by most of us as models for imitation. His pure life, unspotted as the ermine of the justice he administered—his useful toils in serving his country and his profession—have sown seeds, which will long yield to both a rich harvest, and have met with those rewards from grateful millions, which will long encourage our youth as well as more advanced age to emulate his example. It is fortunate, that the records of much of his various labors will remain for the edification of us all. And, painful to many as has been the death of one distinguished by so many excellencies and so much usefulness, it is a source of gratitude, that his efforts were spared to the world so long, and till they had accomplished so much and that the fruits of them can never die, while the law endures as a science, and genius, industry and ambition, nobly employed, are held in veneration among men."

Similar resolutions were passed in the other districts of the first circuit, and to all of them a similar reply in substance was made. They are omitted for want of room. The circuit court for the district of Maine was the first one held by Judge Woodbury under his appointment as associate justice of the supreme court of the United States.

The following is reprinted from 1 Newb. 315:

District Court of the United States. Fifth Judicial Circuit. District of Louisiana. New Orleans, November 3d, 1845. Hon. Theodore H. McCaleb, Presiding.

On the opening of the court, this morning, at 10 o'clock A. M., E. Warren Moise, Esq., rose, and after a few eloquent and appropriate remarks, moved an adjournment of the court, as a tribute of respect to the memory of the late Mr. Justice Story. This motion was seconded by C. Roselius, Esq., late attorney-general of this state. In granting the motion, his honor, Judge McCaleb, made the following remarks: "In yielding, as I do, a ready compliance with the motion which has just been made, I shall, I trust, be excused for making a few remarks. I am not so presumptuous as to imagine that I can add anything to the praise so justly merited, which has already been bestowed upon the character of him whose memory it is the object of the motion to honor. The duty of portraying the character and recounting the services of Mr. Justice Story, has already devolved upon those who, from intellectual superiority and from long personal acquaintance with his character, were peculiarly well qualified to perform it. It is my wish, simply, that on the present occasion the sentiments of admiration and gratitude for the long and signal services of the great jurist, expressed in such eloquent and pathetic terms by his immediate neighbors and friends, may find in our bosoms a cordial response. Though far from the scene of his active and zealous efforts to advance the great interests of the science in which he was long known and recognized as one of the ablest preceptors, we have, as Americans, been equally sharers in the benefits which his unequalled labors have diffused over our vast Union. It is peculiarly fit and proper that the bench and the bar throughout our widely extended country, should do honor to the memory of Mr. Justice Story. They are daily and hourly constrained to acknowledge the obligations under which he has placed them, by the prodigal liberality with which he has everywhere dispensed the inexhaustible treasure of his great intellect; and it is impossible for those of us who are called to minister at the altar of justice, within the range of federal jurisdiction, adequately to express the gratitude we must ever feel for the benefits which his matchless assiduity through a long life, has conferred on every branch of legal science. It is a source of pride to us as Americans, to know that his opinions are cited as authority before the highest common-law tribunals of England. He has long since, in admiralty law, taken his place with Stowell, Tenterden and Robinson, who have shed so much light upon this particular branch of jurisprudence. As a chancellor, he will descend to posterity in the 'glorious company' of a Loughborough, an Eldon, a Cottenham, a Brougham, and a Lyndhurst—eminent among all, inferior to none. While we express the solemn conviction that his place cannot soon be supplied, even from our widely extended country, rich as it may be, and as it undoubtedly is in intellectual greatness and legal learning, let us hope that those who are called to minister at the altars of justice, while they cannot expect to equal him in his comet-like velocity, will strive at least to imbibe his wisdom and follow in the luminous 'track of his fiery car.' While, however, we award honors so justly due to the memory of this distinguished jurist, we should beware lest our regret for his sudden loss should betray us into unjust comparisons; and I trust it will not be deemed inconsistent with the occasion, but on the contrary as a simple act of justice, if I express my dissent from the opinion of one¹ who has written an eloquent and, I think, except in one important particular, a just eulogium on the life and services of him whom we now honor. That opinion elevates the judicial character of Mr. Justice Story above that of the late venerable Chief Justice Marshall. They were, we know, for many years associates on the bench of the supreme court of the United States, and I think it may be safely asserted that the latter was universally acknowledged to be without an equal in this country. The industry and research of the former have long been proverbial, and so far as relates to these attributes, so essential to a magistrate, he doubtless excelled his illustrious and venerable friend. But in the development of great principles, in a lucid and systematic arrangement of an argument by which error is most clearly exposed or truth most easily discerned, in all the qualities which distinguish the sound logician, the latter still stands pre-eminent among the great legal names of our country. We are told by the elegant author of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, that 'an indulgent edict of the younger Theodosius excused the judge from the labor of comparing and weighing discordant arguments of jurists, who, in the age of the Antonines disclaimed the authority of a master and adopted from every system the most probable doctrine. Five civilians, Caius, Papinian, Paulus, Ulpian and Modestinus, were established as the oracles of jurisprudence. A majority was decisive; but if their opinions were equally decided, a casting vote was ascribed to the superior wisdom of Papinian.' There are few American jurists who, when impeded and embarrassed by discordant authorities, do not feel irresistibly inclined to turn with the like veneration to the opinions of Marshall. Though gone from the stage of action, he is yet, and would that he could continue to be through all time, regarded as the Papinian of American constitutional law. Even in those cases in which he felt compelled to differ in opinion with a majority of his brethren on the bench, there are few I believe who, upon an attentive and impartial examination of the comparative strength of the reasons advanced for and against the propositions upon which a difference has arisen, are not forced to the conclusion that truth, justice and law have been compelled to yield to the power and authority of numbers. It is in such cases, when the opinion of the majority is cited as law, and the opinion of the minority is necessarily to be treated as error, that we are led to sympathize with the great Roman orator when, under the influence of his enthusiastic admiration of the Athenian philosopher, he exclaimed, 'Errare malo cum Platone, quam cum istis vera sentire.' Happily, however; through a long judicial career there was no material conflict of opinion between Marshall and Story. And although we are constrained to acknowledge that 'one star is greater than another star in glory,' let us be thankful that two such orbs were so long permitted to reign 'lords of the ascendant' in our American firmament. Let us be thankful that we have hitherto been guided by examples so pure and by wisdom so unerring. Let us continue to pursue with alacrity and pride a noble profession adorned by such venerable names. Let us yield an unreluctant homage to the majesty of law, and ever feel with the eloquent Hooker, that 'her seat is the bosom of God and her voice the harmony of the world.'" Upon the conclusion of the above remarks from the judge, Isaac T. Preston, Esq., attorney-general of the state, moved that the motion made by Mr. Moise, with the accompanying remarks of the judge, be spread upon the record, and that the same be published. The court then immediately adjourned until to-morrow morning, at 10 o'clock A. M.

¹Mr. Sumner, author of remarks on the funeral of Mr. Justice Story, published in the October number of the Law Reporter.

The following is reprinted from 3 Story, VII., (Preface:)

At a meeting of the Suffolk bar, held in the circuit court room, on the morning of the 12th of September, the day of the funeral of Mr. Justice Story, Mr. Chief Justice Shaw having taken the chair, and announced the object of the meeting, the Honorable Daniel Webster arose and spoke nearly as follows:

"Your solemn announcement, Mr. Chief Justice, has confirmed the sad intelligence, which had already reached us, through the public channels of information, and deeply afflicted us all. Joseph Story, one of the associate justices of the supreme court of the United States, and for many years the presiding judge of this circuit, died on Wednesday evening last, at his own house in Cambridge, wanting only a few days for the completion of the sixty-sixth year of his age. This most mournful and lamentable event has called together the whole bar of Suffolk, and all connected with the courts of law, or the profession. It has brought you, Mr. Chief Justice, and your associates of the bench of the supreme court of Massachusetts, into the midst of us, and you have done us the honor, out of respect to the occasion, to consent to preside over us, while we deliberate on what is due, as well to our own afflicted and smitten feelings, as to the exalted character, and eminent distinction of the deceased judge. The occasion has drawn from his retirement, also, that venerable man, whom we all so much respect and honor, (Judge Davis,) and who was, for thirty years, the associate of the deceased, upon the same bench. It has called hither another judicial personage, now in retirement, (Judge Putnam,) but long an ornament of that bench, of which you are now the head, and whose marked good fortune it is, to have been the professional teacher of Joseph Story, and the director of his early studies. He is here, also, to whom this blow comes near,—I mean the learned judge, (Judge Sprague,) — immediately from whose side it has struck away a friend, and a highly venerated official associate. The members of the school, to which the deceased was so much attached, and who returned that attachment with all the ingenuousness and enthusiasm of educated and ardent youthful minds, are here also, to manifest their sense of their own severe deprivation, as well as their admiration of the bright and shining professional example, which they have so loved to contemplate; an example,—let me say to them, and let me say to all, as a solace, in the midst of their sorrows,—which death hath not touched, and which time cannot obscure.

"Mr. Chief Justice, one sentiment pervades us all. It is that of the most profound and penetrating grief, mixed, nevertheless, with an assured conviction, that the great man whom we deplore, is yet with us, and in the midst of us. He hath not wholly died. He lives in the affections of friends, and kindred, and in the high regard of the community. He lives in our remembrance of his social virtues, his warm and steady friendships, and the vivacity and richness of his conversation. He lives, and will live still more permanently, by his words of written wisdom, by the results of his vast researches and attainments, by his imperishable legal judgments, and by those juridical disquisitions, which have stamped his name, all over the civilized world, with the character of a commanding authority. 'Vivit, enim, vivetque semper; atque etiam latius in memoria hominum et sermone versabitur, postquam ab oculis recessit.'

"Mr. Chief Justice, there are consolations which arise to mitigate our loss, and shed the influence of resignation over unfeigned and heartfelt sorrow. We are all penetrated with gratitude to God, that the deceased lived so long; that he did so much for himself, his friends, the country and the world; that his lamp went out, at last, without unsteadiness or flickering. He continued to exercise every power of his mind, without dimness or obscurity, and every affection of his heart, with no abatement of energy or warmth, till death drew an impenetrable veil between us and him. Indeed, he seems to us now, as in truth he is, not extinguished, or ceasing to be, but only withdrawn: as the clear sun goes down at its setting, not darkened, but only no longer seen. This calamity, Mr. Chief Justice, is not confined to the bar, or the courts, of this commonwealth. It will be felt by every bar, throughout the land, by every court, and indeed by every intelligent and well-informed man, in or out of the profession. It will be felt still more widely, for his reputation had a still wider range. In the high court of parliament, in every tribunal in Westminster Hall, in the judicatories of Paris and Berlin, Stockholm and St. Petersburg, in the learned Universities of Germany, Italy, and Spain, by every eminent jurist in the civilized world, it will be acknowledged, that a great luminary has fallen from the firmament of public jurisprudence.

“Sir, there is no purer pride of country, than that in which we may indulge, when we see America paying back the great debt of civilization, learning, and science to Europe. In this high return of light for light, and mind for mind, in this august reckoning and accounting between the intellects of nations, Joseph Story was destined by Providence to act, and did act, an important part. Acknowledging, as we all acknowledge, our obligations to the original sources of English law, as well as of civil liberty, we have seen, in our generation, copious and salutary streams turning and running backward, replenishing their original fountains, and giving a fresher and a brighter green to the fields of English jurisprudence. By a sort of reversed hereditary transmission, the mother, without envy or humiliation, acknowledges that she has received a valuable and cherished inheritance from the daughter. English justice admits, with frankness and candor, and with no feeling but that of respect and admiration, that he, whose voice we have so recently heard within these walls, but shall now hear no more, was of all men who have yet appeared, most fitted by the comprehensiveness of his mind, and the vast extent and accuracy of his attainments, to compare the codes of nations, to trace their differences to difference of origin, climate, or religious or political institutions, and to exhibit, nevertheless, their concurrence in those great principles, upon which the system of human civilization rests.

“Justice, sir, is the great interest of man on earth. It is the ligament, which holds civilized beings, and civilized nations together. Wherever her temple stands, and so long as it is duly honored, there is a foundation for social security, general happiness, and the improvement and progress of our race. And whoever labors on this edifice, with usefulness and distinction, whoever clears its foundations, strengthens its pillars, adorns its entablatures, or contributes to raise its august dome still higher in the skies, connects himself, in name, and fame, and character, with that which is and must be as durable as the frame of human society. All know, Mr. Chief Justice, the pure love of country, which animated the deceased, and the zeal, as well as the talent, with which he explained and defended her institutions. His work on the constitution of the United States, is one of his most eminently successful labors. But all his writings, and all his judgments, all his opinions, and the whole influence of his character, public and private, leaned strongly and always, to the support of sound principles, to the restraint of illegal power, and to the discouragement and rebuke of licentious and disorganizing sentiments. ‘Ad rempublicam firmandam, et ad stabilendas vires, et sanandum populum, omnis ejus pergebat institutio.’ But this is not the occasion, sir, nor is it for me to consider and discuss at length, the character and merits of Mr. Justice Story, as a writer or a judge. The performance of that duty, with which this bar will, no doubt, charge itself, must be deferred to another opportunity, and will be committed to abler hands. But, in the homage paid to his memory, one part may come with peculiar propriety and emphasis from ourselves. We have known him in private life. We have seen him descend from the bench, and mingle in our friendly circles. We have known his manner of life, from his youth up. We can bear witness to the strict uprightness and purity of his character; his simplicity, and unostentatious habits; the ease and affability of his intercourse; his remarkable vivacity, amidst severe labors, the cheerful and animating tones of his conversation, and his fast fidelity to friends. Some of us, also, can testify to his large and liberal charities, not ostentatious or casual, but systematic, and silent,—dispensed almost without showing the hand, and falling and distilling comfort and happiness, like the dews of heaven. But we can testify, also, that in all his pursuits and employments, in all his recreations, in all his commerce with the world, and in his intercourse with the circle of his friends, the predominance of his judicial character was manifest. He never forgot the ermine which he wore. The judge, the judge, the useful and distinguished judge, was the great picture which he kept constantly before his eyes, and to a resemblance to which all his efforts, all his thoughts, all his life, were devoted. We may go the world over, without finding a man who shall present a more striking realization of the beautiful conception of D’Aguessau, ‘C’est vain que l’on cherche, à distinguer en lui la personne privée et la personne publique; un même esprit les anime, un même objet les réunit; l’homme, le père de famille, le citoyen, tout est en lui consacré à la gloire du Magistrat.’

“Mr. Chief Justice, one may live as a conqueror, or a magistrate; but he must die as a man. The bed of death brings every human being to his pure individuality; to the intense contemplation of that deepest and most solemn of all relations, the relation between the creature and his Creator. Here it is, that fame and renown cannot assist us; that all external things must fail to aid us; that even friends, affection, and human love and devotedness, cannot succor us. This relation, the true foundation of all duty, a relation perceived and felt by conscience, and confirmed by revelation, our illustrious friend, now deceased, always acknowledged. He revered the scriptures of truth, honored the pure morality which they teach, and seized hold on the hopes of future life, which they impart. He saw enough in nature, in himself, and in all that can be known of things seen, to feel assured that there is a Supreme Power, without whose Providence not a sparrow falleth to the ground. To this gracious Being he trusted himself, for time and for eternity; and the last words of his lips, ever heard by mortal ears, were a fervent supplication to his Maker to take him to Himself.”

The following resolutions, drawn up by George S. Hillard, Esq., and Charles Sumner, Esq., were then submitted to the meeting by Mr. Webster:

“Resolved, that the members of the Suffolk bar have learned with deep regret the death of the Honorable Joseph Story, one of the justices of the supreme court of the United States, and Dane Professor of Law in Harvard University.

“Resolved, that we acknowledge with the liveliest gratitude, the vast debt which we and our whole country owe to his labors and services as a judge. He was elevated to the bench in early manhood, and his judicial life was prolonged to a period almost unexampled in the annals of the common law. The wisdom of the selection was immediately indicated, by the distinguished ability which he displayed, and each succeeding year has added to the splendor and extent of his judicial fame. He moved with familiar steps over every province and department of jurisprudence. All branches of the law have been illustrated and enlarged by his learning, acuteness, and sagacity, and of some he has been the creator. His immortal judgments contain copious stores of ripe and sound learning, which will be of inestimable value in all future times, alike to the judge, the practitioner, and the student. We, too, who have had such ample opportunities of witnessing his judicial presence, can give our emphatic tribute of admiration to the gentle dignity with which he administered the law, to his untiring industry, his firm impartiality, his uniform courtesy, and recognition of the rights of all who approached him, his quickness and tact in the dispatch of business, the readiness with which he applied his vast learning, and his humanity in the treatment of those towards whom he was called upon to direct the powers and frowns of the law.

"Resolved, that in regarding the deceased as an author, jurisprudence mourns one of her greatest sons—one of the greatest not only among those of his own age, but in the long succession of ages, whose fame has become a familiar word in all lands, where the law is taught as a science; whose works have been translated and commented on in several of the classical languages of the European continent; and have been revered as authorities throughout the civilized world. It was his rare lot while yet alive, to receive, as from a distant posterity, the tribute of foreign nations to his exalted merit as a jurist.

"Resolved, that we mourn his loss as a teacher of jurisprudence, who brought to the important duties of the professor's chair the most exuberant learning, the most unwearied patience, a native delight in the great subjects which he expounded, a copious and persuasive eloquence, and a contagious enthusiasm, which filled his pupils with love for the law, and for the master who taught it so well; who illumined all his teachings by the loftiest morality, and never failed to show that whosoever aspired to the fame of a great lawyer must be also a good man.

"Resolved, that we recall with gratitude and admiration, his character as a man and a member of society. We have seen and felt the daily beauty of his life. We honor his memory for his domestic virtues, his warm affections and generous temper, the purity, elevation, and simplicity of his life and conversation, and the spontaneous sympathy which gave so cordial a charm to his looks, his tones, and his greetings. The approach of age never chilled the impulses of his heart, nor deadened his interest in life. We respect, too, his activity of mind, the literary attainments which his systematic industry enabled him to acquire, and the unaffected conscientiousness which made him so ready to assume and so prompt to discharge the common duties of life.

"Resolved, that the death of one so great as a judge, as an author, as a teacher, and so good as a man, is a loss which is irreparable to the bar, to the country, and to mankind.

"Resolved, that a committee of twelve be appointed by the chair, to consider and determine the proper tribute of respect to the deceased, and to make the necessary arrangements for carrying the same into execution.

"Resolved, that the bar tender their heartfelt sympathy to the family of the deceased, and request permission to join in the funeral ceremonies.

"Resolved, that the president of this meeting be requested to communicate a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased; and the attorney of the United States be requested to communicate the same to the circuit court of the United States, over which the deceased has so long presided, and ask to have them entered on the records of the court."

The resolutions were adopted, and the chair appointed as the committee provided for in the seventh resolution, Judge Davis, Hon. Jeremiah Mason, Judge Putnam, Judge Jackson, Benjamin Rand, Judge Sprague, Charles G. Loring, Franklin Dexter, B. R. Curtis, Judge Warren, Charles Sumner, and Robert Rantoul, Jr. Mr. Jeremiah Mason introduced the following resolution, with a few appropriate remarks:

"Resolved, that Mr. Webster be requested to pronounce a discourse on the life and judicial character of the late Mr. Justice Story, at such time and place as shall be designated by the committee of the bar."

Mr. Webster has not fulfilled this office.

At subsequent meetings of the bar, called on the opening of the circuit court in the other circuits over which Mr. Justice Story had presided, and also upon the opening of the supreme court of the United States at the succeeding term, other resolutions were passed, and addresses made, expressive of the deepest sense entertained by the bar and bench of the great loss which jurisprudence had sustained in his death. But, however grateful the publication of these would be to the feelings of the reporter, he feels constrained to omit them, for reasons wholly apart from their merit and his own wishes.

TANEY, ROGER BROOKE.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1397.]

The following proceedings of the bench and bar at the time of his death are reprinted from 2 Cliff. 609:

At the opening of the circuit court of the United States for the first circuit, holden at Boston, on the term day, Saturday the 15th of October, A. D. 1864, Judge Clifford, stating that he understood that the members of the bar desired to take some notice of the death of the late Chief Justice Taney, proceeded for that purpose, without transacting other business, to adjourn the court to Monday, the 17th of October, A. D. 1864, at twelve o'clock, M. At the opening of the court on Monday, the 17th of October, A. D. 1864, Richard H. Dana, Jr., Esq., attorney of the United States, rose and addressed the court as follows:—

"May it please your honor:—The members of the bar of this court, desiring to notice in the most reverential spirit the death of the head of the judiciary of the United States, have assembled this morning and passed certain resolutions, which they have instructed me, as the law officer of the United States, to present to the court, with a request that they may be entered upon its records. Permit me, sir, also to express the hope entertained by the bar, that your honor, as the associate and friend of the late chief justice, will be pleased to reply to the address from the bar. Some of our members have had the acquaintance of Chief Justice Taney in private life. They cherish the recollection of his extreme courtesy, his simple dignity, and the fulness and charm of his instructive conversation. Those of us, who have appeared before the high tribunal over which he presided, desire to place on public record our sense of the gratification afforded to us individually, and of the benefits conferred on the administration of public justice, by his peculiar faculty as a presiding officer, his great administrative abilities, and by the patient and unbroken attention he always gave to counsel addressing the court. And all the members of this bar, whether their knowledge of him has been official or personal, or only derived from the study of his judicial decisions, unite in acknowledging the purity of his private life, and those extraordinary intellectual qualities, working upon a fund of deep and rich legal learning, acquired by the enlightened industry of early and middle life, which have placed him in the very foremost rank of American jurists. In the presence of your honor, and of gentlemen who have known him so intimately in official and private relations, it is most becoming in me, whose acquaintance with him has been slight and recent, to do no more than to present the resolutions of the bar, and ask your honor's permission to have them entered upon the records of the court."

Mr. Dana then read the proceedings of the bar, as follows:—

"At a meeting of the members of the bar of the first circuit, held at Boston, on Saturday, the 15th of October, A. D. 1864, to take measures for giving expression to the feelings of the bar on occasion of the death of Chief Justice Taney, the meeting having been called to order by Richard H. Dana, Jr., attorney of the United States, Sidney Bartlett was appointed chairman, and Elias Merwin, secretary. On motion of Mr. Dana, a committee, consisting of Benjamin R. Curtis, Caleb Cushing, Richard H. Dana, Jr., and Sidney Bartlett, was appointed to prepare and report resolutions for the consideration of the bar. At an adjourned meeting, held Monday, the 17th of October, A. D. 1864, the following resolutions, reported by Benjamin R. Curtis, in behalf of the committee, were unanimously adopted, namely:—

“Resolved, that the members of this bar render the tribute of their admiration and reverence for the pre-eminent abilities, profound learning, incorruptible integrity, and signal private virtues exhibited in the long and illustrious judicial career of the late lamented Chief Justice Taney.

“Resolved, that the attorney of the United States be requested to communicate these proceedings to the court, and ask to have them entered on the records of the court.

“Sidney Bartlett, Chairman.

“Elias Merwin, Secretary.”

Mr. B. R. Curtis then addressed the court:—

“May it please the court: I have been requested to second the resolutions which Mr. Attorney has presented. I suppose the reason for this request is, that for six years I was in such official connection with the late chief justice as enabled me to know him better than the other members of this bar. My intimate association with him began in the autumn of 1851. He was then seventy-three years old; a period of life when, the Scripture admonishes us, and the experience of mankind proves, it is best for most men to seek that repose which belongs to old age. But it was not best for him. I observe that it has been recently said, by one who had known him upwards of forty years, that during all those years there had never been a time when his death might not reasonably have been anticipated within the next six months. Such was the impression produced on me, when I first knew him. His tall, thin form, not much bent with the weight of years, but exhibiting in his carriage and motions great muscular weakness, the apparent feebleness of his vital powers, the constant and rigid care necessary to guard what little health he had, strongly impressed casual observers with the belief that the remainder of his days must be short. But a more intimate acquaintance soon produced the conviction that his was no ordinary case, because he was no ordinary man. An accurate knowledge of his own physical condition and its necessities: an unyielding will, which, while it conformed everything to those necessities, braced and vivified the springs of life; a temper which long discipline had made calm and cheerful; and the consciousness that he occupied and continued usefully to fill a great and difficult office, whose duties were congenial to him, gave assurance, which the event has justified, that his life would be prolonged much beyond the allotted years of man. In respect to his mental powers, there was not then nor at any time while I knew him intimately, any infirmity or failure whatever. I believe the memory is that faculty which first feels the stiffness of old age. His memory was and continued to be as alert and true, as that of any man I ever knew. In consultation with his brethren he could, and habitually did, state the facts of a voluminous and complicated case, with every important detail of names and dates, with extraordinary accuracy, and I may add with extraordinary clearness and skill. And his recollection of principles of law and of the decisions of the court over which he presided was as ready as his memory of facts. He had none of the querulousness which too often accompanies old age. There can be no doubt that his was a vehement and passionate nature; but he had subdued it. I have seen him sorely tried, when the only observable effects of the trial were silence and a flushed cheek. So long as he lived, he preserved that quietness of temper and that consideration for the feelings and wishes of others which were as far as possible removed from weak and selfish querulousness. And I believe it may truly be said, that though the increasing burden of years had somewhat diminished his bodily strength, yet down to the close of the last term of the supreme court, his presence was felt to be as important as at any period of his life. I have been long enough at the bar to remember Mr. Taney's appointment; and I believe it was then the general impression, in this part of the country, that he was neither a learned nor a profound lawyer. This was certainly a mistake. His mind was thoroughly imbued with the rules of the common law and of equity law; and, whatever may have been true at the time of his appointment, when I first knew him, he was master of all that peculiar jurisprudence which it is the special province of the courts of the United States to administer and apply. His skill in applying it was of the highest order. His power of subtle analysis exceeded that of any man I ever knew; a power not without its dangers to a judge as well as to a lawyer; but in his case, it was balanced and checked by excellent common sense and by great experience in practical business, both public and private. His physical infirmities disqualified him from making those learned researches, with the results of which other great judges have illustrated and strengthened their written judgments; but it can be truly said of him that he rarely felt the need of them. The same cause prevented him from writing so large a proportion of the opinions of the court as his eminent predecessor; and it has seemed to me probable, that for this reason his real importance in the court may not have been fully appreciated, even by the bar of his own time. For it is certainly true, and I am happy to be able to bear direct testimony to it, that the surpassing ability of the chief justice, and all his great qualities of character and mind, were more fully and constantly exhibited in the consultation-room, while presiding over and assisting the deliberations of his brethren, than the public knew, or can ever justly appreciate. There, his dignity, his love of order, his gentleness, his caution, his accuracy, his discrimination, were of incalculable importance. The real intrinsic character of the tribunal was greatly influenced by them, and always for the better. How he presided over the public sessions of the court some who hear me know. The blandness of his manner, the promptness, precision, and firmness which made every word he said weighty, and made very few words necessary, and the unflinching attention which he fixed on every one who addressed the court, will be remembered by all. But all may not know that he had some other attainments and qualities important to the prompt, orderly, and safe despatch of business. In the time of his predecessor the practice of the court is understood to have been somewhat loosely administered. The amount of business in the court was then comparatively so small, that this occasioned no real detriment, probably no considerable inconvenience. But when the docket became crowded with causes, and heavy arrears were accumulated, it would have been quite otherwise. The chief justice made himself entirely familiar with the rules of practice of the court and with the circumstances out of which they had arisen. He had a natural aptitude to understand, and, so far as was needed, to reform the system. It was almost a necessity of his character to have it practically complete. It was a necessity of his character to administer it with unyielding firmness. I have not looked back to the reports to verify the fact, but I have no doubt it may be found there, that even when so infirm that he could not write other opinions, he uniformly wrote the opinions of the court upon new points of its practice. He had no more than a just estimate of their importance. The business of the supreme court came thither from nearly the whole of a continent. It arose out of many systems of laws, differing from each other in important particulars. It was conducted by counsel who travelled long distances to attend the court. It included the most diverse cases, tried in the lower courts in many different modes of procedure. Some according to the course of the common law; some under the pleadings and practice of the courts of chancery in England; some under forms borrowed from the French law; many under special laws of the United States framed for the execution of treaties; and many more so anomalous that it would not be easy to reduce them to any classification. And the tribunal itself, though it was absolutely supreme, within the limits of its powers, was bounded and circumscribed in its jurisdiction by the constitution and by acts of congress, which it was necessary constantly to regard. Let it be remembered also, for just now we may be in some danger of forgetting it, that questions of jurisdiction were questions of power as between the United States and the several states. The practice of the court therefore involved, not merely the orderly and convenient conduct of this vastly diversified business, drawn from a territory so vast, but questions of constitutional law, running deep into the framework of our complicated political system. Upon this entire subject the chief justice was vigilant, steady, and thoroughly informed. Doubtless it would be the tendency of most second-rate minds, and of not a few first-rate minds, to press such a jurisdiction out to its extreme limits, and occasionally beyond them; while for timid men, or for those who might come to that bench with formed prejudices, the opposite danger would be imminent. Perhaps I may be permitted to say, that though on the only important occasions on which I had the misfortune to differ with the chief justice on such points, I thought he and they who agreed with him carried the powers of the court too far, yet, speaking for myself, I am quite sure he fell into neither of these extremes. The great powers intrusted to the court by the constitution and laws of his country he steadily and firmly upheld and administered; and, so far as I know, he showed no disposition to exceed them.

"I have already adverted to the fact that his physical infirmities rendered it difficult for him to write a large proportion of the opinions of the court. But my own impression is that this was not the only reason why he was thus abstinent. He was as absolutely free from the slightest trace of vanity and self-conceit as any man I ever knew. He was aware that many of his associates were ambitious of doing this conspicuous part of their joint labor. The preservation of the harmony of the members of the court, and of their good-will to himself, was always in his mind. And I have not the least doubt that these considerations often influenced him to request others to prepare opinions, which he could and otherwise would have written. As it was, he has recorded many which are important, some of which are very important. This does not seem to me to be the occasion to specify, still less to criticise them. They are all characterized by that purity of style and clearness of thought which marked whatever he wrote or spoke; and some of them must always be known and recur to as masterly discussions of their subjects. It is one of the favors which the Providence of God has bestowed on our once happy country, that for the period of sixty-three years this great office has been filled by only two persons, each of whom has retained, to extreme old age, his great and useful qualities and powers. The stability, uniformity, and completeness of our national jurisprudence are in no small degree attributable to this fact. The last of them has now gone. God grant that there may be found a successor true to the constitution, able to expound and willing to apply it to the portentous questions which the passions of men have made."

Caleb Cushing, Esq., then addressed the court as follows:—

"May it please your honor:—I, also, have been placed in official and personal relations with the late Chief Justice Taney, which although not so close as those of Mr. Curtis, his associate on the bench, yet sufficient to render it an act of public duty on my part, as well as of individual respect, to address the court on this occasion, and to manifest in imperfect words my profound reverence of the person and the memory of the venerable and venerated chief justice. I do this, I undertake to speak of his life and character, with something of the same emotion as if that great magistrate, in all the gravity of his rank and station, were now before me in corporal presence on the bench. He had presided over the majesty of the supreme court during the long period of almost a complete historical generation of the human race, so that for us of this day he had become the living voice of the law,—'republicæ lex loquens.' He was one of those men who possess such tenacity of vitality as half to suggest that the human body may sometimes endure to extreme old age by the mere force of a great mind within it, as if the will had power to withstand physical decay, and repel the attacks of death. He had inducted into office nine presidents of the United States; and as he stood on that historic eastern front of the capitol, the republic's 'giant steps,' in the lofty dignity of his great form and office, year after year witnessing and assisting at the rise and fall of parties, of administrations, of dynasties, all else seemed to be transitory as day and night, evanescent as dream-spectres, whilst he and it were stable and monumental alone in this government. Take him for all in all, it is not too much to say that he worthily filled the high place, which Jay and Ellsworth and Marshall had already rendered illustrious, exhibiting in his life, like them, that supreme type of nobleness, which no hereditary charters of greatness can bestow, but which consists in the unmistakable impress of genius stamped upon his human work by the master-hand of God. Compared with them, his intellectual character had more of unity and simplicity, because it was more exclusively juridical; as he never entered congress, and as no part of his life was occupied with political debate or agitation; and he exercised functions other than legal only during the brief period, that, accidentally as it were, and not from chosen vocation, he filled the office of secretary of the treasury. With this exception, and with some further exception as a member of the legislature of his state, his long life was passed either at the bar of the state of Maryland or of the United States, or on the bench of the supreme court.

"His professional career was nearly contemporaneous with the judicial career of Chief Justice Marshall, to whose political school he belonged; and as Marshall and he together held the office of chief justice for more than sixty-three years, Marshall upwards of thirty-four years, and Taney upwards of twenty-eight years, they together, and their learned associates, may be said to have built up the great construction of our federal jurisprudence, of which the foundations only were laid in the time of Jay and Ellsworth. As a member of the bar and as attorney-general of Maryland, and as a member of the bar and attorney-general of the United States, he prepared himself, as your honor has since done, for the discharge of the higher and larger duties of the bench. His opinions, therefore, as they appear in the six last volumes of Peters, in the twenty-four volumes of Howard, and in the three volumes of Black, compose the great records of his judicial life; and they constitute a monument of usefulness, and a title of fame deserving to be placed on a level at least with the opinions of any of the most renowned magistrates of France, of England, or of the United States. As matter, and as reasoning, they are distinguished by completeness of learning, by comprehensiveness of grasp, and perspicacity of thought, by logical precision, clearness and perfection of argument, and by conclusions which command our respect, and not seldom our assent, even when contrary to those of the majority of the court. As rhetorical style, they are of unsurpassed excellence, and perfect models of judicial composition. The diction is pure and chaste, without solecisms of word or grammar; the sentences are well constructed; the thoughts are systematically arranged; the propositions are symmetrical, with their conditions or qualifications, not patched on rudely, or loosely scattered about, but incorporated into the sentence or paragraph; and the whole show signs of the limæ labor of a skillful hand and well-trained intellect. In illustration of all these qualities, we may point to his opinion in the case of The Genessee Chief, which reversed the law of the court, as laid down by Marshall, on the question of admiralty jurisdiction in the navigable fresh waters of the United States; his dissenting opinion in Smith v. Turner, and Norris v. Boston, commonly called the 'Passenger Cases;' and his opinions in the case of Luther v. Borden, and the case of Ableman v. Booth.

"His deportment towards the bar was uniformly attentive, courteous, and kind, self-respecting, and, therefore, respectful; which was the more important, not only because he, of course, spoke for the court in its official communications with the bar, but because he generally pronounced the law on all questions of the practice of the court. Of the inner qualities of the judicial character of the chief justice, as observed by his associates on the bench, who alone could see and appreciate those qualities, Mr. Curtis has spoken in terms of cordial praise befitting himself and the subject; and your honor cannot fail to bear similar testimony to the exalted virtues of a cherished friend and respected chief. I speak of the private character of the chief justice only to say that it was such as became his public life; tender and affectionate in domestic relations, courteous with a sort of gentle stateliness of courtesy in social intercourse, dignified and yet of unaffected simplicity in all things, so that in his presence one felt the sense of his greatness, not oppressively but pleasantly, as a force that warmed and cheered, while it also attracted and elevated all within the scope of its influence. You forgot, then, the great and lofty magistrate, and saw only the high-toned gentleman, the wise and good man, on whose ordinary life the weight of conscious power rested as gracefully as the robes of office which invested him on the bench. May it please your honor, such, after twenty-eight years of personal observation and knowledge, are my impressions of the judicial career and public and private character of Chief Justice Taney. And permit me now in conclusion to touch, and but to touch, a class of considerations, which are in all men's minds, and of which not to speak at all might be taken to imply that nothing can be appropriately spoken. We live in a country of republican institutions, where debate, oral and written, is free even to licentiousness; where political parties or factions occupy the field of public affairs; and where all conspicuous persons are subject alike to unmeasured praise or unmeasured blame according to the prevalent passions of the hour. If, as Lord Palmerston once said, the agitations of opinion are the consumers of life, so they are also the creators of life, in all elective governments. They are the drawbacks on the blessing of liberty, they are the price at which greatness is purchased. None, therefore, traverse the troubled sea of political affairs without being tossed or buffeted by the waves or winds of party opinion.

"Thus it happened to Taney: but so also it happened to Jay, to Ellsworth, and to Marshall. Each of them passed from political life to the bench. Nay, more, Jay held the appointment of envoy extraordinary to Great Britain, and Ellsworth that to France, each while continuing for a while to be chief justice; and Marshall exercised at the same time the functions of secretary of state, and of chief justice. Be sure that each of these great men, either before, or after, or during his tenure of the chief justiceship, performed some political act not less unacceptable to adversary parties than any performed by Taney while secretary of the treasury. Be sure, also, that if it were worth one's while, on a solemn occasion like this, to deal seriously with any of these futilities of bygone controversy, it would be easy for me to cite opinions of Marshall, to say nothing of Jay and Ellsworth, which occasioned at the time not less of party sensibility than any one of Taney's. But enough of this. If we refuse to be just even to the great men of our country while they are living, we can afford to be generous to them when they are dead, and when they cease to stand in the pathway of our convictions, our interests, and our ambitions. When their human forms no longer move and speak and act, but come to be fixed and silent on the canvas of history, when the mortal man has put on immortality, and he but appears to us in memory like one of the disembodied shadows of statesmen and heroes in the divine visions of Dante, then, if living he were truly great, he looms up the more grandly in death, his proportions magnified in the haze of the distance, the faulty points shaded over and filled up, but the mighty outlines imaged to the eye with tenfold distinctness and vividness of perception. Thus, in my judgment, will the world see Taney hereafter, as it now does Jay and Ellsworth and Marshall. And he, like them, so long as the memory of present time endures, will stand secure on the pedestal of the ages, statuesque in his erminent dignity, colossal in his intellectual lineaments, to be admired and honored,—and may we not hope to be emulated?—as one of the greatest among the great men of America."

Charles L. Woodbury, Esq., then addressed the court as follows:—

"May it please your honor:—The eulogy upon the intellectual ability of the late chief justice I may well leave to abler hands than mine, to the leaders of this bar, whose discrimination and experience so well fit them to the duty. I have risen simply as one who probably has known the late chief justice longer than any other member of this bar, to offer the tribute of my respect. In my youth the residence of my father was for many years in close proximity to his, and in the daily intercourse of families it was my privilege to see him frequently in his domestic circle. Afterwards, when called to the bar, I had occasions in the supreme court to feel his personal kindness, and to observe that it was extended considerably to all the younger members of the bar. As a student and young lawyer in that section, I always found the local fame of Mr. Taney as the first lawyer of Maryland, since the palmiest days of Luther Martin, an axiom of belief. The late chief justice was not merely the calm, dignified, and untiringly laborious cabinet minister and judge as all saw him. That placid exterior was not the result of apathy, nor did it denote an emotionless nature. Within the depths of his character there was a great and stormy energy; within his heart there was a depth and power of passion that stirred and woke his intellectual nature to the highest efforts of his genius. He knew how to govern himself. Like General Washington, his entire self-control, and that perfect self-command to which his iron will had subjected his whole physical nature, gave him that loftiest of moral dignity, inspiring awe as well as admiration at his equitable and emotionless conduct. He was a chief. Had he been a soldier he would have been a hero. For forty years that great man has occupied most distinguished positions in the state, with a personal bearing as unruffled as if no storm could sweep the surface. And yet amid all this native strength of character and powerful self-control, his domestic virtues were most fully developed and of the kindest nature.

"Mr. Taney accepted his judicial position as an end; and it is, I think, safe to say that he had no political ambition. His highest eulogy, and the one most befitting the lofty station that he filled, was that in all his official and private intercourse his conduct was always becoming the high-toned gentleman, and believing Christian, which he professed himself to be before the world. Heaven grant that in the future our country may have other chief justices as great and good as him."

His honor Judge Clifford then spoke as follows:—

"The court cordially concurs with the members of the bar in their testimony of respect to the memory of Chief Justice Taney, and will cheerfully, but with heartfelt sorrow, comply with their request to place the resolutions they have adopted upon the records of the court. Death has removed from the high sphere of his duties the venerable chief justice of the supreme court of the United States, and it is eminently fit and proper that the members of this bar should pause in the midst of their usual avocations and give public expression to their sense of the great loss they have sustained, and to the profound respect and veneration they entertain for the exalted private virtues and distinguished public services of the great magistrate, whose earthly career is now closed forever. Rest assured that the court fully approves the resolutions you have adopted, and will heartily unite with you in responding to the sentiments which they contain. Such a manifestation of the sense of the great loss which has been sustained in his death, not only by the bench and the bar, but by the whole people of the United States, is no more than what is befitting this occasion, and entirely accords with my own views and feelings upon the subject. Having enjoyed his confidence for more than a quarter of a century, and for six years last past been associated with him in the bench of the supreme court, I should do injustice to my own feelings if I omitted to say that none can fully appreciate the extent of the loss which the surviving members of the supreme court have sustained, except those who have known him intimately, and often met him at the private consultations and conferences of the court. All such must forever feel that the whole country has peculiar and lasting cause to mourn his loss as a great and good man, and as a learned, wise, and just magistrate. Unreal greatness of every kind always diminishes as you approach it, but true judicial greatness shines even brighter in the conference-room than in the bench or in the forum of public discussion. Those who have often met him in those weekly conferences best know the great value of his public services, because the best opportunities were afforded there to witness his unerring love of justice, the exhibitions of his profound experience, and the clearness, strength, and comprehension of the logical resources of his mind. Justice requires me to say that, in his hands, the most complicated causes were made plain, and the weightiest and most difficult questions became of ready and easy solution, and yet he was as willing to concede to his associates the right of independent judgment as to exercise it himself; and in cases of real doubt and difference of opinion was as prompt as any of them to modify or even yield his first impressions. Extended remarks upon his recorded judgments are unnecessary, as that duty has been well performed at the bar. Undoubtedly they constitute the great legacy he has left to his country, and it does not require the gift of prophecy to foretell that they will have the effect to preserve his memory in grateful remembrance as long as the constitution of the United States, and the institutions of free government which it ordains, shall endure. Suffice it to say upon this subject, that, in my judgment, the opinions delivered by the chief justice during the long period he presided in the supreme court of the United States, are unsurpassed as clear, logical, and correct expositions of law, if due regard be had to their number, to the magnitude of the controversies, and the scope and variety of the questions which the controversies involved.

Chief Justice Taney was a native of Maryland, and was born on the 17th of March, 1777, in Calvert county, in that state. His ancestors were among the earliest settlers of the state, having emigrated from England to that colony in the time of the Protector. Most of them were Catholics, and for many years they experienced the disabilities incident to their religious faith, under the intolerant legislation of the parent country. Better times, however, were approaching, and when the people of Maryland adopted their constitution, in 1776, they abolished all such distinctions, and established full equality of political privilege, irrespective of religious opinion. Subsequent to that period, the father of the subject of these remarks was repeatedly elected to represent his native county in the lower house of the legislature, and ever after enjoyed the full benefits of religious toleration. Influenced, perhaps, by those considerations he afterwards sent his son, Roger B. Taney, to Dickinson College, in the state of Pennsylvania, which was under the superintendence of Protestant professors. Persons who knew him well have often remarked that it was there that he learned his views of religious toleration, and it was there, also, that he completed his classical education. Choosing the law for his profession, he commenced his study at Annapolis, in 1796, the year after he graduated. As is well known, he read law with Jeremiah T. Chase, chief justice of the general court of the state, and was admitted to practice in three years after he commenced the study. When admitted to the bar he immediately returned to his native county to practise his profession, and in the autumn of the same year, when but twenty-three years of age, was elected a delegate to the general assembly of the state. Contemporaries agree that he displayed in the assembly an intrepidity of character and an uprightness of motive which secured for him the esteem and admiration of his associates, but he declined a reelection with a view of applying himself more closely to the practice of his chosen profession. Actuated by the motive of enlarging his business, he left his native county and removed to the county of Frederick, where he resided for twenty-two years. While residing there, in 1816, he was elected to the senate of the state, and served with great distinction as senator for the term of five years. Politics, however, had not sufficient charms to tempt him to abandon the favorite pursuit of his life. On the contrary, the universal testimony is, that during the period he resided there he very much increased his practice, and that it embraced the widest range of subjects and every description of civil and criminal jurisprudence, which, doubtless, had the effect to lay even more deeply than had been done in his preparatory studies, the foundations of those solid professional attainments, which so eminently fitted him for the performance of the still higher class of duties which devolved upon him in after life. Evidence is not wanting to show that his competitors at the bar, during that period, were jurists and advocates of the very highest order of talent, as will abundantly appear by a reference to the judicial reports of the state. Mention need only be made of Pinkney, Martin, Harper, and Winder, but there were a host of others of less age, just advancing into the first rank of the legal profession. Powerful as was the competition, still his practice, as has been well remarked by a distinguished writer, was constantly increasing, and in a brief time became both extensive and lucrative, 'not only in the county courts in the judicial district where he resided, but also in the court of appeals.' Considerations, growing out of the increase of his business, induced him, upon the death of Mr. Pinkney, to accept an invitation to remove to the city of Baltimore, from which came a large portion of his commercial practice. One who knew him well says that the field was too tempting to be shunned, and that he 'entered upon it in the full vigor of his faculties, with an established reputation and with talents and attainments that fitted him to maintain it against all opposition.' After his removal to Baltimore the field of his professional practice was very much enlarged. Several of his former competitors had been removed by death, and his services were now sought, on one side or the other, in most of the controversies of great magnitude, litigated in the tribunals of the state, and he at once entered upon the more enlarged sphere of practice in the supreme court at the city of Washington, over which he has since presided for so many years. Additional labor was also devolved upon him a few years later by his acceptance of the appointment of attorney-general of the state. The appointment was made in 1837, and it appears that he continued to hold the office until June, 1851, when he resigned it upon receiving the appointment to the same office under the federal government. Power of appointment, when he was commissioned as attorney-general of the state, was vested in the governor and council, and the fact that he was known to be opposed to those functionaries when the office was tendered to him furnishes but one among many evidences which exist to show that a high estimate was placed upon his personal character and professional qualifications. Beyond doubt he was, at that period, the leading advocate at the bar of his native state. Old competitors had passed away or been left behind, and he remained without a rival; but in a few years a new and equally accomplished competitor appeared to compete for the first honors of that distinguished bar. William Wirt removed to Baltimore in 1829, still possessing all the power and eloquence which he had displayed in his earlier practice in that city, and which had characterized his brilliant efforts as attorney-general in the supreme court of the United States. Comparison between those distinguished advocates will not be attempted, as it is well known that 'their professional talents were as diverse as their manner at the bar and their style of elocution.' Reference to the judicial records will show that they often met, and it will be sufficient to say that the exact and comprehensive legal knowledge of the chief justice, together with his calm and clear logic, made him a full match for his polished and impassioned competitor, and that he came out of the contest with a reputation greatly increased, as all his contemporaries freely admit. But circumstances over which he had no control soon opened a new field for the employment of his professional talents. Difficulties in the cabinet of General Jackson induced Mr. Berrien to resign the office of attorney-general of the United States, and in June, 1831, the president having come to the conclusion to reconstruct the cabinet, tendered Mr. Taney that office, which he accepted; and he continued to discharge its duties with unsurpassed ability and success until, at the earnest solicitation of the president, he resigned it to accept the office of secretary of the treasury. His appointment as secretary of the treasury was made in September, 1833, and on the 23d of the same month he issued the celebrated order for the removal of the deposits. By that order he gave great offence to a majority of the senate, in consequence of which his nomination was rejected, and he returned to the city of his residence to practise his profession. Whatever explanations of these events are necessary have already been given at the bar, and need not be repeated. Enjoying the confidence of the president, as he did, it was hardly to be expected that he would long remain in private life, and, accordingly, upon the resignation of Mr. Justice Duval, in January, 1835, he was nominated as an associate justice of the supreme court of the United States, but the senate refused to entertain the nomination, except to postpone it indefinitely on the last day of the session. Chief Justice Marshall died on the 6th of July, 1835, and on the 28th of December following, the president sent to the senate the name of Roger B. Taney for the office of chief justice of the supreme court, made vacant by the death of that illustrious magistrate. But the senate did not act upon the nomination until the 15th of March following, when it was confirmed by a large majority. Further comment upon his judicial opinions will not be attempted, except to say that they are invariably based on principle more than on decided cases, as may readily be seen by consulting any one of the thirty-three volumes where they are to be found. Taken as a whole they constitute an imperishable monument to his memory, which needs no further inscription to insure its transmission to future ages. Great as is his loss to the country, it is even greater to the surviving members of the court over which he so long presided, because to them it is irreparable. Irreparable, I repeat, not only on account of his great experience and profound knowledge, but also on account of his pre-eminent ability and success in presiding over the deliberations of the court. Some of the duties incident to that position are as delicate as they are important, and yet he always performed them to entire acceptance. Indeed, his whole intercourse with his associates was characterized by such a sense of justice and impartiality, and by such an unrivaled equanimity, exemplary benignity of temper, and amenity of manners, that no one of the number ever had the slightest cause of offence. Nothing need be said of his private life, as all concede that it was eminently worthy of the exalted character he sustained in all the public stations which he filled. Attempts have been made to call in question his patriotism; but I think it my duty to say, what I sincerely believe, that the charges were as unfounded as they are now harmless to the object of their attack. Gone to the grave in the full fruition of his honors, his reputation is above the reach of any such reproach. Reverence for the constitution of the United States was a leading characteristic of his judicial life, as every one knows who was ever associated with him in the bench, and as all others may know if they will but consult his judicial opinions upon constitutional questions. He revered the constitution as the great result of the Revolution, and as having been ordained 'to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty;' and I have no hesitation in declaring that there is not an act of his life inconsistent with that profession. Pursuant to the request of the members of the bar it is ordered that the resolutions which have been read shall be placed upon the records of the court."

The following is reprinted from 5 Blatchf. 552:

The following proceedings took place in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of New York, at the city of Albany, before Mr. Justice Nelson and Judge Hall on the 14th of October, 1864:

The Death of Chief Justice Taney.

Mr. John V. L. Pruyn addressed the court as follows:

"May it please the court: I am sure that the duty I am about to perform is one which will meet the cordial approval of your honors. I wish to announce in form, in order that a proper record of the event may be made, by your direction, on the minutes of the court, the sad news which we all heard yesterday, of the death of the chief justice of the supreme court of the United States. His feeble health for several years past, had, at his great age, rendered this event one to which his friends and the country had looked forward as likely, in the course of nature, soon to occur, and the weight of the blow has thus been somewhat lessened by the premonitions of its occurrence. Looking at the large powers vested in the supreme court of the United States—much greater under our form of government than those lodged with tribunals occupying relatively the same position in other countries—the extent and character of its jurisdiction, and the high respect in which its judgments have been held, the loss of its presiding judge is an event of very great importance in the constitutional and judicial history of our country. In this case that importance is unusually marked. The deceased chief justice had held his high office for the long space of twenty-eight years and upwards, discharging its duties with an ability and integrity which was admitted by the whole country. During this extended period many constitutional questions of great importance were passed upon by the court, after their discussion by the most distinguished counsel in the land, and most of the vexed points which disturbed our early judicial history were disposed of. In their decision the clear and luminous mind of the chief justice appears in every page, and his opinions will hereafter be referred to, as worthy of the reputation of a court which has numbered among its judges so many illustrious names. In the few hours which have passed (and those interrupted by other cares) since I was requested to discharge the duty I am so imperfectly attempting to perform, I have only had time to bring together a few of the events in the life of the late chief justice, which may be of interest to us who survive.

"Roger Brooke Taney was born in Calvert county, Maryland, on the 17th of March, 1777, and thus was, at the time of his death, in the 88th year of his age. He graduated at Dickinson College, Pennsylvania, in the year 1795, studied law at Annapolis, was admitted to the bar in 1799, and in the same year was elected to the house of delegates in Maryland, being the youngest member of that body. He declined a re-election to this office, preferring to give his whole time and energies to his profession. In the year 1800 he removed from his native county, where he had commenced practice, to Fredericktown, where he pursued his profession most laboriously for twenty-two years, when he changed his residence to Baltimore. During this period he attained a high position at the bar; and the Maryland Reports of that time show that he was engaged in many of the important cases which were brought before the courts of that state, meeting in argument such men as Pinkney, Williams, Martin, and others of the eminent lawyers of that commonwealth. In some of these cases, with that firmness of purpose for which he was so distinguished, Mr. Taney stood up manfully for what he believed the right, without regard to public opinion. In no instance was this more conspicuous than in that of the Reverend Mr. Gruber, a Methodist clergyman, who had been indicted for an attempt, by his preaching at a camp-meeting, to stir up an insurrection among the slaves. By the cleverness and ability displayed by Mr. Taney on the trial, the prisoner was acquitted. For a long period (I quote from one of his biographers) 'the Methodists of that section entertained the kindest feelings for the Roman Catholic advocate, who had successfully defended their pastor against popular excitement and judicial power.' Mr. Taney served one term in the senate of his native state—from 1816 to 1821. In 1823 he removed to Baltimore, where he almost immediately entered upon a large practice in the federal courts. The then recent death of Mr. Pinkney, Mr. Martin, Mr. Harper, and others of the leading members of the bar, had left the space to be filled, which Mr. Taney entered upon with all that zeal, industry and ability which had already secured him a wide reputation. In 1827 he was appointed, by the governor and council, attorney general of Maryland. The estimation in which he was then held, may be inferred from the fact that he was politically opposed to the appointing power. It was during his professional career, while residing in Baltimore, that Mr. Taney and Mr. Wirt often met in professional struggles, and to the honor of the latter it should be said, that he never hesitated to speak in the highest terms of the great ability of his adversary. In June, 1831, Mr. Taney was appointed by General Jackson attorney general of the United States. Most exciting questions arose during this administration, especially those of nullification, and the recharter of the United States Bank. The attorney general stood firmly by the president in all these controversies, and, on the resignation of Mr. Duane, as secretary of the treasury, growing out of the question as to the removal of the government deposits from the Bank of the United States, Mr. Taney, in 1833, was transferred to the treasury department. His celebrated order, removing the deposits, led to the rejection of his nomination as secretary of the treasury by the senate, and, in June, 1834, he resigned. The term of about nine months during which he held this office, was, it is believed, the only time during which he was entirely withdrawn from professional life. In the early part of 1835 General Jackson nominated Mr. Taney to the senate as one of the associate justices of the supreme court, in the room of Judge Duvall, deceased. The senate did not act on the nomination, and, Chief Justice Marshall having died in the summer of 1835, the president, on the 23th of December of that year nominated Mr. Taney as chief justice, which nomination was confirmed on the 15th of March, 1836. Mr. Clay, it is said, strenuously opposed the confirmation of the nomination, but frankly admitted to Judge Taney, years afterward, that he regretted his course, adding, with a cordial shake of the hand, that he regarded him as a worthy successor of Chief Justice Marshall. What higher praise could have been asked for?

"Judge Taney held the circuit court in Maryland, during the year 1836, and took his seat on the bench of the supreme court in January, 1837. From that time to the day of his death, the history of the chief justice is known to the world. The published reports of the decisions of the high tribunal over which he so ably presided, speak of and for his labors far more emphatically than anything I could say. Did time allow me, I might refer to the great learning and ability displayed in many of the opinions he pronounced, and especially of the luminous character of those which related to constitutional questions. But I must pass this by, and proceed to other topics. I will not undertake to speak at length of the professional ability and mental characteristics of the departed judge. That duty will no doubt be more ably and more appropriately performed in another place, and under circumstances which will give the occasion a national character. He was a well read and profound lawyer, strong in his convictions as to great principles, and firmly adhering to them. In the clearness and logical character of his judgments, he was not excelled by any jurist of our country. It was beautifully remarked of him, by Mr. Wirt, that he was 'the man of moonlight mind; I mean,' he said, 'the moonlight of the Arctics, where you have all the light of day without its glare.' His deportment on the bench was beyond all praise. The quiet dignity of his manner, and the ease and grace with which he presided over the deliberations of the court, can never be forgotten by those who witnessed them. And how can I speak of his conduct to the bar? Never was a judge more kind, more considerate, more patient than he. Every one who addressed him, while impressed with the presence in which he stood, still felt that he was speaking, as it were, to a friend—one who would overlook the imperfectness of his argument, and patiently weigh and consider every view presented. But the chief justice was that without which acquirements, learning, all other attainments, are of little moment—a thoroughly incorruptible, fearless and honest judge. Little did those who only saw him presiding in court, where the kindness and childlike gentleness of his manner were so apparent, know how brave a heart beat under that quiet and calm exterior. He was one of the few—alas! how few there are—who had the moral courage to do what he believed to be right, and I am firmly convinced, that rather than yield his views on any of the great questions of constitutional law which form the groundwork of our institutions, he would readily have sacrificed his life. But you, sir, [addressing Mr. Justice Nelson] who were associated with him so many years in the discharge of your high official functions, knew him so well, you so thoroughly understood his many excellent qualities both of heart and mind, his great attainments and his elevated character, that I feel that, in your presence, I ought not to say more on this subject.

"The daily beauty and simplicity of the private life of the chief justice I believe to have been almost without parallel along the great men of our country. In his conversation he was most attractive, winning and instructive, and I never left, after an interview with him, without increased regard for his virtues and character. Of his religious life I cannot venture to speak, except perhaps to say that which is known to us all, that he was one of the most prominent members of the Roman Catholic Church in this country—devoted, in the broad spirit of Christianity, to its institutions and its interests. But he comprehended all classes of men in his sympathies, and showed his faith by a life of duty, integrity and Christian devotion here, which, we reverently trust, has secured for him an eternal reward in that blessed state to which he has gone. 'Clarum et venerabile nomen'—long may the influence of the ability, the integrity, and the pure and elevated character of the great departed judge, remain with the members of that august tribunal over which he so long and honorably presided. May it please the court, I now move that an appropriate entry of the death of Chief Justice Taney, be made by the clerk on the records of this court, and that the court do now adjourn."

Mr. Justice Nelson responded as follows: "The death of Chief Justice Taney, from his great age, in his eighty-eighth year, and bodily infirmities, was not unexpected. For several years past he has been, physically, so feeble as to excite, constantly, the serious apprehension of his family and friends. But his mind, during all these years, and at all times, has been unimpaired. The life and public services of this venerable and eminent judge have been so long and so conspicuously before the country, that it can hardly be necessary to do more than to allude to them. He was one of the most learned and able lawyers of the nation, while engaged in the practice of the law, and well earned and achieved the highest honors of his profession; and, in all the public offices and employments which he has filled—attorney-general of the United States, secretary of the treasury, and chief justice of the supreme court of the nation—his clear intellect and unpretending habits, both in public and private life, were always distinguished characteristics. There never was a public functionary, in this or any other country, who brought to the investigation of the great questions that came before him, political or judicial, or to the discharge of his high duties, a clearer understanding, or purer heart, or greater patience and devotion in the pursuit of right and justice. Few men possessed a more well balanced mind in the discharge of varied duties and responsibilities, and in the application of it to the business affairs of life. In his nature and temperament, there were fewer disturbing elements than ordinarily fall to the lot of humanity. His disposition was kind and generous; and his intercourse and association with his brethren and the bar were most courteous and friendly. He was always ready and willing to give them the benefit of his counsel and advice. In his death, the country has lost a public servant, a large portion of whose life has been devoted to her service—the bench and the bar, their best friend and brightest ornament. Those of us who have been long and intimately associated with him feel most deeply his loss. He was our friend and brother. Our best consolation is in the memory of his virtues and of the good deeds that filled the measure of his life."

THOMPSON, SMITH.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1398.]

The following notice is reprinted from 2 Paine, (Preface):

To Justice Thompson, however, we are chiefly indebted for the learned, clear, and satisfactory decisions which are contained in this volume. In the long list of eminent jurists whom the state of New York is proud to enroll among her sons, none, perhaps, were more conspicuous for those sterling qualities of head and heart which constitute the able and efficient judge than Smith Thompson. He possessed a mind of remarkable clearness and vigor, and powers of analysis and close reasoning of no ordinary kind. Modest in his deportment, and plain in his manners, he yet had a firmness of purpose and an independence of spirit, which, in the pursuit of truth and right, were inflexible. His opinions, so lucid and concise, and expressed in language so simple, yet so pointed, are models of judicial composition. Called to the bench of the supreme court of New York so early as 1802, and having for his official associates no less distinguished personages than James Kent, Morgan Lewis, and Ambrose Spencer, he at once took a prominent position, which he ever after, during a long judicial career, maintained. He subsequently filled the post and discharged the duties of chief justice of the state of New York; and on the 18th of March, 1823, a vacancy having occurred on the bench of the supreme court of the United States, by the lamented death of the Hon. Brockholst Livingston, one of the associate justices and presiding judge of the circuit court in the second circuit, on the 9th of December of the same year Judge Thompson was appointed his successor.

THRUSTON, BUCKNER.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1398.]

Circuit Court of the District of Columbia for the County of Washington. At a meeting of the bar and officers of the court on the 30th day of August, 1845, on motion, Richard S. Coxe, Esq., was appointed chairman and William Brent secretary.

On motion of Joseph H. Bradley, Esq., the following resolutions were unanimously adopted: "Resolved, that this meeting have heard with deep and sincere emotion of the death of the Hon. Buckner Thruston, for many years a judge of the circuit court of the District of Columbia. Resolved, that we lament the death of an individual with whom we have been long associated in the administration of justice, and in the intercourse of society, distinguished by his elegant attainments as a scholar, for his extensive erudition, for his integrity on the bench, and his accomplishments as a gentleman. Resolved, that we sincerely sympathize with his afflicted family in the death of Judge Thruston, full of years and ripe in character. Resolved, that the district attorney be requested to submit these proceedings to the circuit court, and to ask the court to permit them to be entered on their minutes and to unite with the bar and officers of the court in paying respect to the memory of the deceased; and that we will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days. Resolved, that a copy of these proceedings be respectfully communicated to the family of the deceased, and be published in the several newspapers in this district."

James Hoban, Esq., district attorney, submitted the above proceedings to the court. To which the Hon. William Cranch, chief judge, made the following reply in behalf of the court: "The court has received with great sensibility information of the death of Hon. Buckner Thruston, one of the judges of this court. Having been long associated with him in the discharge of our judicial duties, we cannot but deeply feel the loss we have sustained. His judicial life has been prolonged beyond the usual term of human life, and has been uniformly marked with strict integrity. But this is not the time or place to pronounce his eulogy. His long and faithful services are well known and appreciated in the community and will be long remembered. The surviving judges deeply sympathize with the gentlemen of the bar, officers of the court, and the afflicted family of the deceased, and will join them in the testimonials of respect proposed by the bar and the officers of the court, and will order their proceedings to be entered on the minutes of the court. The court will now adjourn. Test: Wm. Brent, Clerk."

John Buckner Thruston was born in Virginia, in 1763. He was the son of Charles Mynn Thruston, a distinguished Revolutionary officer. He emigrated in early life to Kentucky. Studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practiced his profession at Frankfort. Being possessed of superior talent he was called into public service by being appointed United States judge for the courts of the territory of Orleans in 1805; but on his election to the senate of the United States from Kentucky, he declined the appointment of judge. He served as senator from December 2, 1805, to July 1, 1809. Although elected for six years, he resigned on being appointed by President Madison judge of the United States circuit court of the District of Columbia. This office he held until his death at Washington, D. C., August 30, 1845, in the 83d year of his age, having occupied the bench 36 years. He was a gentleman in every sense of the word; that is, superior attainments combined with his urbane manners in private life, made his company pleasing, instructive and procured for him general esteem.

TRIGG, CONNALLY F.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1399.]

The following proceedings of the bar are reprinted from 1 Flip. v.:

The Honorable Connally F. Trigg, United States district judge for the eastern and middle districts of Tennessee, died at his home in Bristol, on Sunday, April 25, 1880. He was born in Abingdon, Virginia, March 8, 1810. Was appointed by President Lincoln to the position he held at the time of his death, July 2, 1862. A meeting of the members of the Memphis bar was held, when a committee, composed of W. Y. C. Humes, M. P. Jarnagin, George Gantt, Luke W. Finlay, and S. P. Walker, was appointed, who reported resolutions highly complimentary to the deceased. These were seconded by Mr. Jarnagin, and unanimously adopted. Henry Craft, Esq., on a subsequent day, delivered a eulogy upon the deceased, saying among other things:

"As Judge Trigg came to judicial position in stormy times, and presided in the federal courts of this state in the convulsion and in the reconstruction, it was natural and proper that these bar resolutions should direct attention to his bearing in those troublous days. When those who had been out in the Confederate ranks returned, they became a host of witnesses to the equanimity, the courage, and the fine intelligence which characterized his discharge of duty. It fell to his lot to be the pioneer in judicial action upon many novel and important questions growing out of the war, and out of the legislation which it engendered; and it must have been highly gratifying to him that the supreme court of the United States affirmed his rulings. Because of his action, I have often said, and the assertion is not too strong, that Tennessee owes to Judge Trigg more than to any other judge. I knew him well, and in the most intimate social relation, while these trying questions were being presented, and I can say that I never saw him when he seemed to feel the slightest perplexity, or doubt, or hesitation, as to his course. He seemed to be guided by a sort of innate sense of what was right, and to go straight forward almost without need for deliberation. I presented the application of the lawyers returning from the war, for admission to his court without taking the test oath. Some of them were surprised that I did not consider it necessary to make elaborate argument, or to adduce a great array of authority. I told them I had become too familiar with his habit of thought and feeling to entertain a moment's apprehension as to what he would do. His opinion [delivered May 10, 1865] in that matter virtually covered the very ground upon which the supreme court afterwards rested a similar decision. As far as he was from the weakness of concession to the passion and prejudice of one side, he was equally far from encouragement or approval of what was done on the other. He was loyal in his whole being to the constitution and the Union, and ready and anxious to exert all his power to maintain them. He made no compromise with secession, and looked with sternest disapproval upon the effort to tear the flag in twain; but he was utterly a stranger to malice or vindictiveness toward those who upheld the Confederate cause. He earnestly desired to see their efforts thwarted, and their military power crushed; but when this was done, it was not in his nature, nor in his construction of the law, to inflict punishment by confiscation of their property, nor by proceeding against them as criminals. I heard him say from the bench, in dealing with confiscation cases: 'The informer does not commend himself to the favorable consideration of this court.' I repeat that the state owes to Judge Trigg a debt of gratitude greater than to any other man who has exercised judicial functions within her boundaries.

