

Citizens or entities who are subject to any and all laws must have reasonable prior access to those laws. If a particular law requires the setting of standards, the government should hire competent persons or organizations that can create such standards and make the full content of the resulting law freely available over the Internet or at minimal cost (i.e., the cost of reproduction).

It is unjust - and arguably unlawful - to expect individuals or other entities to comply with laws to which they do not have reasonable prior access.