"As I think now of Judge Trigg in the discharge of his official duty; as I recall his benignant face so finely put upon the canvas that hurls in your honor's chamber; as I remember him in social intercourse, and as my mind runs rapidly over the retrospect of the fifteen years during which he went and came among us, I recognize a guileless, straight-forward simplicity as the prominent trait of his character. To do right, to be just, to indulge the largest charity, to be alive to all human sympathy, and to administer the law as one who could be touched with the feeling of human infirmity, seemed to be so natural to him as to require no effort. Utterly devoid of affectation and egotism and selfishness, he never seemed to think that there was anything he could do other than just what he did. He claimed no credit, sought no applause, but walked calmly along his judicial path, apparently unconscious that he was exhibiting the highest qualities of our manhood. This simplicity of character was conspicuous in his steadfast adherence to the fundamental principles, and his abiding faith in the rudimental truths of jurisprudence—principles and truths with which he was very familiar. He was not a learned judge in the sense of knowing what a hundred courts had decided upon a thousand questions. He could not rattle off the names of cases and books, nor stuff an opinion with precedents and quotations; but there were great lights, older than the books and steadfast as the stars, towards which his mind turned as the needle turns to the pole. Judge Trigg lived out the allotted three-score years and ten, in the ripeness of age; in charity with all the world; without blot or stain upon his private or judicial robes; loyal to country, to friends and to family; loyal to duty and truth, he has calmly gone away. Those loved him most who knew him best. He was a good judge, a good citizen, and a good man. This is a truthful eulogy. Is it not eulogy enough?"

WARE, ASHUR.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1400.]

The following proceedings upon his resignation and death are reprinted from 3 Ware, 329, 337:

The members of the Cumberland bar met by invitation at the United States court room in Portland, on Wednesday, the 23d day of May, 1866, to determine what expression of their esteem and respect for Judge Ware would be appropriate to the occasion of his retirement from the bench of the district court of the United States, a position which he had resigned after a judicial service of more than forty-four years. Hon. Thomas A. Deblois, Hon. George Evans, and District Attorney Geo. F. Talbot, were appointed a committee to prepare resolutions expressive of the sentiments of the bar on the occasion. At an adjourned meeting, Mr. Talbot, from this committee, presented the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, that the members of Cumberland bar, ask leave, on the occasion of the retirement of Judge Ware from the bench of the district court of the United States, to express their high appreciation of the important labors and studies, by which, through his long career of judicial service, the principles of maritime equity and international law have been established, and the interests of commerce have been secured and extended; and to signify their pride and satisfaction in the just eminence, which the pure style, the exhaustive learning, and the logical candor of his published opinions have gained for him among jurists throughout the world.

"Resolved, that we shall ever cherish in grateful remembrance, the patience, impartiality, and courtesy, which have marked the official conduct of Judge Ware towards the members of the bar, and the amiable frankness and dignified simplicity, which in his intercourse with us individually, have formed the basis of the friendship and veneration in which he has long been held; and that we tender to him our cordial wishes that he may find in the retirement he has chosen as the appropriate close of his protracted labors, that calm satisfaction, which the retrospect of important service to his age and to the world, faithfully performed, cannot fail to give, and that peace of mind which flows out of a pure and blameless life."

It was then voted, that the resolutions be presented by the U. S. district attorney to Judge Ware, at the coming in of the court on Thursday, May 31st, at 11 o'clock A. M., being the last day previous to that on which his resignation was to take effect, with such remarks as the attorney might deem appropriate. A few minutes after 11 o'clock the venerable judge came in, and taking his seat upon the bench, the court was formally opened, the area assigned for the accommodation of the bar being filled with the members of the legal profession, anxious to participate in the official leave-taking. The district attorney then came forward and read the resolutions, accompanying the presentation with the following address:

"May it please your honor: In presenting these resolutions in behalf of the Cumberland bar, I perform a task at the same time sad and grateful. It is sad to be obliged to defer to that judgment of yours which has constrained you to terminate the pleasant official relations that have so long subsisted between the court and the legal profession practicing in it, and to feel that the bench you are about to vacate, will be deprived of the confidence and veneration your character has given it in the popular heart. But it is grateful to review your long career as a judge, paralleled by no other in judicial history, and to remember how its foundation was laid in thorough classical, historical, and legal study, how its progress has been signal-marked with the lights of jurisprudence, and how it has culminated in the eminence which has crowned your prolonged labors. It is grateful, too, to know that you have arrived at that goal which fitly divides labor from repose with natural vigor so little abated, that those tastes for intellectual investigation, which have been at the same time your employment and your diversion, have not lost their relish. You took your seat upon the bench of this court very early in the independent existence of our state. Maine, by her seaboard position and the enterprise and hardihood of her people destined to become a commercial and maritime state, counts herself happy in having had you for so many years at the head of her maritime and admiralty court. The people who have been the most resolute in attempting to subdue and control the sea, have from the earliest times dictated its laws. While powerful chiefs subjected to their sway such territories of the land as they could occupy and defend with their arms, the sovereignty of the ocean was for them who were bravest in defying its dangers. While on the northern coasts of the Mediterranean, and on the south shores of the Baltic and North seas, merchants were gathering wealth, and mariners finding exciting adventures, thoughtful minds were collecting and expanding those principles of natural equity, and those customs and usages to which traffic had learned to accommodate itself, which, still for the most part unenacted, form the body of the commercial law of the world. As citizens of our state, we feel no more pride in the rank among commercial and maritime communities our merchants and ship-builders and seamen have won, than in the high repute your labors and studies have gained for you, in interpreting and developing the principles of maritime jurisprudence. It was the pious surmise of the Psalmist, that 'they who go down to the sea in ships, and do business in great waters, see the works of the Lord and his wonders in the deep.' However these wonders may affect a refined and elevated spirit, it would seem as if the effect of the storms of the sea upon ordinary men was to arouse the storms of evil passion, and that the lawlessness of the open ocean begat in them a feeling that they had sailed beyond the constraints of human law, and crossed the line that bounds the jurisdiction of conscience and of God. Certain it is that the sea has been the theatre of some of the darkest deeds of which human nature is capable, and its unfathomed caves hold the secrets of the bloodiest cruelties ever perpetrated by man upon his kind. The early commerce, half traffic and half plunder, though it drew civilization in its train, was scarcely above the grade of statute piracy; nor could we believe, unless compelled by history, —looking at the quiet, civil, and decent social life of the thriving communities on the new continents and islands, in the massacres, enslavements, and extortions, that accompanied their discovery and colonization. Even now that necessarily despotic system of mastery, which places the persons and lives of unarmed seamen on shipboard under the custody of one doubly-armed man, whose ferocious passions may be stimulated by intoxication, sometimes brings back as freightage from far-off seas, horrors that afflict the human heart in the recital. The ocean, that seems almost to defy its maker, the last of chaos to feel the coercion of creative order, has hitherto baffled man.—But every age it yields to his daring and inventive spirit. Long ago he found means to venture out upon its open wastes, using its currents and its very storms as propulsion for his travel and transportation. Within our time, in the steamboat, he has subjected it to forces more completely within his control, and defying its own. He is just about to span it with a line upon which his whispered messages shall make themselves heard beneath all its uproar from continent to continent. Not less remarkable than these physical achievements, by which science and skill have made the sea docile to the uses of man, are the moral agencies, which have carried the majesty and sanction of law to the loneliest waters of the most barbarous coasts. This law, written in part only in those axioms of natural equity which a large, liberal, and candid mind can read, it has been your province to explain, and to apply to the settlement of controversies, and that too, without aid from the deliberations of a jury. How justly and wisely you have done it, the confidence and respect of this commercial community, whose claims you have decided, and whose property has been controlled by your decrees, is ample testimonial. The shipmaster, in the port of a foreign land, has been made to feel that the charter-party defining the due compensation for his toil and risk, the interest of the ship in its proportion of the gains of commerce, and of the merchants in profits of his venture, would be enforced against his goods and his person upon his return from however prolonged a voyage. The sailor, the proper ward of the admiralty, has found in the humane patience, with which you have listened to the recital of his wrongs, his beatings, his tyings-up, his privations of food and wages, that your guardianship was something more than a maxim. And the coaster and adventurous landsman, who have braved the storms of our own rocky coast to rescue wrecked ships, wrecked goods, and periled lives, have been encouraged by your bounty to venture again upon a like beneficence.

"We congratulate ourselves that your Reports, to be further enlarged, as we trust, by the publication of your manuscripts, will be enduring monuments of your humane feelings, your cultivated sense of justice, and your learning. I need not characterize in other terms than those used in the resolutions we have adopted, books quoted in all the admiralty courts of the world, and never but with deference and respect, and attractive to the general scholar by their perspicuous statements, their vivid style, and the cogency and conviction of their arguments. There is one obligation, however, I ought to acknowledge due from counsel for the uniform fullness and appreciative fairness, with which in your opinions you state, and the candor, with which you defer to, arguments of theirs, which you found yourself compelled upon a closer analysis or a more comprehensive review to overrule. Your powers as a court have been large, —your responsibilities great. You lay them down, I apprehend, without a suspicion on the part of any man, however his fortunes may have fared at your hands, that those powers and responsibilities were ever abused, that a decision was ever rendered that did not reflect a delicate and elevated sentiment of justice, and that did not commend itself to the approbation of the public good sense. But I must not recount further the obligations this bar and this entire community are under to you for the dignity of your example, and the honor you have conferred upon this high position, you are now to vacate, lest I give offence to that modesty, and those simple tastes of yours, that would repel extravagance as instinctively as insult. Let me bid you only in an official sense an affectionate farewell, hoping that those habits of recreation and employment, you may find it more difficult to lay aside, than the dignity of your office, will continue to bring you daily to these precincts, that will long be haunted by the attractive and venerable influence of your presence and character."

Judge Ware was much affected by this expression of the feeling and appreciation of the bar, with which he had been so long connected, and with emotion only partially controlled, made the following response, all the bar coming forward and standing around the bench, and listening with reverent attention:—

"Gentlemen of the bar: The expression on the part of the bar practicing in this court, wholly unsought for and unexpected on my part, deserves from me and is received with the deepest gratitude. It is a source of great gratification that the course of the court during the protracted period I have had the honor to sit in it, has received the approbation of men learned in the law, who have been familiar with its practice, from whom nothing has been or could be concealed, and has called forth such an expression. In every case one party or the other must be disappointed, in almost every instance of reasonable, and in some perhaps of just expectations, especially as the jurisdiction and practice of the court were in some degree uncertain and unsettled. In admiralty the prevailing opinion of the soundest and most learned juriconsults of this country is that our courts have a larger jurisdiction than the high court of admiralty in England. Of course the English decisions, to which we habitually look as a safe guide, fail. The halting practice and the imperfect reports of our own court afford but an imperfect substitute. We are, therefore, left to find our way as well as we can by looking to general principles. When these are our only guide there will be of course different opinions. It cannot be expected that there will always be an entire agreement, and the most that can be hoped for is integrity of intention, and this, I trust, has never been doubted. To err is the common frailty of humanity, and I cannot too highly value the calmness with which these errors have been received, and the tenderness with which they have been handled. The unvarying courtesy and kindness on the part of the bar which for so long a period has been uninterrupted, in full measure and beyond what would reasonably be expected, call imperiously for my grateful acknowledgments. They can never be forgotten by me, and will live as long as the pulsation of life lasts. It only remains, that with the best wishes for your happiness in this life and that which is to come, I bid you a final farewell."

At the close of the judge's remarks the court adjourned.

Proceedings of the Cumberland Bar on the Occasion of the Death of Judge Ashur Ware, Which Occurred Sept. 10th, A. D. 1873.

The members of the Cumberland Bar Association met in the United States district court room, at 3 o'clock on the 22d of September, 1873, agreeably to a previous notice, and Hon. Nathan Webb, the vice president, in the absence of Judge Howard, the president, took the chair. M. M. Butler, Esq., on behalf of a committee appointed for that purpose at an earlier meeting, reported resolutions expressive of the sentiments of the bar, in reference to Hon. Ashur Ware, for many years judge of the United States district court for Maine district, lately deceased, and the same were unanimously adopted. At three and one-half o'clock, the court was announced, and Judge Fox took his place upon the bench. The court having been opened, Hon. George F. Talbot arose and spoke as follows:

"May it please your honor: Since its last session, the eminent man, whose personal virtues and judicial authority this court must always honor, has laid aside the burdens and infirmities of a protracted old age, and peacefully passed on to test the mysteries of the life beyond. Judge Ware, who, for more than forty-four years, presided over the district court of the United States for the state of Maine, in the seat to which you have so worthily succeeded, died peacefully at his residence in this city, on Wednesday, the 10th of September inst., at half-past eleven in the morning, in the ninety-second year of his age.

"In announcing this event all sorrow and regret will be out of place. When a life endowed with rare physical and mental vigor, ennobled by worthy and patient labor, adorned and enriched by varied study and learning, dignified by simple and guileless manners, ends, there is no occasion to mourn or deplore. Its ending is rather the fit occasion to sum up and contemplate its excellences, and admire its rare good fortune. His fearless and adventurous spirit, long before it was weakened by the infirmities that oppressed and beclouded it, had frequently testified his satisfaction with the full measure of years allotted to him, and had come to look upon life without regret, and upon death as a problem that fascinated his curiosity and invited his experience. Those of us, who were permitted to look upon the calm face after death had composed it to the grand and beautiful expression which belonged to its maturity, who saw how, from the placid brow and composed countenance, all traces of feebleness and pain had passed away, could but think more kindly of that dread agent, which, seeming to crush all our hopes, leaves on the blank face, before it begins to decay, the gleam and promise of a better life, just as the sun, after it has set, gilds the clouds and sky with its continued light. While we accept trustfully such an omen of his fate, we find how it typifies a process of apotheosis, by which the bowed frame and the briefly clouded mind give place, in our memory and thought, to the dignified presence and clear and capacious intellect, strengthened and expanded by thought and learning, by which our revered friend will hereafter ever be remembered. A life like Judge Ware's, so happily and nobly lived, so rich in substantial, if not conspicuous benefits conferred upon society, a mind so well endowed with intellectual and moral culture, is of historic value, and deserves commemoration in a fitting biography. I know the fact, that he had been often urged to lay the proper foundation for such a work, by furnishing personal memoranda of the leading incidents of his life. Late in his old age he seems, partially, to have complied with such a request; but his life was a contemplative, rather than an active one, and, having few changes or events personal to himself to record, his unique and characteristic history, as told by himself, gives us only the processes by which his mind was trained, the relations which he recognized as connecting himself with God and the universe, and the growth of opinions, mainly theological, which his contemplation and study had compelled him to adopt. The proprieties of this occasion will allow me only to speak briefly of the work he has done in the world, and the traits of mental and moral excellence developed in doing it. He has given this description of his dominant mental passions: 'I had always a love of knowledge. This I believe was innate and instinctive. It had its origin in a natural curiosity, and was wholly independent of the consequences that flowed from it.' He had a quiet contempt for the prevalent taste among his competitors in scholarship, whose efforts seemed to be stimulated by the desire to obtain honors, and who had more thirst for the reputation and rewards of learning than they had for learning itself. He says, moreover: 'My taste and inclination led me more to grave and solid studies, that improved the understanding, than to the lighter graces of polite letters. An important fact, or a principle which is a mere generalization of facts, had always more charms for me than a mere expression of happy elegance.'

"To the shaping and strengthening of his mind, metaphysical studies largely contributed; in relation to this he observes: 'Nothing contributes so much to sharpen the mind, and nothing to discover the weakness of an adverse argument on any subject, nothing to make nice distinctions and just discrimination, nothing to detect as well as practice sophistry; to comprise the whole in one word, nothing so well teaches us the use of language, whether employed to express or, as it sometimes is, to conceal our meaning, as the study of metaphysics.' But although he recognized the value of these studies as discipline, he complained that the knowledge they furnished was uncertain, and that the modern mind, after all its efforts, had been baffled by the same uncertainties and the same limitations that had arrested the researches of the ancient philosophers two thousand years ago. So he turned to mathematics as more attractive and solid ground, and in touching their fixed and certain data, laid his hand upon the laws and methods of the creation. To quote his own language: 'If there be any merit in the essays I have written, either miscellaneous or professional, or judicial opinions, in the selection and arrangement of the thought and matter, I have been more indebted to geometry than to all other studies. I think I may safely say this, when one of the greatest men ever bred in America, great at the bar, great on the bench, and great in political movements (though this was the less seen by the public,) a man who would be, rather than seem great,—said that whatever merits his arguments at the bar might have had, they were all derived from Euclid; and juries, to whom these arguments were addressed, familiarly said of him that other advocates were plausible, but Parsons made a case plain and intelligible. I never studied a subject so well, or understood a science so thoroughly, as the elementary principles of geometry, and none of my juvenile studies had so deep and permanent an influence on my habits of mind.'

"For a mind, whose leading characteristic is a love of knowledge, free of the ambition of distinction, and the meaner ambition of reward, strengthened by the severe and abstract processes of metaphysical and mathematical studies, one career naturally opens itself. It will seek truth—not in the department of man's material and animal life, but in those higher relations which subsist between man as a spirit, and the source from which he sprang, and the destiny to which he is to attain. So we are not surprised to hear Judge Ware confess, that favoring influences aided the natural bent of his genius, to invite him to enter upon the study of theology, and devote his life to the office of preaching. From this project, however, he was deterred by the perhaps unexpected results to which he arrived, in turning his scientific and severe methods of investigation, to the prevalent religious beliefs of his time. These results he perhaps wisely concluded would be a too great innovation upon the cherished convictions of the religious mind of New England, to justify him in publicly proclaiming them. He had no taste for controversy. Notoriety only annoyed him. A wise skepticism, rather than a dogmatic and arrogant assurance, and a thorough respect for the genuine convictions of thinkers who honestly differed from him, compelled him to turn away from his favorite studies, and to use them ever afterwards as the recreations and solace of a life devoted to adjusting, upon far lower grounds, the controversies of men as to their natural rights and obligations. While these opinions of his may have well seemed heretical in the narrow prejudice which held New England sixty years ago, the expanded thought of later times has comprehended and embraced them within the limits of a Christian charity and sympathy. For, after his severe and candid inquiry into the grounds of religious faith, his written confessions show that he held firmly to these conclusions; that the Universe proceeded from the hand of an intelligent Creator, who holds and governs it in the interests of justice and goodness; that man is amenable to the law of right, which is equivalent to the will of God, and is destined to an existence beyond his earthly life, where his condition will depend upon the fruits of virtue he has been able to gather from the good and evil influences, in the midst of which he had lived; and that Christianity, whose essence is the doctrine of the Fatherhood of God, and the equality of man, and whose highest sanction of virtue is furnished in its most clearly stated doctrine of a future life, if not a supernatural and miraculous revelation, is a historical and providential development of the progressive religious attainment of man, the best, as it is the last fruit of his religious aspirations. Turning regretfully away from these high subjects, literature seemed naturally open to him; but sixty years ago literature was not recognized in our country as a profession. His mind had been trained to dwell only in realities, to seek for truth more than for beauty, and to grasp substance rather than form. He disclaimed for himself ideality and a strong poetic fancy, and so what he called the 'lighter and more ornamental graces of polite letters,' had no attractions for him. In this, too, he must be considered to have judged himself too severely, for that very fondness for precise and unequivocal statement, that orderly and logical method, that candid appreciation of all adverse argument, supplied by his metaphysical and mathematical studies, aided as they were by familiar converse with the models of classic oratory and poetry, laid the foundation for a style of expression eloquent in its simplicity and perspicuity. The vividness of his personal and historical sketches, the clearness and picturesqueness of statement in his judicial reports of the facts and incidents upon which he bases his judgment, and the charm of language which, in his private conversation, often arrested the attention even of uneducated persons, showed that he had mental qualities that would have rendered him conspicuous in literature. So, steadily and without regret or misgiving, he turned his well-furnished mind to the study of law. An appointment, never more fittingly made, placed him upon the bench of this court, in a position that exempted him permanently from the cares of getting a livelihood, and preserved his pure and unsophisticated character from those intrigues and ambitions which work among our ablest public men such deplorable demoralization and deterioration. The field itself was sufficiently unpromising of anything but ease and obscurity. It was just the place for an indolent and superficial man to subside into routine and self assumption. What Judge Ware has done in this field, by putting genius and high intellect into his work, may now be seen in the published reports of his judgments,—important contributions to the splendid system of maritime jurisprudence, that regulates the commercial intercourse of civilized nations, and ever to be remembered as the best monuments of his fame.

"The law of the sea, he was called upon to pronounce, must be as liberal and comprehensive as its own compass and extent. The common law, whose maxims had been derived from the feudal system, a highly artificial and aristocratic form of society, would never serve to regulate and restrict a commerce, inviting the freest competition among the most daring and adventurous, nor could the codes or legal principles derived from the consent or custom of a single people, accommodate themselves to the notions of rectitude and fair dealing, recognized by an international comity. It was left to the enlightened sense of justice, to determine the natural principles of law applicable to each case as it arose. Each court was put upon its conscience to pronounce a decree that should accord with the universally accredited sense of justice, or else it would nowhere be respected as the sentence of law. If local prejudice or patriotic feeling blinded its candor, it rightfully lost its authority. At the time Judge Ware took his place upon the bench, the English precedents in admiralty were rare, and only partially applicable to this country, where we had given our admiralty courts a more liberal jurisdiction; and as to the precedents of other countries and treatises, though the work of men of great genius and learning, it must be remembered how soon they would become obsolete, by the expansion and transformation of commerce, through the discovery of new countries, the production of new materials, the invention of more powerful forces of propulsion, and the new commercial usages which would grow out of more frequent and rapid commercial intercommunication. A capacious and well-poised mind to define, for new situations and new relations, the law of natural right, which should not only decide the case in controversy, but be an authority for like cases at home, and receive the respect and acquiescence of the courts of foreign nations, was what was required. For such an office, with such opportunities, the natural and acquired qualifications of Judge Ware were peculiarly adapted. The very taste that had inclined him to theological studies, made him a just and upright judge. The pure and ethical ideas, by which he had regulated his own life, the keen moral sense that defined in his soul so sharply the boundary between right and wrong, gave him a power of moral perception, able to detect under most plausible disguises, every form of oppression and fraud. His metaphysical discipline enabled him to see the weakness of an adverse argument on any subject, to make nice distinctions and just discriminations, and to detect sophistry, and he had learned from geometry how to 'select and arrange,' in his judicial opinions, 'the thought and the matter.' When to this was added an elegance of style, derived from his classical and general reading, we can understand why the reports, which, when completed, will contain the judicial labors of his life, are everywhere held in such high estimation as authority by the courts, and as attractive to the professional and general scholar. There was another mental trait which peculiarly fitted him to be the vindicator of the wrongs and oppressions of seamen. Few men have more heartily believed in the idea of the natural equality of men. He refused to assume any artificial dignity. It was with difficulty that he conformed to the prescribed etiquette and decorum of his own court. It offended his simple taste to assume any badge or drapery, or to take a place in any procession. He liked to come quietly and unheralded, and take his seat in court, clothed only in the natural dignity of his own character and intellect; and if his seat was raised above the level of his friends, the officers of the court and members of the bar, the exclusion and elevation seemed a constant annoyance to him. This democratic feeling crops out everywhere in what he has written. His comments upon history, though mainly dispassionate and critical, grow fervid with indignation at the oppressions and exactions which tyrants and rulers practiced upon the people; and his hearty attachment to Christianity seems largely due to its recognition of the brotherhood of man, and to the solace its high hopes offer to the sufferers and sorrows of the poor and down-trodden.

"Assuming no artificial dignities for himself, he could not defer to any assumptions of rank among those to whom he dealt out justice. Different positions determined different scales of responsibility and duty, but these fairly considered, a man was a man, and below the rank and rights of a man he would never allow a human being to be placed, whatever might be his race or color, or however limited his intellect or education. When at the end of a term of judicial service, rare in the annals of any people, and unprecedented in ours, he resigned his high office, this bar assembled in this court to express a just appreciation of the long official service he had so ably performed. We are now assembled when the long life itself, so successful and happy beyond the common lot, is rounded to a measure of years seldom allotted to man, to do honor to his character, and to give our testimony of his high worth, and to commend him, as an example of rare excellence, to the emulation of the generation of young men who are to succeed us. We may point to his, on the whole, happy old age, as a fit illustration of the noble language of Cicero: 'Aptissima omnino sunt arma senectutis artes exercitationes—que virtutum, quæ in omni ætate cultæ, quum diu multum que vixeris munificos efferunt fructus, non solum quia numquam deserunt, ne extremo quidem tempore ætatis—quamquam id quidem maximum est—verum etiam quia conscientia bene actæ vitæ multorumque bene factorum recordatio jucundissima est.'"

At the close of these remarks, M. M. Butler, Esq., rose to offer the resolutions of the bar, and said:

"May it please your honor: Accompanying the announcement, which has just been made, in so fitting terms, of the decease of Judge Ware, I have been deputed by the Bar Association of Cumberland County, to present to this honorable court, over which he so long and so worthily presided, the resolutions which have been unanimously adopted in view of the occasion, expressive of our veneration of the man, and our appreciation of his virtues and public services. In discharging the duty assigned me, naught indeed can be added, by any poor words of mine, to the beautiful tribute—alike appreciative and discriminating—which has just been paid to 'his memory; naught certainly should be taken away therefrom.

"I am sure that our brother Talbot has not, in any degree, overestimated the importance and influence of Judge Ware's judicial labors. The estimate which Judge Story put upon them, when he said that he regarded Judge Ware as one of the ablest and most learned, if not the ablest and most learned of the then living admiralty lawyers, was concurred in by the voice of contemporary assent, and has been confirmed by the later judgment of the bar of this generation. Among the great lights, by which the paths of admiralty and maritime law have been illumined, his name will shine serene,—a star of the first magnitude. His recorded decisions, beautiful in structure, adorned with grace, and resting on the solid foundations of principle, have raised an enduring monument to his fame. His services in the cause of enlightened jurisprudence have already conferred, and will continue to confer, so long as justice shall be dispensed, lasting benefits on mankind. The allusions to Judge Ware as a scholar have been most happy. It was certainly not alone in professional learning that his attainments were remarkable. He cultivated almost the whole boundless field of human knowledge—metaphysics— theology—polite literature—the classics—modern languages—the sciences—mathematics. He was scholarly in all his tastes and habits. He was one of those deep, quiet, unobtrusive students, of which our country has more in number, I believe, than we get credit for across the Atlantic. Any review of the life of Judge Ware would be incomplete without reference to him as a citizen and member of society. His participation—so far as was befitting his position—in the business enterprises of our city, his connection with our educational interests, his selection, at different periods of his life, as president of two different banking institutions, and as director in another; his identification with the growth of the public improvements of the state, as early president of one of our leading railroad companies,—these attest at once that Judge Ware was no recluse, and the confidence which was reposed in him by the community. He ever took a lively interest in public affairs. In early life, before his elevation to the bench, he wielded a most trenchant pen in the discussion of the important political questions of the day, and afterwards throughout his judicial life, he never ceased to feel, and manifest on proper occasions, his deep interest in all that pertained to the welfare of his beloved country, the state of his adoption and the city of his home. He was a good citizen, a pure patriot, a genuine lover of liberty, a true Democrat, in the higher and nobler sense of the word. But we, especially the older members of our number, who have been brought into more intimate relation with him, would hold in remembrance with enduring regard, Judge Ware, not alone as a great jurist, a ripe scholar, and good citizen, but as the modest, genial, true-hearted man that he was—possessing a tenderness of nature almost feminine,—a simplicity of character almost child-like. In our intercourse with him, none can recall an unkind act or a harsh word. No man had less occasion to repeat the beautiful prayer of the liturgy: 'From hatred, envy, and malice, and all uncharitableness, Good Lord deliver us.' After having gone in and out before us in his judicial career for more than forty years, having passed beyond the extreme limit allotted by the Scriptures to human existence—life's labors faithfully performed, his earthly tasks fully accomplished—this righteous judge, this great jurist, this pure-minded citizen, this excellent man has gone in fullness of time to his reward. Peace be with his ashes. May we not reverently inscribe over his grave:

“Cujus est so'um, ejus est usque ad coelum.”

“May it please your honor: I move that the resolutions to which I have referred, and which, with your honor's permission, I will now read, may be received and entered upon the records of the court:

“Resolved, that we, the members of the Cumberland county bar, deem the recent death of the Honorable Ashur Ware, formerly, and for more than two score years, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Maine, an appropriate occasion for us, who enjoyed with him the kindest and most friendly relations, both professional and personal, to pay our affectionate tribute of respect to his memory, and to testify our grateful appreciation of his virtues and public service.

“Resolved, that the eminence of Judge Ware, in those branches of jurisprudence to which he devoted the labors of his life, has been so universally recognized, as not to need commemoration at our hands. But now that he has gone from us, we would fain give expression to our renewed sense of the importance and influence of his judicial labors, which have left so lasting an impression on the jurisprudence of his times, and our increased admiration of those luminous and erudite judgments, recorded in the reports which bear his name, which for sound learning, depth of research, logical acumen, felicity of illustration, and mastery of the English language, in a style of simple grace and beauty, are models of their kind in judicial literature, and have served no mere temporary purposes, but have become, to a great extent, the foundation of the practice and administration of admiralty and maritime law throughout the land, and precedents for future jurists forever.

“Resolved, that as members of the bar, we shall ever cherish in affectionate veneration the recollection of the modesty, simplicity, and courtesy that distinguished Judge Ware's social and official intercourse with us; of the cordial affability that was always ready to communicate to us his varied stores of thought and learning, and of the many virtues which endeared him to the community in which he lived.

“Resolved, that a copy of these resolutions be communicated to the family of the deceased, and that the same be presented to the court over which he has so long presided, with a request that they be entered of record.”

Hon. Nathan Webb, United States district attorney, seconded the resolutions, and said:

“May it please your honor: In rising to second the resolutions of respect to the memory of Judge Ware, which have now been offered by the Cumberland Bar Association, I cannot but feel regret that I never enjoyed to any considerable extent his personal acquaintance, and am consequently unable, out of my own experience, to add anything to the tribute of affection for the man, contained in this expression of the bar. On every side are met those, who for many years associated with him on terms of friendly intimacy. All unite in their testimony to the kindness of his nature, his purity and simplicity of character, his accurate scholarship and extensive and varied attainments. Companionship with him they esteem among their most valued opportunities. Those of us, who knew him only in his judicial relations, recognize the fruits of those traits of character, and of his thorough and various culture in his official life and service. Whoever studies the published opinions of Judge Ware will not fail to be impressed with the clearness of his intellectual perceptions, the precision and order of his statements, the rigor of his logic, the fullness of his research, the grace of his style, and his conscientious zeal to discern and to uphold truth and justice. Those opinions are widely known and valued: they have been known and valued, and held in ever increasing honor since they were promulgated. It is not easy for us, who have pursued our researches in those branches of law in which he was so illustrious, to measure the sum of our obligation to his labors under the guidance of which we walk. Neither is the toil of those who have come after him, and walk in the paths he has cleared, to be compared with his task in making those paths plain and easy. While he diligently devoted his powers to those pursuits appropriate to his position as a judge, he never lost his relish for the studies of his earlier years, but throughout his long life found leisure to gratify his love of literature and science. He ever turned with delight to the classics, of which, in his prime, he had been a critical student and an ardent lover. He did not, therefore, become indifferent to the interests of his own days, but was a constant and thoughtful observer of men and events, often with his pen giving important counsel and assistance in securing a wise direction of affairs. Remembering him, and the history of his life, we may account him happy, as well in the number of his years, as in the experiences they brought, and for ourselves, to whom he was so long spared, and who have the benefit of his bright example, we may, as we turn to our duties, reverently say:

“Why weep we then for him, who having won
The bound of man's appointed years, at last,
Life's blessings all enjoyed, life's labors done,
Serenely to his final rest has passed;
While the soft memory of his virtues yet
Lingers like twilight hues, when the bright sun is set.”

Hon. John Mussey, for many years clerk of the circuit and district courts, while Judge Ware presided in the latter, arose, and with much feeling said:

“May it please your honor: Having long known the distinguished jurist, whose recent decease is the occasion of this meeting of the brethren, it seems right that I should say a few words about one, with whom for a long period I was so intimately connected. The high stand he occupied for many years as the exponent of maritime and admiralty law, is well known to you and the community at large. When he took the bench of the United States district court of Maine, in 1822, the rights and duties of seamen, the authority and responsibility of officers and owners of our merchant marine, were alike in great measure unknown and unrecognized by both the employers and employes. The clear head of the judge soon evinced the determination and ability to bring order out of confusion and misconception. At first, many of his rulings clashed with the prejudices of owners and masters, but as case after case came before him, the mists of prejudice and shortsightedness lifted and dispersed. Soon those of the community interested looked up to him in confidence, that good common sense—a just appreciation of their needs, would be furnished by Judge Ware as opportunity offered, and they were not disappointed. The most violent opponents to his teachings gave way, and all felt, if they did not acknowledge the fact, that he was truly a public benefactor; that law as delivered by him was sound, reasonable, well-grounded, and would stand the severest scrutiny; and so it proved to be, by the voluntary acknowledgment of many eminent jurists in the Union. A few words of his social and home life. Modest and unobtrusive, he was ever ready to aid and encourage the efforts of the young practitioner in this court. No one, I think, ever left his chambers without being instructed and pleased. To myself, the recollections of the past are most grateful. His manner was always simple, unaffected, and childlike, and his heart full of the milk of human kindness. During a period of more than twenty-six years of official intimacy, never a hasty, cross, or angry word ruffled our friendship. A kinder or more constant friend and companion on the journey of life, I never had nor could desire to have. Such was Ashur Ware as he ever appeared to me.”

The following is the response of Judge Fox, [this may also be found in 2 Hask. 542:]

“Gentlemen of the bar: Judge Ware was appointed district judge of Maine, in February, 1822, and he continued in the discharge of the duties of the office, until the spring of 1866, his resignation taking effect in May, I believe, being then compelled by the infirmities of years to withdraw from this place which he had, by his learning and ability so ably filled for more than forty-four years. Although eight years have not elapsed since his retirement, I think a large proportion of the members of the bar now present, never enjoyed the satisfaction of practicing in the court whilst he here presided, and many of those who were then with us, distinguished in their high professional positions, have since passed away from us. The remembrance of the Fessendens, Evans, Deblois, Barnes, and others, is still vivid with many of us, and at last, this good old judge, so endeared to all who ever held personal intercourse with him, has gone to his reward, after years of feebleness and suffering, and it is just and due to his memory, that the records of this court should, so long as they exist, transmit to those who shall follow us, the expression of the great respect and attachment entertained for him by this bar. Having, for nearly thirty years, practiced before Judge Ware, I trust that in the presence of so many of the bar who have not been thus favored, I may be excused for referring briefly to the manner in which he discharged the duties of his position, and in acknowledging the heavy indebtedment we are under to him for his studious labors in the admiralty law, and the information he has imparted to us upon this branch of jurisprudence. In 1822, Peters' and Bee's were the only reports of decisions in the district courts of the United States, and most of the opinions contained in these volumes were quite brief and meagre of authority, so that Judge Ware, in almost every question of admiralty and maritime law, was compelled to depend on his own researches into the ancient laws of the sea and maritime codes, and his own wisdom and judgment, for his conclusions, as the cases were presented before him for decision. Fortunately for him, his practice in the courts of common law had been of but little moment. His mind was not trammelled by the harsh and unyielding rules of Lord Coke and his followers, and being naturally of a broad Catholic tendency, it was with the greatest satisfaction that he found himself at full liberty to adopt, modify, and apply the pliant rules of equity and admiralty, as the law of his court, according to the circumstances of each particular case. The strict rules of the law of evidence did not always receive his sanction and approval, as some of us may well recollect his readiness to hear almost all that a witness might press into the case, although much of the statement would not have been received in a court of common law. Judge Ware's literary acquirements were second to no man's in this district. He was conversant with the Greek and Latin, as well as with the French, languages, and could thus investigate and examine for himself their authorities without depending on the assistance of others. His extensive acquaintance with the Roman law and the various French writers on commercial and admiralty law is manifest in almost every one of his opinions, which we now possess. He most thoroughly enjoyed the investigation of questions of admiralty and maritime law, making the most diligent search and examination among the rules and sea laws of the ancient marts of commerce, and he pursued his studies and explorations until he was complete master of the subject, so that nothing remained for him, but to present his conclusions in that clear and beautiful manner which is so distinguishing a characteristic of all his opinions, and in which he has never been surpassed, either at home or abroad. Quite often his opinion was not restricted to a mere determination of the rights of the parties in the cause, but, conscious of the importance of his labors, and of the benefit to be derived from the knowledge he would thus impart, he made his opinion a most elaborate and finished exposition of the great principles of admiralty and maritime law involved in the matter in controversy, in relation to which at that time, the entire profession was almost universally ignorant. So complete and thorough were his examinations, so convincing his judgments, that in many cases since his time, the most learned and eminent jurists have referred to them as conclusive authority on the questions he so well investigated, being convinced that their own researches would shed no new light upon a matter which had received the careful and diligent investigation of Judge Ware. His written opinions were deemed so valuable, both to the public and the profession, that they were generally made public through the press immediately on their announcement, and they at once were accorded by the entire profession, the very front rank in admiralty and maritime jurisprudence. In the year 1839, the first volume of his reports was published, followed by a second in 1849, and the demand for these works has been so great as to require a second edition of each of them. A large number of treatises upon admiralty law, and volumes of decisions of various courts of admiralty, both in England and this country, have since that time issued from the press, but all, I believe, are under great obligations to Judge Ware, and no one can acquire a knowledge of admiralty law, without an intimate acquaintance with his decisions. It is quite extraordinary, the multiplicity of questions which he examined, and upon which we enjoy the fruits of his labors. Since I have occupied this chair, hardly a maritime question has been presented to me, in which I have not at once turned to his reports, and derived great assistance from them. In a large majority of the cases, I think I may truly say, I have found in his opinions principles there laid down, applicable to the case I was investigating, and so clearly stated that my own labors were at an end, and nothing further remained for me but to acknowledge my obligations and recognize their authority. I believe no treatises or reports are now extant which are at this moment more useful to the profession, or more frequently acknowledged as authority, or which can afford more knowledge and information than these reports. There is not a judge administering the admiralty law, either in this country or in England, who has not profited by the labors of Judge Ware, and gratefully acknowledged the obligations thereby conferred. The debt due from us all to the profession, according to Lord Bacon, was more than paid by Judge Ware. It was not discharged by any depreciated currency, but was paid in full in pure coin, both principal and interest.

"Judge Ware was of marked simplicity of character, and was always actuated by entire singleness of heart and purpose. The kindest and most friendly relations ever existed between him and the members of this bar. His intercourse with us was ever free and informal, never in the least pretentious; and it always was a pleasure to him, to assist us by his advice in relation to his own decisions, as well as to principles of law upon which we desired information; and I have very frequently in this manner received from him most valuable assistance which it would have been extremely difficult, if not impossible, to have procured from any other source. He had no favorites. Every one who appeared in his court, whether young or old, was certain that all stood on an equality in his presence. With courtesy and the greatest patience, he listened to the views which counsel saw fit to present, the manifest purpose of the judge being to obtain light, to aid him in his determination of the cause, without regard to the source whence it was derived. No one ever took part in a trial before the judge, without becoming attracted to him, and feeling the highest respect for him, as well for the kindness of heart ever exhibited to whatever counsel a party might select to advocate his rights, as for his diligent attention, for his acute wisdom and judgment, and the learning and research manifested in his elaborate opinions. Many of the causes brought before a court of admiralty, such as claims for wages, torts, etc., are of small amount, and of such a nature that any protracted delay of judgment therein, is tantamount to a denial of justice. In this class of cases, the court, under the conduct of Judge Ware, always sat 'velis levatis.' Most of these causes were decided upon the conclusion of the arguments, and those which were retained for advisement, were at once examined, and an opinion prepared and announced in a very few days. The researches I have made do not indicate, that in any admiralty cause presented to him for decision, his opinion was delayed for more than thirty days, and generally it was announced the week succeeding the hearing.

"Judge Ware was alike attentive and diligent in the discharge of his duties as a member of the circuit court for this district, always attending the sessions of that court as long as his health would permit. He frequently presided at jury trials, but his enunciation was not clear and distinct, and his charges were not so fascinating and effective as those of his eminent associate, Mr. Justice Story, but his rulings and instructions were almost invariably sustained when presented for re-examination, and on one occasion I remember, against his own convictions, he having become satisfied that they were erroneous, whilst his associate was of opinion that they were strictly correct, his honesty of purpose leading him to insist on his ultimate opinion and for the reversal of his rulings at nisi prius—and no judge ever strove more firmly to correct what he believed to have been an error committed by himself, than did Judge Ware on this occasion. In another case he could not concur in an opinion prepared by Mr. Justice Story, and although no jurist ever existed whose opinion was, with Judge Ware, of so high authority as that of Judge Story, he felt obliged to prepare a dissenting judgment, which upon appeal to the supreme court received the sanction and approval of that tribunal.

"For some time before his resignation, it was quite manifest to all, that the infirmities of old age were gathering around him. His hearing was so impaired that for a number of years he was under the necessity of taking his seat within the bar with the witnesses in close proximity, that he might understand their testimony. No one was so conscious of his weakness and infirmity as the judge, and I know that his resignation would have been presented at a much earlier day, if he had not, with strict sense of justice, realized, that he had claims upon the public, after expending so many years in its service, which it had no right to expect him to surrender so long as he could attend to the duties of his office. A year or two since, some of you, believing it but a partial recompense for the benefit he had conferred upon the profession, as well as upon the whole mercantile community, endeavored to induce congress to allow Judge Ware the advantages of the retray provisions, which have since been conferred upon the judges of the federal courts. The house of representatives almost unanimously acceded to the proposal, but it was defeated in the senate. This kind-hearted, learned, and good judge, has finished his labors on earth, and it only remains for us, who have been so profited thereby, and who have been so highly favored by his wisdom and learning, to testify our acknowledgment of our great obligations, by the open record in this tribunal, where he so long and so eminently presided, of our testimonial in respect and honor of his memory."

At the close of these remarks, the court adjourned.

Such eloquent tributes, so appropriately paid to the character and labors of the eminent judge, the closing chapter of whose official service has been committed to the reporter for supervision, leave nothing to be added of public interest. But the pen (of one who for many years, as clerk of the circuit court, was associated with Judge Ware) still lingers over the memory of virtues better observed in those daily walks where true character is best exemplified. While the commercial world owes gratitude for his judicial labors, the little circle near by his chambers, could best appreciate the kindness of his nature, and have profited most by the charm of his conversation. Though largely retired from public observation, except when in court, Judge Ware always delighted in a cordial intercourse with those whose official relations presented frequent opportunity for it. To be in companionship with one whose sense of justice was the crowning excellence of his character, and to listen to the words of one whose genial nature added lustre to the wealth of his learning on almost every subject, was no ordinary privilege. While all properly may have been eager to twine a wreath of laurels for his fresh-made grave, one sprig at least, and that, providentially the last, may well be added by G. F. E.

WOODRUFF, LEWIS B.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1403.]

The following proceedings of the bar are reprinted from 13 Blatchf. 535:

The members of the bar in the city of New York met in the United States circuit court room, on Wednesday, September 15th, 1875, in response to a call, of which the following is a copy: "The members of the bar are requested to meet in the United States circuit court room, on Wednesday, the 15th inst., at 2 o'clock P. M., to give expression to their sense of the loss which the profession and the community have suffered in the death of the Honorable Lewis B. Woodruff, circuit judge of the United States: William M. Everts, George Gifford, John E. Burrill, Welcome R. Beebe, Henry E. Davies, Edward H. Owen, Joseph H. Choate, William Stanley, Edmund Randolph Robinson, George T. Curtis, Enoch L. Fancher, Erastus C. Benedict, Francis F. Marbury, George Bliss, Burr W. Griswold, Joseph S. Bosworth, Charles F. Sanford."

Hon. E. C. Benedict nominated as chairman of the meeting, Hon. Samuel Blatchford, judge of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York. The following additional officers were elected, on motion of George Bliss: Vice-presidents—Charles L. Benedict, Nathaniel Shipman, William J. Wallace, William D. Shipman, Murray Hoffman, Charles P. Daly, Noah Davis, Claudius L. Monell, Charles A. Rapallo, Daniel P. Ingraham. Secretaries—John E. Burrill, Aaron J. Vanderpoel, Charles F. Sanford, Benjamin K. Phelps. Joseph H. Choate, Esq., on behalf of the committee who called the meeting, offered the following resolutions:

"The members of the bar of New York have heard with deep and general sorrow of the death of Mr. Justice Woodruff. Identified with the administration of justice in this community for a period of forty years, his career was a continued progress of ever-increasing honor and power. Entering upon life with every advantage of education, and a mind enriched by the fruits of severe study, he attained, in early manhood, a conspicuous and responsible position, and thenceforth to the end pursued the practice of the law as a science and not as a trade, and did his part always to maintain and uphold it as a dignified and liberal profession. He scouted the low arts that would debase it, and abhorred and denounced every attemptor tendency to prostitute it to unworthy purposes. He had a conscience that never slept, and he followed its light through all the mazes of the law. His laborious and absorbing devotion to the cause of his client was proverbial, and this, with his ample learning and honest and manly character, made him always a leading figure among his brethren, an ornament of the profession, and a most valuable member of society.

"But great as were his merits and virtues at the bar, his rich and varied services to the state and nation for twenty-five years, as an able and upright judge, are now his chief title to reverence and eulogy. His idea of what constitutes a judge was that old-fashioned standard which exacted of him the richest learning, the deepest study, the liveliest conscience, and absolute honesty, and he did his best to live up to it as nearly as human infirmity would permit. In whatever court he sat, the authority of his decisions was powerful with his associates, and recognized by the bar. Serving successively in the court of common pleas, the superior court, and the court of appeals, he did his full share to shape and frame the body of the law as it prevails among us to-day; and his rich and growing experience, and the widely-extended reputation of his ability and learning, attracted to him a large measure of public attention; so that when, upon the reorganization of the circuit court of the United States, a judge was to be found to exercise its vast powers and responsible duties in this great circuit, the general sense of the profession and the community approved the judgment of the president in selecting Judge Woodruff as the proper man. How well the choice was justified the record of his judicial labors in that court for the last six years will testify. In bidding farewell at the grave to this eminent and useful lawyer and judge, the members of the bar desire to put on record their high estimate of his mind and character; to cherish the memory of his life and labors; and to commend to one another and to those who follow them, his excellent example.

"Resolved, that a committee of three be appointed by the chair to present these resolutions to the circuit court and the court of appeals, at the next session, and to ask, on behalf of the bar, the entry thereof upon their minutes.

"Resolved, that a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to the family of the deceased."

Hon. Joseph S. Bosworth then addressed the meeting, as follows: "The members of the bar and of the bench have met on this occasion to express their regard for the virtues, their admiration of the learning and official usefulness, and their sorrow for the loss, of one of the most worthy and eminent of their number. It was my good fortune to have been personally acquainted with our deceased brother for many years, as a neighbor and friend, before he was elevated to the bench; to have been officially associated with him for the term of six years in active judicial service; and to have maintained relations of friendship and intimacy with him since our official association was ended. In his own home he was hospitable and genial. He never seemed happier than when his house was filled with his relatives and friends; and I do not believe that any one of them ever had any occasion, from one act or look of his, to suspect that he thought the visit was unnecessarily protracted, whatever may have been its length. The first office to which he was elected was that of judge of the court of common pleas of this city and county, a court which has always had among its judges men of mark and decided ability. His associates in that court were Mr. Justice Ingraham, an industrious, able, learned, and efficient judge, and the present scholarly and accomplished chief justice of that court, Mr. Charles P. Daly. So worthy did he acquit himself in that position, that his associates expressed extreme regret that he should be disposed, as it drew to a close, to accept a nomination for the office of judge in another court in this city, of co-ordinate jurisdiction. But he did accept such nomination, and was elected a justice of the superior court of this city, in the fall of 1855, for the term of six years. His associates in that court, naming them in the order in which they were elected, were Chief Justices Oakley and Duer, and Judges Bosworth, Hoffman, Pierrepont, White, Moncrief, Slosson, and Robertson. Of these nine associates of his, only three survive—Messrs. Hoffman, Pierrepont, and Bosworth. Of these three associates, only Judge Pierrepont, the present distinguished and efficient attorney-general of the United States, was younger than Judge Woodruff. As a member of the superior court, no judge was more laborious or painstaking than Judge Woodruff. His powers of analysis were great, his logic was compact and convincing, and whether examining the papers on a motion, or the questions of law and of fact in a case tried before him, or a case on appeal, he gave to each the most careful attention and deliberate consideration. He was learned in the law, and although, occasionally, his opinions were disapproved by the court of last resort (a fate which quite as often befell the opinions of each of his associates), they expressed, as all his opinions expressed, the honest conclusions of a well-instructed judgment. He was eminently conscientious. His manner on the bench has been criticised by some as being, at times, austere and harsh. I cannot resist the inclination to say one word upon this topic, although conscious of the delicate ground on which I tread. His feelings were kind and strong. He was sincere, earnest, and energetic in his work, whatever it might be and wherever to be performed. This sincerity, earnestness, and energy may, at times, have permeated and given color to his manner and action in disposing of questions arising at the trial, or in banc, requiring prompt and summary decision. But this sincerity, earnestness and energy were, in his case, the marked qualities of a true man and of a fearless, able, and upright judge. They were not—I feel that I can say I know they were not—imbued with any feeling of unkindness to any suitor, his attorney or counsel. It would have been a most painful thought to him that he had ever given just occasion to be suspected of a conscious want of courtesy to any member of the profession in his intercourse with them. After 1861, he was actively engaged as a member of our profession in heavy and important causes, until, at the close of 1867, he was appointed judge of the court of appeals. His opinions in that court attest his industry, great ability, and extensive legal erudition. Of the manner in which he discharged the duties of the office which he held at the time of his death I cannot personally speak. My humble duties did not bring me into the circuit court of the United States for this circuit while he presided as its judge. But the concurring testimony of all whose practice in that court was extensive, is, that his industry, ability, and efficiency were as conspicuous there as in any of the other judicial positions which he had held and adorned. It may be said of our deceased brother, that his life was useful, active, and distinguished. He was eminently useful to his family, to his relatives, to the bench, to the bar, and to the community at large. But his life and his example were not useful to the community merely as the efficient life and instructive example of a learned and laborious lawyer, and of an able, fearless, and upright judge. He believed, and acted on the belief, that humanity has interests and a destiny which do not terminate when the individual man has ceased to breathe. In the relations which he held, in consequence of this faith which was in him, he discharged all the duties growing out of them, worthily and well. He has gone to his rest, after a well spent life, beloved, respected, and honored by all who knew him, and by a goodly company who personally knew him not. The community in which he lived, which he served, and in which he died, will remember, with admiration and gratitude, his life of personal and official purity, and will appreciate the worth of his example, in the influence it may be hoped to exert over those who survive and shall succeed him in their personal, social, and official labors. All, whether relatives or friends, who now or shall hereafter think of our deceased brother, will contemplate a husband, father, citizen, lawyer, judge, and Christian gentleman, possessing a character of finely developed proportions, exercising wisely and well all his good and great qualities in the various relations of his distinguished career. All of us will feel, and will be made happier by the consoling assurance, that, in the world to which our deceased brother has gone, all is well with him now, and forever will be."

George Gifford, Esq., then addressed the meeting, as follows: "After the much that has been said, and well said, respecting the excellencies of our departed judge, I will simply add, in a few words, my testimony to his having possessed in a high degree those characteristics which rendered him eminently qualified for the special duty of administering patent laws. My specialty being practice in patent cases, and his court having original jurisdiction in patent suits, gave me special opportunity of becoming well acquainted with the ability which he manifested in dealing with such cases. I was in the first patent cases which he heard after coming to the bench of the circuit court, and was one of the counsel who argued the last case he heard, which was commenced in the court-room and concluded at his residence, after he was unable to return to the court-room. Judge

Woodruff was richly endowed with properties of mind which were well calculated to insure that distinction in the administration of the patent laws which he so rapidly acquired. He had no prejudices either for or against patents. His sympathies ran neither too high nor too low for inventors. His mind was an even balance in which their merits were correctly weighed. He was free from bias in his deliberations respecting the products of inventive genius. He was patient to hear counsel, and willing to be instructed by the results of their researches. He never allowed his first impressions of a case, however strong or vivid, to lead him to rash conclusions, or to prevent needful examination to insure correctness. He was a learned judge in science and in law. He was an able, theoretical mechanic. He had a natural taste for mechanism, and a great power in discriminating between similarities and differences in machinery. His ability in analyzing mechanism and identifying what was essential therein, was unusually great. His power of drawing a line and discriminating between the essential parts and non-essential parts of an invention was unsurpassed. Appreciating the danger of making mistakes in disposing of the different mechanical questions which often arise, and the disastrous consequences to parties which sometimes follow, it was his habit not to dispose of such questions hastily, but to carefully deliberate, and, sometimes, subject himself to great labor and fatigue to be sure he was right. The recorded decisions of Judge Woodruff, rendered in patent cases, are remarkable for their clearness and soundness, and are very properly much respected as reliable authority in all the federal courts. We were fortunate in having him called to the bench of the court in which he presided at the time of his death, but we have been still more unfortunate in having him so soon removed from us."

Hon. Richard Goodman, of Lenox, Massachusetts, then addressed the meeting, as follows: "Having been notified only a moment or two ago, that I was expected to make any remarks on this occasion, of course I must confine myself almost entirely to such reminiscences of my connection with Judge Woodruff as occur to me at this time. My acquaintance with Judge Woodruff commenced early in my professional career. After leaving the Law School at New Haven, I entered the office of George W. Strong, Esq., then one of the leading lawyers of this city; but finding that he was mainly consulting counsel and had little practice in his office, I looked around for an office where I could learn the practice as it then existed. I was introduced by a fellow-student to Mr. Woodruff, not then a judge. I found him in a building on Broadway, I think, between Cedar and Pine streets, upstairs, occupied in part by the Express newspaper, and his office was on the second story, and below, of all things in contact with a lawyer, was a mock auctioneer's establishment. My surprise was great that any lawyer could occupy an office with the continual sound of that hammer in his ears, and the din of the street coming up through the large rotunda of the building. But Mr. Woodruff then displayed that great concentration of mind and devotedness to his studies that always controlled him, and he was not easily diverted by extraneous objects.¹ We continued there during nearly all the period of my student-ship with him, and from thence removed to 88

¹[Note by Mr. Goodman:] During the utterance of these remarks I remembered an anecdote current among the Judge's relatives, but which I did not relate, as I could not vouch for its authenticity. But after the bar meeting I was assured of its truth by a member of his family, and now, while correcting the stenographer's report, add it as an illustration of Judge Woodruff's absorption in the performance of his duties. Given, like all American judges, to the custom more honored in the breach than the observance, of writing long opinions, he became so engaged in that, to him, pleasurable occupation, one night, at his residence in Twenty-Ninth street, as to become unaware how many of the small hours had passed, and, hearing a noise in the hall, rushed out of his library, expecting to confront a midnight robber, and astonished the housemaid, who had come down to her usual morning work, and was opening the front doors for the day. (R. G.)

Cedar street. An examination at the bar was then very different, as I understand, from the examination at the present time, for my learned Brother Bosworth, with Mr. Ward Hunt, now one of the justices of the supreme court of the United States, and the late President Fillmore, then examined the students, who had already passed through a seven years' course of study. So severe was that examination that, I think, only one in three of the class was at first admitted. On getting through the fire of that examination successfully, I returned to the city of New York, and entered into business for myself. About a year after that, Mr. George Wood—who had recently come from New Jersey, in which state and in the United States courts he had an exalted reputation—was here retained in some very important suits, among others, eminently, the suit of Ogden vs. Astor, in which Mr. Daniel Lord, with whom our associate, Mr. Evarts, was then, or lately had been, a student, was counsel on the other side. When retained in those suits, Mr. Wood, looking for a man who could conduct them successfully and intelligently as attorney and junior counsel, selected Mr. Woodruff; and Mr. Woodruff, finding that those suits would occupy a great portion of the time which he would otherwise bestow upon his general practice, requested me to unite with him, and we formed a partnership about May, 1842. That connection continued with Mr. Woodruff until his elevation to the bench in 1850, and with Mr. Wood until his decease. During that time Mr. Woodruff's business was extensive; and, although he was not then as well known to the bar, or to the community, as afterwards, yet, by those with whom he associated he was especially prized; and it was the connection of Mr. Lord and himself with the case of Ogden vs. Astor which gave the former so high an estimate of Mr. Woodruff's abilities, and caused the promotion of Mr. Woodruff to the bench, for I think that Mr. Lord was the active agent in having his name brought before the nominating convention. Mr. Woodruff, during his professional career, especially during my connection with him, was that dangerous man, the man of one book. His library was select, but, until he became a judge, was not extensive, the main elements in it being 'Gould's Lectures,' in six volumes, copied by himself; and, whenever he had occasion to refer to authorities, those lectures were his principal assistance. But, although he was not a reading man, not a student, not a literary man, in the ordinary phrase, as expressed by us, either in law or in literature, yet there were few men so well posted in all the advanced theories on whatever subject might be circulating through the community. He was a troublesome man to discuss with, even when you were very well advanced in what you were talking about; and, whether it was a question of table-tipping or a question of science in any shape, or a question arising in the courts, or in literature, he always seemed to have thought much on the subject, to have great acquaintance with it, and to be well able to discuss it in all its elements. In addition to that, Mr. Woodruff, from my earliest connection with him—and, as I have understood, long prior to that—appeared a man who always had his principles fixed, and never swerved from them. It is a very easy thing for a man to say he has fixed principles, but it is a very difficult thing, in the midst of business or temptations—and they come thick and fast upon the lawyer in active practice—it is a very difficult thing to carry out those principles on all occasions. When the late Edward Kellogg, of Brooklyn, (so well known for his original theories on banking and finance), at the time when there was an excessive speculation in real estate, first employed Mr. Woodruff, who was then just commencing practice and anxious for employment, he came to him and said, 'I have a large real estate business; I want your assistance, but I don't think I can afford to pay you five dollars for every deed you draw.' Mr. Woodruff's reply to him was—'Sir, I shall be very happy to have your business, but I cannot underbid my professional brethren. I understand the charge at the bar is five dollars for every deed drawn, and whatever business of that kind you bring me, sir, that will be my charge.' Mr. Kellogg afterwards became his devoted friend as well as client, and Mr. Woodruff received from him and his friends a large amount of business. On another occasion a high official from Washington came on, post haste, on Saturday, to employ Mr. Woodruff. I think he had some acquaintance with him during their collegiate course. He arrived on Saturday night. He said his business was urgent, and requested an interview with Mr. Woodruff on the succeeding Sunday. Mr. Woodruff courteously but firmly responded, 'Sir, aside from my conscientious scruples on the subject, I devote that day to my family. I will attend to your business on Monday, but not to-morrow.' The applicant, although at first rather rebuffed, received the rejection courteously, came on Monday, the business was done, and both parties, I believe, were entirely satisfied. And that was the kind of man that Judge Woodruff was from beginning to end—a man of firm, fixed principles, which he carried out without regard to cost or inconvenience to himself. And Mr. Woodruff, although, I am happy to say, a man who, of late years, has lived comfortably, somewhat in affluence—though certainly not arising from the salary received from his office during the last six years—yet, during his long course of professional life, he never seemed to regard the amount of his fees as anything compared to the business to be done, to the principles which he was to carry out, and to the success of his client. It made no difference to him whether his client was a poor man or a rich man; the only point was the success of the suit in which he was engaged. He spent as much time and engaged in as laborious devotion to his business in the little matters for which he received a limited amount, as he did upon those in which he received a larger sum. And I know it was often a laughing remark of our associate, Mr. Wood, that Mr. Woodruff seemed to spend a great deal of time in his office elucidating subjects with clients who were boring him, which he (Mr. Wood) thought beneath Mr. Woodruff's attention. It is said—and I have heard that remark before to-day—that Judge Woodruff, upon the bench, was somewhat austere. I have been absent from the bar so long that it has not come under my personal observation. With me there was never any austerity. During my long intercourse with him, he always treated me as a younger brother, and I found as kind a care in his house, as much fraternal affection from him, as much assistance whenever required, as I could have had from any devoted relative. But, if there was any austerity, it arose, in a great measure, if not entirely, from the earnestness of his nature. Within my recollection, there was a time when there was more cause than now, even, for apprehension on the part of lawyers, and austerity upon the part of judges, on account of young men coming to the bar unprepared, leaping over the barrier without adequate examination, and threatening to fill our courts with ignorance. There have been two evils under which we have been suffering—the election of judges, and the admission of lawyers without proper examination; and I think we have found out that the latter is the greater, as without a learned bar we cannot have honest and capable judges; and I have no doubt, that a man like Judge Woodruff, well versed in the law, armed with the full panoply of science, when on the bench he met gentlemen coming before him, as they had been accustomed to come in some courts, for the purpose of having orders corrected, or papers prepared by the judge, would allow his impatience to exceed its bounds, and treat those suitors in a different light from what he would if they had presented their cases as good lawyers should. But to my knowledge, although Judge Woodruff may, in the discharge of his duties, have had an earnestness which perhaps looked to outsiders like austerity, yet beneath that there was always a great kindness of disposition; and those who, as Judge Bosworth has said, have shared the hospitality of his house and become cognizant of the under-current of his nature, have never failed to recognize the noble qualities of the man. At the time referred to by Judge Bosworth, Mr. Woodruff lived in Nineteenth street, before he moved to his late residence in Twenty-Ninth street, where, united to a lady accomplished in all particulars, and with mental characteristics corresponding to his own, with an interesting family, with a large circle of friends, by marriage and by relationship, his house was always filled, he was the centre of an enlarged hospitality, and no man ever delighted to unbend, and to make all about him happy, more than our late associate. I look back to the time when I was in the habit of being in his house, sometimes for days at a time—I look back to those as the happiest days of my life passed out of my own family. And I am always willing to respond to and endorse any remarks such as have been made by our brother Bosworth, as to the geniality and hospitality of Judge Woodruff. I have, perhaps, exceeded the bounds to which I ought to have been confined on this occasion. I only intended to say a few words here with reference to the gentleman who has been so long associated with us, so long known to the whole community, who goes down to his rest as an upright judge. His career as a lawyer has been that of an able man; his career as an individual has been that of an honest man. I never, in all my reading, found but two men, and those living at a great distance from each other, as to time, who were willing to say, as they departed from this life, 'I am content. I have enjoyed to the full all that life affords, and I am ready for another sphere. I have had enough.' Judge Woodruff would hardly have said that. He would rather have said that he would like to remain longer upon the bench, to linger a little longer among his life associates. He would undoubtedly have liked to continue to dispense justice some years longer, so far as his health allowed him to do so, but at the same time, as we heard yesterday, he was a man of that character that when the time came that he saw his physical usefulness was gone, he was willing to give up and say—would not say, perhaps, but would feel—'I have done my part in this world as an honest man, as a good lawyer, as an upright judge, and I am not afraid to meet the greater Judge above.'

Hon. William M. Everts then addressed the meeting, as follows:

"Our profession has not unfrequently been called together at the close of the vacation, before renewing our service in the courts and to the community, to commemorate the loss of some distinguished lawyer or eminent judge. I am sure all of us can recall some suitable instances of this experience. Sometimes we have been criticised for assuming that there was matter of public interest in these occasions, and that our profession was distinguishable, in this regard, from other useful and honorable employments. Certainly no such observation can justly be made when the loss that we deplore is, even in a greater degree, the loss of the community, or when the lawyer whose career we celebrate was an eminent magistrate and judge. We cannot but feel that, though Judge Woodruff's life, public and eminent as it was in the general esteem, was wholly occupied in professional service, at the bar and on the bench, yet among his contemporaries who have pursued the more active or brilliant paths of political employment, few can be said, either in fact or in the recognition of the community, to have been more distinctly or more usefully public servants than he. His life was, indeed, useful, distinguished, prosperous, public, and in all that makes up the sum of human experience, whether personal, domestic, civic, or official, the full measure of prosperity in all marked his career. He gained no inconsiderable distinction at the bar, and, had he adhered to its employments, we cannot doubt, he would have added to his powers and his repute as an advocate and a counsellor. Yet there is no doubt that his preferences, no doubt that the special aptitudes of his intellect and moral character, fitted him, more especially, for that highest and most honorable employment among men, known in civilized society, that of a judge. And how fortunate he was in the adequate preparation to assume, quite early in life, and to adhere, with but slight interruptions, to the end, to this course of judicial service! Well educated, brought here at an age suitable to bear the more strenuous labors of the bar, he had the good fortune to be associated, thus early in his professional career, with a lawyer than whom, I think I may safely say, our experience or our recollections do not recall any one possessing greater natural powers, or more completely disciplined in all the faculties of a great forensic reasoner—I mean Mr. George Wood. And brought early into such a relation, he was by that connection brought into forensic opposition to eminent lawyers older than himself, men on the same level with Mr. Wood. When he had attracted the approval of the great leaders in the profession, by the display of his qualities of eminent fitness for the public service on the bench, he was, readily and by the consent of all, raised to that position. He first took a seat upon the bench, then and now the most ancient and venerable in our judicial history, a bench having the jurisdiction of the common law, and called by one of the favorite names of the common law, the 'Court of Common Pleas.' His next judicial service was as a judge of the most celebrated commercial court, perhaps, that we have ever had in this country, the superior court of the city of New York. He there filled out, by a somewhat new experience of judicial service, his preparation for the highest station in the political service of the state, a place in the court of appeals. For it seemed as if he was so well fitted to serve us as a judge, that the chances or derangements of courts or of politics were not long to deprive the community of his services. In the court of appeals, Judge Woodruff completed the round of judicial honors of the state, and by this varied experience was fully fitted for new judicial station. And when, by the defeat of his election to the court of appeals, he was thrown out of political place, and there came up a new court of great importance and dignity—the federal circuit judgeship—to be filled, by the general consent of the profession, he first occupied that eminent seat which he has just left. When he came to this new office, there was some feeling that his professional course had not made him specially familiar with the subject of federal jurisprudence, with admiralty or patent law, and not much, if at all, with revenue law. But, sir, a man as well instructed in the common law as Judge Woodruff was, by his experience at the bar and on the bench, has the best and only necessary preparation for any and all the special departments of jurisprudence. Those who have had the most experience in the round of those special employments and special jurisdictions best understand that the common law is wider and deeper, more various and more exacting in its demands and its discipline, than any specialty can ever be. And he who has proved himself to possess the great powers of legal reason, and the great diversity for judicial faculty, that the common law exacts, may well encounter untried special jurisdictions without fear. But Judge Woodruff had some personal fitness for each of these specialties that every judge does not possess. He had a very thorough and profound knowledge of mathematics, which served him in the admiralty jurisdiction and in the patent jurisdiction. He had a very thorough knowledge of the philosophies of the natural sciences, and, if he had no particular or special qualities that should fit him for the other departments of jurisprudence, the force of his intellect was adequate for them all.

"And, yet, all of us that have known Judge Woodruff at the bar and on the bench have felt, and all of us have exhibited this feeling to-day, that his moral qualities as a judge fitly expanded and dignified a great judicial character. That he sought distinction in the profession, and desired the promotions of the bench, is an honor to him, as it would be to any one; but no man ever found him seeking elevation by any unworthy arts, or pursuing competition with his rivals by any secret or dubious means. When there was an office for which himself and his friends might justly think him suitable, he was ready to avow his disposition to accept the office, but not to run after it. To that limit of desire he always adhered. He regarded the career of human life, not as a game, but as the discharge of a duty, and the constant observance of duty through life as the highest and best success permitted to man. He relished thoroughly the full meaning of that noble proposition of the sacred Scriptures, 'Now, if a man also strive for masteries, yet is he not crowned unless his strife be lawful.' "

The chair announced that he had received from a gentleman who was for several years an associate with Judge Woodruff, upon the bench, who was unable to be present at the meeting, a communication which, under the circumstances of the case, and in view of Judge Shipman's former relations to Judge Woodruff, it had been deemed not improper should be read as a portion of the proceedings of the meeting, and be published as a part thereof. The resolutions having been unanimously adopted, on motion of Robert D. Benedict, Esq., it was voted that the following letter of Hon. William D. Shipman be incorporated in the proceedings of the meeting:

"New York, Sept. 14th, 1875. Hon. Samuel Blatchford.—Dear Sir: Other and imperative engagements will prevent my being present at the meeting of the bar of this city, to be held to-morrow, to do honor to the memory of the late Hon. Lewis B. Woodruff, who, for nearly six years, has occupied the high position of United States circuit judge for the second circuit; but I am unwilling to allow the occasion to pass without a brief expression of my sense of the great loss which the bar, the bench, and the public have sustained by his death. My personal acquaintance with Judge Woodruff commenced at the date of his appointment to the office which he last held, though I had long known him by reputation, through his career at the bar, and on the bench of the common pleas, the superior court, and the court of appeals. I knew he was an able lawyer, and an upright judge of large experience and unblemished character. But early in 1870 I was brought into close personal and official relations with him, which continued more than three years, and gave me constant opportunity of observing his character as a man and judge. I soon came to admire his zealous and conscientious devotion to his duties, the strength of his understanding, and the never-absent labor and energy with which he discharged the constantly pressing and heavy responsibilities of his great office. No toil or self-denial, however severe or exacting, for a moment deterred him from a thorough examination of every case which was submitted to his decision. He fully appreciated his position, and well understood the functions of a judge to be, to administer justice according to settled rules. This was the guide to his judicial conduct, and in this he magnified his office. He had, indeed, a high sense of equity, and was always delighted when a sound conclusion was reached that would operate beneficially in the particular case before him. But he would never weaken established rules, nor unsettle the foundation of principles, in order to relieve the exceptional hardship of an isolated cause. He knew too well that both law and equity, to be of any value to an enlightened community, must be administered with steady uniformity, and to this end he spared neither time nor toil in the investigations which preceded his judgments, and in the preparation of his opinions which announced them. To this duty he brought a vigorous intellect, an enlightened reason, and a firm will. To say that he sometimes erred, is merely to pronounce him human. Judge Woodruff was a man of massive and hardy nature. He was not one to reverence overmuch the lighter graces and ornamental accomplishments of a fine gentleman. But no man ever gave a higher regard or a heartier recognition to the solid virtues which constitute the essential riches of character. Within his strong and rugged frame beat a warm, gentle, and manly heart, whose sympathies were limited by no partisan or sectarian lines. He was open, frank, and generous. All who knew him will regret his departure, and mourn the loss of a just man, and an able and incorruptible magistrate. Yours, very respectfully, Wm. D. Shipman."

The chair appointed as the committee to present the resolutions to the court of appeals and the circuit court, Messrs. Henry E. Davies, George Bliss, and Joseph H. Choate.

BIOGRAPHICAL NOTES

OF THE

FEDERAL JUDGES.

INCLUDING A BRIEF ACCOUNT OF THE PUBLIC CAREER OF ALL OF THE FEDERAL JUDGES APPOINTED PRIOR TO THE PUBLICATION OF THE FEDERAL CASES, JANUARY 25, 1894. THESE NOTES HAVE BEEN COMPILED FROM ORIGINAL HISTORICAL RESEARCHES, AND AN EXTENSIVE CORRESPONDENCE WITH THE JUDGES, RELATIVES OF DECEASED JUDGES, CLERKS OF THE UNITED STATES COURTS, AND MANY OTHERS.

ACHESON, MARCUS W. Born in Pennsylvania. Received a collegiate education. Admitted to the bar and practiced in Pittsburgh, Pa. United States district judge for the western district of Pennsylvania, commissioned Jan. 14, 1880. United States circuit judge for the third circuit, commissioned Feb. 9, 1891.

ADAMS, GEORGE. Born in Virginia, in August, 1784. Educated in his native state. United States district judge for the district of Mississippi. Commissioned Jan. 20, 1836. Resigned in 1839. Died at Jackson, Miss., Aug. 14, 1844.

ALDRICH, EDGAR. Born at Pittsburg, N. H., Feb. 5, 1843. At the age of 14 he entered the academy at Colebrook, and afterwards commenced the study of law in the office of Ira A. Ramsey. Subsequently entered the law department of the University of Michigan, graduating in March, 1868, at the age of 20. Returning to Colebrook, he was admitted to the bar of Coös county, and continued in practice alone until Jan. 1, 1882, when he formed a partnership with William H. Shurtleff, under the firm name of Aldrich & Shurtleff, which continued four years. Later he was similarly associated with James I. Parsons, and at Littleton with the Honorable George A. Bingham and others. Was twice appointed solicitor for Coös county. Was a member of the state legislature in 1884, and speaker of the house. United States district judge for district of New Hampshire, commissioned Feb. 25, 1891. M. A. Dartmouth, 1891.

ALLEN, WILLIAM J. Born in Wilson county, Tenn., June 9, 1829. Brought by his parents to Illinois the following year. Studied law at the Louisville, Ky., Law School. Admitted to the bar in 1850. Member of the legislature 1855. U. S. district attorney 1855 to 1859. Circuit judge 1859 to 1861. Representative in congress 1862 to 1865. Member of the Illinois constitutional convention of 1862 and 1870. United States district judge for the southern district of Illinois, commissioned April 18, 1887.

BAKER, JOHN H. Born in Parma township, Monroe county, New York, Feb. 28, 1832. Educated at Wesleyan University, Delaware, Ohio. Studied law, and commenced practice in Goshen, Ind., in 1857. State senator (Ind.) 1862. Representative in congress of United States, 1874. Was appointed a member of the committee on elections. Again elected to congress in 1876-1878. Was member of committee on appropriations. United States district judge for the district of Indiana, commissioned March 29, 1892.

BALDWIN, ALEXANDER W. Born in Alabama, 1835. Studied law. Settled in Virginia City, Nev. United States district judge for the district of Nevada, commissioned March 11, 1865. Was killed in a railway accident at Alameda, Cal., Nov. 15, 1869.

BALDWIN, HENRY. Born in New Haven, Conn., Jan. 14, 1780. Was graduated at Yale in 1797. Removed to Pittsburgh, Pa. Member of congress 1817-1822. Associate justice of the United States supreme court. Assigned to the third circuit, commissioned Feb. 11, 1830. LL. D., Yale, 1830. Author of "A General View of the Constitution." Died in Philadelphia, April 21, 1844.

BALLARD, BLAND. Practiced law in Louisville, Ky. United States district judge for the district of Kentucky, commissioned Oct. 16, 1861. Died July 29, 1879.

BARBOUR, PHILIP PENDLETON. Born in Orange county, Va., May 25, 1783. Studied law at William and Mary. Member of legislature (Va.) 1812-1814, and of congress 1814. Speaker of the house of representatives 1821. Re-elected to congress in 1827. President of the Virginia constitutional convention in 1829. Resigned his seat in congress May 31, 1830. United States district judge for the eastern district of Virginia, commissioned Oct. 8, 1830. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned March 15, 1836. Candidate for the Democratic nomination for vice president in 1832. Died in Washington, D. C., Feb. 24, 1841.

BARNES, DAVID LEONARD. Born in Scituate, Mass., Jan. 28, 1760. After graduating at Harvard commenced the practice of law at Taunton, Mass., removing soon after to Providence, R. I. Was a member of the legislature. United States district judge for district of Rhode Island, commissioned April 30, 1801. Died at Providence, Nov. 3, 1812.

BARR, JOHN W. Born in Versailles, Ky., Dec. 17, 1826. Educated at private schools. Was graduated from the law department of the Transylvania University in 1847. Began practice in Versailles. Removed to Louisville. United States district judge for the district of Kentucky, commissioned April 16, 1880. He organized the present board of sinking fund for the city of Louisville, and served as president of the board for several years after its organization.

BASSETT, RICHARD. Born in Delaware. Member of congress 1787. Member of the federal constitutional convention 1787. United States senator 1789-1793. Presidential elector (Federalist) in 1797. Governor of Delaware 1798-1801. United States circuit judge for the third circuit, commissioned Feb. 20, 1801. The act under which the appointment was made was repealed, to take effect July 1, 1802. Died in September, 1815.

BAXTER, JOHN. Born in Rutherford county, N. C., March 5, 1819, and educated there. Licensed to practice law in 1841. Member of legislature 1842, 1846, and 1852-1857. Presidential elector 1844 and 1848. Removed to Knoxville, Tenn., 1857. Member of state constitutional convention 1870. United States circuit judge for the sixth circuit, commissioned Dec. 13, 1877. Died at Hot Springs, Ark., April 2, 1886.

BEATTY, JAMES H. Born at Lancaster, and educated at Delaware, Ohio. First lieutenant of the 4th Iowa battery during the last half of the civil war. Commenced the practice of the law at Lexington, Mo., Sept., 1865. Was register in bankruptcy until removal to Salt Lake City in 1872, where he remained until his removal to Hailey, Idaho, in 1882. Chief justice of Idaho, 1889, removing to Boise City in 1890. Was a member of the territorial legislature and constitutional convention of Idaho, and assistant United States attorney in Utah. United States district judge for the district of Idaho, commissioned March 7, 1891.

BEDFORD, JR., GUNNING. Born in Philadelphia, Pa., 1747. Was graduated at Princeton 1771. Aide de camp to Washington. Member of legislature, (Del.) Member of congress in 1783-1786. Member of the federal constitutional convention 1787. Presidential elector in 1789 and 1793. Attorney general of Delaware before 1789. United States district judge for the district of Delaware, commissioned Sept. 26, 1789. Died March 30, 1812.

BEE, THOMAS. Born in South Carolina 1729. Member and speaker of the colonial assembly and privy council. Member of committee of safety. In the continental congress 1780-1782. Lieutenant governor of South Carolina. United States district judge for the district of South Carolina, commissioned June 14, 1790. Ceased to be district judge in 1812. Published "Reports of the District Court of South Carolina" 1810.

BELLINGER, CHARLES B. Born at Maquon, Knox county, Ill., Nov. 21, 1839. Removed to Oregon with his parents in 1847. Admitted to the bar in 1863. Member of the Oregon legislature in 1868. Served in the Modoc Indian war in 1873. Clerk of the supreme court of Oregon, 1875-1878. Judge of state circuit court of Oregon, 1878-1880. Lecturer on equity, Law School, University of Oregon, since 1889. United States district judge for the district of Oregon, commissioned April 15, 1893.

BENEDICT, CHARLES L. A resident of Brooklyn, N. Y. Studied law and practiced there. Member of legislature 1868. The first United States district judge for the eastern district of New York, commissioned March 9, 1865. Offered a position on the bench of the New York court of appeals in 1881.

BENSON, EGBERT. Born in New York city, June 21, 1746. Was graduated at Kings College (Columbia) in 1765. Member of Revolutionary committee of safety. Attorney general of New York 1777-1789. Member of legislature 1777. Member of congress 1784-1788, 1789-1793, and 1813-1815. Judge of the supreme court of New York 1794. United States circuit judge for the second circuit, commissioned Feb. 20, 1801. The act under which the appointment was made was repealed, to take effect July 1, 1802. Regent of New York University 1789, 1802. LL. D., Harvard, 1808; Dartmouth, 1811. President of the New York Historical Society. Died in Jamaica, L. I., Aug. 24, 1833.

BETTS, SAMUEL ROSSITER. Born in Richmond, Berkshire county, Mass., 1787. Was graduated at Williams in 1806. Studied law in Hudson, N. Y. Served in the war of 1812, and was appointed judge advocate by Gov. Tompkins of New York. Elected to congress 1815. District attorney for Orange county, N. Y. United States district judge for the southern district of New York, commissioned Dec. 21, 1826. Retired in May, 1867. During his first 20 years on the bench it is said that no appeal was taken from any of his decisions. LL. D., Williams, 1830. Published a work on admiralty in 1838. He exerted a powerful influence upon the development of American admiralty law. Many of his decisions are now published for the first time in this work. He died in New Haven, Conn., Nov. 3, 1868.

BIGGS, ASA. Born in Williamstown, Martin county, N. C., Feb. 4, 1811. Member of the North Carolina constitutional convention of 1835; of legislature 1840-1845; of congress in 1845. One of the commissioners appointed in 1850 to prepare the Revised Code of North Carolina. Elected United States senator in 1854. Resigned in 1858. United States district judge for the district of North Carolina, commissioned May 3, 1858. Resigned April, 1861. Elected to the convention which passed the secession ordinance in May, 1861. District judge, Confederate States of America, 1861-1865. Resumed practice after the war. Died in Norfolk, Va., March 6, 1878.

BILLINGS, EDWARD COKE. Born at Hatfield, Mass., Dec. 3, 1829. Graduated at Yale in 1856. Practiced law in New York city until 1863, when he removed to New Orleans. United States district judge of the district of Louisiana, commissioned Feb. 10, 1876. LL. D., Yale, 1890. Died Dec. 2, 1893, in New Haven, Conn.

BLAIR, JOHN. Born in Williamsburg, Va., 1732. Was graduated from William and Mary College. Studied law at the Temple, London. Member of legislature 1765. Signed the nonimportation agreement in 1769. Member of committee on provisional government and of the council 1776. Judge of the Virginia court of appeals 1777, (afterwards chief justice.) Judge of the high court of chancery in 1780. Member of the federal constitutional convention in 1787, and of the Virginia convention to ratify the federal constitution. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned Sept. 30, 1789. Resigned Jan. 27, 1796. Died in Williamsburg, Va., Aug. 31, 1800.

BLAND, THEODORICK. Born in 1777. Judge of the county court of Baltimore. United States district judge for the district of Maryland, commissioned Nov. 23, 1819. Ceased to be district judge, June 5, 1824. Chancellor of Maryland for 22 years. Died at Annapolis, Md., Nov. 16, 1846. Published Maryland Chancery Reports, (1826-1841.)

BLATCHFORD, SAMUEL. Born in New York, March 9, 1820. Was graduated at Columbia in 1837. Private secretary to Gov. Seward 1839-1841. Admitted to the bar in 1842. Settled in Auburn as law partner of William H. Seward and Christopher Morgan in 1845. Removed to New York city 1854. Declined a place on the state supreme bench in 1855. United States district judge for the southern district of New York, commissioned May 3, 1867. United States circuit judge for the second circuit, commissioned March 4, 1878. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned March 22, 1882. Assigned to the second circuit. Died July 7, 1893. Published Blatchford's Circuit Court Reports, (second circuit.) Trustee of Columbia since 1867.

BLODGETT, HENRY WILLIAM. Born in Amherst, Mass., July 21, 1821. Removed to Illinois about 1831. Studied law in Chicago with Jonathan Y. Scammon and Norman B. Judd. Admitted to the bar 1845. Practiced in Waukegan, Ill. Member of legislature 1852, (Free-Soil.) Counsel of the Chicago & Northwestern Railroad 1855. President and attorney of the Chicago & Milwaukee Railroad. United States district judge for the northern district of Illinois, commissioned Jan. 11, 1870. Retired Dec. 5, 1892, to become counsel before Bering Sea Arbitration Commission at Paris 1892 and 1895.

BOARMAN, ALECK. Born in Yazoo City, Miss., Dec. 10, 1839. Educated at the Kentucky Military Institute. Studied law. Officer in the Confederate army. Began practice in 1866. Settled in Louisiana. Member of the forty-second congress. Judge of the state district court. United States district judge for the western district of Louisiana, commissioned May 13, 1881. Resides at Shreveport.

BOICE, HENRY. United States district judge for the western district of Louisiana, commissioned May 9, 1849. Ceased to be district judge, Jan. 21, 1861. Died about 1866.

BOND, HUGH LENNOX. Born in Baltimore, Md., Dec. 16, 1828. Removed to New York city. Was graduated from the University of the City of New York in 1848. Studied law with Dobbin & Talbot, of Baltimore. Admitted to the bar in 1851. Judge of the Baltimore criminal court 1860-1868. United States circuit judge for the fourth circuit, commissioned July 13, 1870. Died Oct. 24, 1893. Among the noted trials in which Judge Bond presided were the Ku Klux Cases, in South Carolina, the Virginia Coupon Cases, and the Navassa Murder Cases.

BOURN, BENJAMIN. Born in Bristol, R. I., Sept. 9, 1755. Was graduated at Harvard 1775. Studied law and practiced at Providence, R. I. Quartermaster of the second Rhode Island regiment in 1776. Member of congress 1790. Resigned 1796. United States district judge for the district of Rhode Island, commissioned Oct. 13, 1796. United States circuit judge for the first circuit, commissioned Feb. 20, 1801. The act under which the appointment was made was repealed, to take effect July 1, 1802. Died Sept. 17, 1808.

BOYLE, JOHN. Born in Botecourt county, Va., Oct. 28, 1774. Educated in Kentucky. Began practice in Lancaster 1797. Member of congress 1803-1809. Declined the governorship of Illinois territory. Judge of the Kentucky court of appeals. Chief justice of that court 1810-1826. United States district judge for the district of Kentucky, commissioned Oct. 20, 1826. Died Jan. 28, 1834.

BOYNTON, THOMAS JEFFERSON. Born in Amherst township, Lorain county, Ohio, Aug. 31, 1838. Educated in the common schools of his native place. Studied law with Hon. Philemon Bliss, and began practice at St. Joseph, Mo., in 1858. Appointed United States district attorney for the southern district of Florida in 1861. United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, commissioned Oct. 19, 1863. Resigned in 1870. Died in New York City in May, 1871.

BRADFORD, EDWARD G. Born in Maryland. Settled in Wilmington, Del. Member of state legislature in 1849. Deputy attorney general for several years. Appointed United States district attorney for Delaware in 1861. Resigned in 1866. United States district judge for the district of Delaware, commissioned Dec. 12, 1871. Died Jan. 16, 1884.

BRADLEY, JOSEPH P. Born in Berne, Albany county, N. Y., March 14, 1813. Was graduated at Rutgers in 1836. Studied law with Arthur Gifford, Esq., of Newark, N. J. Admitted to the bar 1839. Practiced in Newark 1840-1870. Argued the New Jersey Bridge Case in the United States supreme court in 1860. Candidate for congress 1862. Presidential elector 1868. Lecturer in Rutgers College on political economy and constitutional law. LL. D., Lafayette, 1859. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned April 4, 1870. Assigned to the third circuit, Dec. 21, 1880. Member of the electoral commission in 1877. He married in 1844 Miss Mary Hornblower, daughter of the chief justice of New Jersey. He died Jan. 22, 1892.

BRAWLEY, WILLIAM H. Born in South Carolina, in 1841. Was graduated at the South Carolina College in 1860. Attended lectures at the College de France, in Paris, 1865. Admitted to the bar in 1866. Was solicitor (prosecuting attorney) for the sixth circuit for two terms, resigning in 1874. Was a member of the state legislature for eight years. Was a member of the 52d and 53d congresses of United States. Resigned upon being appointed United States district judge for the district of South Carolina, commissioned Jan. 18, 1894.

BREARLY, DAVID. Born near Trenton, N. J., June 11, 1745. Practiced law in Allentown, N. J. He was once arrested for treason in the excitement of the ante-Revolutionary troubles. Member of the first constitutional convention of New Jersey. Lieutenant in a New Jersey regiment in the Revolution. Chief justice of New Jersey 1779-1789. Member of the federal constitutional convention 1787. President of the New Jersey convention which ratified the federal constitution 1788. Presidential elector 1789. United States district judge for the district of New Jersey, commissioned Sept. 26, 1789. One of the compilers of the Episcopal prayer book in 1785. Died in Trenton, Aug. 16, 1790.

BREWER, DAVID JOSIAH. Born in Smyrna, Asia Minor, June 20, 1837. Studied for a time at Wesleyan. Graduated from Yale in 1856. Studied law for a time with his uncle, David Dudley Field, of New York city. Was graduated from the Albany Law School, and admitted to the New York bar in 1858. Removed to the west the same year, and settled in Leavenworth, Kan. United States commissioner 1861-1864. Judge of probate and of Leavenworth county criminal court 1863-1865. Judge of first judicial district of the state 1865-1869. County attorney 1869-1871. Judge of the Kansas supreme court 1871-1884. United States circuit judge for the eighth circuit, commissioned March 31, 1884. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned Dec. 20, 1889. LL. D., Iowa College, 1894; Washburn, 1890; Yale, 1891.

BRISTOL, WILLIAM. Born in Hamden, Conn., 1779. Was graduated at Yale 1798. Admitted to the bar and practiced in New Haven, Conn. Was at one time mayor of New Haven. Was United States district attorney about 1812. Judge of the state superior court 1819-1826. United States district judge for the district of Connecticut, commissioned May 22, 1826. Died in New Haven, March 7, 1836.

BROCKENBROUGH, JOHN WHITE. Born in Virginia, Dec. 23, 1806. United States district judge for the western district of Virginia, commissioned Jan. 14, 1846. Resigned June, 1861, on the secession of Virginia. Was elected a member of peace congress by the legislature. Was a member of the Confederate congress. For many years was professor at Washington and Lee University. Also conducted a law school at Lexington, Va. Died Feb. 20, 1877.

BRONSON, ISAAC H. Born in Rutland, N. Y., Oct. 16, 1802. Admitted to the bar in 1822. Practiced in Watertown, N. Y. Member of congress 1836; chairman of committee on territories. Judge of territorial court of Florida 1838. United States district judge for the district of Florida, commissioned Aug. 8, 1846. United States district judge for the northern district of Florida, commissioned Feb. 23, 1847. Died at Palatka, Fla., Aug. 13, 1855.

BROOKS, George W. Born in Elizabeth City, N. C., March 16, 1821. Educated at the high school of Gates county. At the age of 21 was appointed clerk of the superior court of Pasquotank county. While in that office he read law under the direction of Charles R. Kenney. Admitted to the bar in 1845. Represented his county in the house of commons at the session of 1852-1853. In 1861 he opposed the secession of his state, and during the civil war was a prominent Unionist. United States district judge of the district of North Carolina, commissioned Aug. 19, 1865. He was a member of the reconstruction convention in 1866. Died January 6, 1882, at his home in Elizabeth City.

BROWN, ADDISON. Born at West Newbury, Mass., Feb. 21, 1830. Was graduated at Harvard in 1852, and from the Harvard Law School in 1854. Removed to New York city. Admitted to the bar 1855. United States district judge for the southern district of New York, commissioned June 2, 1881.

BROWN, HENRY BILLINGS. Born at South Lee, Berkshire county, Mass., March 2, 1836. Was graduated at Yale in 1856. Admitted to the bar in Detroit, Mich., 1860. United States deputy marshal 1861. United States district attorney 1863-1868. Circuit judge for Wayne county, Mich., 1868. United States district judge for the eastern district of Michigan, commissioned March 19, 1875. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned Dec. 31, 1890. Compiler of Brown's Admiralty Reports. LL. D., University of Michigan, 1887; Yale, 1891. Lecturer on admiralty law in the law department of the University of Michigan, 1888.

BROWN, MORGAN W. Native of Tennessee. Was editor of one of the leading papers at Nashville. Is brother of W. L. Brown, judge of supreme court. United States district judge for the eastern and western districts of Tennessee, commissioned Jan. 3, 1834. United States judge for the eastern, middle, and western districts of Tennessee, commissioned Jan. 18, 1839. Ceased to be district judge, March 6, 1853.

BRUCE, JOHN. Born in Sterlingshire, Scotland, Feb. 16, 1832. Removed to Wayne county, Ohio, 1840. Was graduated from Franklin College, Ohio, in 1854. Removed to Iowa. Admitted to the bar 1856. Practiced at Keokuk as the partner of Hon. Geo. W. McCrary, later a circuit judge. Brevet brigadier general in the Union army. Settled in Alabama as a cotton planter. Member of legislature 1872 and 1874. United States district judge for the district of Alabama, commissioned Feb. 27, 1875.

BRYAN, GEORGE S. Born at Charleston, S. C., May 21, 1809. Educated in his native city. Was lieutenant of the Volunteer Troops of the Florida war of 1836. Trustee of public schools of Charleston, high school of Charleston, Charleston College, Charleston Library, and Carolina Art Association. United States district judge for the district of South Carolina, commissioned March 12, 1866. Resigned Sept. 5, 1886. Died at Flat Rock, S. C., Sept. 28, 1895.

BRYANT, DAVID E. Born in La Rue county, Ky., Oct. 19, 1849. Moved with his parents to Grayson county, Tex., in Jan., 1853. Was graduated from Trinity College, N. C., in June, 1871. Returning to Grayson county, was admitted to the bar, and commenced the practice of law in Oct., 1873. United States district judge for the eastern district of Texas, commissioned May 23, 1890.

BUFFINGTON, JOSEPH. Born at Kittanning, Armstrong county, Pa., Sept. 5, 1855. Entered Trinity College, Hartford, Conn., in 1871, and graduated in 1875. Studied law in his native town, and was admitted to the bar in 1878. United States district judge for the western district of Pennsylvania, commissioned Feb. 23, 1892.

BUGBEE, JOHN S. Born May 31, 1840, at Sackville, N. B. Removed in early life to Boston. Admitted to practice in the superior court of Massachusetts, July 19, 1862. Removed to San Francisco, and admitted to practice in supreme court of California, Oct., 1862. Assistant city and county attorney of San Francisco, 1885-1886. United States district judge for district of Alaska, commissioned Dec. 7, 1889. Served till April 21, 1892. Practices law at Juneau, Alaska.

BULLOCK, JONATHAN RUSSELL. Born in Bristol, R. I., Sept. 6, 1815. Was graduated at Brown in 1834. Studied law in his father's office. Admitted to the bar 1836. Practiced in Alton, Ill., until 1843. Returned to Rhode Island. Appointed collector in 1849. Member of legislature 1844-1846. Member of the state senate 1859. Lieutenant governor 1860. Member of special commission to adjust accounts between Rhode Island and the United States 1861. Judge of the state supreme court 1862. United States district judge for the district of Rhode Island, commissioned Feb. 11, 1865. Resigned in Sept., 1869.

BUNN, ROMANZO. Born in South Hartwick, Otsego county, N. Y., Sept. 24, 1829. Removed to western New York in 1832, and to Wisconsin in 1854. Educated at a common school and at Springville Academy, N. Y. Studied law. Admitted to the bar in 1853. Practiced at Ellicottville, N. Y. District attorney in Trempealeau and Monroe counties, Wis. Member of the legislature in 1860. From 1869 to 1877 circuit judge of the sixth circuit, Wis. United States district judge for the western district of Wisconsin, commissioned Oct. 30, 1877.

BUSTEED, RICHARD. Born in Cavan, Ireland, Feb. 16, 1822. His father, a barrister in Dublin, emigrated to Canada, and later to the United States. The son worked on a newspaper in New York. Was a local preacher in the Methodist Church. Admitted to the bar in 1846. Corporation counsel of New York city 1856-1859. Brigadier general of volunteers in 1862. Resigned March 10, 1863. United States district judge for the district of Alabama, commissioned Nov. 17, 1863. Decided the test oath as to attorneys in federal courts unconstitutional, which the supreme court affirmed. Resigned Oct. 20, 1874, and resumed practice in New York city.

BUTLER, WILLIAM. Born in Chester county, Pa., Dec. 22, 1822. Attended the schools of the county until 15 years of age, when he entered the office of the Village Record, a newspaper published in West Chester, where he remained until his nineteenth year, when he purchased an interest in the Norristown Herald and Free Press. While assisting to edit and publish this paper he studied law, and was admitted to the bar in December, 1845, returning soon afterwards to West Chester. Was elected district attorney in 1856; president judge for the 15th judicial district of Pennsylvania in 1861. Re-elected in 1871. United States district judge for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, commissioned Feb. 19, 1879.

BYRD, CHARLES WILLING. Born at Westover, on the James river, below Richmond, July 26, 1770. Was a grandson of Col. William Byrd, founder of the city of Richmond. His father dying in 1777, he was sent to Philadelphia, where he was placed in charge of relatives, and where he received his education and early training. In 1794 he went to Kentucky as the agent of Robert Morris, and located at Frankfort, where he engaged in the practice of law, and also at Lexington, and is said to have been successful. Removed to Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1799, when he was appointed secretary of the Northwest Territory by President Adams, his commission being dated Dec. 1, 1799. Was a member of the first constitutional convention in Ohio, and the second governor of that state. United States district judge for the district of Ohio, commissioned March 3, 1803, which position he held until his decease, Aug. 11, 1828. Is said to have been a personal friend of Thomas Jefferson.

GADWALADER, JOHN. Born in Philadelphia, Pa., April 1, 1805. Was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania 1821. Studied law with Horace Binney. Admitted to the bar 1825. His kinsman, Nicholas Biddle, then president of the United States Bank, gave him the place of solicitor for that institution. Member of congress (Democrat) 1855-1857. United States district judge for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, commissioned April 24, 1858. Died in Philadelphia, Jan. 26, 1879. LL. D., University of Pennsylvania, 1870.

CALDWELL, ALEXANDER. United States district judge for the western district of Virginia, commissioned Oct. 28, 1825. Died in Wheeling, Va., (W. Va.) April 8, 1839.

CALDWELL, HENRY CLAY. Born in Marshall county, Va., Sept. 4, 1832. Educated at common schools in Iowa. Studied law in Keosauque, Iowa. Admitted to the bar 1852. Prosecuting attorney of Van Buren county, Iowa, 1856-1858. Member of legislature 1859-1861. Colonel of volunteers during the Civil War. Resigned June 4, 1864. United States district judge for the eastern and western districts of Arkansas, commissioned June 20, 1864. United States district judge for the eastern district of Arkansas, commissioned March 3, 1871. United States circuit judge for the eighth circuit, commissioned March 7, 1890.

CAMPBELL, JOHN ARCHIBALD. Born in Washington, Wilkes county, Ga., June 24, 1811. Was graduated at the University of Georgia in 1826. Admitted to the bar while still a minor in 1829, by special act of the legislature. Practiced in Montgomery, Ala. Member of legislature. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned March 22, 1853. Assigned to the fifth circuit. Resigned May 21, 1861. Opposed secession. Secretary of war for the Confederate States, and peace commissioner on their behalf in 1865. After the war he was arrested and confined in Ft. Pulaski. Released on parole. Practiced in New Orleans.

CAMPBELL, JOHN WILSON. Born in Augusta county, Va., Feb. 23, 1783. His parents removed with him to Ohio. Received a common school education, was admitted to the bar in 1808, and began practice in West Union, Ohio. Prosecuting attorney for Adams county and Highlands county. Member of legislature. Member of congress 1817-1827. United States district judge for the district of Ohio, commissioned March 7, 1829. Died in Delaware county, Ohio, Sept. 24, 1833.

CARPENTIER, GEORGE MOULTON. Born at Portsmouth, R. I., April 22, 1844. Was graduated at Brown in 1864. Reporter for newspapers and in the courts. Studied law. Admitted to the bar in 1867. Practiced in Providence, R. I. Commissioner to revise the laws of the state in 1830. Justice of the state supreme court 1882. United States district judge for the district of Rhode Island, commissioned Dec. 18, 1884.

CATRON, JOEN. Born in Wythe county, Va., 1778. Educated in common schools. Removed to Tennessee in 1812. Studied law there. Served in the New Orleans campaign under Jackson. Elected state attorney by the legislature. Removed to Nashville. Chosen to the supreme bench of the state in 1824. Chief justice 1830-1836. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned March 8, 1837. Assigned to the eighth circuit. Assigned to the sixth circuit, March 10, 1863. Opposed secession, and had to leave the state. Held the office until his death, May 30, 1865.

CHASE, SALMON PORTLAND. Born in Cornish, N. H., Jan. 13, 1808. Was in the family of his uncle (bishop of Ohio) 1820-1823. Returned to New Hampshire 1823. Was graduated from Dartmouth in 1826, and established a classical school in Washington, D. C., studying law with William Wirt, Esq. Admitted to the bar 1830. Practiced in Cincinnati. Joined the liberty party in 1841. Famous for defending fugitive slaves. Chairman of the Free-Soil party convention at Buffalo in 1843. Elected to the United States senate in February, 1849, by Democratic and Free-Soil coalition. Elected governor of Ohio 1855; re-elected 1857. Candidate for Republican presidential nomination at Chicago in 1860. United States senator in 1860. Appointed secretary of the treasury March 4, 1861. Resigned June 30, 1864. Member of the peace commission in 1861. Chief justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned Dec. 6, 1864. Assigned to the fourth circuit. Presided over the impeachment trial of President Johnson in 1868. Mentioned for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1868. Died May 7, 1873.

CHASE, SAMUEL. Born in Somerset county, Md., April 14, 1741. Studied law at Annapolis. Admitted to the bar in 1761. Member of colonial legislature. Prominent in the stamp-act agitation. Member of congress 1774-1778. Signer of Declaration of Independence. United States commissioner to Canada with Franklin and Carrol. Delegate to England from Maryland in 1783 to recover certain moneys from the Bank of England. Removed to Baltimore in 1786. Chief justice of the criminal court of Baltimore in 1788. Member of the Maryland convention to ratify the federal constitution, which he thought not democratic enough. Chief justice of the general court of Maryland 1791. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned Jan. 27, 1796. Assigned to the old middle circuit, July 1, 1802. He held this office until his death. He was impeached in 1804, by the house of representatives, under the leadership of John Randolph. Acquitted by the senate (the two thirds requisite for conviction not being obtained) March 5, 1805. The grounds of the impeachment were his conduct in the trials of Fries and Callender for sedition four years before, and a charge delivered to the grand jury for the district of Maryland. He was of imperious temper, and given to express his political opinions on the bench. Died June 19, 1811.

CHIPMAN, NATHANIEL. Born in Salisbury, Conn., Nov. 15, 1753. Was graduated from Yale in 1777. Lieutenant in the Revolutionary army. Resigned 1778, and removed to Litchfield, Conn. Admitted to the bar 1779, and removed to Timmouth, Vt. Member of legislature 1784-1785. Judge of state supreme court 1786. Chief justice 1789. Commissioner on behalf of Vermont to adjust differences with New York 1789, and to negotiate for admission of Vermont to the Union 1791. United States district judge for the district of Vermont, commissioned March 4, 1791. Resigned 1793. Chief justice of the state supreme court 1796. United States senator 1797-1803. Member of legislature 1806-1811. Censor 1813. Chief justice of the state supreme court 1813-1815. Professor of law at Middlebury from 1816 until his death, in Timmouth, Vt., Feb. 15, 1843. Published "Sketches of the Principles of Government," and "Reports and Dissertations."

CHOATE, WILLIAM GARDNER. Born at Salem, Mass., Aug. 30, 1830. Was graduated from Harvard in 1852, and from the Dane Law School in 1854. United States district judge for the southern district of New York, commissioned March 25, 1878. Resigned June 2, to take effect June 6, 1881. Resumed practice in New York city.

CLARK, DANIEL, Born in Stratham, Rockingham county, N. H., Oct. 24, 1809. Was graduated at Dartmouth in 1834. Began practice in 1837 at Epping, N. H., where he had studied law. Removed to Manchester, N. H., 1839. Member of legislature 1842. United States senator 1857. Resigned July, 1866. President pro tem. of the senate 1864-1865. United States district judge for the district of New Hampshire, commissioned July 27, 1866. President of the New Hampshire constitutional convention of 1876. Died Jan. 2, 1891.

CLAY, JR., JOSEPH. Born in Savannah, Ga., Aug. 16, 1764. Was graduated from Princeton at the head of his class in 1784. Studied law in Savannah. United States district judge for the district of Georgia, commissioned Sept. 16, 1796. Resigned May, 1801. United States circuit judge for the fifth circuit, commissioned Feb. 24, 1801. The act under which the appointment was made was repealed, to take effect July 1, 1802. Professed religion and joined the Baptist Church in 1803. Ordained to the ministry 1804. Pastor of the First Baptist Church of Boston, Mass., 1807. Died in Boston, Jan. 11, 1811.

CLIFFORD, NATHAN. Born in Rumney, Grafton county, N. H., Aug. 18, 1803. Educated in Haverhill, N. H., Academy, and Hampton Literary Institution. Practiced in York county, Me., 1827. Member of legislature 1830-1834. Speaker 1832-1834. Attorney general of Maine 1834-1838. Member of congress 1838-1843. Attorney general of the United States 1846. Minister to Mexico to arrange a treaty of peace, Sept. 6, 1849. Resumed law practice in Maine. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned Jan. 12, 1858. Assigned to the first circuit. President of the electoral commission in 1877. Died in Cornish, Me., July 25, 1881. Published Circuit Court Reports for the first circuit, (Boston, 1869.)

COLT, LE BARON BRADFORD. Born in Dedham, Mass., June 25, 1846. Was graduated at Yale in 1868, and at the Columbia Law School in 1870. Admitted to the bar of New York 1870. Practiced in Chicago. Removed to Bristol, R. I., in 1875. Member of legislature 1879-1881. United States district judge for the district of Rhode Island, commissioned March 21, 1881. United States circuit judge for the first circuit, commissioned July 5, 1884.

CONKLING, ALFRED. Born in Suffolk county, N. Y., Oct. 12, 1789. Was graduated from Union College in 1810. Admitted to the bar 1812. District attorney for Montgomery county. Member of congress 1812-1823. Removed to Albany. United States district judge for the northern district of New York, commissioned Dec. 14, 1825. Resigned Aug. 6, 1852, to accept the position of minister to Mexico. Settled in Geneseo, 1864. LL. D., Union, 1847. Died in Utica, N. Y., Feb. 5, 1874. Author of treatises on "United States Courts," on "Admiralty," on "Executive Powers," and of the "Young Citizens' Manual."

COXE, ALFRED CONKLING. Born in Auburn, N. Y. Was graduated at Hamilton College in 1868. Admitted to the bar in 1868. Practiced in Utica, N. Y., in partnership with Senator Roscoe Conkling and Ex-Judge Sidney T. Holmes. Appointed in 1880, by the governor of New York, one of the managers of Utica State Hospital. United States district judge for the northern district of New York, commissioned May 4, 1882. He is a grandson of Judge Alfred Conkling, of the same court. Is lecturer at Cornell University on the law of shipping and admiralty.

CRANCH, WILLIAM. Born in Weymouth, Mass., July, 1769. Was graduated at Harvard in 1789. Admitted to the bar in 1790. Practiced in Braintree and Haverhill, Mass. Removed to what is now Washington, D. C., in October, 1794. His kinsman, President John Adams, appointed him judge of the circuit court for the District of Columbia, commissioned March 3, 1801. Chief judge of the same court, commissioned Feb. 24, 1806. He published nine volumes of United States Supreme Court Reports and six volumes of Circuit Court Reports. He also prepared a Code for the District of Columbia, and published a memoir of John Adams, (1827.) He died in Washington, D. C. Sept. 11, 1855.

CRAWFORD, WILLIAM. Born in Virginia in 1767. Was graduated at William and Mary College. Removed to Alabama in 1810. Was receiver of public moneys, and had charge of the United States land office at St. Stephens, Ala. Was United States district attorney at Mobile. United States district judge for the districts of Alabama, commissioned May 22, 1826. Died April 28, 1849. He was author of a work on "Equity Jurisprudence."

CREIGHTON, JR., WILLIAM. Born in Berkeley county, Va., Oct. 29, 1778. Was graduated from Dickinson College, Pa., with distinction, 1795. Studied law in Martinsburgh, Va., and in 1797 visited the Northwest Territory. Settled at Chillicothe, Ohio, in 1799, where he was admitted to practice law. Was secretary of state of Ohio. Elected by the general assembly, March 5, 1803. Re-elected in 1805. Resigned Dec. 8, 1808. Was United States attorney for the district of Ohio in 1808. In 1814 was elected to the thirteenth congress. Was re-elected to the fourteenth congress in 1816, and to the twentieth congress in 1824. Also re-elected to the twenty-first and to the twenty-second. United States district judge for the district of Ohio, commissioned Nov 1, 1828. His term of office expired Dec. 31st of the same year, his nomination having failed of confirmation. Died Oct. 1, 1851. As secretary of state was designer of the great seal of the state. He was a brother-in-law of his predecessor, Judge Byrd, in the office of district judge.

CURTIS, BENJAMIN ROBBINS. Born in Watertown, Mass., Nov. 4, 1809. Was graduated at Harvard in 1829. Practiced in Northfield, Mass. Removed to Boston, and attended the Harvard Law School. Member of legislature, (Whig.) Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned Sept. 22, 1851. Assigned to the first circuit. He wrote a dissenting opinion in the famous Dred Scott Case. Resigned Sept. 30, 1857, and practiced in Boston. Counsel for President Johnson in the impeachment trial, 1868. Died at Newport, R. I., Sept. 15, 1874. He published "Decisions of the United States Supreme Court," (an abridgment of the official reports.) A memoir and a volume of his writings have been published by his brother, George Ticknor Curtis.

CUSHING, WILLIAM. Born in Scituate, Mass., March 1, 1732. Was graduated at Harvard in 1751. Studied law with Jeremy Gridley. Attorney general of Massachusetts. Judge of probate for Lincoln county, Mass., (Me.) 1768. Judge of Massachusetts superior court in 1772. Chief judge 1777. Chief justice of Massachusetts under the state constitution 1780. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned Sept. 27, 1789. Assigned to the eastern circuit, July 1, 1802. Commissioned chief justice 1796, but declined. Vice president of Massachusetts convention to ratify the federal constitution, 1788. Founder of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. Died in Scituate, Sept. 13, 1810.

CUYLER, JEREMIAH. Born in Savannah, Ga., June 4, 1768. United States district judge for the district of Georgia, commissioned June 12, 1821. He was one of those that welcomed La Fayette to Savannah. He laid the corner stone for Nathaniel Greene's monument. Died in Savannah, May 6, 1839.

DALLAS, GEORGE M. Born at Pittsburg, Pa., Feb. 7, 1839, but always resided in Philadelphia. He studied law with St. George Campbell, Esq., and was admitted to the bar, Oct. 13, 1860. Was a delegate at large to the constitutional convention which framed the existing constitution of Pennsylvania, and served upon the committees on the judiciary and on legislation. United States circuit judge of the third circuit, commissioned March 17, 1892. Professor of law of torts, evidence, and practice in law department, University of Pennsylvania.

DANIEL, PETER VIVIAN. Born in Stafford county, Va., April 24, 1784. Was graduated at Princeton in 1805. Studied law in the office of Edmund Randolph, whose daughter he married in 1811. Admitted to the bar in 1808. Member of legislature. Member of Virginia privy council 1812-1835. Lieutenant governor of Virginia. Declined the place of attorney general of the United States, offered him by President Jackson. United States district judge for the district of Virginia, commissioned April 19, 1836. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned March 3, 1841. Assigned to the ninth circuit, March 3, 1845. Ceased to be circuit justice, May 31, 1860. Died in Richmond, Va., June 30, 1860.

DAVIES, WILLIAM. Born in Savannah, Ga., July 8, 1775. Educated at the public schools, and at first was a clerk in a commercial house. Studied law in the office of Judge

Stephens. Represented Liberty county in the state legislature. Received the highest municipal honors in Savannah, and frequently represented Chatham county in both branches of the legislature. Impaired health compelled him to retire from the labors of private practice. United States district judge for the district of Georgia, commissioned Jan. 14, 1819. Resigned in June, 1821, to actively engage in the practice of law. Was chosen to preside in the eastern judicial district of his state in 1828. Died April 30, 1829.

DAVIS, DAVID. Born in Cecil county, Md., March 9, 1815. Was graduated at Kenyon College, Ohio, 1832. Studied law in Massachusetts and at Yale. Removed to Illinois. Practiced in Bloomington. Elected to the legislature 1844. Member of the state constitutional convention 1847. State circuit judge 1848. Resigned October, 1862. Member of Republican nominating convention 1860, and accompanied Lincoln to Washington. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned Oct. 17, 1862. Assigned to the eighth circuit, March 10, 1863. Assigned to the seventh circuit, April 8, 1867. Administrator of Lincoln's estate. Held with minority of the court, in 1870, that the legal tender acts were constitutional. Candidate for the Liberal Republican nomination, and received the Labor Reform (Greenback) nomination in 1872, but withdrew from the canvass. Resigned from supreme bench to take his seat in the United States senate, March 4, 1877. President pro tem. of the senate 1881. Resigned 1883, and retired to Bloomington, Ill., where he died, June 26, 1886.

DAVIS, JOHN. Born in Plymouth, Mass., Jan. 25, 1761. Was graduated at Harvard, 1781. Tutor in the family of General Otis. Began practice in Plymouth, Mass., 1786. Member of the legislature. Member of the Massachusetts convention to ratify the federal constitution. Comptroller of the United States treasury 1795. United States district attorney for Massachusetts 1796. United States judge for the district of Massachusetts, commissioned Feb. 20, 1801. Retired July, 1841. Died in Boston, Jan. 14, 1847. Author of addresses, etc., and editor of "Morton's Memorial of New England."

DAWNE, EDWARD J. United States district judge for the district of Alaska, commissioned Aug. 28, 1885. Ceased to be judge, Dec. 3, 1885. Was never confirmed by the senate.

DAWSON, LAFAYETTE. Born in McLean county, Ill., where he was educated. Removed to Maryville, Mo., in 1866, where he commenced the practice of law. United States judge for the district of Alaska, commissioned Dec. 3, 1885. Ceased to be district judge, Aug. 25, 1888. Later published a digest or pamphlet of his decisions. Died in Maryville, Mo., Jan. 29, 1897.

DEADY, MATTHEW P. Born near Easton, Talbot county, Md., May 12, 1824. Removed to Virginia, and thence to Ohio. Educated at Barnesville Academy. Admitted to the bar in Ohio 1847. Removed to Oregon 1849. Taught and practiced there. Member of legislature in 1850. President of the upper house 1851. Associate justice of the territorial supreme court 1853. President of state constitutional convention 1857. On the admission of Oregon to the Union he was appointed district judge for the district of Oregon, commissioned March 9, 1859. Prepared the Codes of the state in 1862-1864. Published the general laws of the state 1865. Assisted in the same work 1874. Died March 24, 1893.

DELAHAY, MARK W. Born June 24, 1817, near Easton, Talbot county, Md. Educated at Easton Academy, and inherited quite a fortune from his parents. Emigrated to Illinois in 1838, locating at Naples. Removed to Winchester, Ill. Entered the law office of John P. Jordan. Subsequently engaged at Virginia, Cass county, Ill. During the Mormon war he held a commission as captain under John J. Hardin. Removed to Leavenworth, Kan., in 1855. Practiced law and edited the Kansas Territorial Register. Was appointed surveyor general of Kansas and Nebraska in 1861. Was chief clerk of the territorial legislature of Kansas in 1860. District judge for the district of Kansas, commissioned Oct. 6, 1863, which office he held until his resignation, Dec. 10, 1873. Died May 9, 1879, at Kansas City, Mo.

DICK, JOHN. A citizen of Louisiana. United States district judge for the district of Louisiana, commissioned March 2, 1821. Died at New Orleans, April 23, 1824.

DICK, ROBERT P. Born in Greensboro, N. C., Oct. 5, 1823. Graduated from the University of North Carolina in 1843. Admitted to the bar 1846. District attorney for the district of North Carolina 1853-1861. Member of the state constitutional conventions of 1861 and 1865. Member of council of state 1861-1864. Member of state senate 1864-1865. Associate justice of the state supreme court 1868-1872. United States district judge for the western district of North Carolina, commissioned June 7, 1872 LL. D., University of North Carolina, 1869, and 1889.

DICKERSON, MAHLON. Brother of Judge Philemon Dickerson. Born in Hanover county, N. J., April 17, 1770. Was graduated at Princeton 1789. Admitted to the bar 1793, and practiced in Philadelphia. Quartermaster general of Pennsylvania 1805-1808. Recorder of the city court of Philadelphia 1808-1810. Returned to New Jersey. Judge of New Jersey supreme court and chancellor. Member of the legislature 1814. Governor 1815. United States senator 1817-1833. Secretary of the navy 1834-1838. United States district judge for the district of New Jersey for a few months. commissioned July 23, 1840. Member of the state constitutional convention 1844. Died 1853.

DICKERSON, PHILEMON. Born in Morris county, N. J., 1788. Received a liberal education. Practiced law in Paterson, N. J. Member of congress 1833. Resigned to accept governorship of New Jersey, 1836. Again elected to congress 1838. United States district judge for the district of New Jersey, commissioned March 2, 1841. Died in Paterson, Dec. 10, 1862.

DILLON, JOHN FORREST. Born in Montgomery county, N. Y., Dec. 25, 1831. Removed to Iowa. Was graduated in medicine at Iowa University, and practiced six months. Studied law. Admitted to the bar 1852. Prosecuting attorney 1852. State district judge 1858. Twice elected judge of the state supreme court. United States circuit judge for the eighth circuit, commissioned Dec. 22, 1869. Resigned Sept. 1, 1879, and accepted a professorship in Columbia Law School, which he held for three years. Practiced in New York City. Author of treatises on "Municipal Corporations," "Removal of Causes," and "Municipal Bonds;" also of Circuit Court Reports (eighth circuit); "Laws and Jurisprudence of England and America," being a series of lectures in Yale University. Member of L'Institute Detroit International, and of the Association for the Reform and Codification of the Law of Nations. Resides in New York City.

DRAYTON, JOHN. Born in South Carolina, 1766. Son of William Henry Drayton, the Revolutionary statesman. Educated at Princeton and in England. Practiced law in Charleston, S. C. Lieutenant governor in 1798. Governor in 1800 and 1808-1810. South Carolina College was established under his governorship. United States district judge for the district of South Carolina, commissioned May 7, 1812. Died in Charleston, in November, 1822. Author of "Memoirs of William Henry Drayton," (his father,) "A Tour through the Northern and Eastern States," and "A View of South Carolina."

DRAYTON, WILLIAM. Born in South Carolina, 1733. Studied law four years in the Middle Temple, London. Returned to America 1754. Chief justice of the province of East Florida, 1768. Lost his office during the Revolutionary war, but was reinstated. Spent some time during the war in England. Returned to South Carolina after the war. Judge of the admiralty court of South Carolina. Associate justice of the state 1789. First United States district judge for the district of South Carolina, commissioned Nov. 18, 1789. Died May 18, 1790.

DRUMMOND, THOMAS. Born in Bristol Mills, Lincoln county, Me., Oct. 16, 1809.

Was graduated at Bowdoin in 1830. Studied law in Philadelphia. Admitted to the bar 1833. Removed to Galena, Ill., 1835. Member of legislature 1840. United States district judge for the district of Illinois, commissioned Feb. 19, 1850. Removed to Chicago in 1854. United States circuit judge for the seventh circuit, commissioned Dec. 22, 1869. Resigned in July, 1884. Died in May, 1890.

DUANE, JAMES. Born in New York city, Feb. 6, 1733. Married a daughter of Robert Livingston in 1759. Grantee of land in the "New Hampshire Grants," (afterwards Vermont,) and a bitter partisan in that struggle. Elected to the continental congress by the committee of 51 in 1774 as a conservative. Protested against the resolution of Oct. 8, 1774, to support Massachusetts in her resistance to parliament. Opposed the Declaration of Independence as premature. Member of New York provincial congress and committee of safety. Member of state constitutional convention 1777. First mayor of New York after the British evacuation. Member of state legislature, council, and convention to ratify the federal constitution. United States district judge for the district of New York from 1789 until 1794, commissioned Sept. 26, 1789. Resigned in April, 1794. Died at Duaneburg, N. Y., Feb. 1, 1797.

DUCKETT, ALLEN BOWIE. Born in Maryland. Became a citizen of the District of Columbia. Judge of the United States circuit court for the District of Columbia, commissioned March 17, 1806. Died in August, 1809.

DUNDY, ELMER S. Born in Trumbull county, Ohio, March 5, 1830. Educated in the common schools. Taught for several years. Studied law at Clearfield, Pa. Admitted to the bar in 1853. Practiced there until 1857, when he removed to Nebraska. Member of territorial legislature, and associate justice of the territorial supreme court. United States district judge for the district of Nebraska, commissioned April 9, 1868.

DUNLOP, JAMES. Born in Georgetown, D. C., March 28, 1793. Was graduated at Princeton, 1811. Studied law with Francis S. Key, and was afterward his partner. Recorder of Georgetown. Judge of the United States circuit court for the District of Columbia, commissioned Oct. 3, 1845; commissioned as chief judge Nov. 27, 1855; and served until March 3, 1863, when the court was abolished. Died near Georgetown, May 6, 1872.

DURELL, EDWARD H. Born in Portsmouth, N. H., July 14, 1810. Son of Chief Justice Durell, of New Hampshire. Studied at Phillips Exeter; was graduated at Harvard, 1831. Studied law with his father and at Harvard. Removed to Pittsburgh, (Grenada,) Miss., 1834, and to New Orleans 1836. Opposed secession, and lived in retirement during the Civil War. Helped construct the temporary government after the capture of New Orleans in 1862. Mayor of New Orleans 1863. United States district judge for the eastern district of Louisiana, commissioned May 20, 1863; and for the whole state July 27, 1866. President of the state constitutional convention 1864. Declined a position on the supreme bench of the United States 1865. Mentioned as candidate for the vice presidency in 1868. Resigned from the bench 1874. Resided in Schoharie, N. Y., from 1875 until his death, March 29, 1887. Author of "Sketches." Translator of P. C. Roux's "Essay on the History of France." Was engaged on a history of the war and reconstruction at the time of his death.

DUVAL, GABRIEL. Born in Prince George county, Md., Dec. 6, 1752. Received a classical education. Clerk of the colonial legislature. Member of congress 1794. Resigned in March, 1796. Presidential elector in 1796 and 1800. Judge of the Maryland supreme court 1796. Comptroller of the United States treasury 1802. Resigned in 1811. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned Nov. 18, 1811. Assigned to the fourth circuit. Resigned in January, 1835. Died in Prince George county, Md., March 6, 1844.

DUVAL, THOMAS H. Born Nov. 4, 1813, in Buckingham county, Va. Educated at St. Joseph's College, Bardstown, Ky. Studied law with Hon. Charles A. Wicliffe. Was secretary of Florida territory. Emigrated to Texas, locating in Austin, in 1845. Served two terms as district judge. Was secretary of state under Gov. P. H. Bell, and one of the first two reporters of the supreme court. United States district judge for the western district of Texas, commissioned March 3, 1857. Died Oct. 10, 1880.

DYER, CHARLES E. Born in Cicero, Onondaga county, N. Y., Oct. 5, 1834. Removed to Ohio in 1835, and to Wisconsin in 1839. Educated by a private tutor. Entered a newspaper office in Chicago 1849. Removed to Sandusky, Ohio, 1851. Studied law. Admitted to the bar 1858. Removed to Racine, Wis., 1859. City attorney 1859-1860. Member of legislature 1866-1867. United States district judge for the eastern district of Wisconsin, commissioned Feb. 10, 1875. Retired May 4, 1888.

DYER, JOHN S. Born in Franklin, Pendleton county, Va., July 26, 1809. Educated at a classical school near Richmond, and at the University of Virginia, and later in the law school of Judge B. B. Baldwin. Admitted to the bar and practiced in his own and adjoining counties. Removed to Dubuque, Iowa, about 1846. United States district judge of the district of Iowa, commissioned March 3, 1847. Died Sept. 14, 1855.

EDGERTON, ALONZO J. Born at Rome, N. Y., June 7, 1827. Was graduate of Wesleyan University in 1850. Taught school. Studied law three or four years. Settled in Minnesota 1855. Was a member of the first legislature of that state. Entered the army in 1862 as captain. Mustered out as brigadier general in 1867. Was presidential elector in 1876. Was senator from Minnesota 1881. Chief justice of Dakota in 1882. Member of constitutional convention of South Dakota in 1885, and again in 1889. Was president of each convention by unanimous vote of the members. United States district judge for the district of South Dakota, commissioned Nov. 19, 1889. LL. D. from Alma Mater, 1891. Published "Railroad Laws of Minnesota" 1872, also edited "Constitutional Debates of South Dakota." Died Aug. 9, 1896.

EDWARDS, PIERREPONT. Son of Jonathan Edwards. Born in Northampton, Mass., April 8, 1750. Was graduated at Princeton, 1768. Began to practice law in New Haven, Conn., 1771. Member of the legislature. Administrator of Benedict Arnold's estate at the time of his treason. Served in the Revolutionary army. Member of congress 1787-1788, and of the Connecticut convention to ratify the constitution. Founder of the toleration party in Connecticut. United States district judge for the district of Connecticut, commissioned Feb. 24, 1806. Died in Bridgeport, Conn., April 5, 1826.

ELLIS, POWHATAN. Born in Virginia about 1794. Was graduated at William and Mary in 1813. Emigrated to Mississippi territory, and practiced there. Judge of the supreme court of Mississippi 1818. United States senator 1825. United States district judge for the district of Mississippi, commissioned July 14, 1832. Charge d'affaires in Mexico Jan. 5, 1836. Minister to Mexico 1839-1842. On his return he resided in Virginia, and died in Richmond about 1844.

ELLSWORTH, OLIVER. Born in Windsor, Conn., April 29, 1745. Entered Yale in 1762, but left and went to Princeton. Was graduated 1766. Studied theology a year; then law. Admitted to the bar of Hartford county, Conn., 1771. Was farmer and lawyer for three years. State's attorney in 1775, and removed to Hartford. Member of the legislature; committeeman on finances of the state. Member of congress 1778-1783; of governor's council 1780-1784. Declined commissionership of the United States treasury in 1784. Judge of Connecticut superior court 1784-1787. Member of the federal constitutional convention in 1787, and of the state convention to ratify the constitution. United States senator in 1789. Chairman of the judiciary committee, and reported the judiciary act of 1789, substantially as passed.

Federalist leader in the senate. Called the "Cerberus of the Treasury" for his zeal for economy. Chief justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned March 4, 1796. Was sent to France with Patrick Henry and William Davie in 1799 to secure a treaty. Resigned chief justiceship while in Europe, Sept. 30, 1800. Member of governor's council (the court of last resort of Connecticut) 1802. Presidential elector 1804. On reorganization of the Connecticut judiciary in 1807, he was made chief justice of the supreme court. LL. D., Yale, 1790; Dartmouth and Princeton, 1797. Died Nov. 26, 1807.

EMMONS, HALMOR HULL. Born in Glens Falls, N. Y., 1815. Educated at Rutland, Vt. Assisted his father as a journalist. Studied law. Removed to Detroit, Mich., and practiced law with his father there. Partially retired from practice in 1853. United States circuit judge for the sixth circuit, commissioned Jan. 17, 1870. Died in Detroit, May 14, 1877.

ERSKINE, JOHN. Born in Strabane, Tyrone, Ireland, Sept. 13, 1813. Came to America in 1821. Returned to Ireland to school in 1827. Returned to America 1832. Located in Florida, teaching school there. Studied law, and was admitted to the Florida bar in 1846. Removed to Atlanta, Ga., 1855. United States district judge for the Northern and Southern districts of Georgia, commissioned July 10, 1865. When the Southern district of Georgia was set off he remained judge of the Southern district from April 25, 1882, until he resigned, Dec. 19, 1883. Died Jan. 27, 1895.

FIELD, RICHARD STOCKTON. Born in White Hill, Burlington county, N. J., Dec. 31, 1803. Was graduated at Princeton 1821. Studied law with his uncle, Richard Stockton. Admitted to the bar 1825. Member of New Jersey legislature. Attorney general of the state 1838. Resigned 1841. Member of the New Jersey constitutional convention in 1844. Professor in New Jersey Law School 1847-1855. President of the trustees of the State Normal School in 1855. United States senator 1862. United States district judge for the district of New Jersey, commissioned Jan. 14, 1863. Member of the "Loyalists' Convention" of 1866. Died in Princeton, N. J., May 25, 1870. Author of "The Provincial Courts of New Jersey," (volume 3 of the "Collections of the New Jersey Historical Society.")

FIELD, STEPHEN JOHNSON. Born at Haddam, Conn., Nov. 4, 1816. At the age of 13 went to Smyrna, Turkey, to learn Oriental languages. Was gone three years, spending one winter in Athens. On his return he entered Williams College. Was graduated in 1837 with highest honors. Went to New York, and studied law in office of his brother, David Dudley Field, and entered bar in 1841. Was law partner of his brother from 1841 to 1848. Traveled one year in Europe, and went to California, arriving there Dec. 28, 1849, and established himself in practice in Marysville. In 1850 became first alcalde or judge of the town, continuing in that position until establishment of American institutions. Was elected member of first legislature, and took leading part in molding judiciary of state, and establishing Codes of Civil and Criminal Practice. In 1857 was elected judge of supreme court. Was chief justice in 1859, and held that office until he was appointed associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned March 10, 1863. Was one of commission to amend Code in 1873. Was member of electoral commission in 1877. LL. D., Williams College, 1864. In 1869 was appointed professor of law, University of California. His sister is mother of Mr. Justice Brewer. Two attempts have been made to assassinate him.

FISHER, JOHN. Born in Maryland, May 23, 1771. Was clerk of the senate, and later secretary of state, and a leader in the Democratic party. United States district judge for the district of Delaware, commissioned April 23, 1812. Died at Smyrna, April 23, 1823.

FITZHUGH, NICHOLAS. Born in Virginia, May 10, 1764. Married Miss Sally Ashton, a near relative of George Washington. Removed to the District of Columbia. Judge of the United States circuit court for the District of Columbia, commissioned Nov. 25, 1803. Died Dec. 31, 1814.

FOSTER, CASSIUS G. Born at Webster, Monroe county, N. Y., Jan. 22, 1837. Removed to Michigan. Teacher for a time. Returned to his birthplace in 1857. Studied law in Rochester and Le Roy, N. Y. Admitted to the bar 1859. Removed to Atchison, Kan., 1859. Served with the state troops in the Civil War. Member of legislature 1863-1864. Mayor of Atchison 1867. United States district judge for the district of Kansas, commissioned March 10, 1874. Removed to Topeka in 1879.

FOX, EDWARD. The following note is reprinted from 1 Haskell:

Edward Fox was born at Portland, Maine, July 10, 1815. He graduated from Harvard College in 1834. He pursued his preparatory legal studies in the office of Willis & Fessenden at Portland and at the Dane Law School, taking the degree of LL. B. in 1837, and was admitted to the bar. He at once became a copartner with Randolph A. L. Codman, with whom he continued as Codman & Fox until 1847, when he took his younger brother Frederick a partner, under the firm name of E. & F. Fox. In the latter association he continued for the remainder of his practice, though it was once interrupted in the effort to restore the health of his wife by removal to more favorable climate, and again by a brief service on the supreme bench of the state. He was appointed associate justice of the supreme judicial court of Maine, Oct. 24, 1862, and resigned in March, 1863. He was appointed judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Maine by President Johnson May 31, 1866. On the 13th of December, 1881, he sat during a jury trial, and closed the day by a charge marked with characteristic clearness and strength. He died while asleep on the night following, after judicial service of fifteen years in the seat honored for more than forty-four years by his predecessor, the illustrious Ashur Ware.

FRASER, PHILIP. Born at Montrose, Susquehanna county, Pa., Jan. 27, 1814. Educated at Hamilton Academy, in New York, and later at Union College, from which he received an honorary degree of M. A. in 1854. Removed to Florida. Was mayor of the city of Jacksonville, 1847-1848, declining re-election. United States district judge for the northern district of Florida, commissioned July 17, 1862. Died July 26, 1876, at Montrose, Pa.

FULLER, MELVILLE WESTON. Born in Augusta, Me., Feb. 11, 1833. Was graduated at Bowdoin 1853. Studied law in Bangor with his uncle, George M. Weston, and at Harvard. Began practice in Bangor 1855. On the editorial staff of the Age. President of the common council. City attorney 1856. Removed to Chicago 1856, and rose to eminence in the profession there. Counsel in many important cases, among them the National Bank Tax Cases, the Cheney Ecclesiastical Case, the Park Commissioners' Case, and the Lake Front Case. Member of state constitutional convention in 1862, of the legislature 1863-1865. Leader of the Douglas Democrats in that body. Member of Democratic national conventions 1864, 1872, 1876, and 1880. Chief justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned Dec. 17, 1888. Assigned to the fourth circuit. LL. D. Northwestern University and Bowdoin, 1888. LL. D. Harvard, 1890.

GAYLE, JOHN. Born in Sumter district, S. C., Sept. 11, 1792. Was graduated at South Carolina University. Admitted to the bar. Removed to Mobile, Ala., 1813. Member of territorial legislature 1817. Solicitor for the first judicial district 1819. Judge of the Alabama supreme court 1823. Member of legislature; speaker 1829. Governor of Alabama 1831-1835. Presidential elector 1836 and 1840. Member of congress 1847-1849. United States district judge for the Northern, Southern, and Middle districts of Alabama, commissioned March 13, 1849. Died in Mobile, July 21, 1859.

GHOLSON, SAMUEL JAMESON. Born in Madison county, Ky., May 19, 1808. Removed to Alabama 1817. Educated in common schools. Studied law in Russellville, Ala. Moved to Athens, Miss., in 1830. Member of the Mississippi legislature 1833-1836. Member of congress 1837. United States district judge for the northern and southern districts of Mississippi, commissioned Feb. 13, 1839. Resigned Jan. 9, 1861. Active in the secession convention. Enlisted as a private in the Confederate army. Major general of the Mississippi troops and brigadier general of the Confederate army. Member of legislature 1866. Speaker 1878. Died in Aberdeen, Miss., Oct. 16, 1883.

GILBERT, WILLIAM B. Born in Fairfax county, Va., July 4, 1847. Was graduated from Williams College in 1868. From the Law School University of Michigan in 1872. Removed to Oregon. Was a member of the state legislature in 1889. United States circuit judge for the ninth circuit, commissioned March 18, 1892.

GILCHRIST, ROBERT BUDD. Born in Charleston, S. C., Sept. 28, 1796. Studied at Columbia. Was graduated from South Carolina College in 1814. Admitted to the bar 1818. District attorney for South Carolina 1831, and argued the Bond Case, turning on the constitutionality of the tariff. United States district judge for the district of South Carolina, commissioned Oct. 30, 1839. Died in Charleston, May 1, 1856.

GILES, WILLIAM FELL. Born in Harford county, Md., April 8, 1807. Educated in Baltimore. Studied law there. Admitted to the bar 1829. Member of legislature 1837 and 1839. Member of congress 1845. United States district judge for the district of Maryland, commissioned July 18, 1853. Died March 22, 1879.

GLENN, ELIAS. Born at Elkton, Md., in 1770. Appointed United States district attorney by President Madison in 1812, and continued by President Monroe. United States district judge for the district of Maryland, commissioned Aug. 31, 1824; resigned March 28, 1836. Died at Baltimore, Jan. 6, 1846.

GLENN, JOHN. Born at Baltimore, Md., Oct. 9, 1795. United States district judge for the district of Maryland, commissioned March 19, 1852, to succeed Judge Heath. Died at Hilton, Baltimore county, Md., July 8, 1853.

GOFF, NATHAN. Born in Clarksburg, W. Va., Oct. 9, 1843. Educated at Georgetown College and the University of New York. Enlisted in the Third Virginia volunteers (Union) in 1861, and rose to the rank of major. Admitted to the bar 1865, and elected to the legislature the same year. United States district attorney for the district of West Virginia 1868-1881. Secretary of the navy 1881. He was again district attorney from 1881-1882. Elected to congress as a Republican in 1884 and 1886. United States circuit judge for the fourth circuit, under the act of March 3, 1891, commissioned March 7, 1892.

GRAY, HORACE. Born in Boston, Mass., March 24, 1828. Was graduated at Harvard in 1845, and at the Harvard Law School in 1849. Admitted to the bar 1851. Reporter for the Massachusetts supreme court for seven years. Associate justice of the Massachusetts supreme court, Aug. 23, 1864; chief justice Sept. 5, 1873. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned Jan. 30, 1882. Assigned to the first circuit.

GREEN, EDWARD T. Born in Trenton, N. J., June 8, 1837. Was graduated at Princeton in 1854, and at Harvard Law School 1858. Admitted to the New Jersey bar the same year. Practiced in Trenton. Was city solicitor 1860-1861. Counsel for Pennsylvania Railroad Company 1872-1889. Elected trustee of Princeton College 1892. United States district judge for the district of New Jersey, commissioned Oct. 24, 1889.

GRESHAM, WALTER Q. Born near Lanesville, Harrison county, Ind., March 17, 1832. Spent one year in the State University at Bloomington. Studied law at Corydon, Ind. Admitted to the bar 1853. Member of legislature 1860. Resigned 1861, and became lieutenant colonel in an Indiana regiment. Brevetted major general of volunteers March 13, 1865. Resumed practice in New Albany, Ind. Financial agent of Indiana in New York 1867-1868. United States district judge for the district of Indiana, commissioned Sept. 1, 1869. Postmaster general 1882. Secretary of the treasury 1884. United States circuit judge for the seventh circuit, commissioned Oct. 28, 1884. Candidate for the presidential nomination (Republican) 1888. Secretary of state in President Cleveland's cabinet, March 6, 1893. Died May 28, 1895.

GRIER, ROBERT COOPER. Born in Cumberland county, Pa., March 5, 1794. Was graduated at Dickinson in 1812. Taught there one year. Principal of Northumberland Academy 1815. Studied law in leisure moments. Admitted to the bar 1817. Practiced in Bloomsburg, Pa. Removed to Danville. Removed to Alleghany City 1838. Appointed judge of the district court of Alleghany in the same year. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned Aug. 4, 1846. Assigned to the third circuit. Removed to Philadelphia 1848. Sent in his resignation 1869, but held the office until his death, in Philadelphia, Jan. 31, 1870.

GRIFFIN, CYRUS. Born in Virginia, 1749. Educated in England. Member of legislature. Member of congress 1778, 1781, and 1787-1788. President of congress 1788. President of the federal court of admiralty appeals from its creation to its abolition. Commissioner to the Creek Nation 1789. United States district judge for the district of Virginia, commissioned Nov. 28, 1789. Died in Yorktown, Va., Dec. 14, 1810.

GRIFFITH, WILLIAM. Born in New Jersey. United States circuit judge for the third circuit, commissioned Feb. 20, 1801. The act under which the appointment was made was repealed, to take effect July 1, 1802.

Mayor of Burlington, N. J. Died there 1826. Author of the United States Law Register. An obituary note, containing extracts from the resolutions of the New Jersey bar on his decease and other matters, will be found in Wallace's Reporters (4th Ed.) p. 563.

GROSSCUP, PETER S. Born Ashland, Ohio, Feb. 15, 1852. Educated in high school at Ashland and Wittenberg College, graduating June, 1872. Graduated from Boston Law School. City solicitor of Ashland, Ohio, from 1874 to 1881. Republican candidate for congress 1876, but defeated. United States district judge for the northern district of Illinois, commissioned Dec. 21, 1892.

HAIGHT, FLETCHER M. Born at Elmira, N. Y., Nov. 28, 1799. Graduated from Hamilton College in 1818. Admitted to the New York state bar 1820. Represented Monroe county in the state legislature 1833. Practiced law at Rochester, N. Y. Removed to St. Louis, Mo., and later to San Francisco, Cal., where he was appointed United States district judge for the southern district of California, commissioned Aug. 5, 1861. Died Feb. 23, 1866.

HALL, DOMINICK AUGUSTINE. Born in South Carolina, 1765. Began practice in Charleston, S. C. United States circuit judge (chief judge) for the fifth circuit, commissioned July 1, 1801. The act under which the appointment was made was repealed, to take effect July 1, 1802. United States district judge for the district of Orleans, commissioned Dec. 11, 1804. United States district judge for the district of Louisiana, commissioned June 1, 1812. Resigned to accept a place on the Louisiana supreme bench, March, 1813. Again appointed United States district judge for the district of Louisiana, commissioned June 1, 1813. Died in New Orleans December 19, 1820. In December, 1814, he was ordered by the military authorities to adjourn court for two months. In March, 1815, New Orleans being under martial law, he granted a writ of habeas corpus to a member of the legislature then under arrest by Gen. Jackson's order, who refused to recognize the writ, and committed the judge to jail. On the next day he was released, summoned Gen. Jackson to answer for contempt, and fined him in the sum of $1,000. This was refunded to Jackson by congress in 1844, with interest.

HALL, NATHAN KELSEY. Born in Marcellus, Onondaga county, N. Y., March 10, 1810. Moved to Erie county, 1818. Educated at country district schools. At the age of 18 entered the office of Millard Fillmore in Aurora, N. Y. Admitted to the bar 1832, and became a partner of Fillmore in Buffalo. Deputy clerk of Erie county 1831-1832. Clerk of the board of supervisors 1832-1838. City attorney 1833-1834. Alderman 1837. Appointed master in chancery by Gov. Seward in 1839, and judge of common pleas 1841. Elected to assembly 1845. Member of congress 1847-1849. Postmaster general 1850. United States district judge for the northern district of New York, commissioned Aug. 31, 1852. Died in Buffalo, N. Y., March 21, 1874.

HALL, WILLARD. Born in Westford, Mass., Dec. 24, 1780. Was graduated at Harvard 1799. Studied law with Samuel Dana, of Groton. Admitted to the bar 1803. Removed to Dover, Del., and practiced there. Secretary of state for Delaware 1811-1814 and in 1821. Member of congress 1817-1821. Member of legislature 1822. United States district judge for the district of Delaware, commissioned May 6, 1823. Resigned Dec., 1871. Revised the state laws by order of the legislature in 1829. Member of the state constitutional convention of 1831. Died in Wilmington, Del., May 10, 1875.

HALLETT, MOSES. Born in Illinois, July 16, 1834. Studied law in Chicago. Was admitted to the Illinois bar, Jan., 1858. Removed to Colorado in the spring of 1860. Was a member of the territorial council 1863-1865. Appointed chief justice of Colorado territory, April 10, 1866, which office he held until the territory was admitted as a state in 1876. United States district judge for the district of Colorado, commissioned Jan. 12, 1877. LL. D., Colorado University. Dean of the law school, University of Colorado, and professor of American constitutional law and federal jurisprudence.

HALYBURTON, JAMES D. Born in New Kent county, Va., Feb. 23, 1803. Was graduated at Harvard College, and in law at the University of Virginia. Was a member of the general assembly of Virginia. Practiced law for several years in New Kent county, and was attorney for the circuit. United States district judge for the eastern district of Virginia, commissioned June 15, 1844. Resigned April 17, 1861. Died at Richmond, Va., Jan. 26, 1879.

HAMMOND, ELI SHELBY. Born at Brandon, Miss., April 21, 1838. Was graduated at Union University, Tenn., in 1857, and at Lebanon Law School in 1858. Served in the Confederate army 1861-1865. United States district judge for the western district of Tennessee, commissioned June 17, 1878.

HANFORD, CORNELIUS HOLTGATE. Born at Winchester, Iowa, April 21, 1849. Was United States commissioner. Member of the council of Washington Territory one term. City attorney of Seattle three terms. Chief justice of Washington Territory at the time of its admission as a state. United States district judge for the district of Washington, commissioned Feb. 25, 1890. Judge Hanford has lived on the Pacific coast since 1853.

HARLAN, JOHN MARSHALL. Born June 1, 1833, in Boyle county, Ky. Was graduated at Centre College, in that state, in 1850. Appointed by Gov. Helm adjutant general of Kentucky in 1851. Admitted to the bar in 1853. Elected presiding judge of the county court of Franklin county, Ky., in 1858. Was Whig candidate for congress in the Ashland district in 1859, and defeated by only 67 votes. Elector for Bell and Everett in 1861. Colonel of the 10th Kentucky Union infantry in 1861, and subsequently commanded a brigade in the 1st division of the Army of the Ohio. In 1863 elected on Union ticket attorney general of Kentucky. In 1871, and again in 1875, was the Republican candidate for governor of Kentucky. In 1877 a member of the Louisiana commission appointed by President Hayes. Associate justice of the supreme court of the United States, commissioned April 22, 1878. In 1890 he accepted the position of lecturer on constitutional law in Columbian University at Washington, D. C. In 1892 he was appointed by President Harrison, in connection with Hon. John T. Morgan, as one of the arbitrators between the United States and Great Britain, in the dispute relating to the Bering seal fisheries. LL. D., Bowdoin College, Me., and Centre College, Ky.

HARPER, SAMUEL A. United States district judge for the district of Louisiana, commissioned March 7, 1829. Died at Madisonville, La., July 19, 1837.

HARRIS, EDWARD. United States circuit judge for the fifth circuit, commissioned May 3, 1802. The act under which the appointment was made was repealed, to take effect July 1, 1802.

HARVEY, MATTHEW. Born in Sutton, N. H., June 21, 1781. Was graduated at Dartmouth, 1806. Studied law under John Harris. Admitted to the bar 1809. Practiced in Hopkinton, N. H. Member of legislature 1814-1820; speaker 1817-1820. Member of congress 1821-1825. President of the state senate 1825-1828. Councilor 1828-1830. Governor of New Hampshire 1830-1831. United States district judge for the district of New Hampshire, commissioned Nov. 2, 1830. Died in Concord, N. H., April 7, 1866. LL. D., Dartmouth, 1855. President of New Hampshire Historical Society.

HAWLEY, THOMAS P. Born in Ripley county, Ind., July 30, 1830. Received a common-school education. Removed to California in 1852. Deputy county clerk of Nevada county in 1855. Admitted to practice law in 1857. District attorney in 1863. Removed to Nevada in 1868. City attorney, Treasure City, Nev., 1869. Elected justice of the supreme court of Nevada in 1872. Re-elected in 1878 and 1884. Resigned in Sept., 1890, upon having been appointed United States district judge for the district of Nevada, commissioned the 15th of that month.

HAY, GEORGE. Member of the Virginia legislature. United States district attorney for the district of Virginia. Prosecuted Aaron Burr. United States district judge for the eastern district of Virginia, commissioned July 5, 1825. Married a daughter of President Monroe. Wrote political essays over the name "Hartensius," a "Treatise on Usury Laws," a "Life of John Thompson," and a "Treatise on Expatriation." Died in Richmond, Va., Sept. 21, 1830.

HAYS, WILLIAM H. Born in Washington county, Ky., Aug. 26, 1820. Educated in the select schools of his county. Commenced the study of law at Elizabethtown in 1843, under James W. Hays. Attended law lectures at Glasgow, Ky. Was admitted to the bar in 1845. Practiced his profession at Springfield, Ky. Elected county judge in 1851. Re-elected in 1854. Elected to the state legislature in 1861, and in the same year entered the United States army as lieutenant colonel of the 10th volunteer infantry. Became colonel of his regiment in 1862. Served three years, participating in the battles of Chicamauga, Missionary Ridge, Atlanta, Jonesboro, and others. Appointed inspector general of Kentucky by the governor in 1865. Engaged in the oil business on the Cumberland river, and in 1867 returned to Springfield, resuming the practice of law. United States district judge for the district of Kentucky, commissioned Sept. 6, 1879, which office he held until his decease, at Louisville, March 7, 1880.

HEATH, UPTON S. Born in Maryland about 1785. Was liberally educated, the contemporary of Pinkney, Martin, Wirt, Winder, Hooper, Harper, and other noted members of the Maryland bar. United States district judge for the district of Maryland, commissioned April 4, 1836. Was distinguished for his firmness, impartiality, and probity as a public officer. Although he never married, he was the head and support of a large family of relatives. Died at his residence in Baltimore, Feb. 21, 1852.

HILL, ROBERT A. Born in Iredell county, N. C., March 25, 1811. Removed to Tennessee in 1816. He received a meager education. Was a school teacher in 1833-1834. Justice of the peace 1836-1844. Began practice in Waynesborough. Attorney general of Tennessee 1847 and 1853. Removed to Jacinto, Tishomingo county, Miss., in 1855. He was a Whig, and took no part in secession. Member of state convention in 1865. Chancellor after the war. United States district judge for the northern and southern districts of Mississippi, commissioned May 1, 1866. Retired Aug. 1, 1891. Prepared the articles on the judiciary in the Mississippi constitution of 1870. Trustee of the University of Mississippi, and lecturer in the law school.

HILLYER, EDGAR W. Born in Granville, Ohio, Dec. 3, 1830. Was graduated at Denison University. Removed to California 1852. Admitted to the bar in Placer county, 1857. Member of legislature 1861. Resigned and enlisted as a private. Became judge advocate and lieutenant colonel. Resigned 1865. Removed to Nevada. District attorney of Storey county. United States district judge for the district of Nevada, commissioned Dec. 21, 1869. Died May 10, 1882. The proceedings of the bench and bar upon his decease will be found in 8 Sawy. 5.

HITCHCOCK, SAMUEL. Born in Brimfield, Mass., March 23, 1755. Graduated at Harvard 1777. Read law at Brookfield, Mass., with Hon. Jedediah Foster. Moved to Burlington, Vt., about 1786, and practiced law. Was first state's attorney in Chittenden county, holding office from 1787 to 1790. Was representative from Burlington from 1789 to 1793. Was member of convention of delegates of the people of Vermont, held at Bennington, Jan. 10, 1791, to ratify constitution of United States. Was a trustee of the University of Vermont from its start until his death, and was its secretary from 1791 to 1800. He is also said to have drafted its charter. Attorney general of the state 1790-1793. Presidential elector at second presidential election in 1793. Member of first electoral college of Vermont in 1792, and cast vote for Washington and Adams. Was one of revisors of laws in 1797. United States district judge for the district of Vermont, commissioned Sept. 3, 1793, and United States circuit judge for second circuit, commissioned Feb. 20, 1801. The act under which the appointment was made was repealed, to take effect July 1, 1802. Married, May 26, 1789, Lucy C. Allen, daughter of Ethan Allen. Pronounced a eulogy on Washington, which is probably preserved in manuscript. Died at Burlington, Vt., Nov. 30, 1813.

HOBART, JOHN SLOSS. Born in Fairfield, Conn., 1733. Was graduated at Yale 1757. Practiced in New York state. Member of the New York Revolutionary congress. One of a committee to draft a state constitution Aug. 1, 1776. Judge of New York district court July, 1777. Judge of the New York state supreme court. Elected United States senator in January, 1798. Resigned 1798. United States district judge for the district of New York, commissioned April 12, 1798. Died Feb. 4, 1805.

HOFFMAN, OGDEN. Born in Goshen, Orange county, N. Y., Oct. 15, 1822. Was graduated at Columbia in 1840. Studied law at Harvard, and was admitted to the bar of New York, where he practiced. Removed to California 1850, where he continued his practice of law. United States district judge for the northern district of California, commissioned Feb. 27, 1851. United States district judge for the district of California from July 27, 1866, until the abolishment of that district, Aug. 5, 1866, when he was again assigned to the northern district, where he remained until his death, Aug. 9, 1891.

HOLMAN, JESSE LYNCH. Born in Danville, Ky., Oct. 24, 1784. Received a limited education. Studied law in the office of Henry Clay. Removed to Indiana 1808. Circuit judge of Indiana territory. Member of territorial legislature 1813. President of the council 1814. Judge of the Indiana supreme court 1816-1830. United States district judge for the district of Indiana, commissioned Sept. 16, 1835. Died in Aurora, Ind., March 28, 1842. Served as Baptist clergyman in Aurora from 1834 until his death. One of the founders of Indiana College and of Franklin College.

HOPKINS, JAMES CAMPBELL. Born in Pawley, Vt., April 27, 1819. Removed to New York in 1823. Was graduated at the academy in North Granville in 1843. Was admitted to the bar in 1845. Postmaster in Granville for five years. Elected to the senate of New York state in 1853. Removed to Madison, Wis., in 1856. Assisted in arranging the Wisconsin Code of Practice. United States district judge for the western district of Wisconsin, commissioned July 9, 1870. Died at Madison, Sept. 3, 1877.

HOPKINSON, FRANCIS. Born in Philadelphia Sept. 21, 1737. Educated at the College of Philadelphia. Studied law under Benjamin Chew. Admitted to the bar 1761. Went to England 1766, and sought the place of commissioner of customs in the colonies. Practiced law in Philadelphia. Collector of customs at Newcastle 1772. He was removed because of his Republicanism. Resided in Bordentown, N. J. Member of New Jersey provincial council 1774-1776. Member of congress 1776. Signer of the Declaration of Independence. On the committee to draft the articles of confederation. Head of the navy department. Treasurer of the continental loan office. Judge of admiralty for Pennsylvania 1779-1789. Impeached for misdemeanor in office and acquitted. United States district judge for the district of Pennsylvania, commissioned Sept. 26, 1789. Died May 9, 1791. He was skilled in science, painting, and music. Author of essays and poems, among them "The Battle of the Kegs," "The New Roof," "The Political Catechism."

HOPKINSON, JOSEPH. Son of Judge Francis Hopkinson. Born in Philadelphia Nov. 12, 1770. Was graduated at University of Pennsylvania 1786. Began practice at Easton, Pa., 1791. Removed to Philadelphia. Counsel for Dr. Rush in his libel suit against William Corbett in 1799. Counsel for the Western insurgents in the treason trials before Judge Chase, and for Judge Chase in his impeachment trial. A Federalist in politics. Member of congress 1814-1819. Resumed practice 1823. United States district judge for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, commissioned Oct. 23, 1828. Died Jan. 13, 1842. Member of the Pennsylvania constitutional convention of 1839. Served on the committee on the judiciary. Trustee of University of Pennsylvania. President of the Academy of Fine Arts. Vice President of the American Philosophical Society. Author of the song, "Hail Columbia," which was very effective in stirring popular resentment against French aggression in 1798.

HOUSTON, JAMES. Born in Chestertown, Kent county, Md., Oct. 10, 1767. Educated at the public schools of Chestertown. Admitted to the bar, March 17, 1806. Appointed United States district judge for the district of Maryland, April 21, 1806. Died in June, 1819.

HOWE, JAMES H. Born in Turner, Me., Dec. 5, 1827. Was educated at Saco, Me., and Green Bay, Wis. Was attorney general from 1860 to 1862. Colonel of 32d Wisconsin infantry from 1862 to 1864. United States district judge for the eastern district of Wisconsin, commissioned Jan. 3, 1874. Resigned Jan. 1, 1875. Died in 1893.

HOWELL, DAVID. Born in New Jersey, Jan. 1, 1747. Was graduated at Princeton in 1766. Removed to Rhode Island. Professor of mathematics and law in Brown University 1790-1824. Attorney general of Rhode Island. Judge of the state supreme court. Member of congress 1782-1785. Commissioner for the United States to settle their eastern boundary. United States district judge for the district of Rhode Island, commissioned Nov. 17, 1812. Died July 29, 1824.

HUGHES, ROBERT WILLIAM. Born in Powhatan county, Va., June 6, 1821. Educated at Caldwell Institute, Greensboro, N. C. Tutor in Bingham's High School, Hillsborough, 1840-1843. Practiced law in Richmond from 1846 to 1853. Editor of Richmond Examiner 1850-1857. Joint Editor with John M. Daniel 1861-1865. Editor of Richmond Republic 1865-1866, and of Richmond State Journal 1869-1870. United States attorney for the western district of Virginia 1871-1873. Republican candidate for the governor of Virginia in 1873. United States district judge for the eastern district of Virginia, commissioned Jan. 14, 1874. Author of biographies of Gen. John B. Floyd and Gen. Joseph E. Johnston. Published "Lee and his Lieutenants" in 1867. Author of "The Currency Question" (Putnam's: New York), 1879, and of the "American Dollar" 1885, and of five volumes of United States Circuit and District Court Reports 1879-1885. Delivered the opinion in the famous Arlington Estate Case, which was affirmed by the supreme court.

HUMPHREYS, WEST H. Born in Montgomery county, Tenn., in 1805. Studied law with Foster & Fogg, of Nashville. Afterwards attended a course of law lectures, delivered by Charles Humphreys, at Lexington, Ky. Was granted a license to practice law in 1828. Practiced successively at Charlotte and Clarksville. Moved to Fayette county in 1832. In 1834 he was sent as a delegate to the constitutional convention. Subsequently represented his county in the legislature, and was the youngest member of that body. In 1839 he became a member of the board of internal improvements, and was elected by the legislature attorney general for the state, and reporter of the decisions of the supreme court. Re-elected in 1844. Declined re-election at the expiration of his term of office in 1851. United States district judge for the districts of Tennessee, commissioned March 26, 1853, which office he held until June 26, 1862. At the breaking out of the war he was appointed district judge for the Confederate States of America, which position he held until Tennessee came under the control of the Union forces, when Judge Humphreys moved south, where he remained until the close of the war. From that period until a short time before his death was engaged in practice, though not actively. Died in 1881 in Tennessee. He was the brother-in-law of Gen. Gideon J. Pillow, Maj. Granville A. Pillow, and others of large estate in ante bellum days. He was the author of Humphrey's Reports, and of various essays on internal improvements, law reform, and temperance.

HUNT, SAMUEL WARD. Born in Utica, N. Y., June 14, 1810. Was graduated at Union in 1828. Studied law in Litchfield, Conn. Practiced in Utica. Member of legislature 1839. Mayor of Utica 1844. Judge of the New York court of appeals 1865. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned Dec. 11, 1872. Allocated to the second circuit. Retired Jan. 7, 1882. LL.D., Rutgers and Union. Died in Washington, D. C., March 24, 1886.

HUNTINGTON, ELISHA MILLS. Born in Otsego county, N. Y., March 26, 1806. Removed to Indiana. Admitted to the bar there. Prosecuting attorney 1829. Member of legislature 1831. President judge of his circuit. Commissioner of general land office in Washington, D. C., 1841. United States district judge for the district of Indiana, commissioned May 2, 1842. Died in St. Paul, Minn., Oct. 26, 1862.

INGERSOLL, CHARLES ANTHONY. Born in New Haven, Conn., Oct. 19, 1798. Studied law in the office of his father, Judge Jonathan Ingersoll. Was judge of the probate court for the probate district of New Haven, 1829-1838. State's attorney 1849-1853. Clerk of United States courts for the district of Connecticut 1820-1853. United States district judge for the district of Connecticut, commissioned April 8, 1853. Died at New Haven Feb. 7, 1860. M. A., Yale, 1827.

INNIS, HARRY. Born in Caroline county, Va., 1752. Land commissioner for Virginia 1779. Judge of the supreme court of Virginia for the district of Kentucky 1783. Attorney general for Kentucky 1785. United States district judge for the district of Kentucky, commissioned Sept. 26, 1789. Declined chief justiceship of Kentucky 1792. Favored a separate arrangement by Kentucky with Spain for the navigation of the Mississippi. An attempt to impeach him in 1808 for complicity in the Spanish intrigue failed. He died in Frankfort, Ky., Sept. 20, 1816.

IREDELL, JAMES. Born in Lewes, Eng., Oct. 5, 1750. Removed to North Carolina. Deputy collector of the port of Edenton. Studied law with his brother-in-law, Samuel Johnson. Began practice in 1775. Resigned the collectorship on the outbreak of the Revolution. Judge of the superior court 1777. Resigned 1778. Attorney general of North Carolina 1779. Resigned soon after. Commissioner to revise the laws of the state, (Iredell's Revisal, 1791.) A Federalist leader. Member of the state convention which refused to ratify the federal constitution 1788. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned Feb. 10, 1790. Assigned to the southern circuit. Wrote dissenting opinion in Chisholm v. Georgia, denying the right of a private citizen to sue a state. Dissented also in Wilson v. Daniels, touching writs of error, and his view was ultimately adopted by the court. His addresses to grand juries often published. Author of a treatise on Pleading, which was never published. Died in Edenton, N. C., Oct. 20, 1799.

IRWIN, THOMAS. Born in Philadelphia, Feb. 22, 1785. Educated at Franklin College, but was not graduated. Editor of Philadelphia Repository 1804. Admitted to the bar 1808. Indian agent at Natchitoches, La., and practiced law there. Settled in Uniontown, Fayette county, N. Y., 1810. Member of legislature 1824-1826; of congress 1828. United States district judge for the western district of Pennsylvania, commissioned April 14, 1831. Resigned Jan. 4, 1859. Died in Pittsburgh, Pa., May 14, 1870.

JACKSON, HOWELL EDMUNDS. Born in Paris, Tenn., April 8, 1832. Moved to Jackson, Tenn., in 1840. Was graduated from the West Tennessee College 1848. Studied at the University of Virginia two years. Removed to Memphis 1859. Judge of Tennessee supreme court for two terms. Again moved to Jackson 1876. Member of legislature 1880. United States senator (Democrat) 1881-1886. United States circuit judge for the sixth circuit, commissioned April 12, 1886. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned Feb. 18, 1893. Died Aug. 8, 1895.

JACKSON, JOHN GEORGE. Born in Virginia 1774. Surveyor of public lands in what is now Ohio in 1793. Member of legislature 1797-1801 and 1811. Member of congress (Democrat) 1795-1797, 1799-1801, 1807-1809, and 1813-1817. United States district judge for the western district of Virginia, commissioned Feb. 24, 1819. Died in Clarksburg, Va., March 29, 1825.

JACKSON, JOHN J., Jr. Born at Parkersburg, W. Va., Aug. 4, 1824. Graduated Princeton College, N. J., in June, 1845. Admitted to the bar in Virginia, Nov., 1847. Three years attorney for the state in Ritchie and Wirt counties. Four years a member of the Virginia legislature, from Jan., 1852, to Dec., 1856. Whig elector on four presidential tickets,—Taylor, Scott, Fillmore, and Bell. Was strongly opposed to the secession of Virginia, and took a very active part in the public discussion against the ordinance of secession when it was submitted. United States district judge for the western district of Virginia (now West Virginia), commissioned Aug. 3, 1861, which position he still holds.

JAY, JOHN. Born in New York city Dec. 12, 1745. Was graduated at Kings College (Columbia) 1764. Studied law with Benjamin Kissam. Lindley Murray was his fellow-student. Admitted to the bar 1766. Member of Revolutionary committee of correspondence and recommended a congress 1776. Member of congress 1774-1779. One of a committee of three to prepare an address to the people of Great Britain, an address to the people of Canada and Ireland, and a petition to the king. Member of many Revolutionary committees. Drafted the New York state constitution of 1777. First chief justice of New York 1777. President of congress 1778. Minister to Spain 1779. Commissioner with John Adams and Franklin to negotiate the peace of 1783, and did much to thwart the designs of France at that time. Secretary of foreign affairs 1784-1789. Joint author of the Federalist with Hamilton and Madison. First chief justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned Sept. 26, 1789. Candidate for the governorship of New York 1792, but was unfairly "counted out." Special envoy to England 1794, when he negotiated "Jay's Treaty." Elected governor of New York while in England. Re-elected 1798. Reappointed chief justice by President Adams in 1801, but declined. Spent the rest of his life in retirement. Married the eldest daughter of Gov. William Livingston. Died in 1829.

JENKINS, JAMES G. United States district judge for the eastern district of Wisconsin, commissioned July 2, 1888. Circuit judge of the United States for the seventh circuit, commissioned March 23, 1893.

JOHNSON, ALEXANDER SMITH. Born in Utica, N. Y., July 30, 1817. Was graduated at Yale in 1835. Began practice in New York city. Judge of the New York court of appeals 1846-1860. Resumed practice in Utica in 1860. United States commissioner for settlement of the Puget sound controversy in 1864. Member of the New York commission of appeals 1873-1875. United States circuit judge for the second circuit, commissioned Oct. 20, 1875. Regent of the University of the state of New York. Died in Nassau, New Providence, Jan. 26, 1878.

JOHNSON, BENJAMIN. Born in Scott county, Ky., Jan. 22, 1784. Was judge of Lexington circuit. Appointed judge of the superior court of the territory of Arkansas, Jan. 23, 1820, which office he held until his appointment as United States judge for the district of Arkansas. Commissioned June 29, 1836. Died at Little Rock, Oct. 2, 1849.

JOHNSON, THOMAS. Born in St. Leonard's, Calvert county, Md., Nov. 4, 1732. Educated by private tutors. Member of the colonial legislature 1762-1773. A leader in opposing the stamp act. Member of the committee of correspondence 1773, and of the convention to elect delegates to congress 1774. Member of the committee of safety, of the provincial convention, and of congress, 1775. Nominated Washington for commander-in-chief June 15, 1775. Senior general of the Maryland forces, and in charge of all measures of public defense, 1776. Member of congress 1776-1778. Elected first governor of Maryland Feb. 14, 1777. Re-elected 1778 and 1779. Member of legislature 1780-1781. Largely through his influence Maryland joined the Confederacy in 1781. Member of congress 1781-1787, and introduced a bill to sell the western lands. An ardent supporter of the constitution, and a member of the Maryland convention to ratify it. Declined the United States district judgeship for the district of Maryland in 1789. Chief judge of the general court of Maryland April 20, 1790. Resigned 1791. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned Aug. 5, 1791. Declined the chief justiceship offered him by Washington after Rutledge's retirement. Resigned March 3, 1793. Declined the office of secretary of state Aug. 14, 1795. One of three commissioners to lay out the city of Washington. Died at Rose Hill, Frederick county, Md., in October, 1819.

JOHNSON, WILLIAM. Born in Charleston, S. C., Dec. 27, 1771. Was graduated at Princeton in 1790, with the highest honors in his class. Studied law in the office of Charles Cotesworth Pinckney. Admitted to the bar 1793. Member of legislature 1794-1798. Speaker 1796-1798. Judge of the court of common pleas. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned March 26, 1804. Assigned to the sixth circuit. An ardent Democrat. Decided Jefferson's embargo unconstitutional 1808.

Used all his influence against the extension of the admiralty jurisdiction. Opposed nullification, and resided in Pennsylvania during that agitation. He died in Brooklyn, N. Y., August 11, 1834. LL.D., Princeton, 1818. He edited the "Life and Correspondence of General Nathaniel Greene."

JONES, JAMES M. Born in Kentucky about 1821. Removed to Plaquemine, Iberville parish, La., when quite young, and at the age of 17 began to study law in the office of Mr. Edwards of Plaquemine. His health being delicate, he traveled in Europe for about a year, and after his return resumed the study of law, and began practice in Louisiana. Went to California soon after the gold discovery, and located in San Joaquin district. Was delegate to constitutional convention of 1849, in which year he located in San Jose, and formed law partnership with Hon. John B. Weller. His name was spoken of in connection with United States senate when he was too young to be eligible. United States district judge for Southern district of California, commissioned Dec. 26, 1850, but died about Dec. 15, 1851, before he had taken his legal residence at Los Angeles.

JONES, WILLIAM GILES. Came to Alabama in 1834, and held a position in the land office at Demopolis. Moved to Greensboro. Representative from Green county in 1842. Moved to Mobile, and in 1849 was elected to the house from Mobile county. United States district judge for the northern and southern districts of Alabama, commissioned Sept. 29, 1859. Resigned Jan. 11, 1861, to accept same position from President Davis. Resides at Mobile, Ala.

JUDSON, ANDREW THOMPSON. Born in Ashford, Conn., Nov. 29, 1784. Admitted to the bar 1806. Removed for a time to Montpelier, Vt. Settled in Canterbury, Conn. Member of legislature 1816. Prominent in the toleration party, and the movement for a state constitution in place of the old charter, 1818. State's attorney for Windham county 1819. Member of legislature several years. Member of congress 1834-1837. United States district judge for the district of Connecticut, commissioned July 4, 1836. Died in Canterbury, Conn., March 17, 1853.

KANE, JOHN KENTZING. Born in Albany, N. Y., May 16, 1795. Was graduated at Yale in 1814. Studied law with Joseph Hopkinson. Admitted to the bar 1817. Practiced in Philadelphia. A Federalist in politics. Member of legislature 1823. Joined Democratic party. Solicitor for Philadelphia 1808-1830. Commissioner under the convention of indemnity with France 1832. Published "Notes" of the proceedings. Attorney general of Pennsylvania 1845. Resigned 1846. United States district judge for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, commissioned June 17, 1846. Prominent in the Presbyterian Church. Member of the American Philosophical Society. Died in Philadelphia Feb. 21, 1858.

KEATLEY, JOHN H. Born near Bellefonte, Pa., Dec. 1, 1838. Received education in common schools and printing office. Studied law under Gov. Andrew G. Curtin. Admitted to bar in 1860. District attorney in 1863, when in military service. Re-elected 1865. Removed west 1867. Mayor of Council Bluffs, Iowa, 1876. Iowa house representative 1885. Was one of the managers on part of house in impeachment of State Auditor Brown. Chief of law division, second comptroller's office, treasury department, 1887. United States district and circuit judge for district Alaska, commissioned Aug. 25, 1888. Resigned Dec. 8, 1889. Commandant Iowa Soldiers' Home, Oct. 1, 1892. Resigned Oct. 1, 1894.

KETCHUM, WINTHROP W. Born in Wilkes-Barre, Pa., June 29, 1820. Received a classical education. Teacher for four years. Admitted to the bar in 1850. Prothonotary of Luzerne county for three years. Member of legislature 1858. Solicitor of the United States court of claims 1864-1866. Member of congress (Republican) 1875-1877. United States district judge for the western district of Pennsylvania, commissioned June 26, 1876. Died in Pittsburgh Dec. 6, 1879.

KEY, DAVID McKENDREE. Born in Greene county, Tenn., Jan. 27, 1824. Was graduated at Hiwassee College, Tenn., in 1850. Admitted to the bar 1850. Moved to Chattanooga 1853. Presidential elector 1856 and 1860. Opposed secession. Lieutenant colonel of Forty-Third Tennessee infantry (Confederate) during the Civil War. Pardoned by President Johnson. Member of Tennessee constitutional convention in 1870. Chancellor of the third division of the state until 1875. United States senator 1875. Postmaster general 1877-1880. United States district judge for the eastern and middle districts of Tennessee, commissioned May 27, 1880. Resigned Jan. 28, 1895.

KEY, PHILIP BARTON. Born in Cecil county, Md., 1757. Was liberally educated in England. Took the Tory side in the Revolution, and served in the British army with the rank of captain. Returned to Maryland 1785. Settled in Annapolis 1790, and rose to eminence at the bar. Member of legislature 1794. Removed to Georgetown, D. C., 1801. United States circuit judge for the fourth circuit, commissioned Feb. 20, 1801. Commissioned chief judge of the circuit March 3, 1801. The act under which the appointment was made was repealed, to take effect July 1, 1802. Member of congress (Federalist) 1807-1813. Died in Georgetown, D. C., July 28, 1815.

KILTY, WILLIAM. Practiced law in Maryland. In 1799 prepared the Acts of Assembly. Chief judge of the United States circuit court for the District of Columbia, commissioned March 23, 1801. Resigned in Jan., 1806. Chancellor of state of Maryland. Prepared collection of British statutes.

KNOWLES, HIRAM. Born at Hamden, Me., Jan. 18, 1834. Educated at Denmark Academy, Iowa, and Antioch College, Ohio. Graduated at Harvard Law School in 1860. Appointed prosecuting attorney for Humboldt county, Nev., in 1863. Elected probate judge in the fall of the same year. Associate justice of the supreme court of Montana territory in July, 1868. Resigned Aug. 1, 1879. Elected and served as a member of the convention which framed the constitution of the state of Montana, 1889. District judge for the district of Montana, commissioned Feb. 21, 1890.

KNOWLES, JOHN POWER. Born at Providence, R. I., June 13, 1808. Educated at his native place, at the Harvard Law School, and South Reading. Admitted to the bar in 1837. Was reporter of decisions of the supreme court of Rhode Island, 1855-1856, 1865-1867. United States district judge for the district of Rhode Island, commissioned Oct. 9, 1869. Ceased to be district judge March 8, 1881. Died Aug. 3, 1887.

KREKEL, ARNOLD. Born in Germany, March 12, 1815. Removed to America 1832. Settled in Missouri. Educated in Germany and at St. Charles College, Mo. Admitted to the bar 1844. Member of legislature 1852. President of the Missouri constitutional convention of 1865. Colonel Missouri Home Guard 1863-1864. United States district judge for the western district of Missouri, commissioned March 9, 1865. Died June 8, 1888.

LACOMBE, EMILE HENRY. Born in New York City, in 1846. Was graduated from Columbia College in 1863. Columbia Law School in 1865, taking the prize for an essay on constitutional law. Was counsel to the corporation of New York City from June 1, 1884, to June 30, 1887. United States circuit judge for the second circuit, commissioned May 26, 1887. LL.D., Columbia, 1894.

LAMAR, LUCIUS QUINTUS CINCINNATUS. Born in Putnam county, Ga., in September, 1825. Moved to Oxford, Miss. Was graduated at Emory College, Ga., 1845. Studied law in Macon, Ga. Admitted to the bar 1847. Returned to Oxford, Miss., 1849. Professor of mathematics in the University Mississippi. Resumed practice in Covington, Ga. Member of Georgia legislature 1853. Returned to Mississippi 1854, and settled at Lafayette. Member of congress (Democrat) 1857-1860. Resigned. Member of the Mississippi secession convention. Colonel in Confederate army, and commissioner to Russia in 1863. Returned to Mississippi after the war. Professor of political economy and social science in University of Mississippi 1866; professor of law 1867. Resigned, and resumed practice. Member of congress (Democrat) 1872-1877. United States senator 1877. Secretary of the interior March 5, 1885. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned Jan. 23, 1888. Assigned to the fifth circuit. Died in Macon, Ga., Jan. 23, 1893.

L^{AURANCE}, JOHN. Born in Cornwall, Eng., 1750. Removed to New York 1767. Admitted to the bar 1772. Aide de camp to Washington. Presided over Andre's trial as judge advocate general. Member of congress 1785-1786. Member of legislature and of congress 1789. United States district judge for the district of New York, commissioned May 6, 1794. Ceased to be district judge in December, 1796. United States senator 1796-1800. Presided over the senate in 1798. Died in November, 1800.

L^{AW}, RICHARD. Son of Jonathan Law, chief justice and governor of Connecticut colony. Born in Milford, Conn., March 17, 1733. Was graduated at Yale, 1751. Studied law with Jared Ingersoll. Admitted to the bar in 1754. Practiced in New London. Judge of the county court. Member of general assembly, of the council, 1776-1786; of congress 1777-1778 and 1781-1784. Revised and codified the statutes of Connecticut with Roger Sherman. Judge of the state supreme court 1784. Chief justice May, 1786. Mayor of New London 1784. United States district judge for the district of Connecticut (commissioned Sept. 26, 1789) until his death in New London, Jan. 26, 1806. LL.D., Yale, 1802.

L^{AURENCE}, PHILIP K. Born in New York. United States district judge for the district of Louisiana, commissioned Sept. 12, 1837. Died May 19, 1841, at New Orleans, La.

L^{AVITT}, HUMPHREY HOWE. Born in Suffield, Conn., June 18, 1796. Removed with his parents to Warren, Ohio, in 1799. Served in the war of 1812. Received a classical education, and was admitted to the bar in 1816. Commenced the practice of his profession at Cadiz, Ohio, and in the second year of his residence there was elected justice of the peace. Removed to Steubenville. Was prosecuting attorney, which position he held for ten years. Elected a member of the legislature from Jefferson county in 1825, and a member of the state senate in 1827. Appointed clerk of the court of common pleas and supreme court of the county in 1829. Elected a member of congress in 1830. Re-elected twice, but before taking his seat for his third term was appointed United States district judge for the district of Ohio, commissioned June 30, 1834. Upon the division of the state into two districts he was assigned to the southern district, removing to Cincinnati. Resigned March 30, 1871. Appointed a representative of the prison reform congress at London, in 1872. Died in the same year.

L^{EE}, THOMAS. Born in Charleston, S. C., Dec. 1, 1769. Educated in his native city, and was admitted to the bar in 1790. Was soon elected a member of the legislature, and in 1794 was appointed one of the three circuit solicitors. Was clerk of the house of representatives from 1798 to 1804. Elected one of the associate law judges of the state. Became comptroller general shortly after, holding this office for 12 years. President of State Bank from 1817 until his decease. In 1822 was chairman of the committee of ways and means in the legislature. District judge for the district of South Carolina, commissioned Feb. 17, 1823. Died at Charleston, Oct. 23, 1839.

L^{EWIS}, WILLIAM. Born in Chester county, Pa., in 1751. Studied law with Nicholas Wain of Philadelphia, with whom he subsequently practiced for several years, having been admitted to the bar in 1773. United States district attorney for the district of Pennsylvania, Oct. 6, 1789. United States district judge for the same district, commissioned July 14, 1791. Ceased to be district judge in 1792. Died Aug. 20, 1819. He was a member of the Society of Friends, and was the author of the act of 1780 abolishing slavery in Pennsylvania.

L^{IVINGSTON}, HENRY BROCKHOLST. Son of Gov. Livingston of New Jersey. Born in New York city, Nov. 26, 1757. Was graduated at Princeton in 1774. Lieutenant colonel in the Revolution. Private secretary to his brother-in-law, John Jay, in Spain, 1779-1782. Captured on the return voyage. Studied law at Albany with Peter Yates. Admitted to the bar 1783. Removed to New York city. Dropped his first name. Puisne judge of state supreme court 1802. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned Nov. 10, 1806. Assigned to the second circuit. LL. D., Harvard, 1818. Wrote political articles for the press under the name of "Decius." Died in Washington, D. C., March 18, 1823.

L^{OCKE}, JAMES W. Born in Wilmington, Vt., Oct. 30, 1837. Received an academic education. Studied law with Hon. William Stark, Manchester, N. H. Was an officer in the United States navy 1861-1865. Subsequently practiced his profession at Key West, Fla. Appointed clerk of the United States courts for the southern district of Florida in 1866. Became county judge in 1868. Elected to the state senate in 1870. District judge for the southern district of Florida, commissioned Feb. 1, 1872.

LONGYEAR, JOHN WESLEY. Born in Shandaken, Ulster county, N. Y., Oct. 22, 1820. Educated at Lima, N. Y. Removed to Michigan 1844. Admitted to the bar in 1846. Settled in Lansing. Member of congress (Republican) 1862-1867. Member of the loyalist convention in Philadelphia 1866. Member of Michigan constitutional convention 1867. United States district judge for the eastern district of Michigan, commissioned Feb. 13, 1870. Died in Detroit, Mich., March 11, 1875.

LOVE, JAMES M. Born in Fairfax county, Va., 1820. Removed to Muskingum county, Ohio, 1833. Studied law with his brother in Virginia, and with Judge Richard Stillwell at Zanesville, Ohio. Practiced in Coehocton county, Ohio. Captain in the Mexican War. Resumed practice in Ohio 1847. Removed to Keokuk, Iowa. Member of legislature 1852. United States district judge for the district of Iowa, commissioned Oct. 5, 1855. United States district judge for the southern district of Iowa, commissioned July 20, 1882. Died July 2, 1891.

LOWELL, JOHN. Born in Newburyport, Mass., June 17, 1743. Was graduated at Harvard in 1760. Admitted to the bar 1762. Member of legislature 1776-1778. Moved to Boston 1777. Member of the Massachusetts constitutional convention of 1780, and was active in securing the clause indirectly abolishing slavery. Member of congress 1782-1783. Appointed by congress one of three judges to try appeals in admiralty 1782. Member of Massachusetts and New York boundary commission 1784. United States district judge for the district of Massachusetts, commissioned Sept. 26, 1789. United States circuit judge for the first circuit, commissioned Feb. 20, 1801. The act under which the appointment was made was repealed, to take effect July 1, 1802. LL. D., Harvard, 1792. Member of the Harvard Corporation. One of the founders of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. Died in Roxbury, Mass., in May, 1802.

LOWELL, JOHN. A descendant of Judge John Lowell (1742-1802.) Born in Boston, Mass., Oct. 13, 1824. Was graduated at Harvard in 1843. Admitted to the bar 1846. Practiced in Boston. United States district judge for the district of Massachusetts, commissioned March 11, 1865. United States circuit judge for the first circuit, commissioned Dec. 18, 1873. Resigned May 1, 1884. His decisions have been published in two volumes.

LURTON, HORACE H. Born in Campbell county, Ky., Feb. 26, 1844. Educated at Douglass University, Chicago, and Cumberland University, Tenn. Removed to Clarksville, Tenn., in Aug., 1861. Served in the Confederate army. Practiced law at Clarksville, Tenn., from 1867 to 1874, in copartnership with Hon. James E. Bailey. Appointed chancellor of the sixth chancery division of Tennessee, Feb. 1, 1874. Elected to the same position in August, 1876. Resigned in 1878 to resume the practice of his profession with Hon. C. G. Smith at Clarksville. Elected associate justice supreme court of Tennessee, Aug. 1886. Elected chief justice, Jan., 1893. United States circuit judge for the sixth circuit, commissioned March 27, 1893.

McALLISTER, MATTHEW HALL. Born in Savannah, Ga., Nov. 26, 1800. Educated at Princeton. Admitted to the bar about 1820. Practiced in Savannah. United States district attorney for the district of Georgia 1827. Opposed nullification in 1832. Member of legislature and secured the establishment of the court for the correction of errors. Unsuccessful Democratic candidate for governor 1845. Mayor of Savannah, and a friend to the negroes. Member of the Democratic national convention of 1848. Removed to San Francisco in 1850, and practiced there. United States circuit judge for California, commissioned March 3, 1855. Resigned April 7, 1862. Energetic in suppressing the vigilance committee. Author of a eulogy on President Jackson. His opinions were published by his son. Died in San Francisco, Cal., Dec. 19, 1865. LL.D., Columbia.

McALLISTER, WARD, JR. Born at Newport, R. I., July 27, 1855. Educated at Princeton. Graduated at Albany Law School, and was admitted to the New York bar. Studied at Harvard Law School for four years. Removed to California, and in 1882 was appointed assistant United States attorney, which office he held for two years. First United States district judge for the district of Alaska, commissioned July 5, 1884, which office he held until Aug. 28, 1885. Returned to San Francisco, and was appointed by Judge Ogden Hoffman a special commissioner in Chinese habeas corpus cases. He subsequently resigned this position to become counsel for the Pacific Mail Steamship Company. His grandfather, Matthew Hall McAllister, was first United States judge of California.

McCALEB, THEODORE H. Born in Pendleton District, S. C., Feb. 10, 1810. Educated at Phillips' Exeter Academy and at Yale. Removed to New Orleans in 1833, and was later admitted to the Louisiana bar. United States district judge for the district of Louisiana, commissioned Sept. 3, 1841. Held this position until Jan. 26, 1861, at the breaking out of the civil war. Died at Claiborne county, Miss., April 29, 1864. He was for three years president of the University of Louisiana, and for nearly seventeen years professor of admiralty and international law in the same institution. Was an accomplished linguist, and delivered an oration on the dedication of the Lyceum, and eulogies upon his friends Henry Clay and S. S. Prentiss. It is said that he was the only federal judge in the South who was not commissioned a Confederate justice by the Confederate States government.

McCANDLESS, WILSON. Born in Pittsburgh, Pa., June 19, 1810. Was graduated at the Western University of Pennsylvania. Admitted to the bar in 1831. United States district judge for the western district of Pennsylvania, commissioned Feb. 8, 1859. Resigned July 24, 1876. Died in Pittsburgh, Pa., June 30, 1882.

McCAY, HENRY KENT. Born in Northumberland county, Pa., Jan. 8, 1820. Was graduated with distinction at Princeton in 1839. Removed to Lexington, Oglethorpe county, Ga.; taught school and studied law. Removed to Americus, Ga., 1842. Admitted to the bar and practiced there. Lieutenant in the Confederate army during the Civil War. Resumed practice in Americus. Became a strong Republican. Member of Georgia constitutional convention, 1868. Justice of the state supreme court. Resigned, and practiced in Atlanta. United States district judge for the northern district of Georgia, commissioned Aug. 4, 1882. Died at Atlanta, Ga., July 30, 1886.

McCLUNG, WILLIAM. United States circuit judge for the sixth circuit, commissioned Feb. 24, 1801. The act under which the appointment was made was repealed, to take effect July 1, 1802.

McCORMICK, ANDREW PHELPS. Born in Brazoria county, Tex., Dec. 18, 1832. Was graduated from Center College, Ky., in 1854. Admitted to the bar 1855. Practiced in Brazoria. Judge of probate 1865-1866. Member of the Texas constitutional conventions of 1866 and 1868. Judge of state circuit court 1871-1876. Member of legislature 1876-1879. United States district attorney for the eastern district of Texas 1878, but did not qualify. United States district judge for the northern district of Texas, commissioned April 10, 1879. Removed to Dallas 1879. Thence to Graham 1883. United States circuit judge for the fifth circuit, commissioned March 17, 1892, under the judiciary act of March 3, 1891.

McCRARY, GEORGE WASHINGTON. Born in Evansville, Ind., Aug. 29, 1835. His parents removed with him to what is now Iowa in 1836. Educated in a public school and an academy. Admitted to the bar in Keokuk, Iowa, 1856. Member of legislature 1857 and 1861-1865; chairman of committee on military affairs. Member of congress (Republican) 1868-1877. Introduced the bill for the electoral commission of 1877. Secretary of war March 12, 1877. Resigned 1879. United States circuit judge for the eighth circuit, commissioned Dec. 9, 1879. Resigned March, 1884. Practiced law in Kansas City, Mo. Author of "The American Law of Elections."

McDONALD, DAVID. Born in Bourbon county, Ky., May 8, 1803. Educated at the common schools of Indiana, where he removed with his parents. Studied law in Bloomington, and was admitted to the bar in 1830. Elected a member of the legislature in 1833, and prosecuting attorney in 1834. Appointed judge of the tenth judicial circuit of Indiana in 1838, serving 14 years. United States district judge for the district of Indiana, commissioned Dec. 13, 1864. Died Aug. 25, 1869. Was the author of "McDonald's Treatise," a work on practice in Indiana, and held a professorship in the Indiana University, from which institution he had received the degree of LL.D.

McINTOSH, McQUEEN. Native of Georgia. An early emigrant to Florida. Was presidential elector. United States district judge for the northern district of Florida, commissioned March 11, 1856. Ceased to be judge, Jan. 10, 1861. Was member of secession convention of Florida. Died in Pensacola in 1868.

McKENNA, JOSEPH. Born in Philadelphia. Removed to San Francisco in 1855. Educated in common schools of San Francisco, and St. Augustine College, at Benicia. Admitted to the bar at the age of 22. Elected district attorney of Solano county the same year. Sent to the legislature from that county in 1875. Was elected to congress, which office he held for four consecutive terms. United States circuit judge for the ninth circuit, commissioned March 17, 1892. Appointed attorney general of the United States by President McKinley March 4, 1897.

McKENNAN, WILLIAM. Born in Washington, Pa., Sept. 27, 1816. Educated at Jefferson College, graduating in 1833, subsequently taking a post graduate course at Yale. Studied law with his father, Thomas M. T. McKennan, and was admitted to practice in 1837. United States circuit judge for the third circuit, commissioned Dec. 22, 1869, having, it is said, declined a position upon the supreme bench of the United States offered him by President Grant. Retired from the bench Jan. 3, 1891. Died at his home in Pittsburgh, Oct. 27, 1893. He was a delegate to the peace congress in 1860. Presidential elector same year, and has been a delegate to the Republican state and national conventions a number of times.

McKINLEY, JOHN. Born in Culpepper county, Va., May 1, 1780. Began practice in Louisville, Ky. Removed to Huntsville, Ala. Member of Alabama legislature. United States senator 1826-1831. Removed to Florence, Ala. Member of congress 1833-1835. In 1835 he was again elected for the senate, from which place he was transferred by President Van Buren to the supreme court, commissioned April 22, 1837. Assigned to the fifth circuit, March 3, 1845. Died in Louisville, Ky., July 19, 1852.

McKINNEY, JOHN McDOWELL. Born in Lycoming county, Pa., in 1829. Was graduated from Princeton in 1848. Studied law at Williamsport, Pa., and was admitted to the bar, Sept. 3, 1850. Soon after the election of President Lincoln he was appointed to a clerkship in the solicitor's office of the treasury department at Washington, and was the author of the first internal revenue laws. United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, commissioned Nov. 8, 1870. Died Oct. 12, 1871.

McLEAN, JOHN. Born in Morris county, N. J., March 11, 1785. Removed to Warren county, Ohio, 1799. Studied law in Cincinnati, while engaged as a deputy in the clerk's office. Admitted to the bar 1807, practicing in Lebanon. Member of congress (Democrat) 1812-1816. Judge of the Ohio supreme court 1816-1822. Commissioner of the land office 1822. Postmaster general 1823-1829. Declined secretaryship of war and navy 1829. Associate justice of United States supreme court, commissioned Feb. 11, 1830. Assigned to the seventh circuit. Candidate for presidential nomination (Free Soil) in 1848, and in the Republican conventions of 1856 and 1860. Wrote a dissenting opinion in the Dred Scott Case. Died in Cincinnati, April 4, 1861.

McNAIRY, JOHN. Born in North Carolina in 1762. Removed to Tennessee in 1789. Was member of constitutional convention, Jan. 11, 1796. United States district judge for the district of Tennessee, commissioned Feb. 20, 1797. Upon the abolishment of that district was assigned to the eastern and western districts of Tennessee, commissioned July 1, 1802. Resigned 1834. McNairy county was named from him. Died at Nashville, Nov. 12, 1837.

MAGILL, CHARLES. United States circuit judge for the fourth circuit, commissioned March 3, 1801. The act under which the appointment was made was repealed, to take effect July 1, 1802.

MAGRATH, ANDREW GORDON. Born in Charleston, S. C., Feb. 8, 1813. Educated at the private school of Bishop England. Was graduated from South Carolina College with the highest honors in 1831. Studied law in the office of James L. Petigru and at Harvard Law School. Elected a member of the state legislature in 1840, serving two terms. United States district judge for the district of South Carolina, commissioned May 12, 1856. Resigned upon the election of Mr. Lincoln as president, Nov. 7, 1860, and was thereafter appointed Confederate district judge for the same district. Elected governor of South Carolina in Dec., 1864, and at the end of the civil war was imprisoned with other Confederates in Fort Pulaski. After his release he returned to the bar, and for many years enjoyed a large practice. Died at Charleston, April 9, 1893.

MARCHANT, HENRY. Born in Martha's Vineyard, Mass., in April, 1741. Was graduated at Philadelphia College 1762. Studied law under Edmund Trowbridge, at Cambridge, Mass. Settled in Newport, R. I. Attorney general of Rhode Island 1770-1777. Member of legislature. An ardent Whig in the Revolution. Member of congress 1777-1780 and 1783-1784. Member of state convention to ratify the constitution. United States district judge for the district of Rhode Island, commissioned July 3, 1790. Died in Newport Aug. 30, 1796. LL. D., Yale, 1792.

MARSHALL, JAMES. Brother of Chief Justice Marshall. Born in Farquier county, Va., March 12, 1764. Lieutenant in Alexander Hamilton's regiment in the Revolution. Went to Kentucky 1785. A vigorous opponent of the "Spanish intrigue" there. Returned to Virginia 1795. Married the daughter of Robert Morris. Appointed by Washington to negotiate for the release of Lafayette during the French Revolution. Purchased the Fairfax estates in Virginia. Judge of the United States circuit court for the District of Columbia, commissioned March 3, 1801. Resigned 1803. Died in Farquier, Va., April 26, 1848.

MARSHALL, JOHN. Born in Farquier county, Va., Sept. 24, 1755. Educated at home. Captain in Revolutionary army. Attended law lectures by George Wythe in Richmond, 1780, while on duty there. Admitted to the bar 1780. Resigned in January, 1781, and studied law. Began to practice as soon as the courts reopened. Member of legislature and executive council. Removed to Richmond 1783. Member of the Virginia convention to ratify the federal constitution, of which he was an enthusiastic supporter, and with Madison had great influence in securing the ratification. Declined attorney generalship of the United States 1795. Argued the case of the British debts (Ware v. Hylton,) before the United States supreme court in 1796. Declined the place of minister to France 1796. Joint envoy to France with Charles C. Pinckney and Elbridge Gerry, June, 1797. Talleyrand attempted to bribe the envoys, and they withdrew from France. The publication of this correspondence, called the "X. Y. Z." letters, aroused great Federalist enthusiasm in the United States. Marshall was elected to congress (Federalist) in April, 1799. Made a famous speech on extradition relative to the case of Thomas Nash. Nominated secretary of war, but before confirmation was made secretary of state. Chief justice of the United States, commissioned Jan. 31, 1801. Assigned to the fifth circuit. Died in Philadelphia, July 6, 1835. His decisions on the supreme bench are found in the United States Reports from 1 Cranch to 9 Peters; those delivered on circuit are contained in Brockenbrough's Reports. Presided at the trial of Aaron Burr in 1807. Member of Virginia constitutional convention 1829. Author of a "Life of Washington," of which the first volume is sometimes called "A History of the American Colonies."

MARVIN, WILLIAM. Born at Fairfield, Herkimer county, N. Y., in 1808. Received his early training on a farm. Was educated in the common schools and at Homer Academy. Taught school. Afterwards studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1834. United States district attorney for the southern district of Florida in 1835. While holding this office he was twice elected a member of the legislative council. Was also a member of the first constitutional convention of the state of Florida. On the resignation of Judge Webb, in 1839, he was appointed judge of that court, and after the admission of Florida into the Union he was appointed United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, commissioned March 3, 1847. Resigned July 1, 1863. In 1865 he was appointed provisional governor of Florida to assist in the reconstruction of the state government. Resides at Skaneateles, N. Y. He is the author of a "Treatise on the Law of Wreck and Salvage," a small work on "International General Average," and the "Authorship of the Four Gospels."

MASON, JOHN YOUNG. Born in Greenville, Sussex county, Va., April 18, 1799. Was graduated at the University of North Carolina in 1816. Studied law in Litchfield, Conn. Admitted to the bar 1819. Practiced in Southampton county, Va. Member of legislature, of the Virginia constitutional convention of 1827; of congress, (1831-1837;) being chairman of the committee on foreign affairs. United States district judge for the eastern district of Virginia, commissioned March 3, 1841. Resigned March 5, 1844. Secretary of the navy 1844. United States attorney general 1845. Transferred to the navy department again. Removed to Richmond, Va., 1849, and resumed practice. President of the Virginia constitutional convention of 1850. United States minister to France from 1850 until his death, in Paris, Oct. 3, 1859. LL.D., University of North Carolina.

MATTHEWS, STANLEY. Born in Cincinnati, Ohio, July 21, 1824. Was graduated at Kenyon College 1840. Admitted to the bar. Settled in Maury county, Tenn., but returned to Cincinnati. Anti-slavery editor 1846-1849. Common pleas judge 1851. State senator 1855. United States district attorney for the southern district of Ohio 1858-1861. Colonel of the fifty-seventh Ohio regiment during the Civil War. Resigned 1863. Judge of the Cincinnati superior court 1863. Resigned 1864. Presidential elector for Lincoln 1864, and for Grant 1868. Republican candidate for congress 1876. Counsel (Republican) before the electoral commission in 1877. United States senator 1877. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned Jan. 30, 1882. Assigned to the sixth circuit. Died at Washington, D. C., March 22, 1889.

MAXEY THOMAS S. Born in Brandon, Miss., Sept. 1, 1846. Educated at the University of Mississippi and University of Virginia. Was in the Confederate army in 1864-1865. Received the degree of B. L., University of Virginia, 1869. Elected a member of the Mississippi legislature in the fall of the same year. Removed to Jefferson, Tex., in Dec., 1870. Was city attorney in 1873-1874. Removed to Austin in Feb., 1877. United States district judge for the western district of Texas, commissioned June 25, 1888. LL.D., University of Mississippi, 1888.

MERRICK, WILLIAM MATTHEWS. Born in Charles county, Md., Sept. 1, 1818. Liberally educated. Admitted to the bar in Baltimore, 1839. Settled in Frederick, Md., 1844. Deputy attorney general for that county 1845-1850. Moved to Washington, D. C., in 1854 and became a judge of the United States circuit court for the District of Columbia, commissioned Dec. 14, 1855. After the court was abolished, March 3, 1863, he practiced in Maryland. Member of legislature 1870; of congress (Democrat) 1871-1873; of state constitutional convention 1867. Associate justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, May 4, 1885.

MILLER, ANDREW G. Born at Carlisle, Pa., Sept. 18, 1801. Was educated at Dickinson College, and at Washington College, from which institution he was graduated with honors in 1819. Studied law with Andrew Caruthers, Esq., of Carlisle. Was admitted to the bar of Cumberland county in 1822. Practiced law for 16 years, during which time he held the office of deputy attorney general. Appointed associate justice for Wisconsin territory, Nov. 8, 1838. Reaching Milwaukee in 31 days, he took the oath of office on the 10th of December. He was assigned by the governor and legislature to the eastern territorial district, comprising Green Bay, Milwaukee, and the Lake Shore. United States district judge for the eastern district of Wisconsin, commissioned June 12, 1848. Resigned Dec. 31, 1873. Died Sept. 30, 1874.

MILLER, SAMUEL FURMAN. Born in Richmond, Ky., April 5, 1816. Was graduated in medicine at Transylvania University in 1838, and practiced for a time, but afterwards became a lawyer. Favored emancipation. Removed to Iowa in 1850, and became a leader of the Republican party there. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned July 16, 1862. Assigned to the eighth circuit, April 8, 1867.

Orator at the constitutional centennial celebration in Philadelphia, Sept. 15, 1887. Died Oct. 13, 1890.

MONROE, THOMAS B. Born in Albemarle county, Va., Oct. 27, 1791. Educated in Scott county, Ky. Elected member of the legislature from Barren county in 1816. Began the study of law in 1819. Removed to Frankfort in 1821. Was graduated from Transylvania University in 1822. Secretary of state of Kentucky in 1823. Reporter of the court of appeals in 1825. United States district attorney from 1833 to 1834. United States district judge for the district of Kentucky, commissioned March 8, 1834, resigning in 1861. Died at Pass Christian, Miss., Dec. 24, 1865. He was a relative of President Monroe. He published Monroe's Kentucky Reports in seven volumes. In 1848 he was professor in the University of Louisiana. Filled the chair of civil, international, and criminal law in Transylvania University. Professor of rhetoric, logic, and history of the law at the Western Military Academy at Drennon Springs. LL.D., University of Louisiana, Centre College, and Harvard University.

MOORE, ALFRED. Born in North Carolina, May 21, 1755. Was educated in Boston, Mass. Captain in the Revolutionary army. He was appointed attorney general of North Carolina in 1790, without previous legal education. State judge 1798. Appointed associate justice of the United States supreme court Dec. 10, 1799. Assigned to the sixth circuit July 1, 1802. Resigned March, 1804. Died in Blair county, N. C., Oct. 15, 1810.

MORRILL, AMOS. Born in Salisbury, Mass., Aug. 25, 1809. Was graduated at Bowdoin in 1834. Studied law at Salisbury. Removed to Tennessee 1836, and to Texas 1839. Judge of Texas supreme court 1867. Chief justice. United States district judge for the eastern district of Texas, commissioned Feb. 5, 1872. Ceased to be district judge in March, 1884. Died 1885.

MORRIS, ROBERT. Born in New Brunswick, N. J., 1745. First chief justice of New Jersey under the constitution of 1776. Appointed Feb. 5, 1777. Resigned 1779. United States district judge for the district of New Jersey, commissioned Aug. 28, 1790. Died May 2, 1815, in New Brunswick, N. J. His bad health prevented his attendance in court in the latter part of his life, but there was so little business that this caused no inconvenience.

MORRIS, THOMAS J. Born in Baltimore, Md., Sept. 24, 1837. Was graduated at Harvard in 1856. Admitted to the bar in Maryland, 1859. Practiced in Baltimore. United States district judge for the district of Maryland, commissioned July 1, 1879.

MORROW, WILLIAM W. Born near Milton, Wayne county, Ind., July 15, 1843. Removed with his family to Illinois in 1845. Upon the death of his father he returned to Indiana in 1853, and again to Illinois in 1855. Removed to California in 1859. Appointed to a clerkship in the United States treasury department in Washington in 1863. As a member of the National Rifles in the District of Columbia he was called into service in 1863-1864. Was sent to California as a special agent of the treasury department in 1865, serving four years. Studied law in Washington and in California, and was admitted to the bar in the latter state in 1869. Appointed assistant United States attorney in 1870, serving four years. Elected chairman of the Republican state central committee in 1879. Elected attorney for the board of state harbor commissioners in 1880. Was special counsel for the United States before the French and American claims commission 1881 to 1883; also for the Alabama claims commission 1882-1885. Delegate to the Republican national convention in 1884, and was chairman of the California delegation. Elected to the 49th congress from the San Francisco district in Nov., 1884. Re-elected in 1886 and in 1888. Declined a nomination in 1890. While a member of the house of representatives he served on the committees on commerce, immigration, foreign affairs, and appropriations, and frequently as speaker pro tem. Became an honorary member of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, July 9, 1889, and became an honorary member of the Mechanics' Institute of San Francisco, June 8, 1889. United States district judge of the northern district of California, commissioned Sept. 18, 1891. Lecturer on admiralty jurisdiction in the United States in Leland-Stanford University.

MORSELL, JAMES SEWALL. Born in Calvert county, Md., Jan. 10, 1775. Practiced in the District of Columbia. Served in the war of 1812. Associate judge of the circuit court for the District of Columbia commissioned Jan. 11, 1815. Held office until the abolition of the court, March 3, 1863. Died in Prince George county, Md., Jan. 11, 1870. Friend of Francis Scott Key and Judge Taney.

NELSON, RENSSELAER RUSSELL. Son of Justice Samuel Nelson. Born in Coopers-town, N. Y., May 12, 1826. Was graduated at Yale in 1846. Admitted to the bar in native city in 1849. Removed to St. Paul, Minn., 1850. Associate justice of the territorial supreme court from April 23, 1857, to May 11, 1858. United States district judge for the district of Minnesota, commissioned May 20, 1858. Retired May 16, 1896. He was, in point of service, the oldest federal district judge in the United States.

NELSON, SAMUEL. Born in Hebron, Washington county, N. Y., Nov. 10, 1792.

Was graduated at Middlebury in 1813. Studied law at Salem, N. Y., under Chief Justice Savage. Admitted to the bar in Madison, N. Y., 1817. Presidential elector 1820. Member of the state constitutional convention 1822. Circuit judge 1823-1831. Associate justice of the New York supreme court 1831. Chief justice 1837-1845. Member of the state constitutional convention of 1844. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned March 3, 1845. Assigned to the second circuit. Concurred in the Dred Scott decision. Resigned Dec. 1, 1872. Member of the Alabama arbitration commission 1871. Died in Cooperstown, N. Y., Dec. 13, 1873. LL. D., Columbia, 1841; also Middlebury and Geneva Colleges.

NELSON, THOMAS LEVERETT. Born in Haverhill, N. H., March 4, 1827. Entered Dartmouth 1842. Removed to Burlington, Vt., 1844. Was graduated at the University of Vermont in 1846. Civil engineer 1846-1853. Studied law in Worcester, Mass.; admitted to the bar in 1855, and practiced there. Member of legislature 1869. Chairman of judiciary committee. City solicitor of Worcester 1870-1873. United States district judge for the district of Massachusetts, commissioned Jan. 10, 1879. LL.D., University of Vermont, 1885. Member of the American Antiquarian Society.

NEWMAN, WILLIAM T. Born in Knoxville, Tenn., June 23, 1843. Educated in his native city. Entered the Confederate army in the spring of 1861. Was a lieutenant of cavalry during the war. Studied law in Atlanta, Ga., and was admitted to the bar in 1866. Was city attorney 1871-1883. United States district judge for the northern district of Georgia, commissioned Aug. 13, 1886.

NICOLL, JOHN C. Born in Savannah, Ga., about 1794. He removed with his parents to New Jersey, and, on attaining his majority, returned to Savannah, and engaged in the practice of the law. Was recorder of the city. Served several years as member of the legislature. Was at one time captain of the Republican Blues. Was judge of the city court of Savannah, mayor of the city, and judge of the superior court. United States district judge for the district of Georgia, commissioned May 11, 1839. Ceased to be district judge, Jan. 19, 1861. At the breaking out of the war he was appointed Confederate States district attorney, which office he held until his decease, in the city of Savannah, Nov. 16, 1863.

NILES, HENRY C. Born in Kosciusko, Miss., Oct. 21, 1850. Was representative in state legislature in 1878 and 1886. United States district attorney for the northern district of Mississippi from June 24, 1889, to Aug. 17, 1891. United States district judge for the northern and southern districts of Mississippi, commissioned Aug. 17, 1891.

NIXON, JOHN THOMPSON. Born in Fairton, N. J., Aug. 31, 1820. Was graduated at Princeton in 1841. Admitted to the bar of Virginia 1844, and of New Jersey 1845. Practiced in Bridgeton, N. J. Member of the legislature 1848-1849. Speaker 1849. Member of congress (Republican) 1859-1863. Member of the Philadelphia Loyalists' convention 1866. United States district judge for the district of New Jersey, commissioned April 28, 1870. Trustee of Princeton. Prominent in the Old School Presbyterian Church. Edited "Nixon's Digest of the Laws of New Jersey." Author of a treatise on "New Jersey Procedure." Died Sept. 28, 1889.

OGIER, ISAAC S. K. Born in Charleston, S. C., July 27, 1819. Educated in native city. Studied and practiced law in New Orleans. Removed to California. Settled in Los Angeles. Was a member of the first California legislature. United States district judge for the southern district of California, commissioned Jan. 23, 1854. Died in July, 1861.

PACA, WILLIAM. Born at Wye Hall, Harford county, Md., Oct. 31, 1740. Of an old Maryland family. Was graduated at Philadelphia College, 1759. Studied law in the Middle Temple, London, beginning Jan. 14, 1762. Admitted to the bar 1764. Practiced in Annapolis, Md. Opposed the stamp act. Member of the legislature 1771-1774; of the committee of correspondence 1774; of congress 1774-1779. Signer of the Declaration of Independence. State senator 1777-1779. Chief judge of the Maryland superior court 1778-1780. Chief judge of the (federal) court of appeals in prize and admiralty cases for two years, beginning 1780. Governor of Maryland 1782-1786. Member of the Maryland convention to ratify the federal constitution 1788. United States district judge for the district of Maryland, commissioned Dec. 22, 1789. Died at Wye Hall, in Oct., 1799.

PAINE, ELIJAH. Born in Brooklyn, Conn., Jan. 21, 1757. Was graduated at Harvard 1781. Admitted to the bar 1784. Practiced in Vermont. Member and secretary of the Vermont constitutional convention of 1786. Commissioner to adjust the differences between New York and Vermont 1789. Member of legislature 1789-1791. Judge of state supreme court 1791-1795. United States senator (Federalist) 1795-1801. United States district judge for Vermont, commissioned March 3, 1801. Resigned March, 1842. Died April 28, 1842. Member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences and of the American Antiquarian Society. Trustee of Dartmouth and Middlebury Colleges and of the University of Vermont. First Phi Beta Kappa orator at Harvard 1782. A. B., (Hon.) Dartmouth, 1786. LL. D., Harvard, 1812; and University of Vermont, 1825. Resided at Williamstown.

PARDEE, DON A. Born at Wadsworth, Ohio, March 29, 1837. Entered the United States Naval Academy 1854. Resigned 1857. Admitted to the bar 1859. Served in the Union army during the war. Brevet brigadier general. Settled in New Orleans, La., 1865. Register in bankruptcy 1867. State judge of the second judicial district 1868-1880. Member of the Louisiana constitutional convention 1879. United States circuit judge for the fifth circuit, commissioned March 13, 1881.

PARKE, BENJAMIN. Born in New Jersey in 1779. Was the first attorney general for the territory of Indiana, and its first delegate in congress. Captain of cavalry company in Indian war, and participated in the battle of Tippecanoe. Was Indian agent under the territorial government, and member of the state constitutional convention. Was president of State Historical Society. United States district judge for the district of Indiana, commissioned March 6, 1817. Died July 12, 1835.

PARKER, ISAAC C. Born in Belmont county, Ohio, Oct. 15, 1838. Received academic education. A school teacher for four years. Admitted to the bar 1859. Removed to St. Joseph, Mo. City attorney 1862-1867. Served with the state troops during the war. Presidential elector 1864. State circuit judge 1868. Member of congress 1871-1875. Chief justice of Utah territory 1875. United States district judge for the western district of Arkansas, commissioned March 19, 1875. Was a celebrated judge in criminal cases, the number docketed having reached the enormous total of 13,490. Died Nov. 17, 1896.

PARLANGE, CHARLES. Born in New Orleans, La., July 23, 1851. Educated at home by private tutors during the war. Afterwards at Centenary College, Jackson, La. Was honorary United States commissioner for Louisiana to Paris Exposition in 1878. Delegate to constitutional convention in 1879. Member of state senate 1880-1885, when he resigned, to accept position of United States attorney for eastern district of Louisiana, for four years. Was elected lieutenant governor in 1892. Resigned 1893, to become justice of Louisiana supreme court. Resigned on being appointed United States district judge for eastern district Louisiana, commissioned Jan. 15, 1894.

PARRIS, ALBION KEITH. Born in Auburn, Oxford county, Me., Jan. 19, 1788. Was graduated at Dartmouth in 1806. Admitted to the bar in 1809. Began practice in Paris, Me. Prosecuting attorney for Oxford county, 1811. Member of legislature (Massachusetts) 1813-1814; of congress (Democrat) 1815-1819. United States district judge for the district of Maine, commissioned Jan. 28, 1818. Ceased to be district judge, Jan., 1822. Moved to Portland. Member of Maine constitutional convention 1819. Resigned Dec., 1821. Judge of probate for Cumberland county 1820. Governor 1821-1826. United States senator 1826. Resigned 1828. Judge of the supreme court of Maine 1828-1836. Second comptroller of the United States treasury 1836-1850. Retired to Portland 1850. Mayor 1852. Died there, Feb. 11, 1857.

PATERSON, WILLIAM. Born at sea 1745. His parents were Irish, and brought him to America when two years old. Was graduated at Princeton in 1763. Studied law with Richard Stockton. Admitted to the bar in 1769. Member of New Jersey constitutional convention, and of the legislative council. Attorney general for the state in 1776. Member of congress 1780-1781. Prominent in the federal constitutional convention of 1787, and introducer of the "New Jersey plan." United States senator 1789. Governor of New Jersey 1791. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned March 4, 1793. Died in Albany, N. Y., Sept. 19, 1806. LL. D., Harvard, 1806, and Dartmouth. Published a revised edition of the laws of New Jersey, by authority of the legislature.

PAUL, JOHN. Born in Rockingham county, Va., June 30, 1839. Served in the Confederate army during the Civil War. Was graduated in law at the University of Virginia, 1867. Commonwealth attorney 1870-1877. Member of legislature 1877. Member of congress 1881. United States district judge for the western district of Virginia, commissioned March 3, 1883.

PEABODY, GEORGE A. Provisional judge for the district of Louisiana, commissioned Oct. 20, 1862. Ceased to be judge, July 28, 1866.

PECK, JAMES H. Born in Tennessee. Removed to Missouri. Impeached in 1826, because of difficulties with Luke C. Lawless. Acquitted. United States district judge for the district of Missouri, commissioned April 5, 1822. Retired March 8, 1836. Died in St. Charles, Mo., May 1, 1837.

PENDLETON, NATHANIEL. Born in Culpepper county, Va., 1756. Was a major on Gen. Greene's staff in the Revolutionary War. Removed to Georgia, and studied law. United States district judge for the district of Georgia, commissioned Sept. 26, 1789. Ceased to be district judge in 1796. Removed to New York. Judge of Dutchess county, N. Y. He was a member of the federal constitutional convention in 1787, but did not sign that instrument. Was Hamilton's second in the fatal duel with Burr. Died in New York city, Oct. 20, 1821.

PENDLETON, PHILIP C. Born in Berkeley county, Va. (now W. Va.), Nov. 24, 1779. Was educated in Culpeper, Va., Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa., and Princeton, where he graduated, sharing first honors with the late Judge William Gaston, of North Carolina. United States district judge for the western district of Virginia, commissioned May 6, 1825. On account of his extreme diffidence, he resigned shortly afterwards. Died April 3, 1863.

PENNINGTON, WILLIAM SANDFORD. Born in Newark, N. J., 1757. Major of second New Jersey artillery in the Revolutionary War. Member of the legislature. Associate justice of the supreme court of New Jersey Feb. 28, 1804. United States district judge for the district of New Jersey 1815-1826. Commissioned June 19, 1815. Governor of New Jersey 1813-1815. Chancellor of New Jersey. Publisher of New Jersey Supreme Court Reports, (1803-1816.) Died in Newark, Sept. 26, 1826.

PENNYBACKER, ISAAC SAMUELS. Born in Shenandoah county, Va., Sept. 12, 1807. Educated at Washington College, Va. Studied law in the Winchester Law School. Practiced in Harrisburg, Va. Member of congress (Democrat) 1837. United States district judge for the western district of Virginia, commissioned April 23, 1839. Offered the place of attorney general by President Van Buren, but declined. United States senator 1845. Died in Washington, D. C., Jan. 12, 1847.

PETERS, RICHARD. Born at "Belmont," Philadelphia, June 22, 1744. Son of Judge William Peters. Was graduated at the College of Philadelphia (University of Pennsylvania) 1761. Admitted to the bar 1763. Register of admiralty 1771. Resigned on outbreak of the Revolution. Officer in the army. Member of the continental board of war June 13, 1776. Commissioner of war. Resigned 1781. Member of congress 1782-1783; of state assembly 1787; speaker 1788-1790. Speaker of state senate 1791. Declined comptrollership of the treasury on the formation of the federal government in 1789. United States district judge for the district of Pennsylvania, commissioned Jan. 12, 1792. Died at "Belmont," Philadelphia, August 22, 1828. Active in securing the passage of the act of secession by the British parliament for the Episcopal Church in America. Went to England in 1785 to secure the ordination of American bishops. Published Admiralty Decisions for the district of Pennsylvania, (1780-1807.) His estate "Belmont" is included in Fairmount park.

PHILLIPS, JOHN F. Born in Thrall's Prairie, Boone county, Mo., Dec. 31, 1834. His early training was on the farm, and at the select schools of the neighborhood. He matriculated at the Missouri State University in 1851. Entered Center College, Ky., in 1853, graduating from that institution in 1855. Returning home, he at once entered upon the study of law, and entered the office of Gen. John Clarke, of Fayette, Mo., in 1856. Was admitted to the bar in 1857. Engaged in the practice of the law at Georgetown, Mo. Was assistant presidential elector upon the Bell and Everett ticket, in 1860, and in 1861 was nominated as a delegate from the senatorial district to the state convention called to consider the relations of the states to the federal Union, making his canvass as a pronounced Union man. He recruited the 7th cavalry, and was commissioned as colonel of the regiment. Served in Missouri and Arkansas during the war, and was repeatedly recognized in field orders by division commanders for his gallantry and hard fighting. In 1864 he received special commendation of Maj. Gen. Pleasanton for gallant conduct, and was placed by Gen. Rosecrans in charge of the central district of Missouri, and was brevetted brigadier general by Gov. Willard P. Hall, but was not confirmed. At the close of the war he engaged in the practice of law at Sedalia, Mo., and soon after entered into partnership with Judge Russel Hicks. Hon. George G. Vest, afterwards United States senator from Missouri, was soon admitted to the firm, and Judge Hicks retired in 1869, so that for nearly 10 years thereafter the firm was Philips & Vest. Was a delegate to the presidential convention in Nov., 1868. Was Democratic candidate for congress in the same year, and was again nominated for congress in 1874 and 1876. Removed to Kansas City in the spring of 1882. Was supreme court commissioner in March, 1883, and was later appointed judge of the Kansas City court of appeals. United States district judge for the western district of Missouri, commissioned June 25, 1888. In 1877 he was a delegate from the United States to the Pan Presbyterian convention, at Edinburgh, Scotland. LL. D., Missouri State University, Center College, Ky., and Central College, Mo.

PICKERING, JOHN. Born in Newington, N. H., Sept. 22, 1737. Removed to Portsmouth. Graduated from Harvard 1761. Member of the provincial assembly before the Revolution. Member of the legislature during the Revolutionary period. Member of the New Hampshire constitutional convention 1781. Member of the conventions of 1791-1792, and of the convention of 1788, which ratified the federal constitution. Attorney general from Feb. 22, 1786, to June 5, 1787. Presidential elector 1788-1792. President of the state senate. Chief justice of the New Hampshire supreme court. United States district judge for the district of New Hampshire, commissioned Feb. 11, 1795. Removed in March, 1804, having become insane. Died in Portsmouth, N. H., April 11, 1805. LL. D., Dartmouth, 1792.

PITMAN, JOHN. Born in Providence, R. I., Feb. 23, 1785. Graduated from Rhode Island College, now Brown University, 1799, with degree of B. A. Admitted to the bar in

New York in 1806; in Kentucky in 1807. Removed to Kentucky, where he practiced until 1809, when he returned to Rhode Island. In 1812 he removed to Massachusetts, and, later, from there to New Hampshire, where he resided from 1816 to 1820, returning to his native city. United States district judge for the district of Rhode Island, commissioned Aug. 4, 1824. Died Nov. 17, 1864. United States district attorney for Rhode Island 1820-1824. President of the Rhode Island Society for the Encouragement of Domestic Industry 10 years. President of Providence Athenæum 1839-1857. Trustee Brown University 1828-1834. Fellow 1834-1864.

POPE, NATHANIEL. Born in Louisville, Ky., Jan. 5, 1784. Was graduated at Transylvania University, 1806. Began practice at St. Genevieve, Mo. Removed to Vandalia, and later to Springfield, Ill. Secretary of Illinois territory 1809. Delegate to congress 1816-1818. Register of the land office at Edwardsville, Ill., 1818. United States district judge for the district of Illinois, commissioned March 3, 1819. Died at St. Louis in 1849. Was instrumental in fixing the present northern boundary of Illinois.

POTTER, HENRY. Born in Granville county, N. C., 1765. United States circuit judge for the fifth circuit. Commissioned May 9, 1801. The act under which the appointment was made was repealed, to take effect July 1, 1802. United States district judge for the districts of North Carolina, commissioned April 7, 1802. Trustee of the University of North Carolina 1799. One of the revisors of the state statutes, (Laws of the State of North Carolina 1821.) Published "The Duties of a Justice of the Peace." Died in Fayetteville, N. Y., Dec. 20, 1857.

PRENTISS, SAMUEL. Born in Stonington, Conn., March 31, 1782. Removed to Worcester, Mass.; thence to Northfield, Mass. Studied law in Northfield and in Brattleboro, Vt. Admitted to the bar 1802. Began practice in Montpelier, Vt., 1803. Member of legislature 1824-1825. Chief justice of Vermont supreme court 1829. United States senator (Whig) 1831. Resigned April 11, 1842. United States district judge for the district of Vermont, commissioned April 3, 1842. Died in Montpelier, Jan. 15, 1857. LL. D., University of Vermont.

PUTNAM, WILLIAM LE BARON. Born in Bath, Me., May 26, 1835. Graduated at Bowdoin in 1855. Admitted to the bar in Bath, Me., 1858, and practiced at Portland. Mayor of Portland 1869. Twice nominated judge of the state supreme court, but declined. He was in Sept., 1887, appointed commissioner to settle the differences of the United States and Great Britain as to the rights of American fishermen in Canadian waters. LL. D., Bowdoin, 1884, and Brown, 1893. United States circuit judge for the first circuit, commissioned March 17, 1892.

RANDALL, ARCHIBALD. Born in Philadelphia, Pa., 1800. Admitted to the bar 1818. Judge of the court of common pleas at Philadelphia, 1834. United States district judge for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, commissioned March 8, 1842. His bankruptcy decisions are in the "Pennsylvania Law Journal," 1842-1846. Died at Philadelphia, June 8, 1846.

RANDOLPH, PETER. Descendant of the Randolphs, of Roanoke. Born in Virginia about 1780. Was educated at William and Mary College. Removed to Mississippi in 1820, and settled near Woodville. United States district judge for the district of Mississippi, commissioned June 25, 1823. Died Jan. 30, 1832.

RECTOR, JOHN B. Born in Jackson county, Ala., November 24, 1837. Graduated from Yale in 1859. Removed to Texas. Was elected district attorney in Austin in 1866. Appointed state district judge, thirty-first judicial district, in Feb., 1871. United States district judge for the northern district of Texas, commissioned March 30, 1892.

REED, JAMES H. Born Allegheny City, Pa., Sept. 10, 1853. Graduated from Western University in 1872. Commenced study of law with his uncle, Hon. David Reed, July 19, 1872. Admitted to bar, July 17, 1875. Formed partnership with C. P. Knox in 1881. United States district judge for the district of Pennsylvania, commissioned Feb. 20, 1891. Resigned Feb. 15, 1892. Resides at Shady Side, Pittsburg.

RICKS, AUGUSTUS J. Born in Stark county, Ohio, Feb. 10, 1843. Graduated from Massillon High School and Kenyon College. Enlisted as private in the 100th Ohio volunteer infantry in 1862. Later commissioned first lieutenant, and was specially recommended by Maj. Gen. J. D. Cox for a commission as captain and aid de camp. Removed to Knoxville, Tenn. Studied law with the late United States circuit judge, John Baxter, and entered into partnership with his preceptor. Was editor of the Knoxville Daily Chronicle, 1870, then the only Republican paper in the South below Louisville. Returned to Massillon in 1875, where he resumed the practice of law. Appointed clerk of the United States circuit court, March 20, 1878, and clerk of the United States district court, June 22, 1886, holding both positions until his appointment as United States district judge for the northern district of Ohio, commissioned July 2, 1889.

RINER, JOHN A. Born in Preble county, Ohio, 1850. Studied law at the University of Michigan, graduating in 1879. Removed to Wyoming. Was attorney for city of Cheyenne in 1881. Was United States district attorney for the territory of Wyoming, 1884. Elected a member of the upper house, tenth legislative assembly of Wyoming territory, in 1886. Elected member of the constitutional convention in 1889. Elected member of the state senate, 1890, but resigned before the legislature convened, to accept appointment as United States district judge for the district of Wyoming, commissioned Sept. 23, 1890.

RINGO, DANIEL. Born in Kentucky about 1800. Removed to Arkansas in 1830. Was clerk of Clark county from 1825 to 1830. Elected chief justice of the supreme court in 1836, which position he held until 1844. United States district judge for the district of Arkansas, commissioned Nov. 5, 1849, holding this position until the commencement of the civil war. Died at Little Rock, Sept. 3, 1873.

RIVES, ALEXANDER. Born in Nelson county, Va., June 17, 1806. Educated at Hampden-Sidney, Harvard, and University of Virginia. Settled in Albemarle county. Member of legislature 1855-1861. Judge of the Virginia court of appeals 1866. Resigned 1867. United States district judge for the western district of Virginia, commissioned Feb. 6, 1871. Resigned Aug. 1, 1882.

ROBERTSON, THOMAS BOLLING. Born near Petersburg, Va., 1773. Was graduated at William and Mary in 1807. Studied law. Appointed secretary for Louisiana territory, and removed to New Orleans. Member of congress (Democrat) 1812-1818. Governor of Louisiana. United States district judge for the district of Louisiana, commissioned May 26, 1824. His "Events in Paris" described the last days of the first empire, of which he was an eye-witness. He died at White Sulphur Springs, Va., Nov. 5, 1828.

ROSS, ERSKINE MAYO. Born at Belpre, Culpeper Co., Va., June 30, 1845. Graduated Virginia Military Institute. Was admitted to the bar at Los Angeles, Cal., in 1869. Justice of the supreme court of California 1879-1886. First United States district judge for southern district of California, commissioned Jan. 13, 1887. Appointed United States circuit judge for ninth circuit, Feb. 22, 1895.

ROSSELL, WILLIAM. Born in New Jersey in 1761. Judge of the supreme court of New Jersey. United States district judge for the district of New Jersey, commissioned Nov. 10, 1826. Died at Mt. Holly, June 20, 1840.

RUTLEDGE, JOHN. Born in Charleston, S. C., 1739. Studied law at the Temple, England. Member of the stamp act congress in 1765; the continental congress 1774. President of South Carolina March 27, 1776. Resigned 1778. Governor 1779, and proposed that South Carolina be neutral during the rest of the war, when the British advanced on Charleston. After the capture of Charleston in 1780 he accompanied Green's army.

Member of congress 1782-1784. In 1783 he was appointed minister plenipotentiary to Holland, but declined the office. Chancellor of South Carolina 1784. Member of federal constitutional convention in 1787. Offered the place of associate justice of the United States supreme court 1789, but declined, in order to become chief justice of South Carolina. Chief justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned July 1, 1795, and presided in the August term; but in December the senate refused to confirm his appointment, his mind having become diseased. Died in Charleston, July 23, 1800.

SABIN, CHAUNCEY BREWER. Born in Oneonta, Otsego county, N. Y., Aug. 6, 1824. Liberally educated. Admitted to the bar in Albany, Jan., 1846, and practiced there. Removed to Houston, Tex., in December, 1847. A Unionist during the Civil War. Fled the state in 1863. Resumed practice in Houston 1865. State judge for the third judicial district 1867-1868. Removed to Galveston 1871. State district judge 1871-1872. City attorney 1872. Member of legislature 1873. United States district judge for the eastern district of Texas, commissioned April 5, 1884. Ceased to be district judge, March 30, 1890.

SABIN, GEORGE M. Born in Cuyahoga county, Ohio, Sept. 18, 1835. Was graduated at Western Reserve College, Ohio, in 1856. Removed to Wisconsin, and studied law. Admitted to the bar in 1858. Enlisted, and served throughout the Civil War. Removed to Nevada 1868. United States district judge for the district of Nevada, commissioned July 26, 1882. Ceased to be district judge, May 13, 1890.

SAGE, GEORGE R. Born at Erie, Pa., Aug. 24, 1828. Removed to Ohio 1835. Was graduated at Granville College, Ohio, in 1849, and at the Cincinnati Law School in 1852. Practiced in Cincinnati 1852-1858. Practiced at Lebanon, Ohio, 1858-1865. Prosecuting attorney there. Returned to Cincinnati 1865. United States district judge for the southern district of Ohio, commissioned March 20, 1883.

SANBORN, WALTER H. Born at Epsom, N. H., Oct. 19, 1845. Was graduated from Dartmouth at the head of his class, June, 1867. Studied law with Senator Wadleigh, at Milford, N. H. Removed to St. Paul, Minn., 1870. Admitted to the Minnesota bar in 1871. Practiced law with his uncle, Gen. John B. Sanborn, from 1871 until his appointment as United States circuit judge for the eighth circuit, commissioned March 17, 1892. He was a member of the city council of St. Paul from 1878-1880 and 1885 to 1892. Was eminent commander of Damascus Commandery, No. 1, of the Knights Templar of St. Paul, from 1885 to 1888, and grand commander of the Knights Templar of the state of Minnesota in 1889. Was president of the St. Paul Bar Association in 1890. LL. D., Dartmouth, 1893.

SAWYER, LORENZO. Born in Le Roy, Jefferson county, N. Y., May 23, 1820. Removed to Pennsylvania; thence to Ohio. Educated at Western Reserve College. Admitted to the bar 1846. Removed to Illinois; to Wisconsin; thence to California in 1850. Worked in the mines. Practiced in Sacramento. Removed to San Francisco in 1853. City attorney 1854. Judge of the state district court 1862; of the state supreme court 1863. Chief justice 1868-1870. United States circuit judge for the ninth circuit, commissioned Jan. 10, 1870. LL. D., Hamilton, 1877. Trustee of Leland Stanford University. Died Sept. 7, 1891.

SEAMAN, WILLIAM H. Born in New Berlin, Wisconsin territory, Nov. 5, 1842. Educated in common schools, and served apprenticeship as printer. Served in the civil war 1st Wisconsin infantry. Studied law at Sheboygan, Wis. United States district judge of the eastern district of Wisconsin, commissioned April 3, 1893. Has been president of Wisconsin State Bar Association.

SETTLE, THOMAS. Son of Judge Thomas Settle of the supreme court of North Carolina. Born in Rockingham county, N. C., Jan. 23, 1831. Was graduated at the University of North Carolina in 1850. Admitted to the bar in 1854. Member of the legislature 1854-1859. Speaker 1859. Presidential elector (Democrat) 1856. Supported Douglass in 1860. Opposed secession. Captain in the Confederate army for the first year of the war. Solicitor for the fourth judicial circuit. Member of convention and speaker of the state senate (as a Republican) in 1865. Active in the reconstruction. Judge of the state supreme court 1868-1871. United States minister to Peru in 1871. Defeated for congress in 1872. President of the Republican national convention of 1872. Judge of the state supreme court 1873. Defeated for governor 1876. United States district judge for the northern district of Florida, commissioned Jan. 30, 1877. Died Dec. 1, 1888.

SEVERENS, HENRY F. Born at Rockingham, Vt., May 11, 1835. Fitted for college at Saxton's River Seminary, and graduated from Middlebury College in 1857. Admitted to the Vermont state bar in 1859. Removed to Michigan, and entered upon the practice of his profession in that state in 1860. United States district judge for the western district of Michigan, commissioned May 25, 1886.

SEWALL, DAVID. Born at York, Mass., (Me.,) 1735. Was graduated at Harvard in 1755. A classmate of John Adams. Began practice at York 1759. Justice of the peace 1762. Register of probate 1766. Active in the Revolution. Member of the legislature and councillor. Judge of the Massachusetts superior court 1777. United States district judge for the district of Maine, commissioned Sept. 26, 1789. Resigned Jan., 1818. LL. D., Bowdoin, 1812. Died at York, Me., Oct. 22, 1825.

SEYMOUR, AUGUSTUS SHERILL. Born in Ithaca, N. Y., Nov. 30, 1836. Was graduated at Hamilton College in 1857, and from the Columbia Law School in 1858. Practiced in New York city. Removed to Newbern, N. C. Criminal judge there 1868. Member of legislature 1868-1870. Member of the North Carolina constitutional convention of 1871. Member of legislature 1872-1874. Judge of state superior court 1874-1882. United States district judge for the eastern district of North Carolina, commissioned Feb. 21, 1882. Is the author of "Seymour's Digest."

SHEPLEY, GEORGE FOSTER. Son of Judge Ether Shepley, of the supreme court of Maine. Borne in Saco, Me., Jan. 1, 1819. Was graduated at Dartmouth in 1837. Studied law at Harvard. Began practice in Bangor, Me., in 1840. Removed to Portland 1844. United States district attorney for the district of Maine, 1848, 1853-1861. Member of the Democratic national convention in 1860. Colonel of Maine volunteers in 1861. Brigadier general 1862. Military governor of Louisiana 1862-1864. Commander of the military district of eastern Virginia 1864-1865. Military governor of Richmond when occupied by the Union troops. Declined an appointment as associate justice of the supreme court of Maine. United States circuit judge for the first circuit, commissioned Dec. 22, 1869. Died in Portland, July 20, 1878. LL. D., Dartmouth, 1876. His decisions are contained in Jabez Holmes' Reports.

SHERBURNE, JOHN SAMUEL. Born in Portsmouth, N. H., in 1757. Was graduated from Dartmouth in 1776. Studied law at Harvard. Practiced in Portsmouth. Was an officer in the Revolutionary war. United States district attorney for the district of New Hampshire, Sept. 26, 1789. Resigned Dec. 1, 1793, upon his election to congress. Again appointed United States district attorney Jan. 26, 1802, resigning March 26, 1804, upon his appointment as United States district judge for the district of New Hampshire. Died in Portsmouth, Aug. 2, 1830. His name was Samuel Sherburne, Jr., but by act of legislature, Dec. 31, 1789, it was changed to John Samuel Sherburne.

SHERMAN, CHARLES TAYLOR. Born at Norwalk, Conn., Feb. 3, 1811. Brother of General W. T. Sherman and Senator John Sherman. Removed to Lancaster, Ohio, in infancy. Was graduated from Ohio University, at Athens, Ohio, in 1830. Studied law at Dayton and Mansfield, Ohio. Admitted to the bar in 1833. Practiced at Mansfield. Commander of a drilling camp at Mansfield during the Civil War. Member of commission to adjudicate war claims at St. Louis, Mo. Government director of the Union Pacific Railroad. United States district judge for the northern district of Ohio, commissioned March 2, 1867. Resigned Nov. 28, 1873. Died at Cleveland, Ohio, Jan. 1, 1879.

SHIELDS, WILLIAM BAYARD. Native of Delaware. An early emigrant to Mississippi. He participated as attorney general in the arrest of Aaron Burr. Was a leading member of the legislature. United States district judge for the district of Mississippi, commissioned April 20, 1818. Ceased to be district judge in 1823.

SHIPMAN, NATHANIEL. Born in Southbury, Conn., Aug. 22, 1828. Removed to Norwich 1836; thence to Jewett City 1842. Was graduated from Yale in 1848. Admitted to the bar 1850. Removed to Hartford 1851. Member of legislature 1857. Governor Buckingham's secretary 1858-1862. United States district judge for the district of Connecticut, commissioned April 16, 1873. United States circuit judge for the second circuit, commissioned March 17, 1892. LL. D., Yale, 1886.

SHIPMAN, WILLIAM D. Born in Chester, Conn., Dec. 29, 1818. Educated at the common school. Was engaged in mechanical labor from age of 17 to 24. Afterwards taught school until 1850, during which time he studied law. Admitted to the bar in the latter year in Middlesex county, Conn., and settled in East Haddam, in that state. Elected judge of probate for the district of East Haddam in 1852. Member of the lower house of the legislature in 1853. Same year was appointed United States district attorney for the district of Connecticut, and held that office until March 12, 1860, when he was commissioned United States district judge for the same district. Resigned May 1, 1873, and became the senior partner of the firm of Barlow, Larocque & MacFarland, of New York City. A. M. and LL. D., Trinity College, Hartford.

SHIRAS, Jr., GEORGE. Born in Pittsburg, Pa., Jan. 26, 1832. Educated at the Ohio University and at Yale, from which institution he was graduated in 1853. Was admitted to the Allegheny county bar in 1856. Practiced in Pittsburg. Was presidential elector in 1888. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, Oct. 7, 1892. LL. D., Yale, 1883.

SHIRAS, OLIVER P. Born at Pittsburg, Pa., Oct. 22, 1833. Was graduated from the University of Ohio in 1853. Entered the scientific school of Yale University. Was graduated from Yale Law School in 1856. Removed to Dubuque, Iowa, 1856. Admitted to the bar there. Aid-de-camp and judge advocate in the frontier army 1862-1863. Resumed practice at Dubuque. The first United States district judge for the northern district of Iowa, commissioned Aug. 4, 1882. LL. D., Yale, 1886.

SIMONTON, CHARLES H. Born at Charleston, S. C., July 11, 1829. Educated at the high school in Charleston, and at South Carolina College, from which institution he was graduated in 1849. Was admitted to the bar in 1852. A member of the legislature from 1856 to 1860. Entered Confederate army in 1861. Was member of constitutional convention of the state in 1865, and was elected to the legislature and made speaker of the house in the same year. Again elected to the legislature in 1877, and was chairman of the judiciary committee of the house until 1886. United States district judge for the district of South Carolina, commissioned Sept. 3, 1886. Appointed United States circuit judge for the fourth circuit, Dec. 19, 1893. LL. D., South Carolina College, and D. C. L., University of the South.

SITGREAVES, JOHN. Born in New Berne, N. C., about 1740. Studied law and practiced there. An officer in the Revolutionary War. Member of congress 1784-1785; of the legislature 1786-1789. United States district judge for the district of North Carolina, commissioned Dec. 20, 1790. Ceased to be district judge, Feb. 13, 1801. Died in Halifax, N. C., March 4, 1802.

SKINNER, ROGER. United States district judge for the northern district of New York, commissioned Nov. 14, 1819. Ceased to be district judge, Aug. 27, 1825.

SMALLEY, DAVID A. Born in Middlebury, Addison county, Vt., April 6, 1809. Received academic education. Admitted to the bar in Franklin county, in 1831, and practiced there. Removed to Burlington. Member of legislature 1842. Vice president of Democratic national convention at Baltimore, 1852. Collector of customs for Vermont 1853. Delegate to the Cincinnati convention of 1857. United States district judge for the district of Vermont, commissioned Feb. 3, 1857. Resigned March, 1877. Died March 10, 1877, at Burlington.

SMITH, CALEB BLOOD. Born in Boston, Mass., April 16, 1808. Removed to Ohio 1814. Educated at Cincinnati and Miami Colleges. Studied law in Cincinnati and Connorsville, Ind. Admitted to the bar 1828. Practiced in Connorsville and edited the Sentinel. Member of legislature 1833-1836. Speaker 1836. Member of congress (Whig) 1843-1849. Presidential elector 1840 and 1856. Mexican claims commissioner. Resumed practice in 1850 in Cincinnati. Removed to Indianapolis. Influential in procuring Lincoln's nomination in 1860. Secretary of the interior 1861. United States district judge for the district of Indiana, commissioned Dec. 22, 1862. Died in Indianapolis, Jan. 7, 1864.

SMITH, JEREMIAH. Born in Peterborough, N. H., Nov. 29, 1759. Enlisted in the Revolutionary army. Fought at Bennington under Stark. Was graduated at Rutgers in 1780. Admitted to the bar in Dover, N. H. Member of New Hampshire constitutional convention 1791-1792. Member of congress (Federalist) 1791-1797. United States district attorney for the district of New Hampshire 1798-1801. United States circuit judge for the first circuit, commissioned Feb. 20, 1801. The act under which the appointment was made was repealed, to take effect July 1, 1802. Chief justice New Hampshire superior court of judicature 1802-1809. Governor of New Hampshire 1809. Presidential elector 1809. Trustee of Phillips Exeter Academy. Member of State Historical Society. LL. D., Dartmouth, 1804; Harvard, 1807. Chief justice New Hampshire supreme judicial court 1813-1816. Patron and friend of Daniel Webster. Died in Dover, Sept. 21, 1842.

SPEER, EMORY. Born at Cullodea, Ga., Sept. 3, 1848. Was graduated at the University of Georgia in 1869. Served in the Confederate army. Began practice at Athens, Ga., 1869. Solicitor general for the western judicial circuit of the state 1873. Resigned in 1876. Member of congress 1879-1883. Trustee of the University of Georgia 1877-1885. Now dean law faculty Mercer University. United States district judge for the southern district of Georgia, commissioned Feb. 13, 1885. Author of work on "Removal of Causes."

SPRAGUE, PELEG. Born in Duxbury, Mass., April 27, 1793. Was graduated at Harvard in 1812. Studied in the Litchfield (Conn.) Law School. Admitted to the bar 1815. Practiced in Augusta, Me., and afterwards at Hallowell. Member of the Maine legislature 1820-1821; of congress (Whig) 1825-1829. United States senator 1829. Resigned Jan. 1, 1835, and practiced in Boston. Presidential elector (Whig) 1840. United States district judge for the district of Massachusetts, commissioned July 16, 1841. Retired March, 1865. LL. D., Harvard, 1847. Died in Boston, Oct. 13, 1880. His "Decisions in Admiralty," etc., are edited by F. E. Parker.

STEPHENS, WILLIAM. Born at Bulie, near Savannah, Ga., in 1752. At the beginning of the Revolutionary war he was appointed the first attorney general of Georgia, and was colonel of the Chatham county militia. Has repeatedly filled the office of chief magistrate of the city of Savannah. Was judge of the superior court of Georgia for several years. United States district judge for the district of Georgia, commissioned Oct. 22, 1801. Died in the city of Savannah, Aug. 6, 1819. He was at one time president of the Union Society, and also held the office of grand master Mason for the state of Georgia.

STOKES, JOHN. Born in North Carolina. Brother of Gov. Montford Stokes, of North Carolina. Colonel in the Revolutionary army. Member of state legislature in 1786. United States district judge for the district of North Carolina, commissioned Aug. 3, 1790. Died at Fayetteville, N. C., in Oct., 1790, after holding his first court. Stokes county was named for him.

STORY, JOSEPH. Born in Marblehead, Mass., Sept. 18, 1779. Was graduated at Harvard in 1798. Studied law under Samuel Sewall and Samuel Putnam. Began practice in Salem, Mass., 1801. Member of legislature 1805, and Republican leader in that body. Defended the embargo in 1808 as a temporary measure. Member of congress 1808, and secured the repeal of the embargo. Speaker of the Massachusetts house of representatives in 1811. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned Nov. 18, 1811, being then 32 years old. He had great influence upon the development of American admiralty, prize, and patent law, and, with Kent, of equity jurisprudence. His charges to the grand juries in 1819 were influential in stopping the slave trade in New England. Wrote the opinion in the Dartmouth College Case. Denounced the Missouri compromise. Member of Massachusetts constitutional convention in 1820. First "Dane Professor" of law at Harvard, 1829. Removed to Cambridge. A popular and able teacher. Declined the chief justiceship of Massachusetts in 1831. Presided over the United States supreme court in the interregnum between Marshall and Taney, and during Taney's illness in 1844. Marshall wished Story to succeed him as chief justice. Overseer of Harvard 1818. LL. D., Harvard, 1821; Brown, 1815; Dartmouth, 1824. A bank president in Salem for many years. Author of many legal works, among them "Bailments," "The Constitution," "Equity Jurisdiction," "Equity Pleading," "Agency," "Partnership." His works are of high authority in America, in England, and on the European continent. His decisions are contained in the reports of Cranch, Wheaton, and Howard. Next to Marshall, the greatest judge of the formative period of our federal jurisprudence. Died in Cambridge, Sept. 10, 1845.

STORY, WILLIAM. Born in Brookfield, Wis., April, 1844. Was educated in his native city and at Salem, Mass. Graduated from the University of Michigan in 1864. Enlisted in the 39th Wisconsin volunteer infantry, and at the close of the war entered the law office of Carter, Pitkin & Davis, of Milwaukee. Removed to Fayetteville, Ark., in 1866. Appointed to the bench of the state circuit court in 1867, and again to the same position in 1868, on the adoption of a new state constitution. United States district judge for the western district of Arkansas, commissioned March 3, 1871. Resigned in 1874, removing to Colorado to engage in the practice of the law. In 1890 he was elected lieutenant governor of Colorado. Resides at Ouray. His father was a nephew of Hon. Joseph Story, for 24 years associate justice of the supreme court of the United States.

STRONG, WILLIAM. Born in Somers, Tolland county, Conn., May 6, 1808. Educated at the Plainfield Academy, and was graduated at Yale in 1828. A teacher at Burlington, N. J., where he studied law under Garret D. Wall. Spent six months in the Yale Law School. Admitted to the bar in Pennsylvania in 1832. Settled in Reading. Member of congress (Democrat) 1847-1851. Chairman of committee on elections. Justice of the Pennsylvania supreme court 1857. His opinions are contained in volumes 30-60 Pennsylvania State Reports. Resigned 1868, and practiced in Philadelphia. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned April 4, 1870. Assigned to the third circuit. Resigned Dec. 14, 1880. Member of the electoral commission 1877. Prominent in the Presbyterian Church. President of the American Tract Society. Lectured in the University of Pennsylvania, and in the Columbian University, Washington, D. C. LL. D., Lafayette, 1867; Yale and Princeton, 1870.

SULLIVAN, JOHN. Born in Somersworth, part of Old Dover, N. H., Feb. 17, 1740. Of Irish parentage. Practiced law in Durham, N. H. Member of first continental congress in 1774. Member of first college of presidential electors in New Hampshire. Brigadier general in the Continental army 1775. Major general 1776. He was captured in the battle of Long Island, but was soon exchanged. In command in Rhode Island 1778, and in Iroquois county 1779. Resigned. Member of congress 1780-1781. Resumed practice in New Hampshire. Member of state constitutional convention 1781. Major general of the New Hampshire militia 1784-1786. Attorney general of state 1782-1786. Councillor 1785. Speaker of house 1785-1786. President of New Hampshire 1786, 1787, and 1789. Saved his state from anarchy at the time of an uprising similar to the rebellion of Shays in Massachusetts. Commissioned to settle disputes with Vermont. President of convention, and active in securing New Hampshire's ratification of the federal constitution in 1788. United States district judge for the district of New Hampshire, commissioned Sept. 26, 1789. Died in Durham, N. H., Jan. 23, 1795, while holding office. LL. D., Harvard, 1780; Dartmouth, 1789.

SWAN, HENRY H. Born in Detroit, Mich., Oct. 2, 1840. Educated at the University of Michigan. Studied law in Stockton, Cal., and Detroit, Mich. Was admitted to the bar in Oct., 1867. Was assistant United States district attorney for the eastern district of Michigan from 1870 to 1877. United States district judge for the eastern district of Michigan, Jan. 21, 1891. Lecturer on admiralty law, University of Michigan.

SWAYNE, CHARLES. Born at Guyencourt, New Castle county, Del., Aug. 10, 1842. Educated at the public schools and higher academy. Taught in high school from 1864 to 1870. Was graduated from the law department of the University of Pennsylvania, June, 1871. Admitted to the Philadelphia bar in the same month. Admitted to the bar of the supreme court of Pennsylvania in 1873, and of the United States in 1876. Removed to Florida in March, 1885. Was a candidate on the Republican ticket for supreme judge in the state of Florida, and was defeated. United States district judge for the northern district of Florida, commissioned May 17, 1889.

SWAYNE, NOAH HAYNES. Born in Culpepper county, Va., Dec. 7, 1804. Educated in Waterford, Va. Studied law in Warrenton. Admitted to the bar 1823. Removed to Coshocton, Ohio. Prosecuting attorney 1826-1829. Member of legislature, (Jackson Democrat.) United States district attorney for Ohio 1831-1841. Removed to Columbus 1831. Declined the place of presiding judge of common pleas in 1833. Member of a commission to restore the credit of the state, and of another to settle the Michigan boundary line. Joined the Republican party at its formation. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned Jan. 24, 1862. Resigned July 24, 1881. LL. D., Dartmouth and Marietta, 1863; Yale, 1865. Died in New York city, June 8, 1884.

SWING, PHILIP B. Born in Miami township, Clermont county, Ohio, Oct. 23, 1820. Was educated at the common schools of his county. Prosecuting attorney in 1847. United States district judge for the southern district of Ohio, commissioned March 30, 1871. Died at Batavia, Ohio, Oct. 30, 1882.

TAFT, WILLIAM HOWARD. Born in Cincinnati, Ohio, Sept. 15, 1857. Was graduated from Yale in 1878. As second in his class, delivered the Latin oration. Was also class orator, and delivered his class oration. Studied law at Cincinnati Law School, and divided first prize on graduation. Was admitted to the bar in May, 1880. Was appointed assistant prosecuting attorney of Hamilton county, Ohio, in Jan., 1881. Resigned in March, 1882, to become United States collector of internal revenue for the first Ohio district. Resigned to resume the practice of the law in Jan., 1883. Was appointed assistant county solicitor of Hamilton county, Jan., 1885. Resigned to become judge of the superior court of Cincinnati in March, 1887, by appointment of Gov. Foraker. Was elected to the same bench for five years in April, 1888. Resigned in Feb., 1890, to become solicitor general of the United States. United States circuit judge for the sixth circuit, commissioned March 17, 1892. LL. D., Yale, 1873.

TAIT, CHARLES. Born in Louisa county, Va., 1768. Removed to Georgia. Admitted to the bar. State judge of the western circuit of Georgia 1803-1809. United States senator 1809-1819. Removed to Alabama. The first United States district judge for the district of Alabama, commissioned May 13, 1820. United States district judge for the northern and southern districts, commissioned March 10, 1824. Resigned in 1826. Died in Wilcox county, Ala., Oct. 7, 1835.

TALLMADGE, MATTHIAS BURNET. Born in Stanford, Dutchess county, N. Y., March 1, 1774. Was graduated at Yale in 1795. Studied law with Ambrose Spencer, the chief justice of New York, at Hudson. Practiced in Herkimer. Member of the New York legislature. United States district judge for the district of New York, commissioned June 12, 1805. Removed to New York city. United States district judge for the northern district of New York, commissioned April 9, 1814. Married a daughter of Gov. George Clinton. Prominent in the Baptist Church. Died in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., Oct. 7, 1819.

TANEY, ROGER BROOKE. Born in Calvert county, Md., March 17, 1777. Son of a Roman Catholic planter. Was graduated at Dickinson in 1795. Read law at Annapolis with Judge Jeremiah Chase. Admitted to the bar in 1799. Member of legislature (Federalist) 1799, the youngest in that body. Removed to Frederick in 1801. Married a sister of Francis Scott Key in 1806. Defended Gen. Wilkinson before a court-martial in 1811, and became unpopular thereby. A War Federalist, during the war of 1812. Member of the legislature in 1816. Increased his unpopularity by defending a Methodist minister charged with inciting insurrection among the blacks. Removed to Baltimore 1822, and became the leader of the bar there. Became a Jackson Democrat in 1824. Counsel for Maryland in the Lord Baltimore Case before the United States supreme court. Attorney general of Maryland 1827. Attorney general of the United States Dec. 27, 1831. When Duane refused to remove the government deposits from the United States bank he was removed, and Taney made secretary of the treasury in his place, (in September, 1833.) For this he was bitterly attacked, and the senate refused to confirm his nomination June 23, 1834. Nominated as associate justice of the United States supreme court in January, 1835, but the senate refused to confirm him. Nominated chief justice Dec. 28, 1835, and confirmed by a vote of 29 to 15; commissioned March 15, 1836. Assigned to the fourth circuit. Sat on circuit in April, and presided over the full court in January, 1837, succeeding Chief Justice Marshall in the office. His accession to the bench was followed by a tendency to extend the rights of the states rather than those of the federal government, in contrast with the decisions of Marshall. He revised the latter's decision in Briscoe v. Bank of Kentucky, touching the right of a state to establish a state bank. Justice Story soon after resigned. Taney held in a dissenting opinion in the Massachusetts and Rhode Island boundary dispute that the court had no right to settle questions of jurisdiction between states. Wrote the opinion in the Dred Scott Case. His decision in the case of Booth, a fugitive slave, overruling a decision of the Wisconsin supreme court, was declared "void and of no force" by the legislature of that state. He denied the jurisdiction of the court to compel by mandamus a governor of a state to deliver up a fugitive slave. In the Case of Merryman he denied the right of the president to suspend the writ of habeas corpus. Died in Washington, D. C., Oct. 12, 1864. His opinions in the supreme court contained in Howard's and Black's United States Reports. Those delivered on circuit are reported by Campbell.

TAPPAN, BENJAMIN. Born in Northampton, Mass., May 25, 1773. Apprenticed to learn engraving. Studied law. Began practice in Steubenville, Ohio, in 1799. Member of legislature 1803. Served as aid in the war of 1812. Presiding judge of the fifth Ohio circuit. United States district judge for the district of Ohio, commissioned Oct. 12, 1833. Ceased to be district judge, Dec. 26, 1833. Presidential elector 1833. United States senator (Democrat) 1839-1845. Joined the Free-Soil party at its beginning. Died in Steubenville, April 12, 1857.

TAYLOR, GEORGE K. United States circuit judge for the fourth circuit, commissioned Feb. 20, 1801. The act under which the appointment was made was repealed, to take effect July 1, 1802.

TEAYER, AMOS M. Born in Chautauqua county, N. Y., Oct. 10, 1841. Was graduated from Hamilton College in 1862. Entered the army as second lieutenant, 112th New York volunteers, July, 1862. Commissioned first lieutenant United States signal corps in 1863. Studied law in St. Louis, Mo., and was admitted to the bar in March, 1868. Elected circuit judge of the eighth judicial circuit, state of Missouri, in Nov., 1876. Re-elected in Nov., 1882. United States district judge for the eastern district of Missouri, commissioned Feb. 26, 1887. United States circuit judge for the eighth circuit, commissioned Aug. 9, 1894. LL. D., Hamilton College, 1892.

THOMAS, ALFRED D. Born in Walworth county, Wis., Aug. 11, 1837. Read law with Judge Olauson H. Barnes at Delevan, Wis., and Butler & Cotterill, at Milwaukee. Educated at Brown University, graduating in the class of 1861. Was married Oct., 1864, to Miss Fanny C. Barnes, daughter of Judge Barnes, territorial judge of Dakota. Was district attorney of Walworth county from 1872-1878. Removed to North Dakota in the latter year. United States district judge for the district of North Dakota, commissioned Feb. 25, 1890. Died Aug. 8, 1896.

THOMPSON, SMITH. Born in Stamford, Dutchess county, N. Y., Jan. 17, 1768. Was graduated at Princeton in 1788. Taught in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and studied law there under Chancellor Kent. Admitted to the bar in 1792. Member of legislature 1800; of the state constitutional convention 1801. Declined the office of attorney for the middle district of New York 1801. Associate justice of state supreme court 1802-1814. Chief justice 1814-1818. Secretary of the navy 1818. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned Sept. 1, 1823. LL. D., Yale and Princeton, 1824; Harvard, 1835. Died in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., Dec. 18, 1843.

THRUSTON, BUCKNER. Born near Winchester, Va., in 1763. Son of Charles Mynn Thruston, a distinguished Revolutionary officer. Removed to Kentucky in early life. Received a classical education. Studied law, and was admitted to the bar, practicing in Frankfort. Was appointed United States judge for the territory of Orleans, which he declined on his election to the United States senate from Kentucky. He served in the senate from December 2, 1805, to July 1, 1809, when he resigned, on being appointed United States circuit judge for the District of Columbia, commissioned Dec. 14, 1809. Died in Washington, D. C., Aug. 30, 1845.

TILGHMAN, WILLIAM. Born in Talbot county, Md., Aug. 12, 1756. Studied law under Benjamin Chew. Admitted to the Maryland bar 1783. Member of legislature. Practiced in Philadelphia after 1793. Chief judge of the United States circuit court for the third circuit, commissioned March 3, 1801. The act under which the appointment was made was repealed, to take effect July 1, 1802. President of the court of common pleas 1805. Chief justice of the Pennsylvania supreme court 1806. By order of the legislature, published the English statutes in force in Pennsylvania 1809. President of the American Philosophical Society 1824. Died in Philadelphia, April 30, 1832. LL. D., Harvard, 1814. A memoir of him is to be found in 15 Serg. & R. 437.

TODD, THOMAS. Born in King and Queen county, Va., Jan. 23, 1765. Was educated at Manchester, where he resided until 1782. Was a member of the Manchester troop of cavalry in 1781, during the invasion of Virginia by Arnold and Philips. Was a matriculate in 1782-1783 of Liberty Hall Academy, now Washington and Lee University, Va. Removed to Danville, Ky., to engage in the practice of the law. Was a tutor in 1783, studying law at night. He was a member of all the 10 conventions held by the people from 1784 to 1792. Was clerk of the federal court for the district of Kentucky for the same period. Was appointed lieutenant colonel commandant of Lincoln county, June, 1792. Appointed clerk of the court of appeals, serving until 1801, when he was appointed judge of the court of appeals, and chief justice in 1806. Associate justice of the supreme court of United States, commissioned March 3, 1807. Died at Frankfort, Ky., Feb. 7, 1826.

TOULMIN, HARRY T. Born in Mobile county, Ala., 1838. Educated at the common schools, and at the universities of Alabama and Virginia. Began the practice of the law in Mobile in 1860. Was presidential elector in 1868. Member of the state legislature in 1870 and 1872. Was judge of the state circuit court from 1874 to 1882. United States district judge for the southern district of Alabama, commissioned Jan. 13, 1887.

TOWNSEND, WILLIAM K. Born in New Haven, Conn. Was graduated at Yale in 18—, and at the Yale law school in 18—. United States district judge for the district of Connecticut, commissioned March 28, 1892. He holds the Edward J. Phelps professorship of law in Yale University.

TREAT, SAMUEL. A cousin of Judge Samuel Hubbel Treat. Born in Portsmouth, N. H., Dec. 17, 1815. Was educated at the public schools of his native town, and at the age of 16 was employed as assistant teacher in the high school. Was graduated from Harvard in 1837. Commenced the study of the law in 1838 in the office of Jeremiah Mason and Charles B. Goodrich; also was engaged in teaching at the same time in the Weld school at Jamaica Plains, near Boston. Was elected to take charge of the Temple Hill Academy in the Genesee Valley, N. Y., and while there continued his legal studies under Gov. John Young. Resigned in November, 1840, and in 1841 removed to St. Louis. Was admitted to the bar, but devoted several years thereafter to editorial work. Spent the winter of 1848 in Cuba. Returning to St. Louis, he was appointed judge of the court of common pleas, Aug., 1849. Was elected to the same office in Aug., 1851, and held office until 1857. United States district judge for the eastern district of Missouri, commissioned March 3, 1857. Resigned March 5, 1887. Was member of the corporation of the Washington University of St. Louis. LL. D., Washington University, 1879.

TREAT, SAMUEL HUBBEL. A descendant of Robert Treat, the colonial governor of Connecticut. Born in Plainville, Otsego county, N. Y., June 21, 1811. Studied law and was admitted to the bar in Richfield. Walked to Springfield, Ill., in 1834, and began the practice of law there. Judge of state circuit court 1839-1841; of state supreme court 1841-1855. United States district judge for the southern district of Illinois, commissioned March 3, 1855. Retired Feb. 15, 1887. Died in Springfield, Ill., March 27, 1887. Prominent in the Episcopal Church. Compiler with W. B. Scates and R. S. Blackwell of Illinois Statutes.

TRIGG, CONNALLY F. Born in Abingdon, Va., March 8, 1810. Removed to Bristol, Tenn., and engaged in the practice of the law. United States district judge for the districts of Tennessee, commissioned July 17, 1862. Died in Bristol, Tenn., April 25, 1880.

TRIMBLE, ROBERT. Born in Berkeley county, Va., in 1771. His parents removed to Kentucky when he was three years old. He was self-educated. Was a school teacher for a time. Began practice in Paris, Ky., 1803. Member of legislature 1803. Judge of the Kentucky court of appeals 1808; chief justice 1810. United States district attorney for the district of Kentucky 1813. United States district judge for the district of Kentucky, commissioned Jan. 31, 1817. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned May 9, 1826. Died Aug. 25, 1828.

TROUPE, ROBERT. Born in New York city in 1757. Was graduated at Columbia in 1774. Studied law under John Jay. Aid in the Revolutionary army. Captured in the battle of Long Island, and confined on the prison-ship "Jersey." Secretary of the board of war 1778-1779. Completed his law studies with Judge William Paterson, of New Jersey. A Federalist in politics. United States district judge for the district of New York, commissioned Dec. 10, 1796. Resigned in April, 1798. Was a member of the state legislature. Published a letter in 1822 on the lake canal policy of New York; "Vindication of the Claim of Elkanah Watson," in 1821; "Remarks on Trinity Church Bill," in 1813. Died in New York city, Jan. 14, 1832.

TRUITT, WARREN. Born in Green county, Ill., July 4, 1846. Entered McKendree College at Lebanon, Ill., graduating in 1868, ranking high in mathematics and philosophy. Commenced the study of the law in the office of Judge Snider, of Belleville, Ill. Was admitted to the bar in 1870. Removed to Oregon in 1871, locating in Polk county. Was elected judge in 1874, and, after serving four years, declined a renomination. Was a member of the legislature in 1883. Was on the Republican state ticket in 1884, and was selected as electoral messenger to carry the presidential vote of Oregon to Washington City. Was appointed register of the land office at Lake View, Or., in 1885. Again appointed register of the land office at Lake View, in 1889. United States district judge for the territory of Alaska, commissioned Jan. 15, 1892. His successor was appointed Nov. 8, 1895. He is at present engaged in the practice of the law in San Francisco, Cal.

TUCKER, ST. GEORGE. Born in Port Royal, Bermuda, July 10, 1752. Removed to Virginia in 1771. Was graduated from William and Mary College in 1772. Studied law in the office of George Wythe. Was admitted to the bar, April 4, 1774. Served in the Revolutionary army on the staff of Gen. Nelson. Was major of militia, Feb. 25, 1781. Was wounded at Guilford Court House. Was lieutenant colonel, Sept. 12, 1781. Member of the privy council of the state in 1781-1782. Member of the Annapolis convention of 1786-1788. Was judge of the general court 1787-1804. Was professor of law at William and Mary 1789-1804. President judge of the Virginia court of appeals 1804-1813. United States district judge for the district of Virginia, commissioned Jan. 19, 1813. Resigned June 30, 1825. Was author of "A Dissertation on Slavery; with a Proposal for a Gradual Abolition of it in the State of Virginia" (Philadelphia, 1796; New York, 1861); "Probationary Odes of Jonathan Pindar, Esq." (Philadelphia, 1796); "How Far the Common Law of England is the Common Law of United States"; "Commentaries on Blackstone," five volumes (Philadelphia, 1804); essays, poems, plays, etc. Died at Edgewood, near Warminster, Nelson county, Va., Nov. 10, 1827. LL.D., William and Mary, 1790.

TURNER, EZEKIEL B. Born at Putney, Vt., May 24, 1825. Was educated at a local academy. Removing to Michigan in 1843. Admitted to the bar, Jan. 14, 1850. Prosecuting attorney for St. Joseph county 1850. Removed to Texas 1853. District attorney for the western district of Texas 1866. Attorney general of Texas under the reconstruction acts. State judge for the thirty-second judicial district 1871-1876; sixteenth judicial district 1876-1880. United States district judge for the western district of Texas, commissioned Nov. 18, 1880. Died at Austin, June 2, 1888.

TYLER, JOHN. Born in James City, Va., Feb. 28, 1747. Was educated at William and Mary College. Studied law in the office of Robert Carter Nichols. Was judge of the state admiralty court in 1776, but resigned to accept a seat in the legislature 1778. Was speaker of the house of delegates during the Revolution. Was re-elected judge of the state admiralty court in 1786, and was also judge of the state supreme court. Was vice president of the Virginia convention in 1788. Was elected judge of the general court of Virginia in the latter year. Was elected governor of Virginia in 1808. United States district judge for the district of Virginia, commissioned Jan. 7, 1811. Died Jan. 6, 1813.

UNDERWOOD, JOHN CURTISS. Born in Litchfield, Herkimer county, N. Y., in 1808. Was graduated at Hamilton in 1832. Removed to Clark county, Va. Married a cousin of Gen. Stonewall Jackson. Member of the Republican national convention of 1856. He became unpopular in Virginia, and removed to New York in 1860. Refused consulship to Callao, Peru, 1861. Fifth auditor of the treasury 1861. United States district judge for the district of Virginia, commissioned March 27, 1863. Refused to admit Jefferson Davis to bail, June, 1866. Upheld the confiscation acts and the civil rights of negroes. Died in Washington, D. C., Dec. 7, 1873.

VAN NESS, WILLIAM PETER. Born in Ghent, N. Y., 1778. Was graduated at Columbia, 1797. Settled in New York city. Friend of Aaron Burr, and his second in the Burr-Hamilton duel, for which he was hated by the Federalists. United States district judge for the southern district of New York, commissioned May 27, 1812. Died in New York City, Nov. 7, 1826. Published "An Examination of the Charges against Aaron Burr," "Laws of New York, with Notes," (with the collaboration of John Woodworth,) and "Jackson's First Invasion of Florida."

WAITE, MORRISON REMICK. Son of Chief Justice Waite, of Connecticut, (1787-1869.) Born in Lyme, Conn., Nov. 29, 1816. Was graduated at Yale in the famous class of 1837, of which William M. Everts, Benjamin Silliman, and Samuel J. Tilden were members. Studied law in his father's office. Completed his legal education in the office of Samuel M. Young, of Maumee City, Ohio, whose partner he became after his admission to the bar, in 1839. The firm removed to Toledo, Ohio, in 1850. He formed a partnership with his brother, Richard. Leader of the Ohio bar. Member of the legislature 1849. Counsel for the United States, with Caleb Cushing and William M. Everts, before the Geneva arbitration commission, 1871-1872. (His argument was published.) Member and president of the Ohio constitutional convention of 1874, elected by both parties. Chief justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned April 1, 1874. Many great questions were before the court during his term, among them the war amendments, the civil rights act, the legal tender acts, the Virginia "readjustment" acts. He was assigned to the fourth circuit, including Virginia and the Carolinas, and was very popular with the bar in those states. LL. D., Yale, 1872; Kenyon, 1874; University of Ohio, 1879. Died in Washington, D. C., March 23, 1888.

WALLES, LEONARD B. Born in Wilmington, Del., Nov. 26, 1823. Was graduated at Yale in 1845. Admitted to the bar in 1848. Practiced in Wilmington. Judge of the state superior court for New Castle county 1864. Resigned 1884. United States district judge for the district of Delaware, commissioned March 20, 1884.

WALKER, JONATHAN H. Born in Cumberland county, Pa., in 1756. Was educated at Dickinson College. Graduated from that institution in 1787. Studied law at Carlisle with Stephen Duncam, and in 1776 joined the colonial army under Gen. St. Clair, and was sent to support Arnold in the expedition against Quebec. He also took part in the campaign against the Indians in western Pennsylvania in 1779. Was appointed president judge of the fourth judicial district of Pennsylvania, March 1, 1806. United States district judge for the western district of Pennsylvania, commissioned April 20, 1818. Died at Natchez, Miss., in Jan., 1824. His son Robert J. Walker was secretary of the treasury during the administration of President Polk.

WALLACE, WILLIAM JAMES. Born in Syracuse, N. Y., April 14, 1838. Educated by private tutors. Studied law at Hamilton College. Admitted to the bar in July, 1859. Mayor of Syracuse 1873-1874. United States district judge for the northern district of New York, commissioned April 7, 1874. United States circuit judge for the second circuit, commissioned April 6, 1882. LL. D., Hamilton, 1875; Syracuse University, 1882. Resides at Albany.

WARE, ASHUR. Born in Sherburne, Mass., Feb. 10, 1782. Was graduated at Harvard in 1804. Tutor there 1807-1811. Professor of Greek 1811-1815. Admitted to the bar in Boston 1816. Removed to Portland, Me., 1817. First secretary of the state of Maine 1820. Editor of the Portland Argus. United States district judge for the district of Maine, commissioned Feb. 15, 1822. Resigned May 31, 1866. Author of articles on admiralty in Bouvier's Law Dictionary. Died in Portland, Sept. 10, 1873. LL. D., Bowdoin, 1837.

WASHINGTON, BUSHROD. Nephew of George Washington. Born in Westmoreland county, Va., June 5, 1762. Was graduated at William and Mary, 1778. Studied law in Philadelphia with James Wilson. Served as a private in the Revolution. Member of the legislature 1787; of the Virginia convention to ratify the federal constitution 1788. Removed to Alexandria, and thence to Richmond. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned Sept. 29, 1798. Assigned to the third circuit Feb. 13, 1801. Died in Philadelphia, Nov. 26, 1829. He inherited Mount Vernon. First president of the Colonization Society. He published Reports of the court of appeals of Virginia and of the United States circuit court for the third circuit.

WATROUS, JOHN C. Born in Colchester, Conn., 1806. Was graduated at Union, 1828. Practiced in Tennessee and Alabama. Removed to Texas 1842. Attorney general of the republic of Texas. When the state was admitted to the Union, he became United States district judge for the district of Texas, commissioned May 29, 1846. Assigned to the eastern district of Texas, Feb. 21, 1857. Resigned Jan., 1869. There was an unsuccessful attempt to impeach him. Removed to Baltimore, Md. Died there June 17, 1874.

WAYNE, JAMES MOORE. Born in Savannah, Ga., 1790. Was graduated at Princeton 1808. Admitted to the bar 1810. Practiced in Savannah. Member of legislature. Mayor of Savannah 1823. Judge of superior court 1824-1829. Member of congress 1829-1835, (Jackson Democrat.) Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned Jan. 9, 1835. Assigned to the fifth circuit, March 10, 1863. Member of two Georgia constitutional conventions. Active in removing the Indians from Georgia. His admiralty decisions are of high authority. LL. D., Princeton, 1849. Died in Washington, D. C., July 5, 1867.

WEBB, NATHAN. Born in Portland, Me., May 7, 1825. Was graduated at Harvard in 1846. Admitted to the bar in 1849. Practiced in Portland. Member of legislature 1864-1865. County attorney of Cumberland county 1865 and 1868. United States district attorney for the district of Maine 1870. Declined reappointment in 1878. United States district judge for the district of Maine, commissioned Jan. 24, 1882.

WELKER, MARTIN. Born in Knox county, Ohio, April 25, 1819. Common-school education. Admitted to the bar in 1840. Clerk of common pleas for Holmes county 1846-1851. State judge of common pleas for the sixth district 1851. Served five years. Removed to Wooster, Wayne county, 1857. Lieutenant governor 1857. Judge advocate 1861. Assistant adjutant general 1862. Superintended the draft in Ohio. Member of congress 1865-1871. Member of the loyalist convention of 1866. United States district judge for the northern district of Ohio, commissioned Dec. 2, 1873. LL. D., Wooster University, Ohio, 1874. Professor of political science, constitutional and international law, in Wooster University. Resigned June 1, 1889.

WELLS, ROBERT W. Born in Frederick county, Va., Nov. 29, 1795. Received his early education at Winchester. Removed to Ohio, where he commenced the study of the law in the office of Judge Vinton at Marietta, Ohio. While engaged in the study he removed to the territory of Missouri at the solicitation of Mr. Rector, then principal deputy surveyor for that territory, and engaged in 1866 in the public surveys of the territory, which was then inhabited mostly by Indians. He afterwards settled in St. Charles, capital of the territory, and engaged in the practice of law. Was elected a member of the first general assembly of the state, and took an active part in the adoption of the constitutional amendments then made relating principally to the judicial system. Subsequently became attorney general of the state, removing to Jefferson City with the removal of the state capital. United States district judge for the district of Missouri, commissioned June 27, 1836. Died at Bowling Green, Ky., Sept. 22, 1864. He was the author of "Wells' Code (Mo.) Practice," 1849.

WHEELER, HOYT H. Born at Chesterfield, N. H., Aug. 30, 1833. Admitted to the bar in 1859. Commenced practice at Jamaica, Vt. Member of legislature 1867-1869. Judge of the state supreme court 1869-1877. United States district judge for the district of Vermont, commissioned March 16, 1877. Removed to Brattleboro, 1884. LL. D., University of Vermont, 1886.

WHITE, ALBERT SMITH. Born in Blooming Grove, Orange county, N. Y., Oct. 24, 1803. Was graduated at Union in 1822, in the class of William H. Seward. Admitted to the bar in 1825. Moved to Indiana, and practiced in Lafayette. Member of congress (Whig) 1837-1839. United States senator 1839. Resumed practice 1845. Was active in railroad construction and management in Indiana. Member of congress (Republican) 1860. United States district judge for the district of Indiana, commissioned Jan. 18, 1864, but held the office only a few months, dying in Stockwell, Ind., Sept. 4, 1864.

WILKINS, ROSS. Born at Pittsburg, Pa., Feb. 19, 1799. Was educated at Dickinson College, graduating from that institution in 1818. Was prosecuting attorney at Pittsburg 1821-1823. Was territorial judge of the territory of Michigan 1832-1837. Was recorder at Detroit 1837. United States district judge for the district of Michigan, commissioned Jan. 26, 1837. Resigned Feb. 18, 1870. Died at Detroit, May 17, 1872.

WILKINS, WILLIAM. Born in Carlisle, Pa., December, 1779. Was in Dickinson College for a little time. Studied law at Carlisle. Admitted to the bar at Pittsburgh, Pa., Dec. 28, 1801, and practiced there. Member of the city common council 1816-1819; of the legislature 1820. President judge of the fifth judicial district of the state Dec. 18, 1820. United States district judge for the western district of Pennsylvania, commissioned May 12, 1824. Ceased to be district judge in March, 1831. United States senator (Jackson Democrat) 1831. Pennsylvania gave her electoral vote to him for vice president in 1833. Minister to Russia 1834. Member of congress 1842-1844. Secretary of war 1844-1845. Member of legislature 1855. Died in Homewood, Allegheny county, Pa., June 23, 1865.

WILLIAMS, ARCHIBALD. Born in Montgomery county, Ky., June 10, 1801. At an early age he supported himself, first by manual labor, and afterwards by teaching school, devoting all his leisure to his own cultivation and improvement. He studied law. Was admitted to the bar in Tennessee 1828. Removed to Quincy, Ill., in 1829. He soon became a member of the state senate, and was ranked among the ablest men of the state, and was twice elected to the lower house. Was also a member of the convention of 1847. Was United States attorney for Illinois in 1849. Soon after the inauguration of President Lincoln, March, 1861, he was tendered the appointment to the supreme bench of the United States, which he declined. United States district judge of the district of Kansas, commissioned March 12, 1861. Died at Quincy, Ill., Sept. 21, 1863.

WILLIAMS, JOHN A. Born at Remsen, Oneida county, N. Y., May 1, 1835. Was educated at Lowville Academy, Lewis county, N. Y. Clerk of courts of Waukesha county, Wis., 1856-1861. Entered the Union army during the war as captain, and was discharged as major. Settled at Pine Bluff, Ark. Was a member of the Arkansas constitutional convention of 1874. Was judge of the state circuit court for 11 years. Resigned to engage in the practice of law at Pine Bluff. United States district judge of the eastern district of Arkansas, commissioned Sept. 25, 1890.

WILLSON, HIRAM V. Born in Madison county, N. Y., April, 1808. Was graduated from Hamilton College 1832. Studied law with Hon. Jared Willson, Canandaigua, N. Y., and in the office of Francis S. Key, Washington, D. C. Removed to Cleveland, Ohio, in 1833, and became partner of Hon. Henry B. Payne, and later with Hon. Edward Wade and Reuben Hitchcock. Was an unsuccessful candidate on the Democratic ticket 1832. United States district judge for the northern district of Ohio, commissioned Feb. 20, 1855. Died Nov. 11, 1866, at Cleveland, Ohio.

WILSON, JAMES. Born near St. Andrews, Scotland, Sept. 14, 1742. Educated at St. Andrews, Glasgow, and Edinburgh Universities. Came to New York in 1763. Removed to Philadelphia in 1766. Tutor in the City College, (University of Pennsylvania.) Studied law with John Dickinson. Admitted to the bar. Began practice in Reading. Removed to Carlisle. Member of the provincial convention and of congress 1775. Hesitated about declaring independence, but signed the Declaration. Commissioner of Indian affairs for the middle department 1775. One of the committee to hear appeals in admiralty cases. Colonel in the campaign of 1776. Practiced in Annapolis a year, but returned to Philadelphia. Advocate general for France in the United States 1779. Director of the Bank of North America 1781. Unpopular for his conservative views, and for acting as counsel for Tories. Once mobbed, and left the city for a time. Brigadier general of militia 1782. Counsel for Pennsylvania before the court of arbitration in the Connecticut-Pennsylvania dispute 1782. Member of congress 1775-1778, 1782-1783, and 1785-1789. Member of the federal constitutional convention in 1787, on committee on details, and had great influence in forming the constitution, and in securing its ratification by Pennsylvania. Leader of the Federalists in the state. Member of state constitutional convention 1789-1790, and prepared the form of the new Pennsylvania constitution. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned Sept. 29, 1789. Died in Edenton, N. C., Aug. 28, 1798. Professor of law in Philadelphia College 1790. LL. D., Philadelphia College, 1790. Published commentaries on the United States constitution.

WINCH, JOEL C. C. Born in Vermont. Enlisted in the United States army, and at the close of the war engaged in the practice of law at Houston, Tex. Was a prominent member of the Republican party in his state. Appointed district attorney for the counties of Harris and Galveston in 1869. United States district judge for the eastern district of Texas, commissioned Oct. 4, 1870, his term of office expiring March 4, 1871, by reason of the failure of the senate to confirm his appointment. Died at Houston, Tex., about 1877.

WINCHESTER, JAMES. Born in Maryland 1756. United States district judge for the district of Maryland, commissioned Oct. 31, 1799. Ceased to be district judge in March, 1806. Removed to Tennessee. Brigadier general in the war of 1812. Defeated and surrendered at the River Raisin in January, 1813. Confined for a year in Quebec. Served at Mobile under Gen. Jackson. Resigned from the army in March, 1815. Lived in retirement in Tennessee. Died July 27, 1826.

WITHEY, SOLOMON L. Born at St. Albans, Vt., April 21, 1820. Removed to Ohio 1835, thence to Grand Rapids, Mich., 1838. Began to study law 1839. Admitted to the bar in 1844. Judge of probate 1848. Member of legislature 1860. United States district judge for the western district of Michigan, commissioned March 11, 1863. Declined circuit judgeship for the sixth circuit December, 1869. Bank president in Grand Rapids. Died April 25, 1886.

WOLCOTT, OLIVER. Son of Oliver Wolcott, the governor of Connecticut, and signer of the Declaration of Independence. Born in Litchfield, Conn., Jan. 11, 1760. Was graduated at Yale in 1778. Served as aid and quarter master in the Revolution. Studied law in Litchfield. Admitted to the bar in 1781. Removed to Hartford. Member of the state "committee of the pay table." Joint commissioner with Oliver Ellsworth to adjust the claims of Connecticut and the United States. Comptroller of state accounts 1788. Auditor of the national treasury 1789. Comptroller 1791. Declined presidency of United States Bank in 1791. Secretary of the treasury (following Hamilton) 1795. Disagreed with President Adams, and resigned Nov. 8, 1800. His enemies accused him of burning the treasury building in Washington to cover speculation. Nominated United States circuit judge for the second circuit, and unanimously confirmed; commissioned Feb. 20, 1801. The act under which the appointment was made was repealed, to take effect July 1, 1802. Merchant and banker in New York. Democratic candidate for governor of Connecticut 1815. Elected 1817. Re-elected for 10 years. Member state constitutional convention 1818. Afterwards resided in New York city, where he died June 1, 1833.

WOODBURY, LEVI. Born in Frankestown, N. H., Dec. 22, 1789. Was graduated with the highest honors at Dartmouth in 1809. Studied at the Litchfield, Conn., Law School. Admitted to the bar 1812. Practiced in Frankestown. Clerk of the state senate 1816. Judge of the state supreme court 1817. Removed to Portsmouth 1819. Governor of New Hampshire 1823-1824. Speaker of the state house of representatives 1825. United States senator (Democrat) 1825-1831. Secretary of the navy 1831-1834, and of the treasury 1834-1841. Refused the chief justiceship of the New Hampshire supreme court. United States senator 1841-1845. Voted to annex Texas 1844. Declined the English mission 1845. Associate justice of the United States supreme court to succeed Justice Story, commissioned Sept. 20, 1845. I.L. D., Dartmouth and Wesleyan, (Conn.) Died in Portsmouth, Sept. 4, 1851.

WOODRUFF, LEWIS B. Born in Litchfield, Conn., June 19, 1809. Was graduated from Yale with special honors in 1830, and from Litchfield Law School in 1832. Was admitted to the bar in Connecticut, in the autumn of that year, removing soon afterwards to New York city, where he entered the office of Hon. Willis Hall. Was judge of court of common pleas, Jan., 1850. Was judge of superior court 1856. Resumed practice in 1861. Appointed judge of the court of appeals in Jan., 1868. United States circuit judge for the second circuit, commissioned Dec. 22, 1869. Died in Litchfield, Sept. 10, 1875.

WOODS, WILLIAM ALLAN. Born near Farmington, Marshall county, Tenn., May 16, 1837. Removed to Davis county, Iowa, in 1847. Was graduated from Wabash College in 1859. Tutor there 1859-1860. Teacher in Marion, Ind., and studied law there 1860. Admitted Dec., 1861. Commenced practice in Goshen, Ind., March 17, 1862. Member of legislature 1867. State judge for the thirty-fourth judicial circuit 1873-1881. Judge of the state supreme court 1881. Chief justice. United States district judge for the district of Indiana, commissioned May 2, 1883. Removed to Indianapolis. Circuit judge for the seventh circuit under the judiciary act of March 3, 1891, commissioned March 17, 1892.

WOODS, WILLIAM BURNHAM. Born in Newark, Licking county, Ohio, Aug. 3, 1824. Educated in part at Western Reserve College. Was graduated at Yale in 1845. Studied law in Newark, Ohio, and practiced there. Mayor 1856-1857. Member of legislature 1857-1869. Speaker 1858. Served in the Civil War. Brigadier general of volunteers. Mustered out May 5, 1866. Cotton planter and lawyer in Alabama. Active in the reconstruction. Chancellor of the state 1868. United States circuit judge for the fifth circuit, commissioned Dec. 22, 1869. Associate justice of the United States supreme court, commissioned Dec. 23, 1880. Died in Washington, D. C., May 14, 1887. Compiler and preparer of Woods' Circuit Court Reports.

WOOLSON, JOHN SIMSON. Born in Tonawanda, N. Y., Dec. 6, 1840. Removed to Mt. Pleasant, Iowa, in June, 1856. Graduated from Iowa Wesleyan University in June, 1860. Was appointed assistant paymaster, United States navy, March, 1862. Resigned in Dec., 1865, to pursue the study of law. Completed preparatory law studies with his father at Mt. Pleasant, and was admitted to practice, Sept., 1866. Was a member of Iowa state senate from 1876 to 1882 and 1886 to 1891. Was chairman of its judiciary committee 1880, 1888, and 1890. United States district judge for the southern district of Iowa, commissioned Aug. 17, 1891.

INDEX.

[The references are to pages. The asterisk (*) indicates that the case has been reversed.]

ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL.

The filing of letters of administration by the administrator of a deceased party held a "proceeding" in the case, under act Md. 1785, c. 80, § 1. 129

In a suit in equity against the members of a firm, a demurrer will not lie to a bill of revivor to bring in the representative of a deceased partner. 215

An exception to the jurisdiction of the federal circuit court by a denial of the fact of citizenship, which is properly averred, can only be taken by plea in abatement. . . 447

Rule 23 of the supreme court, in equity, is inapplicable to such objections as are in abatement only 447

ACCOUNT STATED.

An account may be a stated or settled account, though not signed by the parties. . . . 821

The presumption of a promise to pay arises when the account is rendered and received without objection made in a reasonable time 821

ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

The acknowledgment of a deed before a person who styles himself a justice of the court of common pleas is prima facie evidence that he was such; and it is not necessary to produce the commission of the justice until evidence is given to render the fact questionable 62

ACTION.

Upon a joint shipment and orders by three persons, the master of the vessel is not liable to an action by two for a breach, in the absence of an express promise. 841

Where plaintiff has several causes of action which may be joined, and brings a separate suit on each, the court will compel a consolidation at his costs. 417

ADMIRALTY.

See, also, "Affreightment"; "Average"; "Bill of Lading"; "Bottomry and Respondentia"; "Charter Parties"; "Collision"; "Demurrage"; "Maritime Law"; "Maritime Liens"; "Pleading in Admiralty"; "Practice in Admiralty"; "Salvage"; "Seamen"; "Shipping."

Admiralty has jurisdiction in the case of a tort which originated in port, but did not become a completed act until carried out upon navigable tide waters. 781

The admiralty jurisdiction of the federal courts in no way depends upon the residence or citizenship of the parties. 939

A contract to furnish materials for the construction of a vessel built upon the shores of tide waters, and designed for use upon navigable waters, is not within the admiralty jurisdiction of the federal courts 859

Page

If the subject-matter of a contract concern the navigation of the sea, it is a case of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, although the contract be made on land. 909

A contract for wages on board of a steamboat, plying between ports of adjoining states, on a navigable tide river, may be enforced by a suit in rem, in the admiralty. . 149

The pilot, deck hands, engineer, and firemen on board of a steamboat are entitled to sue in the admiralty for their wages. 149

Furnishing an air pump to a water craft (a "chunker") used for pumping water out of dry docks is a maritime service, and the lien given therefor by the local law may be enforced in the district court in admiralty 308

A contract to tow a canal boat in New York Harbor is a maritime contract, and gives rise to a lien enforceable in admiralty. 405

A contract for an excursion trip by steamer between Philadelphia and Cape May is a maritime contract, and within the admiralty jurisdiction 609

The nature of a contract or service, and not the question whether the contract is made, or the service is rendered, on the land or on the water, is the proper test in determining admiralty jurisdiction 648

Admiralty has jurisdiction of a claim for services in hauling a vessel on ways and for a per diem while she is on the ways, and being repaired by another person. 648

The forcible deportation of a citizen to a foreign country in an American ship, commanded by an American master, in pursuance or execution of a sentence of banishment of an illegal and self-constituted body of men, is a maritime tort, of which admiralty has jurisdiction. 781

In cases in which a common interest has been promoted by services of counsel which a mere selfish consideration of his client's interest would not have induced him to render, a part or even the whole of his compensation may occasionally be allowed from the general fund arising from the sale of the vessel 653

Where an arrested vessel in any manner again comes into possession of the owner, he cannot defeat a lien against her, on the ground that the contract out of which it arose was made, and the consideration for it rendered, while the vessel was in the custody of the law. 395

Where, on an appeal by both parties from a decree finding them mutually in fault in a collision case, the decree below was affirmed, no costs were given to either party 299

AFFIDAVIT.

Where a clerk certifies the mayor, it is not necessary that the mayor should certify the clerk 716-

AFFREIGHTMENT.

See, also, "Admiralty"; "Bills of Lading"; "Carriers"; "Charter Parties"; "Demurrage"; "Shipping."

A contract to transport goods, and collect and return the money therefor, is one of affreightment, and the consignee has a lien against the vessel for money so collected 939
 On a libel to recover damage to cargo proved to have been shipped sound and delivered damaged, defendant has the burden of accounting for such damage..... 941
 The French Code de Commerce does not differ from the general maritime law in respect to liens on the ship for damage to the cargo 940

ALIENS.

An executor may recover rents for the use of the heir who is an alien..... 388
 Under Act Md. Dec. 1791, § 6, no alien can take by descent the real estate of an alien or naturalized citizen, but he can take real estate by deed or will.....1076
 The personal property of an alien or naturalized citizen dying intestate will be distributed according to the law of the domicile of the deceased1076

ANIMALS.

Where cattle are impounded for damage feasant, the badness of plaintiff's fence is no justification of pound breach, but may be given in evidence in mitigation of damages. 845

APPEAL AND ERROR.

An appeal will not lie except from a final decision or judgment; and, where none is given, the appellate court has not jurisdiction 967
 A decree in a suit in rem on a bottomry bond referring the case to a commissioner, to ascertain the amount, and report to the court, with liberty to either party to move to frame the decree thereon, is not final and appealable 891
 In a suit in equity by or against an assignee, an appeal to the circuit court is allowed only upon final decrees of the district court where the sum in controversy exceeds $500 947
 Where a case has been improperly taken out of the hands of a magistrate through a writ of certiorari, on a motion presented to the court by way of a writ of error coram nobis, the court will issue a writ of procedendo 966
 In computing the time within which an appeal in bankruptcy must be taken, Sunday is to be counted, except when the last day would fall on Sunday..... 814
 If the appeal is prayed on the day of trial, notice is unnecessary, and the appeal bond may be given at any time within 10 days... 965
 Instructions will be presumed to be correct where the evidence is not spread upon the record by exception or otherwise..... 967
 If, on the whole record, the judgment of the inferior court is correct, it will not be reversed because improper evidence was admitted 951
 Where a specific relief is asked for, even though there be a prayer for general relief, the circuit court, on appeal in admiralty, cannot grant a relief which is inconsistent with, or entirely different from, that which is prayed..... 125

APPEARANCE.

See, also, "Removal of Causes." Page
 A defendant who voluntarily appears in a suit in this court waives his right to urge, as an objection to the jurisdiction of this court, that he was not found or served with process in this district..... 265
 The court will not order defendant's appearance to be struck out, so as to charge the marshal 434

APPRENTICE.

The father of an apprentice who binds himself is liable upon the indentures, by reason of his signature and seal, although there be no express words of covenant binding the father 517

ARBITRATION AND AWARD.

An award may be good in part and void in part 387

ARMY AND NAVY.

Persons who have been accepted as volunteers (Act Feb. 6, 1812) are not entitled to be discharged as alien enemies..... 131
 The place of service of volunteers may be changed notwithstanding the insertion in their enrollment of the officer's name under whom they were to serve..... 131
 Congress has constitutional power to provide that crimes, even of a capital character, committed on board a naval vessel, by persons who formed part of the naval forces of the United States, shall be tried exclusively by courts martial.....1160
 The fact that manslaughter is not named in the naval code as an offense punishable by court martial is no ground for holding that the civil courts of the United States have jurisdiction thereof. In the absence of any statute conferring jurisdiction upon these courts, it is sufficient in any case, to exclude such jurisdiction, that the accused is charged with the offense, in taking the life of a seaman belonging to a naval ship, in the exercise of what was claimed to be his rightful authority as an officer in command....1160
 The circuit court of the District of Columbia has no power, by habeas corpus or otherwise, to revise or correct the error of a court martial. The appeal must be to the president 965

ARREST.

Where a defendant has knowledge that the officers of justice are in pursuit of him for an offense committed by him against the law, he will not be justified in resisting such officers, even though such officers do not exhibit to him the warrant, or inform him of the particular cause of his arrest.....1067

ASSIGNMENT.

Where an assignee of a claim takes no steps to enforce the same, he will lose his right as against a subsequent assignee in good faith1098
 In the case of separate reports on a reference of all matters of difference between the parties on which executions were issued, held, that an assignee of one of the parties before issue of the execution took subject to the right of set-off of one execution against the other 428

ASSUMPSIT.

Assumpsit will not lie at common law on a parol demise 386

ATTACHMENT.

See, also, "Bankruptcy."

Under the Georgia law no attachment lies for the recovery of unliquidated damages consequent upon the breach of a contract... 930

In a chancery attachment in Virginia, the court may order the attached debt to be paid over to the plaintiff, on his giving security to refund, etc., although the plaintiff's right may be doubtful..... 120

Assignees of British bankrupt allowed to be made parties to defend a chancery attachment against the bankrupt, on certificate of foreign notary public certified by American consul 224

An order for the attachment "of the property of" a defendant named, issued as a provisional remedy, prior to judgment, under the provisions of Code Prac. Ky. § 223, gives the sheriff no authority to seize property which has been conveyed to another, on the ground that such conveyance was in fraud of creditors; and such a seizure, if made, does not carry the property into the custody of the court 1111

A personal judgment cannot be rendered against defendant on a foreign attachment under the Indiana statute of 1838 where defendant was not personally served with process, and did not appear; and the judgment in such cases should be for a sale of the property attached. A sale on fieri facias issued on such judgment is void..... 748

ATTORNEY AND CLIENT.

The appearance of an attorney in a cause is received as evidence of his authority, and no additional evidence is required..... 956

AVERAGE.

Libelants who might otherwise be entitled to contribution under general average may lose it by laches in enforcing their claim, as against a mortgagee whose debt was a maritime lien before he waived it for the mortgage security 474

BAIL.

The marshal is bound to take sufficient bail for the appearance of defendant, and he is judge of the sufficiency..... 343

In ordinary cases of libel, special bail is not required without some special reason other than the publication of the libel itself 402

In Virginia, special bail in an action of debt upon judgment rendered in one or the other states cannot be required by the indorsement of an attorney..... 653

An affidavit to hold to bail must be positive, and the indebtedness must be stated from the knowledge of the affiant, and not on information and belief..... 668

Sufficiency of affidavit to hold to bail in an action for money lent..... 856

Sufficiency of affidavit to hold to special bail in an action for breach of an agreement 863

Special bail for the stay of execution before a justice of the peace become liable to pay the debt in case it is not paid by the principal, or made out of his property, on the issuing of execution at the expiration of the stay; and nothing can discharge the bail except payment of the judgment..... 121

After scire facias returned, the bail will be exonerated if the principal be confined in the penitentiary of one of the states before any execution returned against him, and so continue to be confined until the return of the scire facias..... 639

BANKRUPTCY.

Operation and effect of bankruptcy laws, and of proceedings thereunder.

The provisions of the bankrupt act of 1867 apply to railroad corporations..... 329

The publishers of a daily paper and proprietors of a book and job printing office are manufacturers, within the meaning of the bankrupt act..... 90, note.

Where the creditors do not all become parties to an assignment before the debtor files his petition under the act of 1841, subsequently passed, the assignment is invalid 294

A deed of trust recorded on March 2, 1867, the date of the approval of the bankrupt act, is not avoided thereby..... 752

When the United States courts, under the bankrupt act, have acquired jurisdiction of the bankrupt's estate, the state courts lose jurisdiction of all claims against him provable under the bankrupt act 600

Whether a claim for a homestead exemption under a state law is provable in bankruptcy can be determined only by the bankruptcy court 600

The district court, in bankruptcy, will enjoin a judgment creditor from committing the bankrupt to prison on execution for a debt..... 375

No lien can be acquired or enforced by any proceeding in a state court commenced after petition is filed in bankruptcy, though, in cases where jurisdiction has been previously acquired by state courts of a suit brought in good faith to enforce a valid lien upon property, such jurisdiction will not be divested 752

It is no ground of withdrawal of the property of a deceased bankrupt from the bankruptcy court that the only debts are apparently barred by the statute..... 661

Jurisdiction of courts.

Where a partnership has been dissolved more than a year, and a partner files his individual petition in bankruptcy for an adjudication against himself and his late partnership, no partnership assets appearing, the case is not within Act 1867, § 36.. 624

Register—Certifying questions.

A question, in order to be properly certified to the judge, must arise regularly in the course of proceedings before the register, and between the parties having the legal right to raise it..... 662

Commencement of proceedings—Voluntary bankruptcy.

A proceeding in bankruptcy by a partner against his co-partner is not an involuntary proceeding, within Act 1874, c. 390, § 9.... 97

An amendment will not be allowed as to jurisdictional facts not required by law... 422 — Involuntary bankruptcy.

A debtor, if unable to meet his engagements as they accrue, is insolvent, though his assets greatly exceed his liabilities... 529

A party may purchase a claim in good faith, in order to join in an involuntary petition, and make the necessary number... 492

If the sale of a claim is void for fraud or want of consideration, the claim is to be deemed to belong to the assignor..... 492

Creditors whose claims are under $250 are not to be counted in computing the number who must unite in an involuntary petition, if one-fourth of the creditors whose claims are above that sum join in the petition 492

In computing the amount of creditors, all the claims must be counted, irrespective of the amount. 492

A petition founded upon the suspension of payment of commercial paper need not negative all the circumstances which might excuse the nonpayment. 88

Acts of bankruptcy.

An executory agreement by a railroad company to transfer certificates of its stock is not an act for which it can be forced into bankruptcy. 329

The issue at par of the stock of a railroad company, not theretofore issued, in payment of the bona fide debts of the company, is not an act of bankruptcy. 329

But, where paid-up stock is disposed of to creditors under circumstances to give them an illegal preference, it will be an act of bankruptcy. 329

A debtor who directly or indirectly assists or facilitates the obtaining of a judgment on which an execution has followed is guilty of procuring or suffering his property to be taken in execution. 529

Mere honest inaction on the part of an insolvent debtor, who is sued on a just debt, and who allows judgment to go against him, and his property to be levied on, is not an act of bankruptcy, within Act 1867, § 39. 672

Payment of wages to employes, though made in the regular course of business, is an act of bankruptcy if done in contemplation of insolvency. 90, note

The recording after the passage of the bankrupt act of a deed of trust made before such passage cannot be held to be an act of bankruptcy, but the consequences flowing from the act of the grantor attach as from the date of its execution. 752

It is not an act of bankruptcy, under Act 1867, § 39, as amended July 14, 1870, for a railroad company to suspend, and not resume payment of its commercial paper, for a period of 14 days. 329

There is no suspension of payment of commercial paper, within the bankrupt act, where a note payable 1 day after date remains unpaid for 40 days, where no demand is made. 406

The nonpayment by a merchant for 14 days, without legal excuse, of a single piece of commercial paper, is an act of bankruptcy, without reference to whether he is actually insolvent. 88

The owner of oil lands who divides them into leaseholds, and receives the rent in oil, is not a trader, within the meaning of the bankrupt law, as he deals only in the product of his land. 529

Adjudication.

The adjudication is an essential prerequisite to an assignment of the estate to the assignee. 678

Assignee.

An election of a near relative of the bankrupt as assignee will be set aside, and the appointment by the register according to the rules of the district will be confirmed. 935

The assignee has only the right of the bankrupt except in cases of transfers in fraud of creditors. 320, 323

Assignment.

A register has the right to convey the estate to the assignee when there is "no opposing interest," although the title to the property is in dispute. 731

Property of bankrupt—What constitutes.

A claim for the destruction of a vessel for which an allowance is made under the Geneva award will pass to the assignee. 9

The assignee in bankruptcy will receive the benefit of the state statute avoiding all deeds of trust as to creditors except from the time of recording them. 752

Where the bankrupts collect from their undertenants rent accruing before the bankruptcy, and secured by a lien upon crops, the district court has jurisdiction of a petition filed by the landlord to recover such fund. 732

The nature of the title to real estate held by partners cannot be changed to the prejudice of the rights of separate creditors by their classification thereof in their schedule. 947

— Exemptions.

The state exemption laws, as interpreted and settled by the adjudication of its highest courts, are controlling on the bankruptcy court. 733

Where there are no individual assets, the members of a bankrupt firm are entitled, under the Missouri laws, to an exemption of $150 each out of partnership assets. 835

The homestead exemption under the Virginia constitution exists only against debts contracted after the constitution took effect, and is by its terms subject to mortgages, deeds of trust, pledges, or other security thereon, notwithstanding article 7, § 32. 733

An insolvent merchant cannot sell his homestead and transfer the exemption to his store into which he moves his family. 660

The amendatory act of June 8, 1872, is prospective, but it may be availed of in all pending cases where assets are undistributed and the exemption can be granted without prejudice to the interest already vested before the passage of the act. 733

— Liens.

An assignee in bankruptcy takes the property of the bankrupt, subject to all legal and equitable claims of others. 9

A prior lien gives a prior claim, and the district court in bankruptcy may ascertain and liquidate such a lien. 303

Judgments obtained against a debtor, at the time insolvent, by creditors having no reason so to believe him, are enforceable in the bankruptcy court. 663

Where a mortgagee takes possession of chattels on a default in payment of the mortgage, the mortgagor has no interest therein subject to levy on execution. 717

The fact that plaintiff sued on his execution immediately upon the rendering of the judgment, and defendant filed his bankruptcy on the same day, will not affect the lien of the execution where there was no collusion. 404

The adjudication relates to the filing of the petition, and works a dissolution of an attachment before then levied upon the bankrupt's goods from that date. 917

Judgments whereby a creditor of an insolvent obtains an illegal preference are voidable, but not void per se. 904

A purchaser at sheriff's sale, after proceedings commenced in bankruptcy, where the levy was made prior thereto, will acquire a good title, notwithstanding that the judgments under which the sale took place are afterwards declared void as in fraud of the act. 904

The landlord's lien given by Code Va. c. 128, § 12, is independent of proceedings by distress warrant or attachment. 752

The right of an execution creditor or a landlord, upon a warrant of distress, is paramount to that of the assignee in bankruptcy, where the execution or warrant of distress was issued before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy. 116

	Page		Page
— Sale.		to the filing of the petition, held , that the officer was entitled to compensation from the assignee for keeping such sheep until claimed and received by the assignee.....	917
Where a creditor is secured by a mortgage which is valid under the state law and the bankrupt act, the court has no jurisdiction to order a sale of the property, unless the creditor comes into the bankruptcy proceeding	793	Discharge—Proceedings to obtain.
Proof of debts—What is provable.		The bankrupt may apply for a discharge within 60 days after the adjudication, where debts have been proved, but no assets have come to the hands of the assignee	609
Money actually paid on "puts" and "calls," which are void as wager contracts, may be proved as claims against the estate of the party from whom they are taken	828	Where there are proved debts and assets, a discharge cannot be granted where not applied for within a year after the adjudication	422
— Secured debts.		A member of an existing firm having firm debts and firm assets cannot be discharged on his individual petition unless the firm is also declared bankrupt.....	302
A creditor having a lien on property is admitted as a creditor only for the balance of the debt after deducting the value of the property	303	A partner who is in bankruptcy upon the petition of his co-partner cannot obtain his discharge without the assent of creditors or the amount of assets required in voluntary proceedings	97
— Set-off.		Under Rev. St. § 5112, the assets coming into the hands of the assignee in bankruptcy, exclusive of exemptions, must be equal to 30 per cent. of the claims proved against the bankrupt's estate, to entitle him to a discharge.....	96
One to whom a bankrupt is indebted for money advanced, and who, before the bankruptcy, has purchased a note of the bankrupt, having in his possession at the time of the bankruptcy goods of the bankrupt, consigned to him for sale, may sell the goods, and, as against a claim for the proceeds, set off his claims against the bankrupt, under Rev. St. § 5073.....	1081	Where the bankrupt was about to lose all remedy by the repeal of the bankrupt law, the court permitted a default to be opened on terms	833
Payment of debts.		On the death of the bankrupt, after his uncontested application for a discharge had been submitted to the court, and a favorable report of the master had been made, the court has power to order the discharge to be entered nunc pro tunc.....	865
An assignment to attorneys of a portion of a claim for their compensation will be enforced in the bankruptcy court.....	1051	The presumption that the final oath required by section 29, Act 1867, was duly taken, is not overcome by the mere fact that such oath is not upon file.....	865
Examination of bankrupt, etc.		— Acts barring.
The assignee has no right to examine the bankrupt under section 26, Act 1867, after he has obtained his discharge.....	403	It is no ground of opposition to a discharge that a debt is created by fraud, for the discharge does not operate thereon...	663
The bankrupt's wife must attend before the register, and submit to an examination, the same as any other witness, under Act 1867, § 26; and she may be punished for contempt, under section 7, if she refuses to answer.....	602	A single debt due in a fiduciary capacity will not prevent a decree as to all other debts	834
A witness who claims to have acted as counsel for a bankrupt cannot, on that ground, refuse to be sworn as a witness in the bankruptcy proceedings.....	541	The concealment of assets and false swearing in the affidavit connected with the schedule must appear to have been intentional, to preclude a discharge.....	97, 719
A bankrupt summoned at the instance of a creditor who has proved his claim cannot refuse to be sworn and examined on the ground that the claim is not valid, unless such invalidity has been proved.....	306	The bankrupt is not chargeable with false swearing or fraud in omitting from his schedule a judgment held by him which he honestly regards as worthless, or in unintentionally omitting a debt which he considers of value as an asset.....	317
A bankrupt who refuses to be sworn and examined under the advice of counsel will not be punished for contempt or amerced in costs other than those of the certificate	306	Slight inaccuracies and a want of recollection will not warrant the belief of willful false swearing or false entries, where the bankrupt, a speculator in stocks, was obliged to rely mostly upon statements of his brokers	542
Creditors cannot interpose to prevent the examination of the bankrupt summoned at the instance of another creditor.....	306	The law only requires that the books of account shall be an intelligent record of the merchant's or trader's affairs, kept with that reasonable degree of accuracy and care which is to be expected from an intelligent man in the business. Casual mistakes will not prevent a discharge....	317
On the examination of the bankrupt, a creditor who has filed proof of a debt, claiming that it was contracted by fraud, cannot inquire as to the facts constituting the fraud	656	A speculator in stocks is not a merchant or tradesman within the law requiring the keeping of proper books of account.....	542
Costs. Fees. Disbursements.		An entry of notes upon the fly leaf of the blotter is sufficient.....	317
A regular taxation by the clerk should be made of all the fees and disbursements in each bankrupt case.....	1057	A chattel mortgage given to secure a debt need not be entered upon the account books	317
The fee of the register for taking an ordinary proof of debt is $1.87½.....	1079	The contents of account books kept by a trader before he becomes such need not be carried into the books which he keeps as a trader.....	317
For examining and filing a proof of debt taken before any other officer, 50 cents allowed	1079
The sum of $50, deposited with the clerk, is not a fund in court for general distribution among creditors, but is to be disbursed under the supervision of the court.....	1057
The sum, or such portion of it as may be necessary, may be appropriated to the register in the first place.....	1057
Where a bankrupt is relieved by order of the court from further payment of fees, the $50 deposit will be distributed pro rata to the register, clerk, and marshal.....	1057
Where a flock of sheep belonging to the bankrupt were taken on attachment prior

A conveyance constituting a preference made 14 months before the commencement of bankruptcy proceedings will not prevent a discharge, as it cannot be said to have been made in contemplation of becoming bankrupt 415

— Scope and effect.
 The discharge will bar actions brought against the bankrupt by foreign creditors, though it might not be recognized as a bar against foreign creditors in courts of their own country..... 916

Debts due to persons arising out of the fact that the bankrupt, while register of the land office, converted to his own use money deposited with him by private parties for the purchase of public lands, are not discharged 655

Section 21, Act 1867, is inapplicable to debts which by section 33 are excepted from the operation of a discharge..... 656

The question whether a debt is fraudulently contracted, and therefore not affected by a discharge, can only be raised and determined in a suit to collect the debt in which the discharge is set up as a bar.... 656

Prohibited or fraudulent transfers.
 Any lien or incumbrance which would be void for fraud as against creditors if no petition had been filed or assignee appointed will be equally void against creditors represented by the assignee..... 752

A creditor will not be held to be unduly preferred by a bankrupt unless he understands at the time that he is dealing with a bankrupt or with his avowed agent for security or payment out of the funds of the bankrupt 320

The payment of a duebill to induce the holder to become a party to a general assignment in favor of creditors which never took effect, made by a person who either did not act as agent for the debtor, or, if he did, concealed such agency from the creditor, is not a fraudulent preference... 320

A transfer in execution of a contract made when there were no circumstances to impeach it as an intended fraud upon the bankrupt act will be protected..... 423

A merchant or trader who cannot pay his debts in the ordinary course of his business is insolvent 114

A bill of sale by a bankrupt to a person who had knowledge of his insolvency in payment of a debt held a fraudulent preference 540

Knowledge of the insolvency of a debtor will not be presumed to a creditor because of the knowledge of his attorney..... 663

A creditor who knows that his debtor cannot pay all his debts in the ordinary course of business has reasonable cause to believe the debtor to be insolvent..... 114

Knowledge that a party is embarrassed in carrying out his business for want of means is not sufficient to fix on a grantee in a trust deed knowledge of his insolvency, if he fully believed that his property is more than sufficient to pay all his debts 752

The preference is illegal where a judgment is entered upon a warrant of attorney to confess..... 904

Where the sale is not made in the usual and ordinary course of business, the burden of proof is on the purchaser to sustain the validity of the purchase..... 225

Suits and proceedings in relation to the estate.
 Property transferred by an insolvent partnership to a partnership creditor, by way of preference or otherwise, where the firm has never been declared bankrupt, cannot be recovered by an assignee of the surviving partners after the death of one of them 402

An assignee, in alleging title to property, must allege an adjudication in bankruptcy 678

The circuit court has not jurisdiction of suits brought by the assignee of the bankrupt, simply to collect the assets assigned 533

The jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court of a suit brought by the assignee to recover property fraudulently mortgaged or conveyed is not exclusive of the state courts, and the court which first obtains jurisdiction will have the right to decide the matter 793

Where the creditor commences suit in the state court to foreclose the mortgage before the assignee files a suit to set it aside as a fraud upon the law, the state court will have the right to decide the matter, to the exclusion of the federal courts 793

Review.
 The decision of the district court upon an application to confirm a sale of a bankrupt's estate is not within the general supervisory jurisdiction of the circuit courts. (Act 1867, § 2.)..... 814

The circuit court has no supervisory jurisdiction in the case of a suit brought by the assignee or a creditor pending the bankruptcy proceedings, or on the rejection or allowance of a claim, but has such jurisdiction in all other classes of cases.. 814

When questions of policy and expediency have been fairly before the creditors, and disposed of by them, and their action has been approved by the register and the district court, such action will not be interfered with by the circuit court, on review 93

The circuit court will not set aside the appointment of an assignee by the district judge where the only error claimed is in holding that no election had been made by the creditors, there being no allegation against the fitness of the person appointed 531

On a review in bankruptcy, the circuit court cannot consider objections to a proceeding in composition that were not taken in the district court..... 93

Arrangement with creditors: Composition.
 In composition proceedings, the debtor, though present, may, by a vote of the creditors present, be excused from examination on account of illness..... 98

The bankrupt is not required to attend any meeting of the creditors but the first one 718

The debtor may be excused by the creditors from answering inquiries, even though he is present at the meeting of creditors (Act June 22, 1874, § 17.)..... 93

A person is not disqualified as trustee, or as a member of a committee of creditors, because related to the bankrupt or a creditor or a proposed member of the committee of creditors 934

It is no valid objection to a composition that it is unsecured and payable in installments, and that the property of the debtor is restored to him, to be dealt with at his pleasure 93

A composition of 20 per cent. in money, secured by time notes, leaving certain realty in the hands of the assignee, to be converted into money, and paid to the creditors, is a lawful composition 718

The question as to the time for the payment of the composition is one for the creditors to settle, and their judgment will not be reversed except for valid reasons..... 98

Security for the payment of the composition is not always essential to its validity... 98

The fact that security provided for a composition does not certainly secure the full payment of the composition does not make the composition uncertain 98

The circuit court, in the exercise of its supervisory jurisdiction, will not interfere, except in a very clear case, where the district court has affirmed the action of majority creditors 718

 Where a composition has been approved by the creditors, the register, and the district court, the circuit court will not interfere, unless specific errors in the action of the creditors or the court below can be pointed out, which, if sustained, would change the judgment 718

BANKS AND BANKING.

Where a draft is drawn on time, and is sent, together with the bill of lading for goods shipped to the drawee, to a bank at his place for collection, the bank is not liable for delivering the bills of lading to the drawee on the acceptance of the draft..... 597
 A national bank may borrow money for the purpose of lending the same again to others with a view to making a profit..... 1121
 A national bank may lend money in good faith, without any fraudulent intent, to its directors as well as to others, provided the amount so loaned does not exceed the limitation of one-tenth of the capital stock actually paid in..... 1121
 One national bank, which loans money to another, knowing that the latter intends to loan the same to its directors, may recover the same from the borrowing bank, if it had no knowledge of any fraudulent intent in making the loans to the directors, even though the directors failed to repay the same 1121
 The assignee in bankruptcy is the "legal representative" of the borrower, within section 30 of the national banking act, and as such can maintain an action to recover back the penalty for taking usurious interest.... 673
 The provisions of the general banking law for winding up national banks under the direction of the comptroller of the currency are not exclusive of the remedy by creditors' suit, and the appointment of a receiver.... 679

BILLS, NOTES, AND CHECKS.

A receipt, not negotiable, and intended as a memorandum of indebtedness by the maker thereof to the holder, does not come within the rule of law in Massachusetts that one who indorses a note, not being a holder of it, is an original promisor..... 654
 The transfer of property by the maker of a promissory note to the indorser for the express purpose of paying the debt will dispense with notice of nonpayment, if the amount of property thus assigned be sufficient to satisfy the liability; not otherwise, although all the property of the maker may have been thus assigned..... 487
 If, however, the assignment to the indorser is in trust for general creditors, and sufficient only for the payment of a small portion of the debts of the maker, such transfer, although including all the debtor's property, is not sufficient to excuse the want of notice to the indorser..... 487
 If the plaintiff obtain possession of the defendant's acceptance by a fraudulent practice, he cannot recover upon it..... 119
 A bank which discounts a note for a partner, who drew the same in the name of the firm, and forged the name of the payee, cannot sue under the assignment, but may sue in the name of the payee for its benefit.... 824
 An indorsement for collection merely may be disregarded, and the suit be brought by the indorser..... 1086
 A declaration on note indorsed by one as agent in his own name should show that the note was made payable to such person as agent 155

In an action against a bank on a promissory note taken for collection, the burden of proof rests with the bank to show that the notary made the proper demand on the maker of the note, either at his place of business or at his residence..... 1078
 In an action on a note, judgment may be given for interest from its maturity or in damages 952

BILL OF LADING.

See, also, "Affreightment"; "Carriers"; "Demurrage"; "Shipping."
 Although the bona fide holder of a bill of lading is entitled to the proceeds, the consignee has the right to deduct his commissions, and also the charges and insurance advanced by him..... 412
 A recital in a bill of lading that the goods were received in good order may be contradicted by showing that the cask, case, etc., in which they were packed was insufficient, and the injury to the goods was caused thereby 932
 It is not sufficient for the carrier to show merely that the packages were insufficient, and that the defect was not discovered by him, but he must show that the loss actually resulted from such insufficiency and from no fault of his..... 932

BONDS.

See, also, "Counties"; "Municipal Corporations"; "Railroad Companies."
 A valid bottomry bond can be made to procure a loan to pay for repairs made in a port of distress on the credit of the vessel.. 892
 A bill for the services of a stevedore in the necessary unloading of a vessel to ascertain the extent of the damages may be included in the amount of the bond, as also a charge for commissions in procuring the loan 892
 The lender upon bottomry in good faith, and under circumstances which justified the loan, cannot be held responsible for the reasonableness of the charges in the repair of the vessel..... 892
 A recital that the master was necessitated to take the sum loaned upon the vessel, her cargo and freight, will not control the actual hypothecation clause confined in terms to the vessel and the freight..... 928
 An omission to include the cargo in the hypothecation, if by mistake, may be reformed 928
 The lender must receive the amount of his bottomry bond at the place where payable, though a bill of exchange is given for the same, payable at another place..... 928
 Freight pledged means the freight of the whole voyage, and not the freight for that part unperformed at the time of giving the bond 928
 The bottomry lien attaches from the date of the bond, although the ship, by reason of the default of the parties procuring the loan, never performs the voyage described in the bond, but undertakes a different voyage; and the principal of the loan may be recovered in an action in rem, after the completion of that voyage, and as against a claimant who purchased the ship with knowledge of the facts..... 84

BRIDGES.

See, also, "Navigable Waters."
 A drawbridge over navigable water, although it unavoidably occasions some delay in passing it, is not necessarily such an obstruction to the navigation as to amount to a nuisance. 626

BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS.

The loans by building associations under an arrangement whereby the members bid for the amount and pay a premium are not usurious1090

CARRIERS.

See, also, "Affreightment"; "Average"; "Bills of Lading"; "Charter Parties"; "Demurrage"; "Shipping."

A steamboat bill of lading for the delivery of goods at a certain point, specifying the rate of freight to a more distant point, is a through contract, and binds the carrier to deliver at the latter point.552, 554

In the absence of a special contract, the carrier can only relieve himself from liability for injury to goods by proving that it was the result of some natural and inevitable necessity superior to all human agency or control, or of a force exerted by a public enemy. 922

A common carrier may, by special contract, limit his common-law liability to that of an ordinary bailee for hire, but he cannot exempt himself from liability for misconduct or negligence. 826

The exception from fire liability inserted in a bill of lading does not excuse the carrier in all cases of destruction by fire. He is, notwithstanding, bound to use reasonable care and vigilance, such as an ordinarily prudent man would exercise over his own property552, 554

Though liability for fire is excepted, the carrier is bound to do all that reasonable and prudent men could do to prevent the entire destruction of the property after it has caught fire552, 554

The measure of damages for the loss of property shipped is its net value at the point of destination, with interest, deducting freight552, 554

CHARTER PARTIES.

See, also, "Demurrage"; "Shipping."

An agreement for the hire of a vessel for a given term at a certain rate per month, the vessel being manned and victualed by the owners, the hirer paying port charges and pilotage, makes the hirer owner pro hac vice*346

In a charter party under seal there is an implied covenant that the vessel is seaworthy, and fit for the service for which she is hired, and the charterer may aver such warranty, and declare on it in covenant. 128

In the case of separate charter parties for successive voyages, a breach of the first charter party in refusing to accept the vessel at the agreed rate, where she subsequently sails the voyage at a lesser rate, will not release the vessel from the other charter parties 691

CHATEL MORTGAGES.

See, also, "Shipping."

Under Rev. St. Mass. c. 74, § 5, it is not necessary, as between the parties, that the mortgage should be recorded. 323

CIVIL RIGHTS.

The thirteenth amendment gave to the freed slave no right of protection from the

Page federal government superior to that of his white fellow citizens, and no exemption from the power of state control which might be exercised against others.1005

Page The provision of the fourteenth amendment that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States," prohibits the action of the state alone. It gave congress no power to legislate against the wrongs and personal violence of citizens1005

The privileges and immunities which this clause forbids the states to abridge are only that limited class which depend immediately upon the constitution of the United States, such as the right to pass from state to state and to the national capital, to protection upon the high seas and in foreign countries, and the like.1005

Congress has no authority, under the thirteenth and fourteenth amendments or otherwise, to declare it a crime for any individuals to deny to negroes the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of the theaters and inns of a state.1005

A state officer, empowered by law to select jurors to serve in the courts of the state in the trial of civil and criminal cases, who for a series of years selects only white jurors, and fails to select colored jurors, is amenable to indictment in a court of the United States, under Act March 1, 1875, § 4 (18 Stat. 335), entitled "An act to protect all citizens in their civil rights".....1002

In North Carolina, the equal rights, in inns and public conveyances, of all persons without distinction of class, are fully protected by state statutes, and existed as to inns at common law; and the "Civil Rights Bill" was unnecessary in the state, and its only effect is to give jurisdiction of wrongs committed against citizens on account of class to the federal courts. 999

These laws, state and national, were intended to secure political and legal equality of rights to all citizens, but were not intended to establish social equality, or to enforce social intercourse between different classes of citizens. 999

CLAIMS.

The proof of an assignment of a claim for indemnity cannot be by parol. 961

COLLISION.

See, also, "Pleading in Admiralty"; "Practice in Admiralty."

Between sail vessels.

Failure of a sloop running before the wind in the East river to foresee the point at which an approaching schooner will run out her tack so as to keep out of her way when she comes about, is a fault barring recovery for an ensuing collision. 305

Between steam and sail vessels.

A sail vessel will be held in fault for collision with a steamer where, when sailing on parallel courses, with ample space between them, she changes her course to cross the steamer's bows, so near that the latter could not, by reversing, avoid her. 36

If the collision is occasioned by an alteration of the course of the sailing vessel, it devolves upon her to prove the propriety or necessity of such movement. 36

Mere apprehension of danger, not then imminent, is not sufficient to justify a change of course by a sailing vessel meeting a steamer under way. 328

In an action for damages to a sailing vessel by collision with a steamer, the burden of proof lies in the first instance on the libellant 36

Vessels moored, etc.
A vessel cast off from a tug in a tideway at fault for collision with a vessel moored cannot recover for increased damage from the fact that the latter's anchor was afloat 122

Tugs and tows.
Tug held in fault for starting out with a tow in a tide so strong that she could not control her maneuver, and was forced against a vessel lying at a pier 1
A steamer is liable for a collision with a scow, caused by the steamer suddenly changing her course to avoid being run into by a sailing vessel, unless it is proved that the steamer was without fault in getting into a position which made the change of course necessary. (Reversing 969) 970

Lookouts.
The fact that the master of a vessel was acting as wheelsman and lookout will render the vessel liable where the proofs leave it doubtful whether such fact contributed to the collision 872
The failure of a lookout to report a vessel which he sees is evidence of negligence in the performance of his other duties 685

Particular instances of collision.
Between sail vessel just coming to anchor off the Battery at New York, and steamer descending the river, where both were held at fault; the sail vessel for want of a lookout, and the steamer for traveling too near the shore, in the night, at too great speed 299
Between steamer and schooner at sea, where both were held in fault; the former for not taking prompt measures to avoid the collision, and the latter for not seeing the steamer before changing her course 936
Between scow cast off from tug in tideway and with a sheer and vessel at anchor, where former was held solely at fault 122

Procedure.
A joint action for collision cannot be maintained in rem against one vessel and in personam against the owner of another 869
Where the blame for a collision is found to lie with the libellant alone, the costs will be taxed against him 305

CONFLICT OF LAWS.

Where a policy of insurance is written at the home office of the insurance company, and transmitted to an agent in another state, who had authority to receive applications for policies and payment of premiums, and through whom losses were paid, the contract is governed by the laws of the state of the domicile of the company 704
Where the contract was that the purchasers should pay the sellers in England, and the uniform mode of payment was to remit bills of exchange on England, the contract will be held to be governed by the laws of that country 821

CONFUSION OF GOODS.

An agent who, without authority, mixes his principal's goods with his own, so that he cannot distinguish them, must lose what he contributed 787

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

The limitation in the fifth amendment, "when in actual service in time of war or public danger," refers only to the militia, and does not apply to the regular land and naval forces. In respect to the latter, the power of congress is irrespective of the actual condition of the country, and the same in time of peace as in time of war or public danger 1160

The power of controlling navigation is incidental to the power to regulate commerce, which the constitution confers upon congress; and, consequently, the power of congress over the vessel is co-extensive with that over the cargo 239
Under the power to regulate commerce and to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying that power into effect, congress has authority to give full protection to commerce by its criminal jurisprudence 997
Statutes passed by congress in pursuance of this power are of paramount authority, and cannot be invalidated or impaired by the action of any state or states. Any law, ordinance, or constitution made by them for that purpose is wholly nugatory, and can afford no legal protection to those who may act under it 997
A state law providing that a note whose consideration is the right to make, use, or vend a patented invention, shall bear upon its face the words "given for a patent right," and that such note shall be subject to the same defenses in the hands of a third person as in the hands of the original owner, impairs the value of patent right property, and is unconstitutional 603

CONTINUANCE.

If, after a plea of nil debet by the appearance bail, the principal gives special bail, and pleads the same plea, plaintiff is entitled to a continuance of course 387
The court will not continue a cause for the absence of a witness who has been summoned, if no attachment has been moved for, if the witness resides within 100 miles of the place, although he resides out of the district 536

CONTRACTS.

See, also, "Sale"; "Vendor and Purchaser."

Although a letter of retraction of an offer of sale be actually on the way at the time that letter of acceptance is mailed, yet the contract is closed unless such letter of retraction be received prior to the mailing of the letter of acceptance 373
A contract between the heir contesting a will, which excluded him, and the executor, for a division of the estate between them if the heir was successful, is void as against public policy 135
Where, on a contract for the sale of grain, the parties do not contemplate delivery, but expect simply to settle the differences as established by future prices, the contract is void as a wager contract 828
If a purchase or sale of grain for future delivery, made in the form of a contract, is in fact simply a bet or wager on differences, the form it assumes does not affect its invalidity *38
A contract for the sale or purchase of grain for future delivery, legitimate on its face, cannot be held void as a wagering contract merely by showing that one of the parties so understood it. To render it void, it must be proved that both parties regarded it simply a wager on differences *38
"Puts," or the privilege, for a nominal consideration, of delivering a large quantity of grain within a certain time at a specified price, when taken of persons notoriously running a "corner," are wager contracts, and void as against public policy. 828

A custom or usage of paying debts in Confederate notes in the insurrectionary states during the war of the Rebellion was illegal, and cannot be sanctioned as of any binding force 17

A bond given in 1869, payable in "dollars" generally, was payable in gold and silver only; but, after the passage of the legal tender acts, it could lawfully be discharged by legal tender notes. 17

The performance of a contract to deliver teas of the first quality is not excused by the fact that no such teas can be obtained in the market 887

A subsequent agreement to diminish the quantity and the price of certain goods contracted to be delivered does not excuse the contractor for a violation of the contract as to quality. 887

In an action for damages for a breach of contract, no evidence of fraud is admissible 55

Damages for a breach of contract for the delivery of goods do not bear interest. 887

On breach of a contract to haul all the stone which defendant had contracted to supply for certain work, where plaintiff, after part performance, was not allowed to complete, he is entitled to recover the contract price for the material hauled, together with the profit he would have made had he been allowed to complete the contract 1085

In an action on a note for the price of goods, where defendant sets up damages for a breach of contract, the same should be allowed as at the date of the verdict, and not at the date of delivery of the goods, so as to carry interest. 888

COPYRIGHT.

A photograph is not a print, cut, or engraving, within Act Feb. 3, 1831, § 1. 424

CORPORATIONS.

See, also, "Banks and Banking"; "Building and Loan Associations"; "Municipal Corporations"; "Railroad Companies."

Two states may, by concurrent legislation, unite in creating the same corporate body 73

Under Act Mass. March 3, 1809, providing that the "corporation may, * * * at any legal meeting called for that purpose, assess" each share, etc., the power to assess cannot be delegated to the directors. 312

A by-law authorizing the directors "to take care of the interests and manage the concerns of the corporation," does not import an intention to delegate to the directors the power to lay assessments. 312

An unauthorized assessment of the same amount as a dividend previously declared, made payable on the same day, cannot be collected out of such dividend, without consent of the stockholder. 312

The capital stock of a bank is a trust fund for the payment of the bank notes; and where any portion of it, before the expiration of the bank charter, is divided among its stockholders without providing funds which ultimately are sufficient to pay the outstanding bank notes, the fund may be followed into the hands of the stockholders 435

A bill in equity for such purpose might be maintained by some of the holders of the bank notes against some of the stockholders, the impossibility of bringing all before the court being sufficient to dispense with the ordinary rule of making all parties in interest parties. 435

In such case the decree against the stockholders before the court should be only for their contributory share of the debt, in the proportion which the stock held by them bore to the whole capital stock. 435

In New York, a receiver appointed under a judgment creditors' bill may recover unpaid subscriptions to the capital stock without a previous call by the corporation. 265

A stockholder may sue to enjoin the collection of a tax against the corporation, making the directors parties defendants to the bill 606

A manufacturing corporation is not liable upon a note or evidence of indebtedness indorsed by an officer for the accommodation of a third person. 654

The authority of an officer to sign and indorse promissory notes for the company does not imply authority to sign or indorse notes for the accommodation of third persons 654

In a bill against a foreign corporation by a judgment creditor for a sequestration of its property and the appointment of a receiver with power to collect unpaid subscriptions to stock, it is a sufficient statement of the amount of such unpaid subscriptions to state that they are more than sufficient to pay the judgment. 265

The fact that such corporation has no property in the district, and no property anywhere but the demands for such unpaid subscriptions, is no objection to the jurisdiction of the court, and no defense to such suit. 265

COSTS.

See, also, "Witnesses."

As to the allowance of costs in the federal courts prior to the fee bill of 1853, see 1058

Act March 3, 1847, regulating costs in admiralty proceedings in rem where less than $100 is recovered, is repealed by Act Feb. 26, 1853. 879

Full costs will be given in an action of covenant, though the verdict be for one cent only 517

Where, in a suit in equity for infringement of a patent, defendant was held to have infringed one claim, and another claim was held to be invalid, no costs were allowed to either party. 776

The amount of the costs of a suit in New York may be proved by parol. 552

The acts of congress in relation to costs in the case of a cause removed from a state court to the federal court apply only to such costs as accrue after the removal 406

A bond for costs, which omits the name of the nonresident plaintiff about to institute suit, is defective, and the suit should be dismissed 8

Nor can bond be given after the institution of suit, so as to prevent dismissal. 8

Witnesses who attend without being summoned are voluntary witnesses, and their fees cannot be taxed against the losing party 518

Models of the invention described in the plaintiff's patent, and procured by the defendant in good faith, may be included in the taxation of costs, but not other models 518

Copies of patents, either that of the plaintiff or others, procured by the defendant, cannot be taxed as costs to the plaintiff 518

COUNTIES.

See, also, "Municipal Corporations"; "Railroad Companies."

A county which, in disregard of the limitation upon the power given it by statute to issue bonds, issues them absolutely payable to bearer, is liable thereon to a bona fide holder for value, who bought them in the market in the course of trade..... 426

In the case of bonds issued in pursuance of the authority of an ambiguously worded statute, the court will adopt a liberal construction in order to sustain them, though it would have prevented their issue had application been made therefor in season.. 493

An election which results unfavorably to the subscription for stock in a railway company does not exhaust the power of the county board to subscribe, but the question may again be put to vote..... 544

COURTS.

See, also, "Admiralty"; "Bankruptcy"; "Criminal Law"; "Equity"; "Judges"; "Removal of Causes."

Comparative authority of federal and state courts: Process.

The fact that a state law provides a mode in which a third person may intervene when his property is attached on process against another does not prevent such person maintaining replevin in the federal court, where his property is attached under process of a state court..... 1111

In the case of an inseparable railroad line running through two states, the court of the place of residence of its principal office may appoint a receiver of its entire property..... 73

In the case of two suits between different parties having different purposes in view, commenced in courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction, where possession of property which is the subject of the suit is necessary to the relief asked in each case, that court which first seizes the property acquires jurisdiction over it, to the exclusion of the other, no matter when the suits were commenced, or process in personam was served. 73

The court, on a bill filed by railroad bondholders to construe a trust deed and to compel trustees to take possession, or for the appointment of a receiver, on service of a subpoena and a restraining order, obtains constructive possession of the trust property, and possession taken under process of another court in subsequent proceedings is in contempt of the former, though the latter court first obtains actual possession. (Per Woods, C. J.)..... 73

Federal courts—Grounds of jurisdiction.

An alien assignee of a judgment obtained by a nonresident can maintain a suit thereon in the federal court, though his immediate assignor was a citizen of the same state with defendant..... 122

The mere allegation that a party is an alien is not sufficient to give jurisdiction. There must be an allegation that he is a subject or citizen of some one foreign state.. 116

In the case of a corporation, it must be alleged that all the corporators are citizens of some one or more state or states of the United States..... 116

A citizen of one state may sue in the federal circuit court of another state to restrain acts which, if consummated, would do irreparable injury to his property in the latter state..... 626

If the jurisdiction of the court could be ousted by making all the parties concerned in interest plaintiffs, those who are citizens of the same state with the real defendants may refuse to join in the suit, and may be made defendants..... 388

— Circuit courts.

The circuit court has jurisdiction to aid in enforcing the judgment of a state court 116

A state cannot maintain as plaintiff an action in the circuit court of the United States..... 382

Act Feb. 28, 1839, does not enable the federal circuit courts to make a decree in equity which may affect a resulting interest in the subject of controversy vested in a party not before the court..... 331

Where an objection for the want of such a party has been sustained at a final hearing, the court, instead of dismissing the bill, usually retains the cause, in order that he may be made a party..... 331

A proceeding to bring into court a person who becomes a necessary party in consequence of an act performed by himself, after the commencement of the suit, though supplemental as to the former parties, is original as to the new party, and, though the former suit was commenced before the passage of Act May 4, 1858, it may, if afterwards instituted, be, within the meaning of the law, a suit brought after its enactment..... 331

Under that act, and under the previous law and practice of the circuit courts in equity, a subpoena issued in such a case, out of the circuit court for either of two districts of a state, may be served in the other district of the same state..... 331

The holder of bank notes payable to bearer is not an assignee of a chose in action within the judiciary act of 1789 (section 11), limiting the jurisdiction of the circuit court..... 435

A foreign corporation doing business in Illinois is liable to be sued there in the federal court, though there be no express provision of statute in regard to service.. 253

Such a corporation is to be "found" there, within the meaning of the United States statutes, which provide that no suit shall be brought against any person in any district other than that in which he is an inhabitant, or where he is found..... 253

— District courts.

The district court in one state has no jurisdiction in personam against a citizen of another state, not served with process in the former state..... 125

The eleventh section of the judiciary act of 1789 applies to the courts of the United States sitting in admiralty, as well as when sitting in equity and common law... 150

Jurisdiction cannot be obtained on libel in personam, in admiralty, by process of foreign attachment, where respondent, being a nonresident, is not found within the district..... 150

— Administration of state laws.

The federal courts follow the rules of construction of state statutes established by the highest courts of the state..... 606

On questions touching the tenure of real estate the federal courts are to be governed by the laws and decisions of the courts of the country where such real estate is situated..... 947

The federal circuit courts will follow the decision of the highest state court as to the admissibility of evidence and the force and effect of deeds defectively acknowledged.. 707

— Procedure.

A state law regulating the practice of the state courts does not apply to the federal courts unless adopted by such courts or the act of congress..... 792

The federal court, in granting writs of mandamus for the purpose of compelling a municipal corporation to levy a tax, will conform as much as possible to the state practice in similar cases..... 385

Local courts.
 The orphans' court of the District of Columbia has no jurisdiction, by virtue of Act Md. 1789, subc. 12, § 3, and Id. subc. 15, § 12, or otherwise, to inquire whether a father be a fit person to be intrusted with the personal custody and education of his children. Its jurisdiction, as to him, extends only to the due care and management of the infant's estate1069

CRIMINAL LAW.

See, also, "Arrest"; "Grand Jury"; "Habeas Corpus"; "Indictment and Information"; "Treason."

Congress has not, by the crimes acts of 1825 and 1835 (4 Stat. 115, 775), given to the civil courts any jurisdiction over the crime of murder, when committed on board a United States ship of war, and triable before a court-martial under the navy regulations1160

Quere, whether Act Sept. 24, 1789, § 11, conferring on the circuit court concurrent jurisdiction with the district court of all crimes and offenses cognizable therein, applies to jurisdiction subsequently conferred on the district court in specific terms under the fugitive slave law1013

The federal criminal laws are to be enforced by the federal judiciary without any regard to the criminal laws of the state in which the court is sitting, or the nature of the crime under the state laws.. 981

Under the constitution, treason or other crime committed within the limits of the United States can be tried only within the state and judicial district within which it is committed, and the accused has the right to a trial by jury in such state or district. If, therefore, the condition of such state or district be such that the federal courts there cannot or will not perform their functions, crimes committed there cannot be punished by the regular administration of justice.....1042

Offenses committed without the limits of the United States, upon the ocean, must be tried in the judicial district into which the offender is first brought, or in which he shall have been first apprehended..... 1042, 1049

It is an offense punishable by fine and imprisonment, under the act of 1799 (1 Stat. 618, c. 1), for a citizen of the United States, at a time when a part of the inhabitants of the United States are in rebellion against the government, to write letters to a member of the British parliament, urging that body to acknowledge the independence of the insurgents.....1049

In cases of misdemeanor, not only those who are present, participating in the act, but those who, though absent when the offense was committed, did procure, counsel, command, or abet others to commit it, are indictable as principals 983

Language addressed to persons who immediately afterwards commit an offense, if actually intended by the speaker to incite those addressed to commit it, and adapted thus to incite them, is such a counseling or advising to the crime as the law contemplates, and the person so inciting is liable to indictment as a principal..... 983

In a case where a jury declared that they could not agree after being kept in consultation several days, the judge gave them a binding instruction to bring in a verdict of guilty 257

CUSTOM AND USAGE.

In order that a usage of trade shall control the method of stating accounts between two persons, it must have been continued for such a length of time as to have become generally known to those engaged in the trade, and must be so general as to have become the general rule of commercial intercourse, in the absence of any special agreement or particular course of dealing between individuals..... 821

A custom among commission merchants who buy and sell grain for customers to settle the difference in margins between themselves, their customers being substituted as parties to the contracts, held valid, and binding 38

Evidence is admissible of a usage to explain a clause in a contract of insurance, when the law is unsettled; and in such case the usage, and not the opinions of witnesses, must control 376

The existence of a usage may be proved by one witness 821

CUSTOMS DUTIES.

Customs laws.
 Privateers are included within the exemption of "ships or vessels of war" from making a report and entry on arriving at a port of the United States. (Act March 2, 1799, § 31.) 239

Invoice: Entry: Appraisal.
 Purchases are considered as made at the date of the invoices, and not when the orders for goods were accepted when the market rate has advanced..... 138

The value of an import is determined by the appraisal, and the duty fixed by law must be assessed by the collector upon the value so determined 70

Act July 30, 1846, did not vary the law previously in force regulating the method of ascertaining the quantity of merchandise imported 147

The weight of the boxes, cases, or packages in which goods are imported is not the subject of appraisement, within the meaning of Act July 30, 1846, § 8..... 147

Where the importer does not object, an appraisal by samples taken by a sampler where the appraisers did not see the packages, held sufficient 900

Where samples are fairly selected from one in ten of the packages, and are fully identified, it is of no importance whether they were drawn from the packages by the appraisers themselves, or by the official sampler of the appraisers' department..... 900

An objection that the samples produced before the merchant appraisers on appeal were not identified must be taken on the appeal 900

Payment: Protest.
 The importer should state in his protest every charge objected to 69

Actions for duties paid.
 In an action to recover duties paid under protest, the importers cannot avail themselves of any objections to the action of the customs officers, except those specified in the protests 133

Violations of law.
 Where a valuation of molasses in casks in an invoice is correct, but the quantity stated in the invoice is less than the actual quantity found on gauging, the case is not one for the imposition of a penalty for undervaluation, under Act July 30, 1846, § 8..... 903

Where an invoice of molasses in casks does not specify the number of gallons, the case is one of undervaluation, and the penalty may properly be imposed..... 903

Under Act July 14, 1832, § 14, it is not a distinct and substantive ground of forfeiture that on the opening, etc., of a package of imported goods, etc., the same are not found to correspond with the entry at the customhouse 714

Charge to grand jury on the subject of frauds upon the revenue in obtaining payment of money on drawbacks on the exportation of goods which have paid internal revenue taxes 978

DAMAGES.

Sales of goods at auction are not conclusive evidence of the value of goods in an action for damages for breach of contract 52

The damages in the case of a rotten and unseaworthy vessel brought in collision with a wharf, where the condition of the vessel was not the sole cause of the injury, are the natural and necessary consequences of the collision to the vessel in her actual state of repair. 625

The master of a vessel who willingly and knowingly carries into execution the sentence of banishment of an illegal and self-constituted body of men is liable for exemplary damages 781

In actions of tort the motive of defendant may be inquired into to increase the compensation 781

DEED.

See, also, "Acknowledgment."

A deed to A., in consideration of a sum of money paid, or secured to be paid, in the usual form of a deed of bargain and sale, is to be considered as a conveyance executed, notwithstanding a covenant by the grantor "to make a patent," which can only mean to obtain one, and deliver it to the grantee 63

Under the resolve of the legislature of New Hampshire, approved June 22, 1831, conveyances of state lands by a land commissioner may be recorded in the office of the secretary of state at any time, and take effect only on being so recorded. 533

A curative statute, passed in a state in which a deed of land in another state was improperly acknowledged, cannot act extraterritorially and work curatively upon the deed in such other state. 707

Act Mo. Feb. 22, 1868, does not repeal Rev. St. Mo. c. 109, § 38, pertaining to the admissibility in evidence of certified copies of deeds for military bounty lands, nor does it abrogate the common-law mode of proving the execution of deeds. 707

DEMURRAGE.

The lien for demurrage is lost by a delivery of the cargo, and a receipt of the freight, without any agreement that it is to be held subject to the lien. A statement by the master that he should look to the cargo for the claim will not preserve the lien 308

DEPOSITIONS.

The notice of taking the deposition under Act 1789, § 30, must be given by the magistrate before whom the deposition is to be taken. A notice given by the party is not sufficient 845

The ex parte deposition of a deceased witness, not taken by consent, cannot be read in evidence 913

Rev. St. § 864, must be strictly complied with in taking depositions de bene esse; and the witness must be sworn to testify the "whole truth" on the entire subject of the depositions, and not as to each interrogatory 255

As to the mode of administering the oath, it is sufficient in that respect to follow the directions of the statute law of the state of the United States where the depositions were taken. 255

The deposition of a witness, on the part of the plaintiff, who had given certificates upon which a recovery was expected to be obtained, and who expected a commission of 1 per cent. on the amount to be recovered from the defendant, but which certificates were not evidence in the cause, is admissible 55

The testimony of a witness, taken under a commission directed to five persons, or any one of them, cannot be read in evidence if another person than the commissioner, and who was not named in the commission, assisted in taking the examination of the witness. 55

Depositions under a commission issued to a place where the commissioners are prohibited executing the commission, taken according to the law of the place, in the presence of the commissioners by the judge, are admissible. 376

The certificate of commissioners who have taken a deposition that they had taken the oath prescribed in their commission is sufficient evidence of that fact. 346

The magistrate who takes a deposition under the act of congress must certify the reasons of its being taken. 552

If all the interrogatories, either in form or substance, are not put to the witnesses, the depositions cannot be read. 376

It is no objection to reading a deposition taken abroad that the witnesses had previously been examined and cross-examined under a commission in the United States. . 376

DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION.

In a suit to obtain the distribution of property which came into the hands of the administrator of an executor, where plaintiffs claimed as heirs at law and next of kin of testator, the legal representative of the testator is not a necessary party. 388

In a suit by one of the next of kin to obtain a distribution of property, the executor or administrator of a deceased next of kin, and not his devisee or heirs, must be made a party. 388

DETINUE.

Detinue lies against a person who has quitted the possession of property prior to the institution of suit. 521

A legal eviction or return of the property before suit will bar the action. 521

DISCOVERY.

A cross bill for discovery charging that plaintiff was a nominal one, and that the real plaintiff was a citizen of the same state with defendant, filed after the original bill was set for hearing, on information subsequently obtained, must be answered before the original suit is heard. . 864

A bill of discovery must set forth a title sufficient to support or defend a suit, and pray a discovery pertinent thereto; and, where it cannot be sustained as a bill of discovery, it cannot be retained for the purpose of relief, unless it makes an independent case 841

DISTRICT ATTORNEYS.

Under the provisions of Act May 18, 1842, which are made permanent by Act March 3, 1845, the district attorneys for the Northern and Southern districts of New York are entitled to the same fees that are allowed to attorneys, solicitors, and counsel in the supreme court and court of chancery of New York, according to the nature of the proceedings, for like services rendered therein1074

For services rendered to the United States by those officers in civil and criminal cases, their fees must be taxed according to the latest fee bill in the supreme court of New York, in which the rate of fees is prescribed for attorneys and counsel in that court.....1074

The act of the legislature of New York abolishing all attorney and counsel fees (Laws N. Y. 1849, c. 438, § 303) does not affect the right of those district attorneys to the rate of compensation allowed to attorneys and counsel in the supreme court of New York, as it stood at the time of the passage of that act.....1074

Where there is an allowance in the supreme court or court of chancery of New York, according to the nature of the proceedings, for a corresponding service, the district attorney can have no other or greater fee1074

But it is not necessary, in order to entitle the district attorney to fees for a given service, that a corresponding fee for a like service should be given to attorneys, solicitors, and counsel by an existing law of the state1074

Where no such corresponding fee is given by any existing law of the state, the usage and practice is to refer back to some previous law of the state regulating the fees of attorneys and counsel, wherein may be found an allowance for a corresponding service1074

DIVORCE.

Alimony will not be granted to a wife before she answers..... 951

EJECTMENT.

A warrant and survey of Pennsylvania lands, and payment of the purchase money, are sufficient to give a legal right of entry in ejectment..... 62

An heir who enters upon the death of a tenant for life is an intruder, and not entitled to notice to quit..... 644

Equitable estoppels in pais cannot be set up as a defense to an action at law to recover the possession of real property..... 771

The death of the lessor of the plaintiff cannot be taken advantage of upon the general issue 644

A statement in the answer of the evidence upon which defendant relies to sustain his claim of ownership is irrelevant.. 766

The defendant may allege in his answer that he is the owner of the premises in controversy, but if he couples such allegation with a statement of the grounds of his title, from which it does not appear that he is such owner, the matter may be stricken out as sham..... 766

A plea stating that defendant is in possession as assignee of an unsatisfied mortgage, but which does not allege that he entered with the assent of the mortgagor, is frivolous, but not sham or redundant.. 398

A statement in the answer that defendant derives title from the administrators of a certain person, it not being alleged that such person ever owned or had any interest in the property, is frivolous..... 766

An allegation that the property was conveyed by administrators, in obedience to an order of the probate court, where it does not appear that the order was duly or lawfully made, or that the court had authority to make it, is frivolous..... 766

A counterclaim for permanent improvements should not be pleaded to the whole complaint, but only to so much thereof as to which it is an answer or defense; and it should allege the present value of said improvements, and that they better the condition of the property for the ordinary purposes for which it is used..... 766

To set forth the nature and duration of an estate, license, or right to the possession, under Civ. Code Or. § 316, it is sufficient to allege that the party is the sole or part owner in fee simple or upon condition or for life or years of the premises, as the case may be; or, in case of some special license or right to the possession for a limited time or special use, to state succinctly the license or right to the possession as claimed, with the necessary facts constituting it 398

The right to damages given by Code Or. §§ 313, 318, includes all damages to which the owner is entitled because of the wrongful occupation, as well for waste committed or suffered as the value of the use and occupation. Such right is a distinct cause of action, and, if joined with a claim for possession, should be separately stated... 766

ELECTIONS AND VOTERS.

Under Act May 30, 1870, it is a crime to counsel or advise another to vote illegally or in any way to procure or aid such vote.. 997

Act May 31, 1870, to enforce the rights of citizens of the United States to vote in the several states of the Union, is not unconstitutional, on the ground of discriminating between different classes of citizens. The words "without distinction of race, color, or previous condition of servitude" are general terms, descriptive in character, and are not restricted and cannot limit the preceding words, which apply to all citizens otherwise qualified to vote..... 987

A registration officer who refuses or knowingly omits to give full effect to the law, by placing the name of any citizen on the list of voters who applies for registration, and who is entitled under the state constitution and laws to be registered as a voter, is guilty of a misdemeanor, and is liable to a criminal prosecution, as well as to a civil action, by the party aggrieved.. 987

EMBEZZLEMENT.

Charge to grand jury on the law of embezzlement by officers of national banks.. 976

EQUITY.

See, also, "Courts"; "Injunction"; "Pleading in Equity"; "Practice in Equity."

Where there is a plain and adequate remedy at law, a court of chancery has no jurisdiction 966

If a defendant omits to make his defense at law, equity will not afford him relief on the same grounds..... 751

In the case of a sale under a decretal order in equity, where the purchaser enters into a covenant with surety to pay the purchase money, and has defaulted, the remedy at law is inadequate, and a court of equity will compel performance..... 458

Page

Page

Where, on the partition of lots, quitclaim deeds are given, and it is subsequently discovered that a building which represents more than 90 per cent. of the value of the property laps over on an adjoining lot, equity has jurisdiction to grant relief on the ground of mistake..... 790

The bare fact that parties who hold an equitable title to land cannot sue at law does not give the court jurisdiction..... 864

After the lapse of 20 years, a bill in equity cannot be maintained upon a bond for the conveyance of land, where the obligee early repudiated its obligation, though the obligor considered the bond worthless..... 674

A rule to show cause will be granted upon a bill of review to set aside a decree only when the decree shows upon its face that it is contrary to law, or upon the allegation and prima facie proof of the existence of material facts, which, if known, would have hindered the decree, and which complainant did not know at the former trial, and could not have discovered by the exercise of reasonable diligence..... 810

A bill in equity to recover lands, claiming only an equitable title thereto, which does not set up any facts tending to show that defendants were in any way affected by their equity, cannot be maintained.... 864

Where a bill states a case to which the act of limitation applies, without bringing it within one of the exceptions, a demurrer will lie thereto..... 388

Where fraud is asserted as a ground of relief, as against third persons, a mere denial of all fraud in themselves and all knowledge of fraud in their grantor, is insufficient, without a denial of a knowledge of the facts from which fraud is inferred. 631

The answer is evidence in favor of defendant only so far as it is responsive to the allegations of the bill..... 653

Where a feigned issue for trial of a fact is directed by the court, no declaration of any sort is requisite. The case is put on the trial list, and the jury sworn to try the issue, in the words of the order of issue itself 100

ESTOPPEL.

To constitute an estoppel, there must be some intended deception of the party to be estopped, or such gross negligence on his part as to amount to a constructive fraud, by which another has been misled to his injury 722

Where a person, by his words or conduct, willfully causes another to believe the existence of a certain state of things, and induces him to act on that belief, so as to alter his own previous position, the former is concluded from averring against the latter a different state of things as existing at the same time..... 67

A person who took a bill of sale as security, and persisted, in an action to recover the goods, in claiming the absolute ownership, is estopped from thereafter claiming them as security..... 67

A plea of estoppel by conduct, not showing that the defendant was ignorant of the truth of the matter or could not have conveniently ascertained the same, nor that the defendant had acted upon the matter claimed as an estoppel, will be stricken out on motion 770

EVIDENCE.

See, also, "Deposition"; "Trial"; "Witnesses." The federal circuit court takes judicial notice of the public laws of the state..... 590

Parol evidence cannot be given of the contents of printed cards bearing the joint names of defendants to prove partnership.. 119

Parol evidence cannot be given of a transfer in writing, without proof of the loss of the writing, or otherwise accounting for its nonproduction..... 249

Hearsay and reputation are not admissible to prove particular facts in a contest as to private rights, and proof that a stone monument was reputed to have been put down to designate a private grant is not admissible 350

Declarations of a witness cannot be given in evidence, except only in answer to evidence of other declarations of the witness, inconsistent with what he had previously sworn to..... 669

Parol evidence of the declarations of an auctioneer, contrary to the written terms of sale, is not admissible; but such evidence, as to the property intended to be sold by him, is proper..... 669

The private opinion of a witness as to the fraud or fairness of plaintiff's conduct, derived from facts which appeared before the witness as an arbitrator, is not admissible 913

When a witness states the grounds of his belief of a material fact, his belief, together with the reasons of his belief, are proper evidence to be left to the jury..... 144

Correspondence, between the parties in a cause and others, called for by notice, but which the party who called for it does not read, cannot be read by the party producing it 55

It is improper to allow evidence to go to the jury which would constitute the ground of a separate action..... 722

EXECUTION.

See, also, "Attachment"; "Bankruptcy"; "Garnishment"; "Judgment"; "Judicial Sales." An officer leaving property levied on in the hands of the defendant subjects it to be seized upon by subsequent creditors of the defendant 1080

An officer of another state forfeits any lien he may have on property levied on, by allowing it to be taken out of the jurisdiction of the state..... 1080

After the marshal is commanded by the writ to bring the proceeds of a sale into court, he may pay it to the plaintiff on the execution, on his responsibility, for the right of the plaintiff to receive it..... 647

The court will not interfere, in a summary way, to distribute money, the proceeds of an execution, or decide on the rights of those who claim it, unless the money be paid into court..... 647

Where the purchaser at the sale refuses to comply with its terms, the marshal should again offer the property for sale if he has time to do so, and, if not, by a proper return, enable plaintiff to take out an alias vend. ex..... 647

The marshal makes his return to process at his peril. The court will not dictate its form 647

The return of the marshal to a writ cannot be traversed in an action between the parties to the suit in which the writ issued.. 130

The court will not, on motion, discharge a prisoner for debt, who has the benefit of the bounds, because the creditor refuses to pay the daily allowance..... 88

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS.

Letters of administration have no operation in other states except by sanction of such states 441

	Page
Notwithstanding the renunciation of an executor, under Act Md. 1798, c. 101, subc. 3, § 7, he can come into court and take the responsibility by complying with the law at any time before letters of administration have been granted to another.....	964
An executor could renounce his right as executor after acting as such, and be relieved from his responsibility.....	1078
The administration bond of an executor is liable if he fails to put in a claim against himself.....	160
An action will not lie against the sureties in an administration bond until a devastavit has been established in a suit against the administrator.....	849
A probate court in Oregon held to have no power to authorize generally an administrator to convey lands in performance of his intestate's obligations, but only to convey specific premises upon the petition of the person claiming to be entitled thereto..	769
An administrator cannot acquire the title to the property of the deceased by paying his debts. The property must be sold and accounted for by him.....	230
Liability of lands of decedents in Pennsylvania for debts, and practice and proceedings to sell such lands for payment..	246
An administrator has a right at law to give a preference to a creditor by confessing a judgment, and a court of equity will not interfere by injunction.....	248
In actions against executors and administrators, the statute of limitations may be pleaded after office judgment.....	232
In an action by an administrator upon the trial of an issue of non assumpsit, plaintiff need not produce his letters of administration.....	387
On the plea of "No assets," the practice in Pennsylvania is for the jury to find for the defendant, and for the plaintiff to pray judgment de terris, etc., and of the assets, quando, etc.....	130

EXEMPTIONS.

See "Bankruptcy"; "Homestead."

FACTORS AND BROKERS.

A promise by a consignor, on drawing upon the consignee, to reimburse him if the proceeds of the goods fall short of the amount of the draft, is a contract governed by the law of the place of the residence of the consignee, at which the amount is payable.....

494

FALSE PRETENSES.

The false pretense is complete when defendant fraudulently obtained the indorsement of the prosecutor to a draft, whether the money is paid thereon or not.....

958

In an indictment under Act March 2, 1831, for obtaining goods, etc., by false pretenses, it is error to aver "that by reason of which false pretense the prisoner did then and there unlawfully obtain," etc.

713

On a trial for obtaining money under false pretenses, evidence is admissible that the prisoner made false representation to other persons for the purpose of obtaining money, but not that he had obtained money by means of such representation.....

713

FERRY.

The circuit court of the District of Columbia has a discretion to grant or refuse a license for a ferry over the eastern branch of the Potomac river.....

838

FRAUD.

Page

A bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration and without notice from a fraudulent grantee will hold the estate at law against the original grantor.....	445
A plea to a bill to set aside a conveyance as having been procured by fraud, which avers that defendant is a bona fide purchaser under the original grantee, but fails to aver that he has paid the whole consideration before notice of plaintiff's claim, is bad.....	445
Where a deed in favor of two persons is obtained by the fraud of one, although without the privity of the other, the deed is void as to both.....	156

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES.

An absolute bill of sale is fraudulent as to creditors, unless accompanied and followed by possession.....	19
A parol gift bona fide made prior to the Geneva award for the destruction of a vessel by a Confederate cruiser is good as against subsequent creditors.....	9
A parol promise by a husband to his wife for love and affection to make such a gift does not work a gift, and cannot be enforced.....	9
A conveyance by an insolvent to his wife of personal property for a consideration of one-fifth of its value is conclusively fraudulent.....	135
To render an antenuptial settlement void as in fraud of creditors, both parties must concur in or have notice of the intended fraud.....	*156
If the settlement is not bona fide, the fact that it is made for a valuable consideration will not save it.....	*156
If the amount of property settled is extravagant, or grossly out of proportion to the station or circumstances of the husband, and he is embarrassed by debt, and the other party knows it, this, of itself, is sufficient notice of fraud.....	*156
To ascertain the purpose of the grantor in a marriage settlement, evidence of fraudulent transfers by him to other persons at or about the time of the settlement is admissible.....	*156
Actual knowledge, on the part of the prospective wife, of the fraudulent purpose of the grantor in the marriage settlement, is not necessary to avoid the deed. A knowledge of facts sufficient to excite the suspicions of a prudent person, and put her on inquiry, amount to notice, and are equivalent to actual knowledge.....	*156
A deed of marriage settlement by a person in embarrassed circumstances will be set aside where the prospective wife knew of his embarrassment and demanded a marriage settlement before she would marry him.....	156
In a court of law a deed cannot be sustained in part and avoided in part for inadequacy of consideration.....	701
A conveyance by the husband to the wife, in consideration of the relinquishment of the right of dower of other lands worth three times as much as the dower right, is not absolutely void in a court of law.....	701

GAMING.

See "Contracts."

GARNISHMENT.

The garnishment act of the territory of Arkansas of November, 1831, is not retro-spective.....

955

GRAND JURY.

Grand jurors may, for cause, be challenged by any person to be affected by their finding. The right is not restricted to such persons as are in prison or under bail upon charges of crime; it may be exercised by one who, though still at large, has been warned by the prosecuting attorney of the court that he will be made, during the term, the subject of an indictment for perjury 1157

Where there is reasonable excuse for the delay, challenges to members of the grand jury will be heard after the body has been fully organized 1157

The accused party has no right to submit evidence in his behalf to the grand jury, not even with the consent of the prosecuting attorney 1157

The grand jury are not restricted to acting upon such cases as may be brought before them by the district attorney, but may examine any other cases, as they see fit... 980

A grand jury of the United States is limited, as to the scope of its investigations, (1) to such matters as may be called to its attention by the court; or (2) may be submitted by the district attorney; or (3) may come to the knowledge of the grand jurors in the course of their investigations of the matters thus brought before them, or from their own observations; or (4) may come to their knowledge from the disclosures of their associates on the grand jury..... 992

A grand jury of the United States sitting in California has no such general authority to inspect the books of officers of the United States as is exercised by the grand juries of the state in relation to the books of the state officers..... 992

Grand jurors should present no one, unless, in their deliberate judgment, the evidence before them is sufficient, in the absence of any other proof, to justify the conviction of the party accused 993

To justify the finding of an indictment, the grand jury must believe that the accused is guilty. They should be convinced that the evidence before them, unexplained and uncontradicted, would warrant a conviction by a petit jury..... 992

The district attorney has a right to be present before the federal grand jury at the taking of testimony, for the purpose of giving information or advice, and may interrogate the witnesses; but he has no right to be present during the deliberations of the grand jury..... 992

It is the duty of the grand jurors to keep their deliberations secret. They are not at liberty to state even that they have had a particular matter under consideration. They should allow no one to question them as to their own individual actions or the actions of their associates on the grand jury 992

It is a crime, under the act of 1872, for a person, in violation thereof, and for the purpose of influencing the action of a grand jury, to send to them any letter or communication relating to any matter pending before them, or pertaining to their duties, without a previous order of the court 992

GRANT.

See, also, "Public Lands."

It is not necessary to produce the deed poll, from the person in whose name the application was made for a tract of land, in order to support the title of the plaintiff in an ejectment for the land, the plaintiff having obtained the warrant and paid the purchase money 62

The entry, in the books of the land office, that the balance of the purchase money was paid by the person "to whom the patent had issued," is evidence that a patent did issue, although the patent is not produced 63

Where, a judicial measurement and delivery of a tract of land according to fixed boundaries has been made by the Mexican government, and long acquiesced in, such boundaries will not be modified, although they include a considerable quantity in excess of the amount specified in the grant.. 882

The court has no jurisdiction of an appeal from the decision of the board of land commissioners where notice is not filed with the clerk within six months, as prescribed by the act of 1852..... 889

Claim to Mexican land grant confirmed upon the evidence 885

GUARDIAN AND WARD.

In all cases where an infant is a ward of chancery, no act can be done affecting the person, property, or estate of the minor, unless under the direction, expressed or implied, of the chancery court itself.....1109

HABEAS CORPUS.

When a debtor is in the prison bounds, the court will not award a habeas corpus to discharge him on the ground that his creditor has refused to pay his daily allowance 146

Courts will refuse the writ where no probable ground of relief is shown in the petition, or where it appears that petitioner is duly committed for felony or treason plainly expressed in the warrant of commitment 288

But where probable ground is shown that the party is in custody under or by color of the authority of the United States, and is imprisoned without just cause, and therefore has a right to be delivered, the writ of habeas corpus then becomes a writ of right, which may not be denied..... 288

Where the service of the writ was prevented by force, it was ordered to be placed on the files of the court to be served when and where practicable..... 288

HOMESTEAD.

See, also, "Bankruptcy."

Where a person has acquired a right to a rural homestead under the Texas laws, the subsequent extension of the limits of a city, so as to embrace a part thereof, does not affect such right..... 835

HUSBAND AND WIFE.

In the absence of consent on the part of her husband, a wife cannot dispose of her personal property by will during his lifetime 1088

Where a husband voluntarily abandoned his wife and neglected to provide for her, she may dispose of any property she may have subsequently acquired in such manner as she may please.....1088

Where a woman, during coverture, makes a contract in reference to her separate estate, and subsequently, after the death of her husband, promises to pay the same, she is liable..... 964

INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION.

The offense need not be called by its statutory name where it is set out in hæc verba 958

INFANCY.

Infancy cannot be given in evidence upon a plea of nil debet to an action of debt on a promissory note in Virginia. 840

INJUNCTION.

See, also, "Patents."

At the time of granting an order to show cause against a motion for a preliminary injunction, an immediate restraining order may be granted, to be in force until the decision of the motion, for the purpose of preventing irreparable injury to complainant. (Rev. St. §§ 718, 4921.) 896

Reasonable notice is required to be given to the defendant of the time and place for moving for an injunction. 226, 751

The provision of the judiciary act of 1793 requiring reasonable notice of a motion for a preliminary injunction is repealed by Act June 22, 1874. 896

The defendant will be heard in opposition to the motion, and he is permitted to file his answer. 226

Affidavits will be received in behalf of both parties on application for an injunction 226

An injunction will be refused when there has been a failure to file a bill in equity, as there is, in such a case, nothing upon which a motion for an injunction can rest 116

A judgment in attachment will be enjoined if defendant had no actual notice, and had a good defense, and his failure to make defense was owing, not to any fault or negligence on his part, but to the fault of the plaintiff. 930

Mere negligence in an attorney, unaccompanied by fraudulent combination or connivance, is not sufficient to arrest a judgment at law. 751

A suit will lie to restrain the collection of an unlawful tax against a corporation, the remedy at law being inadequate. 606

A rule to show cause why an attachment should not issue for breach of an injunction in the federal circuit court is not the proper practice, but a motion should be made, on notice, that defendant stand committed for the breach. 622

Where an injunction has been dissolved, and afterwards reinstated, and is still pending, no suit can be maintained on the injunction bond as for a breach of it. 963

INSOLVENCY.

See, also, "Bankruptcy."

A discharge of a debtor, under a state insolvent law, does not discharge a debt due by him to a person who resides in another state at the time the insolvent proceedings take place, and who does not become a party to such proceedings. 644

That the debt has passed into a judgment before the proceedings makes no difference 644

Nor does it make any difference that the indebtedness rests on a contract payable at a place within the state in which the insolvent proceedings take place. 644

A discharge under the insolvent law of one state bars an action for a debt contracted in another 652

Insolvent laws of a state have no effect beyond the limits thereof, and a discharge of a debtor under the insolvent law of Pennsylvania will not protect him from arrest by a citizen of New York for a debt payable in New York or to a citizen of that state. . . 494
A conveyance executed under the Pennsylvania insolvent law of 1799 will not operate to bar an estate tail. 63

INSURANCE.

See, also, "Marine Insurance."

A policy lapses by failure to pay a premium in advance as it becomes due unless the course of dealing between the agent and the insured has been such as to induce a belief that the premium has been paid by the exchange of individual accounts between such persons 301

Under Act Mass. 1861, c. 186, held, that a paid-up policy proportioned to the premiums paid could be obtained after forfeiture of the policy by failure to pay a premium. . . 285

The right of an insured to a paid-up policy under the policy and Act Mass. 1861, c. 186, is a property right which survives to his representatives. 285

Equity could not relieve against the failure to submit notice of the claim and proof of death within 90 days, as provided by statute, so as to keep the original policy in force, though this failure resulted from ignorance of the existence of the policy. . . 285

A representation in the application that the applicant is "sober and temperate" does not mean that he totally abstains from the use of intoxicating liquors, or that he may not have been drunk on some occasions. It means, rather, that he is temperate in the use of spirituous liquors,—not addicted to their excessive use. 407

Under a policy conditioned to be void in case the insured should "die by his own hand," there is no liability if the insured kills himself while in the possession of his ordinary reasoning faculties, and from anger, pride, jealousy, or a desire to escape from the ills of life. 407

If, however, his reasoning faculties are so far impaired that he is not able to understand the moral character, the general nature, consequences, and effect of his act, or if he was impelled thereto by an insane impulse, which he had not the power to resist, the insurer is liable. 407

Neither an act of suicide, nor an attempt nor a threat to commit suicide, creates a presumption of insanity that would be sufficient to justify a jury in finding a person insane; but such an act may be considered, in connection with the previous demeanor and conduct of the person, as evidence of insanity 413

The declarations of the insured husband, made after the date of the policy, as to his health existing, or matters of private history occurring, prior to the date of the policy, are not admissible as evidence in a suit by the wife upon her policy. 143

Forfeitures provided for in policies are for the benefit of the insurer, and may be waived by it. 856

A forfeiture will be considered as waived where, subsequent to its accruing, the insurer, with knowledge of the facts, recognizes the contract as still subsisting, and manifests an intent not to take advantage of the forfeiture, and does no act prior to the death of the insurer indicating a purpose to claim it 856

An agreement in the policy that no action should be sustainable at law or equity until arbitration shall have determined what amount is due is not unlawful, and in such case a reference and ascertainment of the amount due are conditions precedent to the right of action..... 808

INTEREST.

See, also, "Banks and Banking"; "Usury."

The balance found due on a statement of account may properly bear interest, though items of interest were included in the account 821

Interest will not be allowed on unliquidated and contested claims sounding in damages 52

Where an attachment is laid on money in the hands of a third person, interest ceases from the time of the attachment until it is dissolved; but when a debtor, who is also a creditor, lays an attachment in his own hands, interest is chargeable, during the continuance of the attachment..... 55

INTERNAL REVENUE.

A beneficial interest, arising after Act June 30, 1864, was passed, under a will of a person who died before the act was passed, on the termination of a life estate, is a "succession," subject to tax under sections 127, 133 *667

A mining company assaying its own ores only, and not assaying any bullion or amalgam, is required to pay a special tax as assayer. (Act June 30, 1864, § 79, subd. 4S)... 806

INTERNATIONAL LAW.

See, also, "Neutrality Laws."

An association of persons who undertake to establish a new government and assume the character of a nation may be recognized by other governments in whole or in part, or they may be utterly ignored by them....1049

JUDGE.

When a party has been brought before a court of justice in a legal manner, and circumstances are presented requiring a decision to be made, the tribunal making it cannot be deprived of protection from personal liability therefor because it may afterwards, upon fuller investigation, turn out to have been erroneous.....1100

A judge cannot be held civilly liable for inflicting an unlawful imprisonment where his sentence is held illegal by the supreme court of the United States on a writ of habeas corpus by a divided court.....1100

Resolutions and other proceedings upon the retirement of federal judges.....1285

Biographical notes of the federal judges, including a brief account of the public career of all of the federal judges appointed prior to January 25, 1894.....1361

JUDGMENT.

Rendition and entry.

The act of the circuit clerk in filing the docket transcript of a judgment is a ministerial act, and not void though done on a nonjuridical day, and the judgment creditors thereby acquired a lien upon the real estate of the judgment debtor the same as if done on any other day. (Reversing 643)... 641

A motion in arrest of judgment will be dismissed if made after judgment is rendered and execution issued thereon.....1077

Validity.

A personal judgment or decree obtained over a nonresident who has not been personally served within the state, and has not appeared, has no extraterritorial force. . 961, 1069

The question of jurisdiction is considered as having been decided by the first order or process made or issued in a case.....1111

Where the court has general jurisdiction to issue a writ or make an order, a writ or order made in a particular case in which the facts did not confer jurisdiction must be taken as valid and effectual until quashed, reversed, or otherwise superseded by a tribunal competent to review and correct the error1111

Lien.

A. and B. exchanged property, there being at the time a recent judgment, unknown to B., which was a lien on A.'s property, and the property for that reason was re-exchanged, the original parties being put into possession. Held, that a purchaser under an execution on such judgment against B.'s property had a title at law superior to the title of B. or subsequent purchasers from him.. 409

Where a levy under a fi. fa. was quashed, and afterwards defendant died, held, that the judgment should be revived against his executors before a new fi. fa. could issue.. 129

To a scire facias against an executor to revive a judgment obtained against his testator, the defendant cannot plead that there are terre-tenants whose lands are also bound by the judgment, so as to oblige the plaintiff to sue out a scire facias against them.. 246

The proper remedy for persons aggrieved by proceedings under such a judgment is an audita querela, or by obtaining a rule of court to stay proceedings..... 246

A payment which might have been pleaded to the original scire facias to revive a judgment cannot be given in evidence on a second scire facias..... 130

Operation and effect.

When two or more persons are liable for a simple contract debt, a judgment obtained against one is an extinguishment of the claim on the other debtors..... 55

A judgment against one of defendants in a suit against several on an instrument on which all are jointly liable merges the instrument, and is a bar to a suit thereon against either of the other defendants.... 590

The decision of a court of competent jurisdiction is conclusive wherever the same question is again raised..... 669

A dismissal of a bill in equity is not conclusive in a court of law in an action brought for the same matter..... 669

A judgment in a suit for freedom against a person who was kidnapped into slavery will not estop the plaintiff from a re-examination of the same question in a subsequent suit against the kidnapping party, as a valid judgment cannot be rendered against a slave..... 479

A person who sues in the name of another for his use is substantially a party, and is within the rules that the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction is final between the parties, and a bar to a subsequent suit..... 824

Persons not parties to a decree, and consequently not bound thereby, cannot avail themselves of any part of it without admitting its validity..... 701

An inquisition is no bar to a special action upon the case for a cause of action which accrued before the inquisition..... 676

In a plea of a former judgment, in an action at law, it is a sufficient description of the cause of action in the first action to allege that it was identical with that stated in the complaint in the action pending..... 770

Relief against: Opening: Vacating.

At common law a judgment cannot be set aside on motion after the term at which it was rendered. The contrary rule in New York is not followed by the federal courts.. 444

Page

Page

A general allegation of difficulty in procuring vouchers, or of unavoidable delay in settling an administration account, without stating from what circumstances that difficulty and delay arose, is not sufficient ground of equity to enjoin a judgment at law..... 105

Equity will not relieve against a judgment at law, upon plene administravit, on the ground that the defendant at law could not produce vouchers to support his plea, unless there be in the bill an allegation of fraud, mistake, surprise, or accident..... 104

Of different jurisdictions.

A judgment against the plaintiff in an action does not preclude the court of another state from examining the question whether the suit was in fact brought by the plaintiff herself, or by some other persons in her name and without her knowledge or consent 476

Slaves being without capacity to sue or defend, no valid judgment can be rendered against them, and a judgment of a sister state in a suit for freedom against plaintiff will not estop her from contesting the question in a subsequent suit..... 479

JUDICIAL SALES.

See, also, "Equity."

A purchaser on a sale under a decretal order in equity will not be let off from his purchase by submission to a forfeiture of his deposit 458

In the case of a covenant with surety to pay the purchase money given by the purchaser on a sale under a decretal order, a court of equity will by attachment compel performance as against both principal and surety 458

The surety in a covenant by the purchaser at a sale under a decretal order to pay the purchase money cannot take any exceptions to the title where the principal has failed to do so..... 458

The principal and surety in a covenant for payment of the purchase price on a master's sale in chancery have no claim upon the rents and profits of the estate except from the time when the conveyance is completed.. 458

JURY.

See, also, "Grand Jury."

The national legislature has constitutional power to prescribe the qualifications of jurors, and the manner in which they shall be selected and summoned. It may make the judicial system of the United States complete for the independent exercise of all its functions 1042

Qualifications of jurors in the circuit court for the District of Columbia sitting in Alexandria county..... 849

In an action against an insurance company a nephew of a stockholder is not competent 850

It is not a principal cause of challenge that the juror has had conversation with some of the parties, but it is evidence for the consideration of triors upon a challenge for favor 850

Any party to a cause, civil or criminal, may challenge for the causes enumerated in Act June 17, 1862, § 1..... 1157

If, under Act June 17, 1862, jurors be challenged by a party other than the government, the challenge may be disposed of by allowing those who deem themselves disqualified under section 1 to retire from the panel without any sworn evidence of their incompetency 1157

Page

It is a crime, under Act March 2, 1831, § 2, to endeavor to influence a juror by conveying or imparting information to him, out of the jury box, for the purpose of affecting his conduct or judgment, or to endeavor to persuade him by arguments or appeals of any kind except those addressed to him by counsel in open court..... 986

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE.

In Indiana the plaintiff may reduce his demand to bring it within the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace..... 404

The authority of justices of the peace in other states may be proved by parol..... 343

LANDLORD AND TENANT.

See, also, "Bankruptcy."

Under a provision that the lease should terminate if the lessee should be declared bankrupt, unless within 10 days from the date of the petition some sufficient person should become surety for the rent, held, that a mortgage given to secure the rent covered the rent up to the time the keys were surrendered, though two months after the lessee became bankrupt 805

Costs do not accrue, upon levying a distress for rent, unless the goods are sold.... 716

Interest does not accrue on rent until demand made therefor..... 388

LIBEL AND SLANDER.

Plaintiff cannot offer evidence of his general good character to disprove the truth of the words, nor to support his own character, until it is attacked by defendant..... 692

Where the nature of the charge is such that the evidence given by the defendant in support of the plea of justification, though insufficient to prove that, has, if believed in part or in whole, a legitimate tendency to affect the general character of the plaintiff on the subject of the charge, he may reply by evidence of general good character in that particular 692

Defendant may attack plaintiff's general character in respect to the subject-matter of the charge in order to reduce the damages.. 692

LIENS.

See "Admiralty"; "Bankruptcy"; "Maritime Liens"; "Mechanics' Liens"; "Shipping."

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

Retrospective limitation laws, where they do not deprive parties of a reasonable time for prosecuting their claims before being barred, may be valid 694

Those trusts which are the mere creatures of a court of equity, and are not within the cognizance of a court of law, are not within the operation of the statutes..... 388

The statute of limitations does not apply to accounts between merchants, though the dealings between the parties ceased long before suit brought..... 144

Where a mortgagee in possession under an absolute deed, with an agreement that the mortgagor might redeem when he found it convenient, sells the land to a bona fide purchaser, and so destroys the equity of redemption, a court of equity will treat him as a prospective trustee, so the trust is not barred till the expiration of six years from the discovery of a right to an account..... 741

A mortgage cannot be foreclosed after the lapse of 20 years from the date when the cause of action accrued..... 748

Lapse of time short of 20 years will not bar an action to recover possession of real property, where defendant claims under a sale by an administrator, except where the sale was made under Code Or. c. 5, § 42, to pay decedent's debts, and plaintiff claims under such decedent	766
The Oregon statute of limitations upon actions to recover real property does not run against a woman to whom the right to sue accrues during coverture, until the removal of such disability; and this whether the action concerns her separate property or otherwise	771
Under the Ohio statute, if, when a cause of action accrues against a person, he is out of the state, the period of limitation does not begin to run until he comes into the state. . .	476
In order to set the statute to running in favor of a defendant who was out of the state when the cause of action accrued, his coming into the state must either be of a permanent character, or, if not so, it must be brought to plaintiff's knowledge, or, if not, then his stay must be of such a nature that plaintiff, by reasonable diligence, can ascertain it	476
The statute of limitations of a state does not run against one who, immediately upon coming within the state, is cast into prison, and detained there during her stay.	476
Where, immediately after a cause of action arises, plaintiff, while temporarily in another state, is seized and imprisoned, and returns to the state where the cause of action arose immediately upon his release, the statute of limitations does not commence to run until his return to the state.	476
On a debt due by an executor to his testator, the statute ceases to run from the acceptance of the trust by the executor.	160
A clause in a will directing all the testator's debts to be paid, and appropriating the rents of his real estate, does not take the case at law out of the statute of limitations, when the plaintiff does not seek his remedy under the will.	232
A declaration by defendants at the time of serving the writ that they would pay the debt is not sufficient to take the case out of the statute, where the writ did not specify the cause of action nor its amount, and the same was not mentioned to them.	868
After interlocutory decree, and an issue ordered, the court will not permit the defendant to plead the statute of limitations and to file an answer.	232
MALICIOUS PROSECUTION.
Plaintiff must show both malice and want of probable cause, and that defendants knew that they had not probable cause.	913
In an action for malicious prosecution founded on a charge of larceny, it is not necessary for the defendant to fix the time of larceny on the plaintiff. Id. , by his folly or his fraud, he exposes himself to a well-grounded suspicion that he was guilty, the prosecution was founded on probable cause, which is a sufficient defense.	70
Evidence is admissible of loss in the public estimation in consequence of the prosecution, but not in consequence of reports circulated by defendant.	913
MANDAMUS.
Unless special circumstances should require it, a peremptory writ will not be issued, commanding a levy of taxes to pay a judgment against a municipal corporation at a time different from the next general levy	385

MARINE INSURANCE.

Where the policy contained the clause "to add an additional premium if by vessels rating lower than A2," and the cargo was shipped in a vessel with a lower rating, the insured can recover, in case of loss, the value agreed in the policy, less such additional premium beyond the agreed per cent. as the underwriters might deem adequate for the increased risk.	704
A deviation, under the direction of the master and last remaining officer when dying, in order to place the vessel in charge of the American consul, is excusable.	376
A deviation for water, where the necessity really and fairly existed, and a sufficient quantity was originally taken on board, and the port at which the vessel puts in is the nearest, is justifiable.	473
The act of an American consul in whose hands a vessel is placed by the crew, after the death of all the officers at sea, in changing her cargo so as to lighten her, is not chargeable to the insured, and is no defense to the policy, unless the vessel was actually overloaded	376
The same rule applies to the appointment of a British master by the American consul which increased the risk, making the vessel a good prize had she been taken by a French cruiser	376

MARITIME LAW.

See, also, "Admiralty."

The admiralty law cognizable in the federal courts is not the civil law of the Roman government, but the admiralty law of Great Britain	525
Independent of Act Feb. 26, 1845, under the constitution, the maritime law of the United States has the same application to cases upon the lakes as upon tide waters. . .	417
Laws of Oleron, with historical notes.	1171
Laws of Wisby, with historical note.	1189
Laws of the Hanse Towns, with historical note	1197
Marine Ordinances of Louis XIV., with historical note	1203

MARITIME LIENS.

See, also, "Admiralty"; "Affreightment"; "Bottomry and Respondentia"; "Demurrage"; "Shipping."

The right to a lien.

A maritime lien is a jus in re, constituting an incumbrance on the property, and existing independent of the process used to execute it	873
Material men have a lien for repairs under the admiralty law only in the case of foreign ships, or ships belonging to other states. . .	909
A lien arises under the maritime law for materials and labor furnished in repairing a vessel in a foreign port.	525
The ports of the different states are foreign to each other, within the meaning of the admiralty law in relation to liens.	525
No lien arises under the maritime law for materials furnished at the instance of the owner to a vessel in her home port.	522
A lien arises for water casks furnished on the credit of a foreign ship.	909
A lien arises for a diving bell, air pump, and other apparatus supplied a vessel which were not necessary for her use as a navigating ship, but were indispensable for the accomplishment of the enterprise in which she was about to engage.	396
Where a British ship was adjudged forfeited to the United States, and was ordered

	Page
sold by the marshal, but the purchaser failed to comply with his contract, so that a subsequent sale was necessary, held , that the vessel was subject to a maritime lien in the hands of the last purchaser for materials and labor expended in making repairs between the dates of the two sales.	525
Where credit is given for materials furnished, the lien is discharged, or it does not attach	909
By the law of Great Britain, the master has no right, even in a foreign port, to pledge his vessel for necessities, or create a lien thereon by any other form of hypothecation than a formal bottomry bond.	501
The question of a lien on a British vessel which puts into a Danish port in distress for advances to make repairs must be determined by the law of Great Britain.	501
Where a vessel, while undergoing repairs in a foreign port, is sold to her master, who resides in such port, held , that a lien arose for such repairs under the general admiralty laws	134
Where a person takes drafts from the master, pledging the vessel for the amount, for repairs in a port of distress, with knowledge of a letter from the owners limiting the master's authority, he has no lien on the vessel	497, 501
The fraud of the agent of a vessel and the master in a port of distress in making out fraudulent accounts against the vessel for repairs will not invalidate drafts drawn for such amounts, and expressed to be recoverable against the vessel, freight, and cargo, in the hands of a person who, without knowledge of the fraud, discounted them.	497, 501
The record of a mortgage in the office of the collector is not constructive notice to material and repair men.	134
Priority and enforcement.
Maritime liens have priority over mortgages	939
A lien for materials and repairs will have priority over a mortgage owned by one who was presented to the material and repair men as a part owner of the ship, and who, by his bearing, himself confirmed the impression that he was one of the owners.	134
The party claiming a lien on a vessel for materials must show that the contract under which they were furnished had reference to some particular vessel, in the construction or repair whereof such materials were to be used	881
A material man whose lien is discharged by the giving of credit is still entitled, upon petition, to be paid out of remnants and surplus remaining in the registry.	909
Waiver: Discharge: Extinguishment.
A lien against a vessel is waived, as against a purchaser, where the claimant, of whom inquiries are made by the purchaser, is silent as to his claim.	444
A maritime lien is not divested by the death of the owner of the vessel and the representation by his administrator of the insolvency of his estate	873
Liens under state laws.
The statute of Maine conferred on mechanics and material men such a lien on domestic vessels as the general admiralty law had previously allowed to them on foreign vessels	873
A trench excavated in front of the launching ways of a ship for the purpose of deepening the water is not labor performed in launching the vessel, within Act Mass. 1855, c. 231, giving a lien on vessels for such labor.	604
The lien given by the law of the state of New York, for repairs to a domestic ves-

	Page
sel has priority over a mortgage on the vessel given before the repairs were made.	34, 36
The rights of a creditor having a lien against a vessel under Rev. St. Me. c. 125, § 35, are paramount to the rights of the general creditors under the laws of the state regulating the distribution of estates of deceased insolvent debtors.	877

MARSHAL.

The marshal, being called upon by the court to bring before them any defendant arrested by him upon any original writ or mesne process, according to the tenor of his return, and failing so to do, will, on motion, be amerced to the amount of the debt, or damages and costs, and judgment will be entered therefor, nisi, the second day of the next term.	343
The legality of the service of subpoenas made by a deputy, and his right to fees, is not affected by the failure of the marshal to make a return of the appointment of such deputy to the district judge.	373
A deputy marshal is not entitled to charge for service or mileage for himself as a witness.	373
The fees for a service by a deputy marshal legally belong to the marshal, and his receipt for them operates as a discharge from liability for such service.	373
The deputy's remedy for compensation for services performed by him is against the marshal for whom he performed the services	373

MECHANICS' LIENS.

Under the mechanic's lien law of the District of Columbia, no extra work not completed within three months preceding the filing of the claim in the clerk's office is covered by the lien.	972
Under the rule that payments made by a debtor should be applied to the debt least secured, general payments by a debtor, not directed by him to be applied to the contract specifically, may be applied to the extra work, whether completed within the three months or not, provided such extra work was completed and the money due for it	972

MILITIA.

A justice of the peace in the District of Columbia is not an officer of the government of the United States, under Act May 8, 1792, and is liable to militia duty. *388

MORTGAGES.

See, also, "Chattel Mortgages"; "Shipping."
A covenant by a debtor with his creditor to purchase certain lands and then mortgage them to him, will be enforced in a court of equity by a decree of sale.	699
A third person who advances the purchase price for a settler on public lands, taking the receiver's certificate of location as security for payment, and giving back a bond for a deed upon repayment, will be held a mortgagee, and the settler or his alienee may redeem.	699
A deed absolute in form may be shown to have been really a mortgage, by the oral testimony of two witnesses, against the denials of the answer, where those denials are not satisfactory in themselves, and are accompanied with admissions that some confidential relations existed between the parties, not consistent with the terms of the deed. 741

Under the Indiana Code of 1838, a neglect to record a mortgage within the prescribed time did not invalidate it, except as to a subsequent bona fide purchaser or mortgagee whose deed or mortgage was first recorded 748

In Oregon a mortgage is a mere security, and the mortgagor, both before and after condition broken, is the owner of the premises, subject to the lien of the mortgage, and he cannot be deprived of the possession of the same against his will otherwise than by foreclosure and sale. 398

A mortgagee has no right or authority to take possession of the mortgaged premises and hold the same for the satisfaction of his debt, without the consent of the mortgagor 398

A mortgage given to secure the payment of four promissory notes made to raise means to work a plantation is valid, and, upon the negotiation of the notes, relates back to the date of execution. 811

A mortgage to secure advances not to exceed a certain amount is good as security to its full amount to cover a balance of advances made in excess of such amount, diminished by partial payments on account 811

Where one deed of trust is executed as a substitute for a preceding one, the former will at once cease to have any validity or effect 752

A mortgage or deed of trust made as security for a debt will operate as a security for the same continuing debt, though the evidence of it be changed by renewal or otherwise 752

A mortgagee of lands to which the mortgagor has no present title is entitled in equity to the benefit of an after-acquired title 699

A mortgage given to secure a debt due and payable, no time of payment being specified, may be redeemed or foreclosed at any time. 699

Junior mortgagees may foreclose without making prior mortgagees parties, but a sale in such case will be subject to the prior mortgage. 850

In a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage, all persons holding the equity of redemption of the lands, or any part thereof, must be made parties. 748

A general notice calling upon prior mortgagees to present their claims will not make them parties or bind them, but they must be served with process or voluntarily appear 850

Where the court has taken possession of the property by the appointment of a receiver in a suit by junior mortgagees, the senior mortgagees cannot gain possession by a suit subsequently begun until the first is ended 850

In a suit by assignees of a note and mortgage, if the assignment is denied it must be proved. 748

The presumption that an equity of redemption is released after 20 years' possession by a mortgagee does not apply to a case where the mortgagee was in possession under an absolute deed, with an agreement that the mortgagor might redeem when he found it convenient; no specific time being fixed, and the mortgagee having no notice or request to redeem. 741

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

See, also, "Counties"; "Railroad Companies."

Under the authority to issue bonds in payment of a subscription to be made payable to "the president and directors of the railroad company, and their successors and assigns," bonds made payable to "the railroad company or bearer" are valid. 544

Negotiable municipal bonds issued under a law authorizing their issue, which recite that the conditions required by law have been complied with, are unimpeachable in the hands of an innocent holder for value. 544

A city, which has power to borrow money and has issued bonds therefor, which were void because antedated and unregistered, is liable to the purchaser of such bonds or his assignee, for money had and received, for the amount actually paid to the corporation for the bonds, with simple interest thereon 442

In the absence of constitutional restrictions, a legislature may authorize a municipal corporation to aid in the building of a railroad in which the inhabitants are interested, and such authority may be given with or without the assent of the qualified electors of the municipality. 544

A clause in a state constitution requiring the assent of two-thirds of the qualified voters to the giving of aid to railroad companies does not apply where a debt has already been created for a subscription, and the legislature may thereafter authorize the issue of bonds to pay therefor, without submitting the question to the people 544

Proceedings on an inquisition under Act March 3, 1805, in relation to opening, extending, and regulating streets in Washington county, D. C. 676

A municipal corporation has no authority to take upon itself the burden of repairing a road or turnpike in which the public as well as the corporation are interested, when the same is outside the limits of said corporation. 1053

NAVIGABLE WATERS.

See, also, "Bridges."

Under the power to regulate commerce, congress have power to prevent the obstruction of any navigable river which is a means of commerce between states. 626

The paramount right of the public to use a navigable river as a highway does not prevent the state legislature, in the absence of a conflicting enactment of congress, from authorizing the construction of public improvements upon the stream, although they may involve a partial obstruction or inconsiderable detention to navigation 503

Under the constitution and laws of Wisconsin, any obstruction to the use of a navigable stream by the public for purposes of navigation, which is erected without a constitutional legislative authority, is a nuisance, and liable to be abated either at the suit of an individual or at the instance of the state. 503

The right to cross a navigable water by a railroad bridge must be given by the sovereign power, by a special or general act. 626

Where a company is authorized to construct a railroad between two points, "over" a navigable water, a right to construct a bridge over that water is implied, as a necessary means of carrying into effect the power granted. 626

The decision of the acting commissioner of the board of public works, under the Ohio statutes, approving the plan or structure of a proposed bridge over navigable waters, is final and conclusive. 626

NAVY.

See "Army and Navy."

NE EXEAT.

A ne exeat bond only binds the sureties to the extent of the final decree; and if defendant continually remains in the district, according to the condition of the bond, they will be discharged all together.. 913

NEGLIGENCE.

Section 12 of the act of 1838 (5 Stat. 304), which declares that every captain, engineer, pilot, or other person employed on board of any steam vessel, by whose misconduct, negligence, or inattention to duty the lives of any persons on board may be destroyed, shall be deemed guilty of manslaughter, makes the negligence, etc., in question, a crime, when followed by the consequences named, without regard to the question of motive or intent on the part of the persons charged..... 990

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS.

See "Bills, Notes, and Checks"; "Bill of Lading."

NEUTRALITY LAWS.

Act April 20, 1818, § 6 (3 Stat. 449), forbidding military expeditions by individuals against countries with which the United States are at peace, commented on.....1017

To constitute the offense of beginning or setting on foot a military expedition against a friendly power, within section 6, it is not necessary that the expedition shall be actually set on foot. It is sufficient if such preparations are made for it as show an intent to set it on foot.....1018

Any combination of individuals to carry on an expedition is "setting it on foot," within the meaning of the statute, and the contribution of money or anything else which shall induce such combination may be a beginning of the enterprise.....1021

To "provide or prepare the means for any military expedition or enterprise," within the meaning of section 6, such preparation must be made as shall aid the expedition. The contribution of money, clothing for the troops, provisions, arms, or any other contribution which shall tend to forward the expedition or add to the comfort or maintenance of those engaged in it, is a violation of this provision..... 1018, 1021, 1023

The overt act is not an invasion of a foreign country, but taking the incipient steps in the enterprise, such as providing the means for the expedition, furnishing munitions of war or money, enlisting men, and, in short, doing anything and everything that is necessary to the commencement and prosecution of the enterprise.....1020, 1021

Where a privateer was illegally fitted out and commissioned in this country by the French minister, but was afterwards dismantled and her register canceled, then sold to a foreigner, and fitted out and commissioned in a foreign port, held, that her proceedings under the latter commission were not in violation of the neutrality laws 7

To constitute the offense of accepting and exercising a commission to serve against a foreign prince, state, etc., with whom the United States are at peace, under the first section of the act of congress, some overt act under the commission must be done, such as raising men for the enterprise, collecting provisions, munitions of war, or any other act which shows an exercise of the authority which the commission was supposed to confer..... 1018

NEW TRIAL.

Where a jury has had a case before it and disagreed, a second trial cannot be had by another jury from the residue of the panel. The case must go over, in order that it may be tried on a new venire..... 101
In granting a new trial for defendant, the court will make it a condition that the verdict shall stand until another shall be rendered 913

NUISANCE.

A person who owns properties, such as tanneries and mills, located upon a navigable steam, for which he depends in part for his trade, may sue to enjoin the obstruction of the navigation of the bay in which the river empties by a private corporation, where the same would injure his trade.... 626
It is an indictable offense to inflict punishment on a servant or slave, to the annoyance or nuisance of citizens whose pleasure or business carry them near the scene of infliction.....1087
The question of nuisance or no nuisance is one of fact, exclusively for the jury to decide1087

OBSTRUCTING JUSTICE.

Act April 30, 1790, making it a misdemeanor to willfully obstruct, resist, or oppose an officer of the United States in serving or executing any process or warrant, embraces every legal process whatsoever, whether issued by a court in session, or by a judge or magistrate, or commissioner acting in the due administration of any law of the United States..... 983
Any obstruction to the free action of an officer or his lawful assistants in the service of process, willfully placed in their way, is sufficient to constitute the offense. Actual or threatened violence is not necessary 983
The provisions of Act 1790, § 22, apply equally to the execution of process under the fugitive slave law.....1013.

PARTIES.

The court will not make a decree, the execution of which would affect the right of a party not before it, or throw a cloud upon his title; and where such party is necessary to a final decree the bill should be dismissed without prejudice..... 844
In the case of a bill against a banking corporation, to account for certain property held by them, as collateral security for debts due them from a third person, and to apply the surplus, after satisfying themselves, to the plaintiff's debt, the debtor is a necessary party to the bill..... 116
A state which is an indorser of bonds secured by a statutory mortgage is not a necessary party to a suit brought by holders of the bonds to foreclose the mortgage 850
In a suit by a creditor of a corporation to reach a fund which has been distributed among its stockholders, all the stockholders need not be made parties, the impossibility of bringing all before the court being sufficient to dispense with the ordinary rule of making all persons in interest parties 435
In suits in rem in admiralty, all persons having claims of a like nature against the thing may join in a single libel for the purpose of having that question decided, whether the claims arise from tort or contract 879

Where a vessel is arrested by a lien creditor, all other lien creditors may intervene by summary petition, without having the vessel arrested again, and have their claims allowed 879

Where a person is a necessary party, in consequence of an act performed by himself after the commencement of the suit, the proper proceeding to bring him into court is an original bill in the nature of a supplemental bill 331

PARTNERSHIP.

A partner in a milling firm, who permits his co-partner to hold the firm out as a dealer in grains by the use of cards and letter heads indicating such business, will be liable on contracts for the sale and purchase of grain for future delivery, made in the name of the firm. *38

A partnership cannot be proved by evidence of general reputation. 119

PARTY WALLS.

A party wall, though built wholly on one lot, after it has remained there 12 years cannot be pulled down by the owner of such lot and rebuilt on the surveyed line. . . 139

Where a nine-inch party wall is torn down, it cannot be rebuilt by a 14-inch party wall 139

Where the defendant uses a party wall in the erection of his adjoining store, and is put to necessary expense in making the party wall fit for his use, the jury, in assessing the damages, may take into consideration such extra expense, unless the party, or those under whom he claims, waived the defects. 1073

PATENTS.

The commissioner of patents.
The chief clerk is the acting commissioner as well in the necessary absence of the head of the office as in case of a vacancy de jure 577

Patentability.
The word "useful" (Act 1836, § 6) is used merely in contradistinction to what is frivolous or mischievous. 367, 1060

The result alone, even when shown to be more economical, useful, and beneficial to the public, in the manufacture of a better article, is not sufficient evidence of novelty and invention 798

A mere principle may be the subject of a patent, where embodied and applied so as to afford some result of practical utility in the arts and manufactures. 367

The date of invention is the time when the patentee conceives the idea of doing the thing in substantially the way in which he patents it 507

The true test of invention is not whether an ordinary mechanic can make the combination, if it is suggested, but whether he would make the combination without suggestion, by means of his ordinary knowledge 507

The principle or essential character of an invention involves two elements: (1) The object attained; (2) the means by which it is obtained; and if either of these be new, it may be the subject of a patent. 258

The claim of the art of cutting ice by means of an apparatus worked by any other power than human is a claim of an abstract principle, and void. 723

The application to railway carriages of an improvement in axles or bearings which was well known as applied to other carriages, held not patentable. 259

A new and improved method of producing a useful result or effect is as much the subject of a patent as an entire new machine 367

The fact that the inventor of a feature in a machine which anticipates the patented invention did not understand nor have in view the particular advantage of, or function performed by, such feature, will not prevent its invalidating the patent. 489

Prior machines relied upon to defeat a subsequent patent must have been working machines, which have either done work or been capable of doing it. They must not be mere experiments, afterwards abandoned 507

The substitution in a solar microscope of a photographic lens for a microscopic lens is patentable, if the latter did not produce the effect or perform the functions of the former 549

An invention of a flour paste containing corrosive sublimate to prevent putrefaction, but in such small quantities in proportion to the flour that its poisonous and corrosive qualities are neutralized by the flour and the paste thus rendered innocuous, is not anticipated by a flour paste in which a larger proportion of corrosive sublimate was used for the purpose of making the paste poisonous and corrosive. 556

Where an anticipating device has been changed so that by the change the thing which is produced is practically a new structure, the new device, though subsidiary to the former one, is patentable. 907

A ruffle made by machinery at one operation, which theretofore required two or more, is not for that reason patentable. 610

A patent for a design for a reel, consisting of the making of the reel in the shape of a well-known mathematical figure,—the reel itself, as an article of manufacture, being old,—is not valid, under Act March 2, 1861, § 11. 612

A patent for cooked meat put up in a solid form, in its natural state, without disintegration or desiccation, in hermetically sealed packages, cannot be sustained as a new article of commerce. 251

The method of cutting up meat, preparing it with antiseptics, pressing, putting into cans, pressing afterwards, and then hermetically sealing the cans, is not patentable, for want of novelty. 251

The rule that a claim for a combination of old instrumentalities in a machine is not anticipated by a prior invention in which the combination of equivalent instrumentalities appears, when the inventor of the second patent has changed the mechanism so as to produce new and valuable results, stated. 43

The previous construction of a machine resembling that of a patent, but which proved unsatisfactory in operation, and was therefore abandoned, does not operate as an anticipation of the patent. 261

A combination, to be patentable, must disclose something new, either in the combination itself or in the result achieved. 517

Who may obtain patent.
It is not the person who has produced an idea, but he who has embodied it into a practical machine, and reduced it to practical use, who is entitled to protection. 273

The original inventor of a machine, who has reduced his invention to practice, is entitled to a priority of patent right, although subsequently the same machine may have been invented by another person 491

The fact that another first conceived the idea and embodied it in a machine will not prevent a later inventor obtaining a patent, where the former abandoned his experiments before the machine was perfected 273

Page

Page

An inventor who does not reduce his invention to practice, or apply for a patent till after 18 months, others in the meantime having invented the same thing, and reduced it to practice, cannot recover for a breach of his patent..... 258

Prior public use or sale.
An experimental use to ascertain the utility, value, or success of the thing invented by practice is not fatal to a patent 273, 277

The mere using by the inventor of his patent in trying experiments, or by his neighbors, with his consent, as an act of kindness, for temporary and occasional purposes only, will not destroy his right to a patent therefor..... 723

A prior public use which will destroy the inventor's right to a patent much appear to have been with his knowledge and consent 723

Prior description or foreign patent.
If a previous patent so far describes a machine covered by a subsequent patent that any mechanic of ordinary skill could, from the description in the first patent, construct or supply all the essential parts of the mechanism described in the second patent, the latter is void..... 507

Where the description in a foreign publication is fully as definite as the specifications in the application for the patent in this country, it is sufficient to defeat the patent 649

A foreign patent is not admissible as evidence to anticipate an American patent of a date anterior to the enrollment of the foreign patent 43

Abandonment: Laches.
Loss of means by one of two joint inventors, rendering him unable to prosecute his plans in respect to the invention, combined with the assurance of his co-inventor that when the latter should move in the matter of procuring a patent the former should have an equal interest therein, held to excuse laches..... 798

Where an invention has not been abandoned to the public, and has not been in public use or on sale with the consent and allowance of the inventor, no lapse of time will bar an application for a patent, nor affect its validity when granted..... 429

Caveat.
Where a caveat is precise and definite in every detail, and the application does not vary therefrom, the patentee cannot claim that the caveat protected anything more 527

A caveat will protect only one of several distinct patentable subjects falling within its general scope, though, in connection with other circumstances, it may furnish strong proof of his claim to priority in another invention in the same line..... 527

Application and issue: Interference.
A joint patent may be issued to two persons, where each has invented a distinct improvement on the same machine, the object sought to be attained being a unit, and the legal effect thereof is to vest in each of them a joint interest in both improvements 217

A single patent may be taken for two machines which conduce to the same common purpose and object, though they are each separately capable of a distinct use.. 723

A single patent cannot be taken for two distinct machines, not conducting to the same common purpose or object, but designed for totally different and independent objects 723

Page

The fact that the first inventor of a new and useful improvement has not in its specifications described the same with the clearness and particularity required by the statute as a condition of obtaining a patent will not aid a subsequent inventor upon an interference between them..... 798

The objection that one of two parties, who claim as joint inventors, is not shown by the evidence to have been in fact a joint inventor with the other, is not available to the unsuccessful party in an interference proceeding 798

The deposition of one not a party to the interference, tending to show that he was a joint inventor with one of two parties who are claiming as joint inventors, and that the other had no part in it, though not admissible to establish the opponent's claim, may yet be considered as affecting the rights of the joint applicants..... 798

Declarations of a party to an interference at any time before the contest arose, describing his invention, are admissible from necessity, and as part of the res gestæ, for the purpose of showing what he had invented at the date of such declarations... 798

A party who, pending an interference proceeding, assigns all his interest in the subject-matter, and remains merely a nominal party, is nevertheless incompetent to testify therein 798

A party to an interference may, from necessity, be allowed by his own oath to prove the loss out of his own custody of a paper as a foundation for proving by other testimony the contents thereof..... 798

In the case of a joint invention, the deposition of one of the inventors alone may be received to show the loss of a drawing which he had made..... 798

Appeals from commissioners' decisions.
Where the commissioner's refusal to grant a patent is based upon want of novelty, the judge cannot consider a reason of appeal which is occupied mainly in a description of the object and importance of the machine, and of the comparative merits of the applicant's machine and a prior machine, which the commissioner has cited as an anticipation 306

Reasons of appeal which state "that the decision is in opposition to a clear apprehension of the merits of the case"; "that the decision is inconsistent, as opposed in affirmation to precedents which have governed such cases"; and "that the decision is adverse to the opinion of skillful and competent men,"—held too vague and indefinite to raise any question for the judge to pass upon 306

Upon an appeal in an interference proceeding the judge is not confined to the mere question of priority, but has jurisdiction to determine the question of the patentability of the alleged invention..... 798

Validity.
When necessary to make the description of an improvement to a machine understood by a person in the trade to which it belongs, the whole machine must be described..... 367

In such case the patentee must distinguish the part he claims, to prevent the patent being void for ambiguity..... 367

The mechanical parts, principles, or combinations not claimed as new, but mentioned in the specification, are admitted to be old, and need not be so stated or particularly described 269

Where a patentee claims old and well-known devices as a part of his invention, and they are essential to his improvement, the patent is invalid..... 269

An inventor is bound to describe, in his specification, in what his invention consists, and what his particular claim is. But he is not bound to any precise form of words, provided their import can be clearly ascertained by fair interpretation, even though the expressions may be inaccurate..... 723

A signature to the patent, and the certificate of copies, by a person calling himself "acting commissioner," is sufficient on its face in controversies between the patentee and third persons, as the law recognizes an acting commissioner to be lawful..... 572

The mistake in a patent may be corrected by the commissioner who granted it without a resigning or resealing, but where it is material the letters cannot operate except on cases arising after the correction is made... 572

The correction of a clerical mistake operates back to the date of the original patent.. 577

The sanction of the secretary of state to the correction of a clerical mistake in letters patent may be given by a separate writing.. 577

The omission to take the oath or pay the fee will not render the patent void when granted 1060

The fact that a blank form of oath not executed is found among the papers cannot overcome the direct recital of the letters patent that the oath was taken, or the presumption that the requirements of the law were complied with in issuing the patent... 1060

A third person cannot take advantage of the fact that the patent was obtained by fraud, but the patent must be respected and enforced until reversed or annulled by some proceedings directly for that purpose..... 1060

Extent of claim.

Where a patent is for a peculiar combination or arrangement of old devices, and not for a new device, the patentee is not entitled to insist upon mechanical equivalents..... 896

The inventor of an improvement cannot entitle himself to a patent more broad than his invention..... 491

The patent is not for a principle or a result, but for the means described for accomplishing the result..... 295

Drawings annexed to a patent issued under the act of 1837 form no part of the specification, where no drawings were annexed to the original patent..... 258

Repeal of patent.

Where a scire facias is ordered to be issued against a patentee under Act Feb. 21, 1793, to repeal a patent, the court will not permit the United States to be substituted as plaintiffs in place of the petitioner..... 485

Reissue: Disclaimer.

Upon a surrender for reissue, the patentee or his assignee may make the reissue what he would have made the original, if he had known how 217

The patentee can add to the claim of his original patent anything of his invention which is warranted by the description contained in the specification and the drawings connected with it..... 549

In the reissued patent the patentee need not claim all that was claimed in the original patent..... 1060

The surrender of the original patent by the patentee at the request of the assignees, and a reissue to the patentee, who immediately assigns the same to the assignees of the original patent, though irregular, does not vitiate the reissue..... 298

The decision of the commissioner of patents in respect to accepting a surrender of an old patent, and granting a new one, is not re-examinable elsewhere, unless it appear on the face of the patent that he has exceeded his authority..... 593

In the case of a joint patent the joint patentability is not res judicata, but is open to question upon an application for a reissue 217

Extension: Renewal.

A reissue granted to an assignee may be extended to the patentee. In judgment of law, a reissue is only a continuation of the original patent..... 1060

A notice of an application to extend the original patent is a sufficient notice of an application for the extension of a reissue... 1060

An extension of the term may be granted to the administrator of the patentee... 572, 586

On a surrender and extension, the new letters may be issued with an amended specification 567

A patent surrendered and renewed operates as from the commencement of the original patent, except as to causes of action arising before the renewal..... 572

The functions of the commissioner in extension cases are judicial, and his judgment settles conclusively all questions of notice.. 1060

Act July 4, 1836, applies to patents issued before its passage, and a prior assignee of an original term is entitled to the benefit of an extension where the contract provides that any alteration or renewal shall accrue to the benefit of the parties..... 233

The assignee or grantee under the original patent does not acquire any right under the extended patent unless such right be expressly conveyed to him by the patentee.. 586

A person using under license patented machines during the original term is entitled to continue the use of the identical machine during an extended term..... 565, 613

The assignee of the territorial right to make, construct, and use the patented article may, during the term of its subsequent extension, continue to use and repair the patented articles; but he is not entitled to make them 467

A licensee who, having machines in use during the end of an original term of a patent, takes a license for another year under the extended patent, waives any rights which he had to use such machines when the first term expired..... 617

Assignment.

An assignment of a patent by one of two or more administrators is valid..... 367

A patentee cannot, by a surrender of his patent, affect the rights of third persons, to whom he has previously assigned his interest in the whole or a part of the patent, unless the assignees consent to the surrender..... 593

License.

Under a license to use the patented machine in certain territory, the licensee may build more than one machine, but cannot use both at one time..... 565

A clause in a license restricting the use of the invention within a certain territory, and the sale of the product therein, is not repugnant to the concluding clause that the licensee "has all the rights" which the patentee has in said territory under the patent 561

Under a license to run a patented machine, with the restriction that the product should not be made for other persons to be carried out of a specified territory and resold as an article of merchandise, the product cannot be sold out of the territory, or sold to persons to be carried out and resold as an article of merchandise..... 215

A license to manufacture and sell carriages with the patented invention attached, with a proviso that the same should not be assigned, but exercised solely by the licensees in their own manufactory, and that portions of carriages with or adapted for the invention should not be sold, does not prohibit the licensees from procuring the patented fixtures to be made by others..... 483

A license to run a patented machine may be assigned, and the assignee must perform the conditions of the license..... 227

A violation of a patent does not work a forfeiture of a license under the patent, ex-

Page	— Who liable.	Page
	Defendant is liable for an infringement, in the use of an infringing tool, by one who worked in his factory by the piece, furnishing his own tools.....	613
	— Remedy generally.
	If the patentee, after obtaining his patent, dedicates or surrenders it to public use, or acquiesces for a long period in the public use thereof, without objection, he is not entitled to the aid of a court of equity to protect his patent; and such acquiescence may amount to complete proof of a dedication or surrender thereof to the public.....	723
	A bill in equity quia timet will lie for an injunction upon well-grounded proof of an apprehended intention of defendant to violate a patent.....	593
	— Preliminary injunction.
	For the purpose of restraining the unlawful use of a patented machine out of the jurisdiction, it is only necessary that the court should have jurisdiction of the person of defendant.....	215
	But where it may be necessary to proceed directly against the machine itself, as in extreme cases of contumacy, or of fraudulent contrivance to evade an injunction, the proceedings must be instituted in the district in which the machine is located.....	215
	Where a plaintiff moves for an injunction, and it is denied on defects pointed out, it is too late for him to wait until after the defendant has closed his proofs for final hearing, before renewing his motion, on papers designed to cure such defects.....	612
	On motion for an injunction, the affidavit of a single witness is not sufficient to outweigh the oath of a patentee and the general presumption arising from the grant of the letters after a great lapse of time.....	586
	A separate affidavit by plaintiff of his belief that the patentees were the first and original inventors dispensed with where the bill contains such an averment.....	846
	A general allegation by affidavit, on information and belief, that the thing patented existed before, without disclosing the particulars of the information leading to the belief, is insufficient.....	846
	Advantage cannot be taken of complainant's delay in applying for an injunction where his suspicions of infringement were allayed by direct misrepresentations of defendant.....	639
	The burden of showing complainant's previous knowledge of the infringement, where the motion is resisted on the ground of laches, is upon defendant.....	639
	The grant of a patent, without notice to a prior patentee of the application, is no bar to a preliminary injunction in favor of the latter.....	101
	An injunction will not be issued against a respondent's using a machine, unless it is proved that he has used it himself, or employed others to use it for him, or at least has profited by the use of it.....	572
	Where long possession of a patent has existed, and frequent recoveries under it, an injunction will be issued, the originality of the invention by the patentee not being denied, unless the letters appear for some cause illegal or void.....	572
	An injunction will not issue where it does not appear from the record that defendant has ever made or sold the infringing articles in the district.....	249
	An injunction will be denied where there is reasonable doubt about the originality or novelty of plaintiff's invention, or about the substantial identity of the thing manufactured by defendant.....	262
	The purchasers from defendant of the alleged infringing machine, whose use by him has been enjoined, will be restrained from cept where the licensee has assumed such a hostile attitude towards the patent as to amount to a repudiation of the right conveyed by the license.....	483
	The forfeiture of a license may be enforced according to its terms, by reason of the abandonment or neglect of the licensee..	227
	Where a licensee gives notes payable at different times under the agreement that the license should be void if any of the notes should become due and be unpaid, the license is forfeited the moment a note becomes due and is unpaid; and it is optional with the licensor either to sue on the note or to treat the license as forfeited, and enjoin the further use of the patented machine.....	595
	Where, in such a case, the licensor applied for an injunction, an order was made granting it, unless the licensee should, within 60 days, pay the amount of the note and other unpaid notes, with costs.....	595
	Where a license is revoked, and the licensee is sued as an infringer, he is at liberty to avail himself of any defense ordinarily open to any defendant charged with infringement.....	561, 616
	Sale of patented machine or product.
	A patented machine, sold to one who had a license to use it on payment of a royalty based upon the product, was taken to pieces, and the parts sold at auction as scrap iron, on the death of the licensee. Held , that the purchaser of such parts had no right to reconstruct and use the machine.....	639
	Infringement—What constitutes.
	The patent protects the principle applied, and it cannot be evaded by the adoption of mechanical equivalents based upon the same principle.....	367
	The inventor has the exclusive right under the patent to use the machine for all purposes for which it is applicable.....	507
	A specification in a patent of the mechanical parts or chemical ingredients includes known mechanical or chemical equivalents, but not existing equivalents previously unknown to ordinarily skillful machinists or chemists.....	556
	The use of chemical equivalents in place of one or more of the elements of a patented compound may infringe the patent for the compound, although in some respects the substituted equivalents are improvements..	556
	The making of an improvement in a patented machine gives the inventor no right to use the original invention while the term of its patent continues.....	581
	The identity or diversity of two machines depends, not on the employment of the same elements or powers of mechanics, but upon producing the given effect by substantially the same mode of operation, or substantially the same combination of powers.....	1060
	A patent for a combination of three distinct things is not infringed by combining two of them with a third, which is substantially different from the third element described in the specification.....	1060
	A patent for two machines, each of which is a new invention, is infringed by the use of one of such machines.....	723
	A paint for preventing the fouling of ships' bottoms, similar to the patented paint, but substituting arsenite of copper for oxide of copper, held not an infringement.....	420
	A patent for increasing or decreasing the draft of a locomotive boiler by carrying the exhaust pipes of the engines to the bottom of the smoke pipe, and there controlling the discharge of the steam by plugs, is infringed by a locomotive in which a like result is accomplished by carrying the exhaust pipes to the bottom of the smoke box, instead of the smoke pipe.....	261

	Page
using the machine where the injunction remains in full force.	567
Where a licensee has violated the restrictions of his license under a misapprehension of his rights, and has discontinued such violation, a provisional injunction will not be granted.	215
Where the respondents deny the validity of the patent of the plaintiffs, the court will dissolve the injunction at the next term, if the suit at law is not by that time brought against them to try its validity.	567
After the neglect of an order to file testimony, and the overruling of a demurrer as bad, the case will not be opened for further hearing as to a temporary injunction previously granted, unless respondent show by affidavit that the course pursued was not for delay, and indemnity is also filed.	567
An injunction will not be dissolved on account of doubts as to the validity of a new patent issued to correct clerical mistakes in the original patent.	577
A motion to dissolve the injunction will not be heard on the same evidence on which it was granted, or new evidence improperly neglected to be offered before.	581
The injunction will be dissolved on the answer denying the validity of the patent supported by evidence, unless plaintiff file counter evidence sustaining its validity.	581
Where, on a motion to dissolve an injunction, the evidence seems to preponderate in plaintiff's favor, the court will continue the injunction until the right can be tried at law or by issue out of chancery.	581
The sending of circulars to parties engaged in the trade, notifying them of a preliminary injunction, is improper.	249
— Procedure.
Prior to Act July 8, 1870, there was no statute limiting the time within which a suit must be prosecuted, either at law or in equity, for the infringement of a patent.	429
The assignee of a patent right, in part or in whole, cannot maintain any suit at law or in equity, either as sole or as joint plaintiff thereon, at least as against third persons, until his patent has been recorded in the proper department, according to the requisitions of the patent acts.	723
In a suit for infringement, defendant cannot, by a cross bill which sets up no color of title in himself, demand a discovery from the plaintiff in the original suit as to the source of validity of his title.	841
An injunction granted on an original bill, before the surrender of a patent, cannot be maintained upon the new patent, unless a supplemental bill be filed, founded thereon.	593
The defense that a reissue is invalid, on the ground that the patent does not contain a sufficient specification of the proportions of the ingredients to meet the requirements of the law, cannot be considered unless set up in the answer.	421
The defense that the patentee has dedicated or surrendered his patent to the public will not be noticed unless explicitly relied upon and put in issue by the answer.	723
No notice is required by Act July 4, 1836, § 15, of the names and places of residence of the witnesses by whom it is intended to prove a prior knowledge and use of the thing patented.	258
In a joint suit in equity by a patentee and his assignee in part, a disclaimer by the patentee alone will not entitle the parties to the benefit of Act 1837, c. 45, §§ 7, 9.	723
A disclaimer after suit brought is not sufficient to entitle plaintiff to a perpetual injunction.	723
— Evidence.
The presumption, arising from the letters patent, that the patentee was the original and first inventor, in the absence of the application for the patent, extends back only to the date of the letters patent, and in no case does it extend further back than to the time of the filing of the original application.	295

	Page
The patent and certified copies of the record and drawings deposited, with the references thereon, are prima facie evidence of the particulars of the invention patented.	269
Certified copies of the patent and specification, and of the drawings, under oath, filed under Act March 3, 1837, § 1, are prima facie evidence.	277
The evidence must leave no room for a reasonable doubt in order to sustain the defense of want of novelty.	429
— Injunction and its violation.
A party enjoined against the use of a patent is guilty of contempt if he afterwards use another patent, similar in principle, with knowledge that the author of such patent had previously been enjoined.	581
Where reference is made to a master to take an account, an injunction was withheld until the coming in of his report.	776
The limitation of two years in section 2057 does not apply to a proceeding to review a decree in equity.	256
— Accounting: Damages.
Though plaintiff has an established license fee, where the profits made by an infringer amount to more than such fees, plaintiff is entitled to recover such profits on an accounting.	619
Marking patented machine or product.
The manufacturer of an article, which has been patented, can affix upon such article the word "Patented" or any other word of similar import, together with the date of the patent, after the patent has expired.	223
Such an article does not come within the meaning of the statute which prohibits the affixing of the word "Patented" upon any "unpatented article."	223
Various particular inventions and patents.
Beds. No. 97,375, for bedsprings, held invalid for want of novelty.	649
Cameras. No. 16,700 (reissued No. 2,311), for improvement in solar cameras, held valid and infringed.	549
Cameras. Southworth's patent of April 10, 1855, reissued September 25, 1860, for plate holders, held valid.	295; contra, 298
Canned Beef. Nos. 43,516 (reissued No. 6,451), 149,276 (reissued No. 6,370), 161,848 (reissued No. 7,923), for canned meats, held invalid for want of novelty.	251
Coal car. Winan's patent held invalid.	*262
Cook stoves. Wilson's patent of October 10, 1834, for improvement, held invalid.	132
Faucet. Jenkins patent of June 27, 1865, for a self-closing faucet, held valid.	907
Gates. Reissue No. 2,667, for improvement in farm gates, held invalid.	679
Hoop skirts. No. 74,672, for improvement in springs, construed, held valid and infringed.	846
Leather. Woodman's patent of March 29, 1864, for an improved machine for ornamenting leather, held valid and infringed.	*507, *516
Locks. No. 32,331 (reissued No. 4,170), for improvement in locks, held valid and infringed.	776
Looms. No. 6,936, for improvement in looms for weaving figured fabrics, held not infringed.	1060
Nuts. No. 8,427 (reissue No. 666), and No. 13,118 and No. 8,322 (reissued No. 313), for improvement in the manufacture of nuts, held valid and infringed by machines described in Chisholm's patent of November 17, 1863, and Paton's patent of November 29, 1864	429

	Page
Paints. Reissue No. 4,598 (original No. 40,515), for a paint to prevent the fouling of ship's bottoms, held valid, but not infringed	420
Such patent held infringed	421
Paste. No. 52,779, for improved paste for bookbinders, construed, and held infringed	556
Planing machines. Woodworth's patent of December 27, 1828, and the reissue of July 8, 1845, held valid	119, 162, 968
Planing machines. No. 138,462, for improvement, held invalid, as having been anticipated	489
Power. Parker's patent of October 19, 1843, for an improvement in the application of hydraulic power, construed in a charge to a jury	367
Railroad cars. Wiman's patent of October 1, 1834, construed, held valid and infringed	273, 277
Speaking-tube whistles. No. 103,406, for improvement, held infringed	596
Thread. No. 26,415, for improvement in machines for winding thread on spools, held valid	43

PAYMENT.

Bonds whose consideration had failed, previously assigned in payment of a debt, cannot be given in evidence on a plea of payment	130
--	-----

PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS.

Where a statute provides for a board of medical examiners, and requires a license from them as a condition of practicing medicine, a physician may maintain an action at law for his services, though he practiced without a license, if during the time of such services there was no existing board of examiners	536
--	-----

PIRACY.

Under the power to define and punish piracies (Const. U. S. art. 1, § 8, subd. 10), congress may declare to be piracy the service of a citizen or resident of the United States on a vessel used in kidnapping the inhabitants of a foreign country for the purpose of making them slaves, or the use of a vessel owned in the United States in such kidnapping	1026
Congress, under the power to regulate commerce, and to pass all laws necessary to carry that power into effect, may make depredations upon the high seas punishable as piracy, though they do not strictly constitute such crime as known to international law	1049
Until our country has made war, we are considered at peace with all by the law of nations, and without any treaty to that effect	1024

PLEADING AT LAW.

See, also, "Abatement and Revival."

It is not necessary to aver matter of law or public statutes of which the court takes judicial notice	850
Advantage may be taken of the failure of the pleadings to aver jurisdictional facts at any stage of the case	447
If a count in a declaration contains sufficient averments, surplusage will not vitiate it	747

Where goods are received to be sold at certain prices or returned on demand, and are sold and the money received, no special demand is necessary in an action for such money; but otherwise where the action is for a failure to return the goods	747
A plea of payment admits all the allegations in the plaintiff's declaration, essential to support the action, and it is unnecessary for the plaintiff to prove them	952
Where a plea in abatement is bad, plaintiff need not demur, but may treat it as a nullity	951
If a defendant wishes to contest the citizenship of the parties to an action in the national courts, he must do so by plea in abatement; and such a plea, if joined to one to the merits, may be stricken out, but is not liable to a demurrer	766
The plea puis darrien continuance admits plaintiff's cause of action, and disposes all previous pleas and defenses	386
After judgment for the plaintiff upon demurrer to the replication to the plea of limitations, the court will not permit the defendant to withdraw the demurrer, and rejoin specially, unless he can show by affidavit that it is necessary to the justice of the case	144
After judgment for the plaintiff on the defendant's demurrer, and writ of inquiry awarded, the court will not permit the defendant to plead de novo , unless he will withdraw his demurrer	517
Impertinences are any matters not pertinent to those points which are properly before the court for decision at any particular stage of the case	447
A plea in bar cannot be withdrawn, after the case has been prepared for trial, in order to file a plea in abatement	805
It is not incumbent upon joint plaintiffs to prove that they are joint partners	560
The writ is not abated by substituting the assignee in place of the plaintiff, who is bankrupt	387
When a substantial amendment is made in a declaration, the defendant should be allowed until the next succeeding term to plead	722

PLEADING IN ADMIRALTY.

A joint libel against three vessels cannot be amended by substituting the name of the owner of one vessel so as to change it from a libel in rem to one in personam	869
A libel in rem cannot be changed into a libel in personam against the owner	869

PLEADING IN EQUITY.

A bill charging notice of the fraud against one of defendants, "that the defendant then and there, well knowing all and singular the premises," etc., is bad	445
A bill which requires an answer must contain interrogatories	226
A defendant cannot file a cross bill until the original bill is answered	951
After a special demurrer to a bill the allegations of fact on the hearing of the demurrer must be considered as true	567
New matter inserted in a replication to meet special facts alleged in the answer in defense, not responsive to the bill, will be treated as surplusage merely	653

PRACTICE AT LAW.

A discontinuance will be entered without leave of court unless defendant interfere on the ground that the discontinuance is oppressive	805
--	-----

When an action of replevin has been discontinued by the nonappearance of either party, the court will not, at a subsequent term, reinstate the cause, unless it appears to be the fault of the clerk that the appearance was not entered.....

Page
8

PRACTICE IN ADMIRALTY.

A joint action will lie against a vessel in rem and the master in personam on a cause of action for which both are liable.....

919

A proceeding in rem and a proceeding in personam may be joined in one action, where such joinder is calculated to advance the ends of substantial justice.....

919

PRACTICE IN EQUITY.

The omission to make oath to the bill praying for an injunction cannot be raised by demurrer after a hearing and order to file evidence.....

567

After publication of the testimony, no new witnesses can be examined, and no new evidence can be taken, except where the judge himself entertains a doubt, or when some additional fact or inquiry is indispensable to enable him to make a satisfactory decree...
A witness may be examined to the mere credit of the other witnesses, whose depositions have been already taken and published in the cause, but he will not be allowed to be examined to prove or disprove any fact material to the merits of the case.....

401

451

The time for publication will be enlarged after publication has past, though not in fact made, on good cause shown by affidavit, such as surprise, accident, or other circumstances which repel any imputation of laches.....

451

Exhibits in the cause may be proved after publication, and even viva voce at the hearing, when there has been an omission of the proof in due season, and they are applicable to the merits.....

451

The court may, in the exercise of a sound discretion, allow the introduction of newly-discovered evidence of witnesses to facts in issue in the cause, after publication and knowledge of the former testimony, and even after the hearing. But it will not exercise this discretion to let in merely cumulative testimony.....

451

The same rule holds in cases of bills of review and supplementary bills in the nature of bills of review.....

451

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

See, also, "Factors and Brokers."

The appointment of a second attorney or agent to collect a debt is a revocation of the authority of the first one, and persons knowing of the second appointment are held to a knowledge of the revocation..

17

An attorney employed, not to attend to all his client's legal business, but to collect a particular debt, is a special, as opposed to a general, agent; and those dealing with him are bound to ascertain the extent of his authority.....

17

A principal may be estopped by the intentional, willful misstatement of an agent

722

Every sort of profit derived by an agent from dealing or speculating with his principal's effects is the property of the latter, and must be accounted for.....

787

When the principal can trace his property in the hands of his agent, and distinguish it from the mass of the property of the latter, he is entitled to recover it from the agent, or, in the case of his failure, from his assignees.....

789

PRIZE.

Page

Where the captured vessel was destroyed because unfit to be sent in for adjudication, but the cargo was sent in, held, that the court had jurisdiction.....

915

The title of the absolute owner prevails in a prize court over the interest of a lienholder, whatever the equities between those parties may be.....

300

Property purchased at a provisional sale, afterwards confirmed by a sentence of condemnation of a duly-constituted court, is not liable to restitution in a suit in personam against the purchaser's consignee..

867

The crew of the captured vessel were at their request put on shore, and the vessel was destroyed, and no person on board at her capture was sent in for examination. On special leave of the court witnesses for the capturing vessel were examined.....

915

The costs fixed by statute for similar services in admiralty will be allowed in prize cases, where the allowance is not covered by special statute.....

1058

The compensation directed to be made by Act March 25, 1862, will be computed and adjusted conformably to allowances by the laws of the United States to employes for like services under the government, or in accordance with established rules and usages of the courts in regard to their officers rendering like services.....

1058

The gross costs taxed to any of the officers of the court for services in prize suits will be, in collection or payment, subject to all limitations as to amounts or periods of payment, under the acts of congress in force at the time of such taxation.....

1058

Compensation to the officers of court for their services will not be measured by a percentage on the amount of property involved.....

1058

PUBLIC LANDS.

See, also, "Grant."

A covenant by bona fide settlers on unsurveyed lands to purchase them as soon as surveyed, and then mortgage them to a creditor to secure a debt, is not a contract in violation of Act March 31, 1830, §§ 4, 5..

699

A deed of military bounty lands, made in 1820 by the attorney of a patentee under a power of attorney executed in 1816, where the patent was not issued until 1819, is void ab initio under Act April 16, 1816.....

707

A settler under the Oregon donation act acquires title from the passage of the act or the date of his settlement. The patent issued to him is only record evidence of such title.....

762

A certificate and patent thereon, issued under the Oregon donation act, are parts of the same transaction or procedure, and may be read together for the purpose of correcting or explaining the patent, and where there is an absolute contradiction between them the certificate must prevail..

762

Under the Oregon donation act the surveyor general might partition the donation of a married settler equally between the settler and his wife at any point of the compass he might deem expedient, subject, under Act July 4, 1836, § 1, to the supervision of the commissioner of the general land office.....

762

Where a valid objection is found in a certificate issued by the surveyor to a settler under the Oregon donation act, it should be returned to the local office for correction. It cannot be disposed of by issuing a patent contrary thereto.....

762

Page

Where a married settler under section 4 of the Oregon donation act has completed the residence and cultivation required by the act, and made proof thereof, he is entitled to a patent for his donation, and may convey the same in fee simple..... 769

By virtue of the marriage the husband took an estate for the life of himself and wife in the latter's half of the donation claim, and it was not in the power of the territorial legislature to divest him of this estate, although it might exempt it from execution 771

The wife's share of the donation under Act Sept. 27, 1850, was not her separate estate, and Act Or. Jan. 20, 1852, which undertook to declare it so, is void so far as prior settlements are concerned..... 771

A Spanish grant or open concession of land in Louisiana is not valid against the United States unless the same was surveyed 350

To constitute a survey of land under the Spanish government, there must have been an actual measurement by running lines and angles with compass and chain, and designating corners and boundaries by marking trees, fixing monuments, or referring to existing objects of notoriety on the ground, giving bearings and distances, and making descriptive field notes and plots of the work..... 350

A warrant or order of survey could be executed by the surveyor general of the province of Louisiana, or by any deputy appointed by him, or by the district surveyor, or by the commandant of a post, or by a private person specially authorized by the governor general or intendant; but the location of a grant cannot be made by a mere private survey..... 350

The Spanish grant of June 27, 1797, of lands in Louisiana to Winter rejected, because the grant did not designate any particular land, and was not designated and ascertained by an authorized survey.... 350

A list of governors of California, with notes 1259

Table of land claims in the state of California 1217

RAILROAD COMPANIES.

A right to change a location, "either for the difficulty of construction, or of procuring a right of way at a reasonable cost, or whenever a better and cheaper route can be had," does not authorize a company to relocate because a particular town on the selected route will not contribute to the road. Nor will it authorize a departure from the points named in the charter.... 626

Under the authority in general terms to extend the line of road, the company is not authorized to depart from it in any other part except from its termini..... 626

Under authority "to construct branched roads from the main route to other towns or places in the several counties through which the road might pass" the entire branch must be within the limits of a county 626

An act authorizing the indorsement by the government in behalf of the state of railroad bonds bearing interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum authorizes the indorsement of bonds bearing such rate of interest payable in gold..... 850

Bona fide holders for value of bonds indorsed by the governor in behalf of the state, referring to the act giving him authority, are not charged with constructive notice of the fact that the bonds thus indorsed were not first mortgage bonds, as required by the act..... 850

Page

The lien of the state of Missouri under Act Mo. March 3, 1837, on the property of a railroad receiving aid bonds, extends to public lands theretofore granted to aid in its construction..... 111

Bondholders may file a bill, in behalf of themselves and all others who may come in to enforce the trust, without making all bondholders parties..... 80

Where a railroad, being an indivisible line, runs through several states, and defaults in payment of interest on bonds, the court, after demand on the mortgage trustees, will compel them to take possession or appoint a receiver..... 73

Such appointment would be made even though there was no probable deficiency of the trust property to pay the debts secured by the trust deed..... 73

Where, in the case of an inseparable railroad line, running through several states, receivers are appointed by different courts in different jurisdictions, a federal court having jurisdiction will appoint a receiver for the whole line..... 73

The application of the earnings of the road in completing and operating it, after default in payment of bonds, where made in good faith, on consent of the mortgage trustees and part of the bondholders, held not a misapplication..... 12

Upon the application of a mortgage trustee for the appointment of a receiver, the company was directed to set aside half of its net earnings to the payment of interest on its bonded debt..... 12

The appointment of a receiver of the property of a railroad company in the foreclosure of a mortgage is not a matter of course on default of payment of interest, but is a matter resting in the sound discretion of the court..... 12

Where a railway is conveyed by a trust deed or mortgage to secure bonds, and it cannot be divided and sold in pieces without manifest injury to its value, the whole may be sold, before the principal is due, on default in the payment of interest..... 80

In the case of corporations created by different states operating a continuous line of road, a decree of foreclosure made in one jurisdiction on service on the corporation residing therein and the appearance of the other, will bind the latter..... 80

Where the road cannot be divided without injury to its value, the court may decree a sale of the entire property, though a large part is without its territorial jurisdiction 80

RAPE.

The aiding, abetting, and assisting others to commit rape is punishable under the penitentiary act of March 2, 1831. (4 Stat. 448.) 1099

RECEIVERS.

See, also, "Railroad Companies."

On the appointment of a receiver who has taken possession of the property, the subject of the suit, by a court having jurisdiction, no other court can interfere with the property, or entertain complaints against the receiver, or remove him..... 850

RELEASE AND DISCHARGE.

A release to one of two joint obligors extinguishes the obligation, and equity will not relieve in such a case, although it is most apparent the extinguishment was not intended by the parties..... 55

REMOVAL OF CAUSES.

See, also, "Courts."

Right of removal.

Where a case is duly removed under Act Sept. 24, 1789, § 12, by defendant, the question of jurisdiction is not dependent upon any provisions of section 11..... 265

The amount in controversy is not material on the question of the right of removal of an action as having been commenced against a federal officer for an act done under color of the federal revenue laws... 465

A suit cannot be removed from a state court into the circuit court of the United States, where a part of the plaintiffs or defendants are citizens of the state where the suit is brought and of some other state 111

A suit brought against co-partners to recover on a promissory note, where the only defendant served with process was a citizen of another state, and the other defendants were citizens of the state with plaintiff, may be removed to the federal court 637

Rev. St. § 639, subd. 2, so far as it authorizes one of defendants to remove a cause as to him alone, was not repealed by Act March 3, 1875..... 637

Time for removal.

A removal cannot be had under Act March 3, 1875, of a suit pending at its passage, wherein a trial had been had after its passage, although the verdict was set aside, and a new trial granted..... 839

Proceedings to obtain.

A petition for removal is sufficiently signed and verified by the attorney of the party 637

Notice of the application for the removal of a cause is not necessary..... 637

An order made in contempt proceedings instituted in a state court before the removal will be recognized and enforced in the federal court..... 3

But where such order has been appealed from, the federal court will hold in abeyance proceedings for its enforcement until the appeal is disposed of..... 3

A suit removed from the state court comes into the federal court impressed with all the rights and liabilities of the parties as to costs which accrued or attached by the laws of the state, while the suit remained in the state court..... 406

Effect of removal: Subsequent proceedings.

The right to object to the jurisdiction of the federal court after removal of the cause from the state court is not waived by the failure to raise the objection at the first term of the court after the record is filed 839

Where a suit is commenced by summons, and neither the summons nor complaint is filed, defendant may, in his petition for removal, show that the amount in controversy exceeds $500; and plaintiff is not entitled to a remand by afterwards filing a complaint stating the amount in dispute at less than $500 933

Where a cause is removed as having been commenced against a federal officer for an act done under color of the United States revenue laws, the question whether the defendant was acting in performance of his duty as an officer of the customs under the revenue laws is a matter of fact involved in the merits of the case, which cannot be raised upon a motion to dismiss the suit... 465

If a cause be removed from a state court by the defendant, and the plaintiff declares in the circuit court of the United States for more than $500, plaintiff cannot, by a release of part of his debt, so as to reduce it to less than $500, take away the jurisdiction of the circuit court..... 716

REPLEVIN.

Replevin will lie for the goods of a stranger taken in execution as the goods of the debtor, if taken out of the actual or constructive possession of the plaintiff..... 19

Upon the plea of property in the defendant, the burden of proof is on the plaintiff.. 19

It is not necessary to the validity of a replevin bond that the plaintiff in replevin should be bound in the bond..... 440

In debt on a replevin bond, setting forth the condition and averring special breaches, the pleas of general performance, non damnificatus, that plaintiff had no property in the goods replevied, of nul tiel record, where no record is averred in the declaration, and a plea to the whole declaration which is an answer to a part only, are bad..... 441

Actions of replevin, in Alexandria, may, on motion, be tried at the first term..... 135

The only judgment that can be issued in favor of the defendant in replevin is one cent damages and a retorno habendo. He must rely upon a suit on the replevin bond for his damages 1080

In replevin for goods distrained for rent arrear, if the jury do not render such a verdict as will enable the court to render the statutory judgment in favor of the defendant, the court may render the common-law judgment for a return of the property replevied; and in an action upon the replevin bond, for not returning the property, the defendant may, in mitigation of damages, show that no rent was in arrear..... 466

The value of the goods stated in the replevin bond is prima facie evidence of plaintiff's damages; and, if defendant should contend for a less amount, the burden of proof is on him to show it..... 466

If the jury, in replevin, do not find the value of the goods distrained, their finding of the amount of rent in arrear is surplusage 466

REPORTERS.

Notes and prefaces of the United States circuit and district courts reports..... 1261

SALE.

See, also, "Contracts"; "Vendor and Purchaser."

Where property is in the possession of a person as agent at the time he accepts an offer of sale to him, no formal delivery is necessary to pass the title..... 373

The master of a vessel, to whom its cargo of wood is offered at a certain price per cord "for the quantity shipped," is justified, in accepting the same, as meaning the quantity actually shipped, and not that as per bill of lading, though the owner intended the latter 373

The title to machines ordered and received by persons who had the exclusive right to sell such machines in the state, with the understanding that they were to pay for them if sold within the year, and, if not, that they were "to take them for the next season," where the transaction appeared upon the invoices of the manufacturer and the books of the consignees as a sale, passes to the consignees upon delivery..... 513

Page	Page
Where goods are to be paid for on delivery, the title does not pass where they are taken to the place of delivery and laid down, a note being offered in payment. Where the seller of merchandise delivers it to the wrong vessel, which sails before the mistake is discovered, and he subsequently delivers similar merchandise to the right vessel in fulfillment of the contract, the title to the first lot continues in him. Delivery of possession to the purchaser of a moiety of a vessel when in possession of the other part owner is not, in general, indispensable to pass the property. As between the mortgagor and mortgagee, notice to the part owner in possession is not necessary. Where goods are sold by sample, there is an implied warranty that the articles shall correspond with the samples. Where there is a warranty, the examination and approval of part of the articles which are delivered is not a waiver of the contract as to the others. In a contract for the sale of articles without warranty, if there be no fraud on the part of the seller, he is not answerable for the quality of the articles.	$13,000 allowed upon a valuation of $95,000 to professional wreckers for getting a ship off of Florida Reefs. The master has no right to compel the mate to perform a salvage service; and if he does perform one by the order of the master, without objection, he is to be considered as a volunteer. The master of a ship wrecked upon the coast has the custody and charge of the property, and, as against strangers and salvors, may make such arrangements as he sees fit for saving it.
SALVAGE. The relief of property from an impending peril of the sea by the voluntary exertions of those who are under no legal obligation to render assistance, and the consequent ultimate safety of the property, constitute a case of salvage. A vessel, out of sight of land, amid dangerous shoals, with master and both officers sick with a deadly, infectious disease, and with no navigator aboard, flying a signal of distress, is in a position to have salvage service rendered her. Leading the way safely out to sea for a sail vessel anchored among the shoals off Cape May, and in danger of going ashore if her cable should part, after an unsuccessful attempt to tow her, is a salvage service entitled to a liberal reward. The court will prohibit the payment of any part of the salvage to the crew of a stranded vessel who refused to assist in getting her off after wreckers were employed except upon the promise of extra compensation out of the salvage. One who recovers and carries off, against the express commands of the master, cargo accidentally fallen overboard in the salvage operation, which the authorized salvors intend to save at their earliest convenience, cannot recover salvage thereon. A vessel employed for a stipulated sum by the principal salvors with the acquiescence of the master of the wrecked ship, cannot, under any circumstances, recover salvage in addition to the sum agreed. Damages caused by grounding to a steamer which, being delayed by a salvage service rendered by her, reached her destination at low water, and struck in going over Pollock Rip, are too remote, and cannot be recovered against the salvaged vessel. Where the net proceeds of a derelict towed into port by a salvor were only $206, and the owner, after notice, failed to appear, the whole proceeds were decreed to the salvors. Forty-three per cent. allowed upon gross valuation of $41,924 for saving cargo, mainly by diving, from a vessel totally wrecked on Florida Reefs. $5,000 awarded to a steamer worth, with her cargo, $500,000, for piloting out to sea without any considerable danger to herself, a sailing vessel worth $122,500, from a position of considerable peril among the shoals off Cape May.	SCIRE FACIAS. A scire facias is an action to which a party may plead, and it may be executed in the same manner as a summons.
SEAMEN. Protection and relief. "Vessel of commerce," within Act Sept. 28, 1850, abolishing flogging, includes vessels engaged in whale and other fisheries. The provisions of the act, imposing a penalty on masters of vessels in the merchant service for shipping seamen without articles, extend to the merchant marine upon the lakes and public navigable waters connecting the same. A female shipped as cook and steward is entitled to all the rights, and subject to all the disabilities, of a mariner; and the provisions of the statute as to shipping articles apply equally to her. In an action of debt, to recover several penalties under Act 1790, c. 29, § 1, against the master of a vessel for shipping seamen without articles, a single count for all the penalties is sufficient.	SEAMEN. The contract of shipment. The description of a voyage, as "from Boston to Valparaiso or other parts of the Pacific Ocean, at and from thence home direct, or via ports in the East Indies or Europe," is not sufficiently certain, and the articles do not bind the seamen. In the case of ambiguous shipping articles, the construction most favorable to the seamen is to be adopted. Under shipping articles authorizing the master to touch at certain intermediate ports, "or as he may direct," he may stop at places not named, without violating the contract with the seamen. Where a seaman is appointed to act as mate of a vessel, by the master, during the voyage, he may be removed by the master for incompetency, and is not entitled to any other wages than those originally contracted for. A master has no right to degrade his mate in a foreign port for an alleged offense, and make him do seaman's duty; and, if the mate refuse to do duty as a seaman, the master is bound to offer him a passage home.
SEAMEN. Conduct of master or mate in respect to seamen. The abolition of "flogging" does not prohibit corporal punishment of a different kind administered by officers of vessels to compel obedience to lawful commands, or to preserve the discipline and good order of the ship. The advice of an American consul, in a foreign port, gives to the master of a vessel no justification for an illegal act. The imprisonment on shore of seamen is not justified where they peacefully refuse labor from an honest mistake of their right to discharge.	SEAMEN. Conduct of master or mate in respect to seamen. The abolition of "flogging" does not prohibit corporal punishment of a different kind administered by officers of vessels to compel obedience to lawful commands, or to preserve the discipline and good order of the ship. The advice of an American consul, in a foreign port, gives to the master of a vessel no justification for an illegal act. The imprisonment on shore of seamen is not justified where they peacefully refuse labor from an honest mistake of their right to discharge.

	Page
The practice of imprisoning disobedient seamen in foreign gaols is of doubtful legality, and to be excused only by a strong case of necessity.....	146
Wages—Right to.
Where a seaman suffering from a disease when he ships dies during the voyage, his administrator cannot recover wages	718
Where a voyage is broken up by a seizure of the vessel for the debts of its owners, one month's extra pay was allowed the seamen	600
The master may confine a refractory seaman on board of his vessel, inflict reasonable personal correction, or discharge him, without payment of his wages, according to the enormity of his offence.....	146
— Deductions: Extinguishment.
If the imprisonment of a seaman in a foreign port is improper, the expenses of it, or of the employment of a person in his stead, are not to be deducted from his wages	146
Where a cask of wine was lost while being hoisted aboard by the mate and crew, held , that the master, mate, and crew must share the loss with all the rest of the ship's equipage, in proportion to their monthly wages; and the fact that the master had paid off the seamen did not in any wise affect the contribution of the mate.....	106
Where a seaman is imprisoned for misbehavior, he does not forfeit the wages accruing during his confinement.....	470
To justify the forfeiture of a seaman's wages for absence, under the provisions of Act July 20, 1790 [1 Stat. 131], it is indispensable that there be an entry in the logbook of the fact, of the name of the seaman, and of his having gone without leave	470
SET-OFF AND COUNTERCLAIM.
A partnership debt cannot be set off in an action by an assignee of one of the partners	692
SHIPPING.
See, also, "Admiralty"; "Affreightment"; "Average"; "Bills of Lading"; "Bottomry and Respondentia"; "Carriers"; "Collision"; "Demurrage"; "Maritime Liens"; "Salvage"; "Seamen"; "Towage."
Public regulation.
An American registered vessel, while at sea, sold in part to resident citizens of the United States without a bill of sale reciting her registry, and without a new registry until her arrival at her home port, does not lose her privileges as an American vessel	46
A vessel sailing under a fishing license may touch at a foreign port, and procure supplies, without incurring forfeiture under the acts of congress.....	40
Taking on board in a foreign port, and bringing into this country, two barrels, without hire or reward, but as a favor to a friend, supposed to contain crockery, but really containing liquors, is not engaging in trade within the meaning of section 32 of the act of February 18, 1793 [1 Stat. 316], and does not subject the vessel and cargo to forfeiture.....	40
Title to and ownership of vessel.
A bill of sale of one-half of a vessel as collateral security for a debt, with a provision that the mortgagors may keep possession and use the vessel for their own

	Page
benefit until default of payment, is valid as an immediate conditional sale.....	323
The majority owners in value may fit out the vessel against consent of the minority, but they must communicate their design	50
A part owner, who will neither sell at a reasonable appraisal, nor make advances for outfit, cannot legally demand freight, but his share of the vessel will be secured to him.....	50
The master.
Where the master had leave to take his wife with him, and nothing was said about his son, five years old, he was required to pay a reasonable amount for his passage..	327
The expense of regulating the master's chronometer, where he used it for the benefit of the ship solely, should be borne by the ship	327
It is not the duty of a mate, in loading casks of wine from a lighter, either to work at the fall, or bear off with his own hands the cask from the side, as it is about to come aboard.....	106
Trustees holding the title of a vessel, and controlling and managing her for the benefit of others, are liable for the master's wages	327
The master and clerk of a vessel are not entitled to liens for their wages.....	939
Employment of vessel.
Where, during a blockade of the Chesapeake by the British, a vessel was chartered with a Sidmouth license, though such license was not expressed in the charter party, held , that the contract was invalid..	140
Notwithstanding a charter party is invalid, the charterer may, by subsequent negotiation, be liable as on a new contract to reimburse the shipowner for time and expenses incurred in attempting performance	140
The vessel is liable for the neglect of the master to present a proper manifest preventing the owner of the goods shipped from passing them through the custom-house	922
Vessel owners are not liable for damage to iron shipped under a bill of lading exempting the vessel from accountability for rust, unless the rust was received on board, and through want of proper stowage and care	930
In case of loss or damage to goods covered by a bill of lading, the presumption of law is that such loss or damage was occasioned by the act or default of the carrier	83
Lightermen, to whom is committed the charge of transporting goods from the shore, and slinging them in the lighter, for hoisting aboard, are responsible for any defect or negligence in the manner of slinging	106
The vessel is liable, where barratrously run ashore by the master, for the loss of cargo, for injury to the portion saved, and for salvage paid under a decree therefor...	33
In respect to the liability of the vessel for contracts of transportation made with the master, the law makes no distinction between passengers and merchandise.....	919
Where a passenger determined, before the date of sailing, not to take passage in the ship, he cannot complain that the ship did not sail on the day as agreed, and recover back his passage money paid.....	917
The vessel is liable in specie for passage money advanced, and for damages for failure to deliver goods shipped, where the master fails to perform his agreement to transport a passenger with his baggage....	919
Where the master failed to fulfill his contract to carry libellant, held , that he was entitled to recover from the vessel the passage money paid in advance, the expenses incurred in waiting the sailing of another ship, and the sum paid to such other vessel for passage.....	922

Limiting liability. The limitation of the owners' liability by Act March 3, 1851, § 3, to the amount or value of their interest in the ship and her freight then pending, does not limit or affect their liability for loss, damage, or injury resulting through the fault of such vessel to another vessel and her cargo from a collision between the two vessels. (Affirming 681)..	685
On a libel in personam for damages to a vessel in collision, the district court in admiralty has no power to reserve its final decree that the owners may take appropriate proceedings to limit their liability, where neither the ship and freight nor the amount or value is within its control.....	681
The value to which the liability to the owners of a vessel is limited is the value immediately after the injury, and before the vessel is repaired.....	659
Where a vessel is sailed on shares by her master who is not an owner, the interest of the owners in the freight in proceedings to limit their liability is only one-half such amount.....	659
SLAVERY. The prohibition of the importation of colored persons (Act Feb. 28, 1803) does not apply to colored seamen employed in navigating a vessel.....	239
Congress has power to prohibit citizens and residents of the United States from engaging in the slave trade with or between foreign countries, both under the power to regulate commerce (Const. art. 1, § 8, subd. 3), and because such traffic concerns the relations between citizens of the United States and those of foreign countries.....	1026
A vessel becomes liable to forfeiture because built or equipped in the United States for use in transporting slaves from one foreign country to another (Act March 22, 1794), as soon as any preparation of it for such purpose is made, a completion of the equipment not being necessary.....	1026
A vessel is "employed in the transportation of slaves from one foreign country to another" (Act May 10, 1800), so as to be liable to forfeiture, when it is on a voyage to procure slaves for that purpose, though no slaves have as yet been taken on board..	1026
Service on a voyage known to be for the purpose of procuring slaves for transportation from one foreign country to another is a violation of Act May 10, 1800, forbidding citizens and residents of the United States to serve on a vessel used in such transportation.....	1026
The history of the enactment of the "Fugitive Slave Law," and such law construed in a charge to a grand jury, by Nelson, C. J.....	1007, 1013
Under the fugitive slave law of February 12, 1793, the judge or magistrate has no power to issue a warrant to arrest the fugitive, or to commit after the examination is over and the certificate is granted, and such a warrant is wholly invalid for any purpose.....	645
SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE. The matter entitling the party to an amendment of his contract may be set up by way of defense to a proceeding to enforce a specific performance of the contract, where the clause omitted through mistake or accident would, if found in the instrument, constitute a ground of defense.....	561

But such a defense cannot be set up where the rights of a bona fide purchaser have intervened which would or might be seriously prejudiced by giving effect to the defense.....	561
---	-----

STATES.

The territory of the state of Delaware within the "twelve-miles circle" extends across the Delaware river to low-water mark on the Jersey shore.....	1123
The ordinance of 1787 for the government of the Northwest Territory was superseded by the adoption of the constitution of the United States, and the admission to the Union of the states formed from that territory.....	503
The United States laws act directly upon individuals, and are to be enforced by national instrumentalities. A state, as a political body, cannot be compelled to execute such laws.....	1042

STATUTES.

To warrant a court in declaring unconstitutional a law passed by congress, the defect of legislative power must be of the most plain and indisputable character.....	1160
The fact that a law of congress has been in course of execution for many years, and has been acquiesced in during that time, is a strong reason why the courts, especially those of a subordinate character, should not decide the same to be unconstitutional....	1160
The inhibition of the enactment of special laws giving effect to informal or invalid wills or deeds does not apply to a general curative statute.....	707
The provisions of a statute, so far as they are inconsistent with those of a subsequent statute relating to the same subject-matter, are by implication, if not expressly, repealed by the later statute.....	533
An act introduced for the purpose of validating certain bonds which did not pass the legislature by the vote required by the constitution is not constructive notice to anybody of anything.....	850

SUBROGATION.

The fact that the state, which had indorsed railroad company bonds, and was secured by a mortgage, could not be sued, is no reason why the holders of the bonds should not be subrogated to the rights of the state, and have the benefit of the security.....	850
--	-----

TIME.

When the question is as to the effect of a proceeding instituted on the same day on which an act affecting the validity of such proceeding was passed, the precise time at which the act became a law may be properly inquired into.....	752
--	-----

TOWAGE.

See, also, "Collision"; "Salvage."
The contract of towage implies knowledge of the channel and safe pilotage.....	946
In making up a tow, vessels of heavy draft should be placed behind those of lighter draft.....	946
A tug which, in towing a ship, negligently brings her against a wharf, is liable in damages, although the ship was rotten and unseaworthy, unless her condition was the sole cause of the injury.....	625

TRADE-MARKS AND TRADE-NAMES.

The exclusive right to use the trade-mark of a firm does not pass to a member by implication on a sale of the business to him, but he may use the trade-mark, provided he do so in a manner not to deceive the public 845

TREASON.

Until belligerent rights are accorded by the political department of the government to the state or people in rebellion, the judiciary must regard them as rebels and lawless aggressors, and apply to them the penal law 997

The words "levying war," as used in the constitutional definition of "treason," include not only the act of making war for the purpose of entirely overthrowing the government, but also any combination forcibly to oppose the execution of any public law of the United States, with intent to prevent its enforcement in all cases, if accompanied or followed by an act of forcible opposition to such law in pursuance of such combination....1024, 1047

If a body of men be actually assembled for the purpose of effecting a treasonable purpose by force, that is levying war. But it must be an assemblage in force,—a military assemblage in a condition to make war....1039

And there must be some overt act done, or some attempt made by them, with force, to execute, or towards executing, that purpose. The assembly must be in a condition to use force, and must intend to use it, if necessary, to further, aid, or accomplish the treasonable design1046

If the assembly is arrayed in a military manner, if they are armed and marched in military form, for the express purpose of overawing and intimidating the public, and thus attempt to carry into effect the treasonable design, this will, of itself, amount to a levy of war, although no actual blow be struck, or engagement take place.....1046

If a body of men be actually assembled in force, in a condition to make war, in order to overturn the government at any one place by force, this is levying war. It is not necessary that the assemblage should be with military arms and array; numbers alone may supply the requisite force.....1042

If any such assemblage, for the purpose of subverting the government at any place, take forcible possession of any fort, arsenal, or other property of the United States, this is an act of levying war.....1042

If a convention, legislature, junto, or other assemblage entertain the purpose of subverting the government, and to that end pass acts, resolves, ordinances, or decrees, even with the view of raising a military force to carry their purpose into effect, this alone does not constitute a levying of war.....1042

A conspiracy to prevent, by force, the execution of any one law of the United States in all cases, is a treasonable conspiracy; and if there be an actual assemblage of men for the purpose of carrying this intention into effect,—that is, of acting together, and preventing by force the execution of the law generally,—this constitutes a levying of war, and involves the crime of treason..... 1015, 1042, 1046

If there be an assembly of persons, with force, with an intent to prevent the collection of lawful taxes or duties levied by the government, or to destroy all customhouses, or to resist the administration of justice in the courts of the United States, and the assemblage proceed to execute this purpose by force, this is treason against the United States1046

A mere treasonable conspiracy, whether for the purpose of entirely overthrowing the government, or to prevent the execution of any of its laws, is not sufficient to constitute the crime of treason, as defined by the constitution of the United States. In addition to the conspiracy, there must be an actual assemblage of men for the purpose of carrying the conspiracy into effect by force..... 1015, 1032, 1034, 1042

The sudden outbreak of a mob, or the assembling of men, in order, by force, to prevent the execution of a law in a particular instance, and then to disperse, without any intention of continuing together or reassembling for defeating the law generally and in all cases, is not a levying of war such as constitutes treason1015, 1042

The combination of a body of men, with the design of seizing, and the actual seizing, of the forts and other public property of the United States, is a levying of war against the United States, and is treason.....1032

All persons engaged therein are by the law regarded as levying war against the United States; and all who adhere to them are to be regarded as enemies; and all who give them, in any part of the United States, aid and comfort, come within the provisions of the act of April 30, 1790, and are guilty of treason1032

The meaning of the words "overt act" as used in the constitutional definition of treason and in the statute, is an act of a character susceptible of clear proof, and not resting in mere inference or conjecture.....1036

Words, oral, written, or printed, however treasonable, seditious, or criminal of themselves, do not constitute an overt act of treason1034

In a civil war, persons who adhere to their allegiance are not, although they reside in an insurrectionary district, regarded as enemies; and trade with such persons, in good faith and without collusion with the enemy, is lawful, unless interdicted by the government1034

To be employed in actual service in an army raised to oppose the government in its action, or directly or indirectly to aid or assist in the levying or embodying of a military force for the subversion of the government, are plainly acts of "levying war," and involve the commission of the crime of treason. The constitutional definition of treason, however, is of broader signification, and includes all those who join a hostile army after war is begun.....1036

The words, "adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort," include, in general, any act committed after war actually exists which indicates a want of loyalty to the government and sympathy with its enemies, and which, by fair construction, is directly in furtherance of their hostile designs1036

After war actually exists, it is treasonable to sell to, or provide arms or munitions of war, or military stores and supplies, including food, clothing, etc., for the use of, the enemy; to hire, sell, or furnish boats, railroad cars, or other means of transportation, or to advance money or obtain credits for the use and support of the hostile army; and to communicate intelligence to the enemy by letter, telegraph, or otherwise, relating to the strength, movements, or position of the army.....1036

Mere expressions of opinion indicative of sympathy with the public enemy are not sufficient, under the constitution and laws, to warrant a conviction of treason.....1036

To constitute treason against the United States by levying war, there must be a levying of war against the United States in their sovereign character, and not merely a

levying of war exclusively against the sovereignty of a particular state.....	1046
There may be treason against a state by levying war which is aimed altogether against the sovereignty of the state.....	1046
Treason begun against a state may be mixed up or merged in treason against the United States. If the treasonable purpose be to overthrow the government of the state, and forcibly to withdraw it from the Union, and thereby to prevent the exercise of the national sovereignty within the limits of the state, this would be treason against the United States.....	1046
If the troops of the United States should be called out by the president, upon the application of a state legislature or executive, to protect the state against domestic violence, and there should be an assembly of persons with force to resist and oppose the United States troops, this would be treason against the United States, although the primary intention of the insurgents may have been only to overthrow the state government or the state laws.....	1036
If a body of men be actually assembled to effect by force a treasonable purpose, all those who perform any part, however minute, or however remote from the scene of action, and who are actually leagued in the general conspiracy, are to be considered guilty of treason.....	1024, 1049
If war be actually levied at one place, and any person in league with those actually engaged therein send them arms, money, provisions, or intelligence for the purpose of aiding them, he is guilty of treason, however distant he may be from the place of their assemblage.....	1042
A person present, directing, aiding, abetting, counseling, or countenancing the violence, or if, though absent at the time of its actual perpetration, he yet directed the act, or devised or knowingly furnished the means for carrying it into effect, and instigated others thereto, he is guilty of treason.....	1047
An alien resident may be guilty of treason by co-operating either with rebels or foreign enemies.....	1042, 1047
The expressions, "levying war," and "adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort," in the constitutional definition of "treason," were borrowed from the ancient law of England, and are to be understood in the sense which they bore in England when the constitution was adopted.....	1047
Direct proof of the combining to prevent the enforcement of a law may be found in declared purposes of the individual party before the actual outbreak, or it may be derived from proceedings of meetings in which he took part openly, or which he either prompted or made effective by his countenance or sanction, commending, counseling, or instigating forcible resistance to the law.....	1047
Direct proof of the purpose, however, is not legally necessary. The concert of purpose may be deduced from the concerted action itself, or it may be inferred from facts occurring at the time, or before or afterwards.....	1047
The constitutional provision that "no person shall be convicted of treason, unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court" (article 3, § 3), applies, it seems, only to the proofs on the trial, and not to a preliminary hearing before a committing magistrate, or the proceedings before a grand jury.....	1047
Persons who have any knowledge of acts of treason, and do not as soon as possible make it known in the manner prescribed by Act April 30, 1790, § 2, are guilty of misprision of treason.....	1032

Prior to Act July 31, 1861, there was no law for punishing treasonable combinations or conspiracies which were not consummated by an overt act. The statute of that date, however, makes criminal not only combinations to overthrow the government, but conspiracies or mutual agreements, whether by few or many, whether public or private, forcibly to resist, or even to delay the execution of, any law.....	1049
Act July 31, 1861, was designed to punish the mere act of conspiring, which, under the constitutional definition and the act of 1790, do not involve the crime of treason, unless there is an attempt to consummate the treasonable act.....	1036
Act Aug. 6, 1861, making it a high misdemeanor to recruit soldiers or sailors in any state or territory to engage in armed hostility against the United States, or to open a recruiting station for the enlistment of such persons, was intended to reach acts not deemed treasonable under the statute of 1790.....	1036

TRESPASS.

Trespass vi et armis lies by the owner of a slave against a stranger who beats the slave per quod servitium amisit..... 138

TRIAL.

See, also, "Appeal"; "Continuance"; "Evidence"; "Judgment"; "Jury"; "New Trial"; "Practice"; "Witnesses."

Where a juror is taken suddenly ill, the jury may be discharged and the cause continued to the next term..... 850

A general finding for the plaintiff or defendant by a jury is good, and disposes of all the issues..... 952

Instructions should be taken as a whole.. 67

Where a case is submitted to the court special findings are not necessary..... 952

A variance between the capias ad respondendum and the declaration is not a ground for arresting the judgment..... 107

TROVER AND CONVERSION.

The fact that a party came lawfully into possession of property is not the criterion to determine whether a demand and refusal are necessary in an action of trover 967

Where a person purchases personal property from one to whom it has been loaned by the owner, a demand of him is not necessary to support an action of trover.... 967

TRUSTS.

The trustee of a family settlement in which infants are interested may be changed by consent of the parties, upon a bill filed for that purpose only..... 869

A trustee given the power to sell the trust property and reinvest in other property, when the same can be done advantageously, has not an unlimited power of sale, and a sale to his personal creditor in part payment of a debt is not a valid execution of the trust; and, where the purchaser has notice of the violation of the trust, the property is chargeable in his hands with the trust..... 631

Purchasers who took with notice of an invalid execution of a trust in their chain of title, who believed their title good, where the trust is enforced against the land, are entitled to the amount of incumbrances which they have paid, and permanent improvements made, as well as advances they have made to the cestuis que trustent, to be offset against the profits.. 631

UNITED STATES MARSHALS.

See "Marshal."

USE AND OCCUPATION.

In Virginia an action for use and occupation will lie although there be a parol demise for a time, and rent certain, if it be waived, and a promise to pay for the time occupied. 387

USURY.

See, also, "Banks and Banking."

The making a note payable at a place in which exchange sells at a premium does not constitute usury, nor does it render the note void in the hands of a bank whose charter prohibits the taking more than a certain rate of interest. 824

A contract not usurious at the time it is made cannot become so by any future contingency 824

A stranger cannot set up usury as a defense 785

Affirmative relief against a usurious contract will be granted in equity only upon condition that plaintiff pay the amount of money advanced, or allow a decree therefor 785

VENDOR AND PURCHASER.

See, also, "Bankruptcy"; "Fraudulent Conveyances"; "Grant"; "Sale"; "Specific Performance."

To constitute a purchaser without notice, it is not sufficient that the contract should be made without notice, but that the purchase money should be paid before notice 631

The measure of damages in an action for breach of a covenant to convey lands; the title to which was not in the defendant, is the value of the lands at the time of judgment 160

WAR.

See, also, "Prize"; "Treason."

The mayor and common council of a city in Virginia, elected under the de facto government of that state during the Civil War, during the occupation by federal forces, do not derive their authority from the military, and a suit based upon acts done by them cannot be removed into the federal court, as acts done in obedience to the orders of the national authority. . . . 537

WILLS.

It is not necessary to the validity of a will of personal property that it should have any date, that it should be in the handwriting of the testator, or signed by him, or have any subscribing witnesses, provided it was drawn at his request, and according to his dictation. 1068

From 1676, when the act of 29 Car. II. was enacted, no nuncupative will can, under any circumstances, pass real estate. . . 1099

In the District of Columbia there must be not less than three witnesses to a nuncupative will where the amount of personal property exceeds £30. 1099

Where the orphans' court in the District of Columbia passes upon the question which of two papers is the last will of deceased, and an issue from such court is pending in the circuit court, the orphans' court has no jurisdiction to pass upon the question whether another paper is the last will of testator. 953

A will is not effective until probated in the proper court. 956

A devise expressly for life or in tail cannot be enlarged into a fee by other words of doubtful import. 63

A devise to A., and, if he die without heir or issue, the estate to go to B., his brother, gives an estate tail to A. by implication 63

A direction by a testator that his estate shall be held in trust for his daughter and her heirs, free from the control or disposal of any husband she might have, and exempt from his debts, contracts, or engagements, does not refer to the right of guardianship of the husband over the children after the death of the wife. 1069

A devise to an only daughter and her husband, "to them, their heirs begotten of their bodies, or assigns, forever, or, for want of such heirs or assigns, then to the heirs begotten by, or either of them, and to their assigns forever," gives an estate tail to the daughter and her husband, which, in the event of their death without issue, is to go to the heirs of the body of the survivor. 694

Under a devise to testator's wife of all his property, except outstanding debts, which he directs that she shall collect as executor and give to three persons as thereafter to be directed by him, where he dies without making such direction, the wife does not take title under the will to such debts or their proceeds. 388

Testator bequeathed a certain sum of money to a person in trust to invest in lands in the names of six grandchildren, to be conveyed and vested in them in fee simple, and, in case of the death of any of them, the share of the child so dying should go to the survivors. Held, that the will had reference only to a death during the lifetime of testator. 433

A devise of lands "after payment of debts" subjects the land to the payment of the debts. 716

WITNESSES.

See, also, "Bankruptcy"; "Costs"; "Deposition"; "Trial."

The general rule of law is that a party to a suit cannot be a witness. This rule is founded on the interest the party has in the suit, and when that interest is removed the objection ceases to exist. 55

A plaintiff who has assigned all his interest in the suit to a co-plaintiff, and has deposited a sum with the clerk to cover all costs, is competent. 55

The court will not look to remote contingencies in order to disqualify a witness from giving testimony. 55

A constable, defendant in replevin, who justifies under an execution, if indemnified by the plaintiff therein, is a competent witness 386

The bankrupt is a competent witness where his assignee is a party, as he can have no legal interest in the decision of the case 692

A summons to a witness to attend before a register in bankruptcy may be served outside the district but within 100 miles of the place where the witness is required to attend 542

If a witness, whose residence is not at the place of holding court, is summoned at the place of trial, he is allowed mileage for returning to his home, but not for coming to the court. 518

